which comes the cl[illegible]
the expressive effect Schna[illegible] over, the record offers Lateiner's sh[illegible] of the Bagatelles Op. 126 that Schnabel [illegible] with—examples of Beethoven's other kind of late w[illegible] for the piano in their small-scale and concentrated embodiment of their remote and at times strange expressive content.

On the other hand, Victor gives us Artur Rubinstein's performance of an attractive example of Beethoven's early writing, his Concerto No. 1. It isn't as excitingly enlivening as Glenn Gould's in the first movement, as sparkling as his in the finale; but the relaxed, musically sensitive and beautiful-sounding playing is effective in its different way, and is heard, as Gould's is not, in a context of fine playing by the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf.

Of Haydn's late works, one of the most impressive [illegible] The Creation, which astounds one right at the start [illegible] power of its introductory representation of chaos, [illegible] to amaze one with its flow of superb mel- [illegible] articulated by remarkable harmonic [illegible] some of its descriptive passages, [illegible] of its choruses, to charm [illegible] the last section.

tempo [illegible]
Mehta's rattling off of [illegible] m's with undistinguished performance of Ka[illegible] sion with the Los Angeles Philharmonic orchestra on [illegible] other side.

Prokofiev's fine Piano Concerto No. 3 is performed admirably by John Browning with the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf on a Victor record which offers also the arid Concerto No. 4.

Of the two new performances of Tchaikovsky's engagingly melodious Violin Concerto, I prefer the more quietly lyrical one by Itzhak Perlman with the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf on a Victor record to the impassioned one by Leonid Kogan with the Paris Conservatory Concerts Orchestra under Silvestri on a Seraphim stereo record.

A Victrola mono record has the beautiful performances of arias from Il Trovatore, La Forza del Destino, Aida and Un Ballo in Maschera that Milanov was able to achieve in the recording studio in the years when she was excruciating the ear with her tremulous shrillness in performances at the Metropolitan.

One of the most extraordinary voices of today, the mezzo-soprano of Marilyn Horne, is heard on a London stereo record in excerpts from Carmen, Mignon, Samson et Dalila and Werther.

And what to my ear are Palestrina's most beautiful music, his motets to texts from The Song of Solomon, are sung well on a Crossroads stereo record by the Slovak Philharmonic Chorus under Jan Maria Dobrodinsky.

B. H. HAGGIN

Recorded Tape Reviews

BERT WHYTE

Open-Reel Classical

Beethoven: Piano Concerto #1 in C, Op. 15; Piano Concerto #3 in C minor, Op. 37. Artur Rubinstein, piano. Erich Leinsdorf Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RCA Victor TR3-5038, open reel, 3¾ ips ($9.95)

What is it about symphony orchestra conductors and our great piano and violin virtuosi that makes them not only live so long, but have so much verve and votality at their advanced age? One doctor friend of mine suggests that conducting and playing begun at an early age strengthens the heart and in later years constitutes the ideal amount of exercise to keep the heart in good shape. The recent furor about the benefits of "jogging" would seem to bolster this opinion. In any case, Artur Rubinstein, the "elder statesman of the piano" continues to amaze not only because of the seemingly undiminished vigor of his playing, but for the hectic pace of his concert activities.

This pair of Beethoven piano concertos are given a very powerful, strongly propulsive performance and this steel-fingered bravura approach at his age is astonishing. Far more exciting than the efforts of many younger men, his playing still retains the famous Rubinstein warmth and almost poetic expressiveness. In the 1st piano concerto the recording balance favors the piano. There is a strong central image of the piano, projected well forward. The recording was made fairly close-up with a moderately broad acoustic perspective. The hammer action of the piano is frequently audible. Leinsdorf's accompaniment is sympathetic but is on the heavy side and sonically somewhat coarse-textured.

The overall recording is fairly clean but, as usual, the 3¾ ips speed blunts the piano transients. A big-sounding recording, but with rather restricted dynamic range. Almost no crosstalk, little print-through. However at a room-filling level the hiss was obtrusive. There were also some low-frequency sounds which I suspect is the bus outside Symphony Hall. In many Boston Symphony recordings if you have a system with really good low-frequency response and your listening room is quiet enough, in some of the low level passages you will hear the bus accelerating away from the Hall!

The 3rd piano concerto fares better sonically. There is a better piano/orchestral balance, the orchestral accompaniment is not so heavy, piano is cleaner, more articulate. Piano also seems "lighter" in tonal characteristics; possibly a different Steinway than that used in the 1st Concerto, although Rubinstein likes to record with the same piano whenever possible. Wider dynamics in this recording. All other factors are pretty much as in the 3rd Concerto, including, unfortunately, the obtrusive hiss.

New Classical Albums

By Marilyn Tucker

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 1 in C Major, Op. 15. (Artur Rubinstein, soloist; Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor.) RCA Victor LSC 3013.

This is Rubinstein's fifth collaborative effort with Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony (three other Beethoven's: Nos. 3, 4 and 5 and Brahms' No. 1) and, as usual, it's superb.

With Rubinstein in his 80's, it is all the more remarkable for its drive and intensity, strength and spirit, and passages of great joy. Another must.

San Francisco Examiner
D. 220,372
FEB 2 1969

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 24,000
APR 1969

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 175,118
SUN. - CIRC. 185,817
JUL-24-68

4, 1968 NY

'On Record'

A weekly look at specially recommended recordings.

Beethoven: Concerto No. 1 in C, Opus 15. Artur Rubinstein, piano; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA Victor LM-3013.

A particularly felicitous recording of what we know as Beethoven's first piano concerto, which it was not, having been completed in 1798 when the composer still had ideas for a career as a piano virtuoso. It is often referred to as Mozartian — perhaps so in form, but hardly in content, for Beethoven, the "bizarre one," was very much himself. Rubinstein plays as only he can, and the Bostonians under Leinsdorf join in the pleasure.

UTICA OBSERVER DISPATCH
Sunday, August 4, 1968

RECORDS

BY THEODORE STRONGIN
New York Times News Service

NEW YORK —In the world of music, the spring and summer of 1968 belong to a stocky, earnest, dark-haired young man named Daniel Barenboim. The Barenboim star began rising and accelerated when he stepped in at short notice and conducted Leonard Bernstein's [illegible] in four concerts at Carnegie Hall. Beethoven's Symphony No. [illegible] him as a phenomenon. Columbia Disk (ML 6484, stereo [illegible] the English Chamber Barenboim and as free-spirited. But here [illegible] through. Bernstein, compared to Barenboim is [illegible] statesman.

• • •

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN presents a distinctive view of Beethoven on a recording of the Piano Concerto No. 1 in C with Rich Leinsdorf leading the Boston Symphony (RCA Victor LM 3013, stereo LSC 3013). To say that the disk is Rubinsteinesque—mercurial, subtle, completely songful—implies that the pianist's approach to the classical era is more romantic than either Bernstein's or Barenboim's. But with Rubinstein, to talk of style would be puristic quibbling. He is his usual miraculous self here, fresh as ever, an 82-year-old child of nature.

Beethoven: Piano Concerto No. 1—Artur Rubinstein, Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC3013]. Like most truly great artists Rubinstein never rests on his laurels—continually restudying and rethinking works he has long excelled at. Though he has previously recorded all the Beethoven piano concertos (with Krips), he's now redoing them (with Leinsdorf)— and the results are indeed better than before. This 1st (like the previously redone 3rd, 4th, and 5th) has more tenderness and warmth without losing any of its former sparkle and excitement. And Leinsdorf again proves that a great soloist brings out the best in him, too. (R.H.)

EVENING INDEPENDENT
MASSILLON, O.
P. M. - CIRC. 18,437
JUN-24-68

Abraham Kaplan [illegible] Camerata Singers in a dram[illegible] performance of this beautiful work. Ages: All. Grade: Excellent.

"Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1." (RCA Victor LCS-3013). Featuring Arthur Rubinstein at the piano. Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this highly professional performance. Ages: All. Grade: Good Plus.

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800
SEP 20 1968

★ ★ ★

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 1. Artur Rubinstein, pianist, with Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA-Victor LSC-3013

Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, give a great performance of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 in C, Op. 15.

It is difficult to define the source of Rubinstein's magic, but there is a compelling power in his playing which is undeniable. The recorded sound of both piano and orchestra is superb.

★ ★ ★

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 327,594 SUN. 356,929

JUL 6 1968

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concertos: No. 1, in C Major, Op. 15; No. 3, in C Minor, Op. 37. Artur Rubinstein (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA Ⓢ TR3 5038 $10.95.

Performance: Fluent
Recording: Solid
Stereo Quality: Good
Speed and Playing Time: 3¾ ips; 71'56"

Only the Second Concerto is now needed to complete Artur Rubinstein's four-track tape traversal of the five Beethoven piano concertos with Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. Unless the Harrison catalog of stereo tapes has misprinted the information, Leon Fleisher and George Szell with the Cleveland Orchestra offer all five on two 3¾-ips reels at $17.39. Otherwise, Mr. Rubinstein has no other 3¾-ips tape competition, though performances of Nos. 1 and 3 by such renowned Beethovenists as Backhaus and Serkin can be had in 7½-ips format.

Rubinstein's way with Beethoven is that of the intensely musical and thoroughly seasoned non-specialist. He does not linger over the slow movements, and he tends to favor slightly slower pacing of the opening movements, chiefly in the interest of lyrical detail. Piano-orchestra balance is excellent throughout both sequences of the RCA tape, with the microphoning tending to be from the vantage point of the conductor's podium rather than that of, say, a first-row balcony seat. D. H.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

MAR 1969

91

LSC-3013 STEREO

Beethoven
Piano Concerto No.1
Artur Rubinstein
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Erich Leinsdorf

CLASSICAL

BEETHOVEN: PIANO CONCERTO No. 1—Rubinstein/Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf, RCA Victor Red Seal LP 3013 (M); LSC 3013 (S)

Artur Rubinstein's recordings with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have attracted lots of attention as will this team-up on Beethoven's first concerto. Rubinstein's piano work is masterful and Leinsdorf adds to the excitement by leading the orchestra through some stirring moments.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000

JUL 27 1968

SUNDAY OKLAHOMAN
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLAH
Circ. 274,576

10-6-63

Preview List Recommended For Symphony

By John Acord III

Final part of sampling the Oklahoma City Symphony's 32nd season, under Guy ... Harrison, music ... recordings, although ... contains some ... features gorgeous singing on rec... Mi- and Bruno Walter conducts.

James Oliver Buswell IV, violinist, has not yet announced his selection. But the orchestra portion of the twelfth concerto is the exciting Bartok "Concerto for Orchestra." My personal preference on the Bartok is a splendid recording on RCA featuring Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony.

London Record Praised

The final concert of the ... features one of my ... pianists — ...

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

JUL 5 1968

Recordings Reports I

Orchestral LPs

Data	Report
Beethoven: Concerto No. 1. Artur Rubinstein, piano; with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor stereo, LSC 3013; mono, LM 3013; $5.79.	It is hardly a fulsome compliment to declare that everything is neat, tidy, and beautifully dovetailed in this collaboration. Since "Rubinstein" and "Boston Symphony" are brand names of guaranteed excellence, such is the outcome to expect when they meet on the common ground of Beethoven. It is the above and beyond the neat, tidy, and beautifully dovetailed to which one's attention is directed, but too often left unfulfilled. Rubinstein plays the elaborations of the Largo with surpassing breadth and fine singing sound, but it doesn't strike me that he responds to either the first or the last movement with the kind of spirit that animated Christoph Eschenbach in his recent collaboration with Karajan. One may retort that the decades between them preclude such a result. However, if one is inclined to praise Rubinstein for the plusses that have accrued over the years, then a fair sum demands that the minuses be noted also. He plays a long (unidentified) cadenza whose only cachet can be that it was by Beethoven himself. Fine sound, and admirably balanced, too. —IRVING KOLODIN.

COMMONWEAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 46,000

AUG 9 1968

Camera Talk

BY DON LANGER

tapes, ... versity Sound ... mitted to both ... and its world-famous ... speakers. United Audio turn... tables, rated last year as the finest, will keep its lead with a new turntable joining its four excellent models.

The Week's Tapes

RCA has released four new 8-track tape cartridges. "The Wonderful Latin-American Sound of Brazil" (P8S-1341); "Beethoven Piano No. 1, Arthur Rubenstein"; Boston Symphony Erich Leinsdorf (R8S-1096); "The Pops Goes West" Boston Pops (R8S-1095; and, "Living Marimbas, Love is Blue" (C8S-1038).

Recorded Tape Reviews

BERT WHYTE

Open-Reel Classical

Beethoven: Piano Concerto #1 in C, Op. 15; Piano Concerto #3 in C minor, Op. 37. Artur Rubinstein, piano. Erich Leinsdorf Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RCA Victor TR3-5038,
open reel, 3¾ ips ($9.95)

What is it about symphony orchestra conductors and our great piano and violin virtuosi that makes them not only live so long, but have so much verve and votality at their advanced age? One doctor friend of mine suggests that conducting and playing begun at an early age strengthens the heart and in later years constitutes the ideal amount of exercise to keep the heart in good shape. The recent furor about the benefits of "jogging" would seem to bolster this opinion. In any case, Artur Rubinstein, the "elder statesman of the piano" continues to amaze not only because of the seemingly undiminished vigor of his playing, but for the hectic pace of his concert activities.

This pair of Beethoven piano concertos are given a very powerful, strongly propulsive performance and this steel-fingered bravura approach at his age is astonishing. Far more exciting than the efforts of many younger men, his playing still retains the famous Rubinstein warmth and almost poetic expressiveness. In the 1st piano concerto the recording balance favors the piano. There is a strong central image of the piano, projected well forward. The recording was made fairly close-up with a moderately broad acoustic perspective. The hammer action of the piano is frequently audible. Leinsdorf's accompaniment is sympathetic but is on the heavy side and sonically somewhat coarse-textured

The overall recording is fairly clean but, as usual, the 3¾ ips speed blunts the piano transients. A big-sounding recording, but with rather restricted dynamic range. Almost no crosstal, little print-through. However at a room-filling level the hiss was obtrusive. There were also some low-frequency sounds which I suspect is the bus outside Symphony Hall. In many Boston Symphony recordings if you have a system with really good low-frequency response and your listening room is quiet enough, in some of the low level passages you will hear the bus accelerating away from the Hall!

The 3rd piano concerto fares better sonically. There is a better piano/orchestral balance, the orchestral accompaniment is not so heavy, piano is cleaner, more articulate. Piano also seems "lighter" in tonal characteristics; possibly a different Steinway than that used in the 1st Concerto, although Rubinstein likes to record with the same piano whenever possible. Wider dynamics in this recording. All other factors are pretty much as in the 3rd Concerto, including, unfortunately, the obtrusive hiss.

New Classical Albums

By Marilyn Tucker

San Francisco Examiner
D. 220,372

FEB 2 1969

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 1 in C Major, Op. 15. (Artur Rubinstein, soloist; Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor.) RCA Victor LSC 3013.

This is Rubinstein's fifth collaborative effort with Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony (three other Beethoven's: Nos. 3, 4 and 5 and Brahms' No. 1) and, as usual, it's superb.

With Rubinstein in his 80's, it is all the more remarkable for its drive and intensity, strength and spirit, and passages of great joy. Another must.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 175,118
SUN. - CIRC. 185,817

JUL-24-68

4, 1968 NY

'On Record'

A weekly look at specially recommended recordings.

Beethoven: Concerto No. 1 in C, Opus 15. Artur Rubinstein, piano; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA Victor LM-3013.

A particularly felicitous recording of what we know as Beethoven's first piano concerto, which it was not, having been completed in 1798 when the composer still had ideas for a career as a piano virtuoso. It is often referred to as Mozartian — perhaps so in form, but hardly in content, for Beethoven, the "bizarre one," was very much himself. Rubinstein plays as only he can, and the Bostonians under Leinsdorf join in the pleasure.

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 1,000

APR 1969

UTICA OBSERVER DISPATCH
Sunday, August 4, 1968

RECORDS

BY THEODORE STRONGIN
New York Times News Service

NEW YORK —In the world of music, the spring and summer of 1968 belong to a stocky, earnest, dark-haired young man named Daniel Barenboim. The Barenboim star began rising and accelerated when he stepped in at short notice and conducted Leonard Bernstein's ... in four concerts at Carnegie Hall. Beethoven's Symphony No. ... him as a phenomenon. Columbia Disk (ML 6484, stereo ... the English Chamber Barenboim and as free-spirited. But here ... Festival through. Bernstein, compared to Barenboim is ... statesman.

• • •

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN presents a distinctive view of Beethoven on a recording of the Piano Concerto No. 1 in C with Rich Leinsdorf leading the Boston Symphony (RCA Victor LM 3013, stereo LSC 3013). To say that the disk is Rubinsteinesque—mercurial, subtle, completely songful—implies that the pianist's approach to the classical era is more romantic than either Bernstein's or Barenboim's. But with Rubinstein, to talk of style would be puristic quibbling. He is his usual miraculous self here, fresh as ever, an 82-year-old child of nature.

Beethoven: Piano Concerto No. 1—Artur Rubinstein, Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC3013]. Like most truly great artists Rubinstein never rests on his laurels—continually restudying and rethinking works he has long excelled at. Though he has previously recorded all the Beethoven piano concertos (with Krips), he's now redoing them (with Leinsdorf)— and the results are indeed better than before. This 1st (like the previously redone 3rd, 4th, and 5th) has more tenderness and warmth without losing any of its former sparkle and excitement. And Leinsdorf again proves that a great soloist brings out the best in him, too. (R.H.)

EVENING INDEPENDENT
MASSILLON, O.
P. M. - CIRC. 18,437

JUN-24-68

Abraham Kaplan ... Camerata Singers in a dram... performance of this beautiful work. Ages: All. Grade: Excellent.

"Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1." (RCA Victor LCS-3013). Featuring Arthur Rubinstein at the piano. Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this highly professional performance. Ages: All. Grade: Good Plus.

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,600

SEP 20 1968

---

tura...
the detailed ...
which comes the cl...
the expressive effect Schna...
over, the record offers Lateiner's sm... of the Bagatelles Op. 126 that Schnabel ... with—examples of Beethoven's other kind of late w...
for the piano in their small-scale and concentrated embodiment of their remote and at times strange expressive content.

On the other hand, Victor gives us Artur Rubinstein's performance of an attractive example of Beethoven's early writing, his Concerto No. 1. It isn't as excitingly enlivening as Glenn Gould's in the first movement, as sparkling as his in the finale; but the relaxed, musically sensitive and beautiful-sounding playing is effective in its different way, and is heard, as Gould's is not, in a context of fine playing by the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf.

Of Haydn's late works, one of the most impressive ... The Creation, which astounds one right at the start ... power of its introductory representation of chaos, ... to amaze one with its flow of superb mel... articulated by remarkable harmonic ... some of its descriptive passages, ... of its choruses, to charm ... the last section.

tempo ...
Mehta's rattling off of ... m's with undistinguished performance of Ravel ... sion with the Los Angeles Philharmonic orchestra on ... other side.

Prokofiev's fine Piano Concerto No. 3 is performed admirably by John Browning with the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf on a Victor record which offers also the arid Concerto No. 4.

Of the two new performances of Tchaikovsky's engagingly melodious Violin Concerto, I prefer the more quietly lyrical one by Itzhak Perlman with the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf on a Victor record to the impassioned one by Leonid Kogan with the Paris Conservatory Concerts Orchestra under Silvestri on a Seraphim stereo record.

A Victrola mono record has the beautiful performances of arias from Il Trovatore, La Forza del Destino, Aida and Un Ballo in Maschera that Milanov was able to achieve in the recording studio in the years when she was excruciating the ear with her tremulous shrillness in performances at the Metropolitan.

One of the most extraordinary voices of today, the mezzo-soprano of Marilyn Horne, is heard on a London stereo record in excerpts from Carmen, Mignon, Samson et Dalila and Werther.

And what to my ear are Palestrina's most beautiful music, his motets to texts from The Song of Solomon, are sung well on a Crossroads stereo record by the Slovak Philharmonic Chorus under Jan Maria Dobrodinsky.

B. H. HAGGIN

92

From a composer who is among the select, one of the most penetrating contributions that he or anyone else has made to music in the 20th century—

Elliott Carter's Piano Concerto

By ARTHUR COHN

DIAGNOSTICS in music, more simply stated as experimentation (but, since the process is far from facile, the initial word is preferable), by now practically has been worked into the ground. One must confess that the greater part of recent listening to rigorous demonstrations by the sophisticated young has been a hearing of music of puzzlepated plan. One is distressed because the creativity, when probed, may be quite fancy, of genteel cleverness, but is too often a distortion of honesty. The theorem of "being different" turns into a hybrid, a smug merger of cheap effects, sonic pogo-stick gimmickry. Above all, such a surfeit has confused matters, for much of this expostulation should not appear on musical programs; it belongs rather in a category with theater, vaudeville, or multimedia neo-morality shows.

Freedom, of course, belongs to those who create—art is, after all, one field where total, unfettered democracy can be achieved. However, freedom does not always bring forth first-rate composers. There are very, very few who pass the test, which asks a clean-cut and a clear-cut brilliance of newness but with a definition (regardless of vocabulary) of artistic truism. The last demands an absence of arbitrary dogmas and confused negations.

One who passes the test is Elliott Carter, who is certainly among the select composers at work today. Even when we cannot understand all of the sounds he puts together, we are under the spell of a dramatic focus that is overwhelming. His latest work, the Piano Concerto completed in 1965, is one of the most penetrating contributions he or anyone else has made to the music of the 20th century.

The Concerto was commissioned by Jacob Lateiner via the Ford Foundation, under the terms of a unique arrangement whereby a performing musician is given funds to choose the composer he wishes to write a particular type of piece for him. Lateiner selected wisely. Though the work written for him, one predicts, will not have immediate acceptance, it will ultimately—a more important prediction—guarantee his place in the history books of the future.

Dedicated to Igor Stravinsky as an 85th-birthday offering (according to the liner note, although no mention of this is made in the Associated two-piano score), the opus calls for a standard orchestra plus a concertino of three winds (flute, English horn, and bass clarinet) and four strings (violin, viola, cello, and bass) as adjuncts to the solo voice. The world première was given on January 6th, 1967, by those concerned with this recording, made "live" (it would have been economically prohibitive otherwise, and even then it was released only with the aid of moneys garnered from the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, the Steinway Foundation, and the National Council on the Arts). The performance is a technical feat that proves anew the fantastic ability of the Bostonians, again confirms that Leinsdorf is a conductor of compelling insight and courage (there are no opportunities to preach interpretative freedom in this score), and indubitably marks Lateiner as a contemporary music apostle par excellence. RCA Victor's engineering is admirable in all respects.

The form of Carter's Concerto does not survey the harvest of previous concerti with themes, counter-themes, and developments all in place. He is of no mind to preserve the species. The argument of Carter's piece is argument, between solo piano and orchestra, pivoting defense and rebuttal via the septet of the concertino. In a way the piano functions in a quasi-biographical sense (not with precise detail but with essence); the expository material, pushing forward the chronology of events, is to be found in the soloistically formulated concertino, and the opposition

(Continued on page 945)

Almost fait accompli: composer, conductor, and soloist at Symphony Hall, Boston, after final rehearsal

Consternation, concentration: Erich Leinsdorf and Jacob Lateiner studying score (Whitestone Photo)

CARTER: Piano Concerto; COLGRASS: As Quiet As; Jacob Lateiner (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-3001 or Stereo LSC-3001, $5.79.

CARTER (Continued from page 937)

(an attempt to fathom the solo voice, but never successful) is represented by the orchestra. Quite often the piano sounds like an instrument of steel plungers attempting to break through walls of unmovable sound. Carter's music is neither pantonal nor serial; rather, it is conceived in terms of intervallic continuity set in incessant linear arrangement. Thus secundal, quartal, and cluster chords, and verticalities bounded by sevenths and ninths dominate. The disjunct element is total: harmonically, contrapuntally, rhythmically, in phrase organization, and dynamic arrangement. Repetition is eliminated, constant mutation occurs, the music rushes forth in a continuous stream of thought. Though there are two movements, the break between them is more a catching of breath than a separation. Ultimately the orchestra lets go, the concertino dissolves, and the final four measures are for the piano alone.

In both the visual appearance of the score and its actual sound the music of Ives comes to mind. But no music by Ives is so sensitively difficult as Carter's (complications are not applied to the music; they are inherent in the climate of the aesthetic; none is twisted in for the sake of effect—one can propose that technical violence and textural involvement are natural parts of Carter's temperament). Neither is Ives's music so organically designed as Carter's. Further, nothing is left to chance in the work of Carter (and much is in all of Ives). What similarity is there is to be found in the improvisational effect, often sounding like the permisiveness of aleatoric passages although Carter never permits one iota of definition to be decided by the will of the performer. Despite this the Piano Concerto is fresh and vivid, for there is no tossing about nor shuffling of worn-out abstract ideas. It will fascinate the listener if he will study its logic and its unique solutions. In its particular way the Carter Concerto is heroic music, and it demands heroic listeners as well as performers.

Michael Colgrass's As Quiet As was a decided success at its initial performance (in August, 1966, at Tanglewood), and again when the Bostonians presented it on tour. Here the music proves its right to the specialness of a recording.

The seven movements of As Quiet As are based on depictions of answers of fourth-grade children asked to complete the sentence beginning "Let's be as quiet as—". The music shimmers with exotic color (the orchestra includes 23 percussion instruments, alto flute, and harpsichord), embraces delicate shadowing and highlighting (by way of divisi and tissue-strength doublings), and is often toned by softly tingling tintinnabulations, aleatorically designed. However, the excitement and tidiness of Colgrass's narratives are never achieved at the expense of sheer effect. All are fresh views of program music concerned with "An Ant Walking", "A Soft Rainfall", "The First Star Coming Out", etc. In "Time Passing" a montage of varied styles (from Haydn to Webern) is woven into and around a portion of a Beethoven sonatina! The effect is delicious, novel, marvelously skillful. In my judgment As Quiet As promises to be a contemporary classic.

the record shelf

By Harold Patton

BACH—THE GOLDBERG VARIATIONS, Glenn Gould. Columbia MS 7096. BACH—Vol. 4 of a Series, Glenn Gould, The Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 2, Preludes and Fugues 1-8. Columbia MS 7099.	These two albums are excellent testimony to the remarkable musician that is Glenn Gould. The Goldberg Variations are a re-mastering in stereo of Gould's exceptional reading that introduced him to the international record market. The readings have not lost their beauty and the revamped sound is most welcome. The Preludes and Fugues are the first installment on Book 2 and boast the similar revelations and unorthadoxies that were prevalent in his earlier set. They are gloriously played and offer many new insights into the scores.
BRAHMS PIANO TRIOS—Trio in B Major, Op. 8, Trio in C Major, Op. 87, Trio in C Minor, Op. 101, Trio in A Major, Op. posth. (Complete), The Beaux Arts Trio. Philips PHC 2-013.	Hard on the heels of the superb Stern, Istoman, Rose readings of the Brahms Trios comes this very fine set by the Beaux Arts Trio. The Beaux Arts include the Posth. A Major, which is attributed to Brahms though not definitely established as such. Regardless, it is not a major score and though interesting to hear it does not bear frequent repetition as the musical content is not great. In the three major works, The Beaux Arts are sensitive and classically involved. They must yield, however, to the bigger sound and more romantically passionate readings as offered by Stern and his associates.
BRAHMS TRIO IN E FLAT FOR HORN, VIOLIN & PIANO, Op. 40, Trio No. 2 in C For Violin, Cello & Piano, Op. 87, Yehudi Menuhin, Maurice Gendron, Hephzibah Menuhin, Alan Civil, Angel S-36472.	In the Menuhin disk, we have a brilliant reading of the Horn Trio with the incredible Alan Civil combining with the Menuhins in one of the most convincing readings currently available. The Op. 87 Trio, in which the Menuhins are joined by Gendron, the approach is more autumnal though equally as romantic as the Stern group. Angel's sound is excellent while the Philips series is also very good and at the price can be well recommended.
ELLIOTT CARTER — PIANO CONCERTO, Jacob Lateiner, Pianist, World Premiere recorded live at Symphony Hall, Boston. MICHAEL COLGRASS — AS QUIET AS, Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, R.C.A. Victor LSC 3001.	This recording was made possible through a variety of grants from The Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, The Steinway Foundation and The National Council on the Arts. It was written for the pianist Lateiner and he serves the composer well in offering an impressive reading of a remarkable score. It is a wonderful coming-to-grips with the concerti problem by one of the foremost contemporary composers. Not an easy score to know, but on first hearing it is most impressive and on repeated listenings it reveals its texture and content in a most convincing way. The Colgrass is much less important and for my money quite uninteresting. It is made up of a series of titles starting, As Quiet As, A Leaf Turning Colour, An Ant Walking, etc., . . . the sound is superb and I heartily recommend the purchase of this disk for the discovery of the Carter Concerto.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
JUN 1968

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
DEC 1968

Boston Symphony Orchestra: A matching grant to record the Elliott Carter Piano Concerto, for distribution to music schools in the United States and abroad and to U.S.I.S. centers. 1966-67 program. ($7,500)

CHICAGOLAND AND FM GUIDE
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JUL 1968

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
MAY 25 1968

The Cosmos of Carter

CARTER: Piano Concerto. Jacob Lateiner, piano; with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. COLGRASS: As Quiet As. Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor stereo, LSC 3001; mono, LM 3001; $5.79.

AFTER seven hearings and rehearings (a relatively manageable undertaking, as the Carter Concerto totals a shade more than twenty-six minutes), I have no conviction how much musical interest there would be in a tenth, twentieth, or thirtieth hearing. It is not so much the intricacy of the idiom—it is well within the aural grasp of anyone determined to achieve that objective—as it is the use to which the composer has put it. His own objective, indeed, might be said to exclude listener participation, in a play and counterplay of elements exciting, even perhaps satisfying, to the performers.

Somewhat like the quandary which Strauss sought to resolve in Capriccio (which is of first importance, words or music?), Carter is concerned with another long-standing musical dilemma: form and substance. The Piano Concerto he has described as adapting "to another musical situation the same preoccupation with expression, physical performance methods, and formal processes" embodied in other works he has written in the last decade and a half: the Variations for Orchestra, Second String Quartet, etc. The thought content is impressive, the parties to the dialogue obviously convinced of the merits in the arguments they advance, some kind of conciliation eventually attained. But it all strikes my ear as something the listener overhears rather than something which is directed to him as ultimate consumer.

In his useful commentary, Michael Steinberg suggests a likeness to the dialogue between orchestra and piano in the slow movement of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto. This, in turn, Liszt compared to the interchanges of Orpheus and the furies, whose outcome, as we all know, was the surrender of the resisters (orchestra) to the eloquence of the pleader (piano). There are other instances, in works from Mozart to Ives, in which the composer has made a similar use of music-as-dialogue. But, in most of these instances known to me, the listener was spoken to in an intelligible tongue, with which he could affiliate his interests and attention. Carter, by my reckoning, has addressed himself rather to the performers as participants and let the listener go hang. At least I react that way to this skillfully drawn, well executed still life.

Colgrass is a contemporary of another disposition altogether. He aims to please, and his aim in these calculated whimsies —"As quiet as a Leaf Turning Colors," "As quiet as an Uninhabited Creek" are some among the seven sections — is deadly. The realization is accomplished with model efficiency by Leinsdorf and his men. The Carter was taped "live" at the performances of January 6-7, 1967, in Symphony Hall, and credit for its recorded preservation goes to the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc., the Steinway Foundation, and The National Council on the Arts.

The Detroit Free Press
D. 590,546 SUN. 631,175
NOV 24 1968

93

COLLINS GEORGE: CLASSICAL RECORDS

A Passionate New Concerto

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
NOV 30 1968

Elliott Carter's Piano Concerto, performed on record by Jacob Lateiner: Not a work of popular appeal, but dramatic and well-constructed—and admirably performed.

BY COLLINS GEORGE
Free Press Music Writer

The policy of presenting new or unfamiliar works, which the Detroit Symphony Orchestra now does in its Saturday concerts, does not seem to extend to piano concertos. One must turn to records if one wants to hear something other than the old warhorses.

Elliott Carter's Piano Concerto, with Jacob Lateiner at the keyboard and Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not have wide popular appeal, Carter's musical thought being fiercely intellectual.

But it is a dramatic work, well-constructed and passionate and presented here in a performance that does it full justice.

On the other side is a delightfully descriptive work Michael Colgrass' "As Quiet As . . ." which Ehrling played for his Saturday audiences recently. (Victor LSC 3001).

Much more exciting is the Piano Concerto by Alberto Ginastera (Victor LSC 3029). Ginastera, an Argentinian, brings the traditional fire of South America to his work, thus you have here all the throbbing and complex rhythms, all the color, the occasional mad rapidity that make all Ginastera's works so rousing.

The pianist here is a Brazilian, still in his twenties, Joao Carlos Martins, who displays a real affinity for this brilliant, difficult music. He is with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf.

* * *

The Year's Best Recordings

For Christmas shoppers (and others), Recordings presents its annual compilation of classical releases reviewed favorably in these pages since the appearance of the last such list a year ago. Within each of the three major categories (orchestral; chamber and instrumental; vocal), collections of miscellaneous content follow the items listed by composers' names. All discs listed are available either in separate mono and stereo editions or in "compatible" form, unless otherwise noted. The designation "E" after the name of the record company indicates "electronically rechanneled stereo" from a monophonic source; the designation "M" denotes an item available in mono only. An asterisk (*) before a listing indicates a reissue. Especially recommended items are indicated by †.

Orchestral

Bach: Keyboard Concertos Nos. 3 (in D), 5 (F minor), & 7 (G minor). Glenn Gould, piano; with orch. under Vladimir Golschmann (Columbia).

Bartók: Piano Concerto No. 3. Ravel: Concerto in G. Julius Katchen; with István Kertész cond. London Symphony Orch. (London).

Beethoven: Piano Concerto No. 1. Christoph Eschenbach; with Herbert von Karajan cond. Berlin Philharmonic (DGG).

Beethoven: Violin Concerto. Adolf Busch; with Fritz Busch cond. New York Philharmonic ("Private" disc, M).

Beethoven: Leonore Overtures Nos. 1-3 & Fidelio Overture. George Szell, Cleveland Orchestra (Columbia).

Beethoven: Symphony No. 6 & Egmont Overture. Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt cond. Vienna Philharmonic (London).

Beethoven: Symphony No. 9. Brahms: Haydn Variations. Wilhelm Furtwängler cond. Berlin Philharmonic (Unicorn, M, mail-order).

Richard Rodney Bennett: Symphony No. 1. Bax: Overture to a Picaresque Comedy. Berkeley: Divertimento. Igor Buketoff cond. Royal Philharmonic Orch. (RCA Victor).

Berlioz: Symphonie fantastique. Seiji Ozawa, Toronto Symphony (CBS); Symphonie fantastique & Lélio. Pierre Boulez cond. London Symphony Orch.; with soloists & chorus (CBS).

Berwald: Sinfonie capricieuse. Blomdahl: Sisyphos Suite. Rosenberg: Voyage to America (excerpts). Antal Dorati, Stockholm Philharmonic (Victrola).

Bizet: Carmen & L'Arlésienne Suites. Charles Munch cond. New Philharmonia (London Phase 4).

Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 1. Daniel Barenboim; with Barbirolli cond. New Philharmonia (Angel).

Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2. Wilhelm Backhaus; with Karl Böhm cond. Vienna Philharmonic (London).

Brahms: Serenade No. 2. Leonard Bernstein, New York Philharmonic (Columbia).

Britten: Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra. Mussorgsky-Ravel: Pictures at an Exhibition. Seiji Ozawa, Chicago Symphony Orch. (RCA Victor).

Carter: Piano Concerto (Jacob Lateiner). Colgrass: "As quiet as. . . ." Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orch. (RCA Victor).

Chávez: Violin Concerto. Henryk Szeryng; with composer cond. Orquesta Sinfónica Nacional de México (CBS).

Chopin: Concertos and other works for piano and orchestra. Alexis Weissenberg; with Stanislaw Skrowaczewski cond. Paris Conservatoire Orch. (Angel).

Copland: Organ Symphony (E. Power Biggs). Bernstein: Serenade (Zino Francescatti, violin). Bernstein, New York Philharmonic (Columbia).

Dvorák: Symphony No. 9 ("New World"). Eugene Ormandy cond. London Symphony Orch. (Columbia).

Elgar: Symphony No. 1. Sir John Barbirolli, Philharmonia Orch. (Seraphim).

Gerhard, R.: Symphony No. 1; Don Quixote Suite. Antal Dorati cond. BBC Symphony Orch. (Seraphim).

Ginastera: Piano Concerto (João Carlos Martins); Variaciones concertantes. Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony (RCA Victor).

Hummel: Bassoon Concerto in F. Weber: Bassoon Concerto in F. John Miller; with Harold Farberman cond. Copenhagen Chamber Orch. (Cambridge).

Ives: Holidays Symphony. Bernstein, New York Philharmonic (Columbia).

Ives: Symphonies Nos. 1-4. Harold Farberman, New Philharmonia Orch. (Vanguard/Cardinal).

Janácek: Orchestral and Choral Works (Lach Dances, Blaník Hill, etc.). Jiri Waldhans cond. Brno Philharmonic; Pinkas & Veselka cond. Czech Philharmonic Chorus (Crossroads).

Kadosa: Symphony No. 4 Miklós Erdélyi cond. Hungarian State Orch. (Qualiton).

Liszt: Les Préludes. Wagner: Overtures. Zubin Mehta, Vienna Philharmonic (London).

Lutoslawski: Venetian Games; Concerto for Orchestra; Funeral Music. Witold Rowicki cond. Warsaw Philharmonic (Philips).

Mahler: Symphonies Nos. 6 & 9. Bernstein, New York Philharmonic (Columbia).

Mahler: Symphony No. 8. Dimitri Mitropoulos, Vienna Fest. Orch. (Everest, E).

Maros: Symphony for Strings; Musica da ballo. György Lehel cond. Hungarian Radio Orch. (Qualiton).

Mendelssohn: A Midsummer Night's Dream. Schubert: Rosamunde (excerpts). Szell, Cleveland Orch. (Columbia).

Mendelssohn: String Symphony No. 9. Schubert: Rondo for Violin and Strings; 5 Minuets. I Musici (Philips).

Mennin: Symphony No. 7. Martinon: Symphony No. 4. Jean Martinon, Chicago Symphony Orch. (RCA Victor).

Messiaen: Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum; Couleurs de la cité celeste. Pierre Boulez cond. Domaine Musical Ensemble (CBS).

Messiaen: Seven Haikai; Schoenberg: Chamber Symphony No. 1. Pierre Boulez cond. Domaine Musical Ensemble (Everest).

Messiaen: Turangalila Symphony. Takemitsu: November Steps. Seiji Ozawa cond. Toronto Symphony; with Yvonne & Jeanne Loriod, et al. (RCA Victor).

Milhaud: Six Little Symphonies; L'Homme et son désir. Composer cond. Radio Luxembourg Orch. (Candide).

Mozart: 2 Concertos, K. 107. (Karl Engel, piano); Symphony No. 1. J. C. Bach: Sinfonia, Op. 3, No. 4. Hans Koppenburg cond. Frankfurt Chamber Orch. (Odyssey).

Mozart: Piano Concertos Nos. 20 & 25. Julius Katchen; with Karl Münchinger cond. Stuttgart Chamber Orch. (London).

Mozart: Violin Concerto No. 3. Isaac Stern; with Szell & Cleveland Orch.; Sinfonia concertante, K. 364. Stern, violinist-conductor; W. Trampler, viola; & London Symphony Orch. (Columbia).

Prokofiev: Piano Concertos Nos. 3 & 4. John Browning; with Erich Leinsdorf & Boston Symphony (RCA Victor).

Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet (excerpts). Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony (RCA Victor).

Prokofiev: Scythian Suite; Prodigal Son. Ernest Ansermet cond. L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande (London).

Prokofiev: Symphony No. 5. Bernstein, New York Philharmonic (Columbia).

Rachmaninoff: The Isle of the Dead. Scriabin: Poem of Ecstasy. Yevgeny Svetlanov cond. USSR Symphony Orch. (Melodiya/Angel).

Respighi: Pines & Fountains of Rome. Charles Munch, New Philharmonia (London Phase 4).

Rimsky-Korsakov: Antar Symphony. Miaskovsky: Symphony No. 21. Morton Gould, Chicago Symphony (RCA Victor).

Rodrigo: Fantasia para un gentilhombre.

Dodgson: Guitar Concerto. John Wil-

Schumann: Fantasiestucke, Op. 73, for Oboe. David Weber, clarinet; Harry Shulman, oboe; Harriet Wingreen, piano (Lyrichord).

Prokofiev: Piano Music (complete). György Sándor (Vox Boxes).

Rachmaninoff: Etudes-Tableaux, Opp. 33 & 39. Beveridge Webster (Dover).

Ravel: Gaspard de la Nuit; Valses nobles et sentimentales; La Valse. Ruth Laredo, piano (Connoisseur Society).

Satie: Piano Music. Aldo Ciccolini (Angel, 3 LPs).

Schubert: Quartets in A minor & G minor. Amadeus Quartet (DGG).

Schubert: "Trout" Quintet. Rudolf Serkin, Jaime Laredo, et al. (Columbia).

Schumann: Carnaval; Fantasia in C. Claudia Arrau, piano (Philips).

Schumann: Kinderszenen; Intermezzi; Abegg Variations; Waldszenen (excerpts). Christoph Eschenbach, piano (DGG).

Stibilj: Epervier de la faiblesse; Domine. Shinohara: Alterances. Schat: Signalement. Les Percussions de Strasbourg (Philips).

R. Strauss: Cello Sonata. Mendelssohn: Sonata No. 2. Gregor Piatigorsky & Leonard Pennario (RCA Victor).

Stravinsky: Petrouchka. Brahms: Intermezzi; Rhapsody. Misha Dichter, piano (RCA Victor).

Turina: Piano Music. Alicia de Larrocha (Epic).

Vivaldi: Chamber Concertos & Sonatas. Baroque Ensemble of Paris (Epic).

Siegfried Behrend: Guitar Recital (DGG).

E. Power Biggs: Spanish Organ Music (Columbia).

Oscar Ghiglia: Guitar Recital (Angel).

Eastman Brass Quintet: Works of Scheidt, Weelkes, et al. (Candide).

Steven Staryk: 400 Years of the Violin (Everest).

Vocal

Beethoven: Fidelio. Furtwängler cond. Vienna State Opera production (Seraphim, M).

Berlioz: Te Deum. Sir Thomas Beecham cond. Royal Philharmonic Orch. & Chorus; with Alexander Young, tenor (Odyssey, E).

Borodin: Prince Igor. Boris Christoff et al., Sofia Opera production cond. by Jerzy Semkow (Angel).

Britten: The Burning Fiery Furnace. Peter Pears et al., composer conducting (London).

Britten: Les Illuminations (Peter Pears); Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge. Composer cond. English Chamber Orch. (London).

Britten: A Midsummer Night's Dream. Composer conducting; with Alfred Deller, Peter Pears, Heather Harper, et al. (London).

Gay & Pepusch: The Beggar's Opera. Sir Malcolm Sargent conducting (Seraphim).

Ginastera: Bomarzo. Julius Rudel cond. Opera Society of Washington (CBS).

Gluck: Orfeo ed Euridice. Grace Bumbry, Anneliese Rothenberger, et al., Václav Neumann conducting (Angel).

Handel: Giulio Cesare. Beverly Sills, Maureen Forrester, Norman Treigle, New

(Continued on page 79)

Year's Best

Continued from page 73

York City Opera under Julius Rudel (RCA Victor).

Haydn: The Seasons. Gundula Janowitz, Peter Schreier, Martti Talvela, Vienna Symphony Orch. & Chorus under Karl Böhm (DGG).

Henze: Der junge Lord. Christoph von Dohnányi cond. Deutsche Oper. production (DGG).

Henze: The Muses of Sicily; Moralities. Dresden Church Choir et al., cond. by composer (DGG).

B. Herrmann: Moby Dick. Composer cond. Aeolian Singers, London Philharmonic Orch., et al. (Pye Virtuoso import).

Janácek: The Makropoulos Case. Bohumil Gregor cond. Prague Opera (Epic).

Lehár: The Land of Smiles. Giuseppe di Stefano et al., Heinz Lambrecht cond. Volksoper Orch. (London).

Lortzing: Zar und Zimmermann. Robert Heger conducting; with Erika Köth, Peter Schreier, Nicolai Gedda, Hermann Prey, Gottlob Frick (Seraphim).

Mahler: Das klagende Lied. Teresa Zylis-Gara, Anna Reynolds, Andor Kaposy; with Wyn Morris cond. New Philharmonia Orch. & Ambrosian Singers (Angel).

Monteverdi: Scherzi musicali. Hugues Cuénod, Charles Bressler, et al. (Project 3).

Mozart: La Betulia liberata. Adriana Lazzarini, Emilia Cundari, Petre Munteanu, Paolo Washington, orch. & chorus under C. F. Cillario (Victrola).

†Mozart: The Comic Mozart (ensemble songs & canons). Erika Köth, Peter Schreier, Hermann Prey, Walter Berry, Akademie Kammerchor, etc. (Seraphim).

Mozart: Don Giovanni. Birgit Nilsson, Fischer-Dieskau et al., Karl Böhm cond. Prague Opera (DGG).

Mozart: Entführung aus dem Serail & Zauberflöte (excerpts). Fritz Wunderlich et al. (DGG).

Mozart: Masonic Music (complete). Peter Maag conducting Volksoper Orch., soloists, chorus (Turnabout).

Mozart: Il re pastore. Reri Grist, Lucia Popp, et al., Denis Vaughan conducting (RCA Victor).

Orff: Catulli Carmina. Ormandy, Philadelphia Orch. members, soloists, & chorus under Robert Page (Columbia).

Orff: Oedipus der Tyrann. Rafael Kubelik cond. Bavarian Radio Orch. & Chorus, with Astrid Varnay, Gerhard Stolze, Kieth Engen (DGG).

†Penderecki: St. Luke Passion. Henryk Czyz cond. Cracow Philharmonia et al.; To the Victims of Hiroshima. Witold Rowicki cond. Warsaw Philharmonic (Philips).

†Poulenc: Four Song Cycles. Gerard Souzay; with Dalton Baldwin, piano (Philips).

Schoeck: Notturno. Barber: Dover Beach. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, with the Juilliard Quartet (Columbia).

Schoenberg: Pierrot Lunaire. Helga Pilarczyk; with Pierre Boulez cond. Domaine Musical Ensemble (Everest).

Schoenberg: Serenade. Boulez conducting; with Louis-Jacques Rondeleux, baritone (Everest).

(Continued on page 83)

Continued from page 79

Shostakovich: Symphony No. 13 ("Babi Yar"). Kiril Kondrashin cond. Moscow Philharmonic Orch. & Chorus; with Vitaly Gromadsky, basso (Everest, E).

Sibelius: Songs. Tom Krause (London).

R. Strauss: Frau ohne Schatten, Rosenkavalier, & Elektra (excerpts). Christa Ludwig, Walter Berry, Sieglinde Wagner (Victrola).

R. Strauss: Rosenkavalier (scenes). Lisa della Casa & Anneliese Rothenberger; Rudolf Neuhaus cond. (Angel).

Stravinsky: Cantata; Mass; In Memoriam Dylan Thomas. Composer conducting chamber ensemble; with Adrienne Albert, Alexander Young, & Gregg Smith Singers (Columbia).

Szokolay: Blood Wedding. Andras Korody cond. Hungarian State Opera (Qualiton).

Tchaikovsky: The Queen of Spades. Boris Khaikin cond. Bolshoi Opera (Melodiya/Angel).

Verdi: Otello (excerpts). Helen Jepson, Giovanni Martinelli, Lawrence Tibbett, Metropolitan Opera Orch. under W. Pelletier (Victrola, M).

Verdi: Rarities. Montserrat Caballé (RCA Victor).

Wagner & Verdi: Songs. Sándor Kónya (Decca).

Wolf: Spanisches Liederbuch. Elisabeth Schwarzkopf & Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau; with Gerald Moore (DGG).

Yardumian: Mass "Come Creator Spirit." Lili Chookasian; with Anshel Brusilow cond. Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia & Choruses (RCA Victor).

Janet Baker: English Songs (Angel).

Montserrat Caballé & Bernabé Marti: Zarzuela Duets (RCA Victor).

Tom Krause: Opera Arias (London).

Lotte Lehmann: Brahms & Wolf Songs (Victrola, E) and Operatic Arias (Seraphim, M).

Zinka Milanov: Opera Arias (Victrola).

Marni Nixon: Songs of Ives, A. Goehr & Schürmann (Nonesuch).

Wilhelm Pitz: Cond. New Philharmonia Chorus & Orch. in Bruckner, Beethoven, Brahms, etc. (Angel).

Boris Shtokolov: Russian Songs and Arias (Melodiya/Angel).

Gérard Souzay: Cantatas by Rameau, Courbois, Boismortier, & Campra; with Paillard Chamber Orch. (Epic).

Teresa Stich-Randall: Italian Operatic Arias (Westminster).

Nancy Tatum: American Songs (London).

Lawrence Tibbett: Opera and Song (Victrola, E).

—Compiled by Richard Freed.

The Detroit Free Press
D. 590,546 SUN. 631,175

NOV 24 1968

93

COLLINS GEORGE: CLASSICAL RECORDS

A Passionate New Concerto

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000

NOV 30 1968

Elliott Carter's Piano Concerto, performed on record by Jacob Lateiner: Not a work of popular appeal, but dramatic and well-constructed—and admirably performed.

BY COLLINS GEORGE
Free Press Music Writer

The policy of presenting new or unfamiliar works, which the Detroit Symphony Orchestra now does in its Saturday concerts, does not seem to extend to piano concertos. One must turn to records if one wants to hear something other than the old warhorses.

Elliott Carter's Piano Concerto, with Jacob Lateiner at the keyboard and Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not have wide popular appeal, Carter's musical thought being fiercely intellectual.

But it is a dramatic work, well-constructed and passionate and presented here in a performance that does it full justice.

On the other side is a delightfully descriptive work Michael Colgrass' "As Quiet As..." which Ehrling played for his Saturday audiences recently. (Victor LSC 3001).

Much more exciting is the Piano Concerto by Alberto Ginastera (Victor LSC 3029). Ginastera, an Argentinian, brings the traditional fire of South America to his work, thus you have here all the throbbing and complex rhythms, all the color, the occasional mad rapidity that make all Ginastera's works so rousing.

The pianist here is a Brazilian, still in his twenties, Joao Carlos Martins, who displays a real affinity for this brilliant, difficult music. He is with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf.

* * *

OK, so you know that hyperbol isn't just what happens
New York's morning.

How would you feel if you had four heads? Many brands hav but almost all TEAC tape decks have separate heads for record, en . And one for reverse, and this model has four. (No hyperbo
The unique arrangement of these four heads lets you monitor as monitor from the tape a split second later, or combine both moni systems for your own echo chamber effect.

Besides all this, the A-1500 has exclusive ADD recording for simu playback and recording on separate tracks. And a unique automa system for up to four hours uninterrupted performance. Other fe this page, but wouldn't you rather give a listen than get a lesson?
your head will tell you the difference in ours.

• Two exclusive eddy-current outer rotor motors for reel drive • Dual-speed hysteresis for capstan drive • All-pushbutton controls — touch and go! • Automatic shutoff
• Independent LINE and MIC input controls • Choice of cabinet or portable styling

So what else is new?

Look to TEAC
2000 Colorado Avenue, Santa

liams; with Charles Groves cond. English Chamber Orch. (Columbia).
Rossini: Overtures. Szell, Cleveland Orch. (Columbia).
Rubinstein: Piano Concerto No. 4. Liszt: Solo pieces. Oscar Levant; with Mitropoulos cond. New York Philharmonic (Odyssey, M).
Schoenberg: Pelleas und Melisande. Barbirolli, New Philharmonia (Angel).
Schumann: Piano Concerto; Noveletten Nos. 1 & 2. Artur Rubinstein; with Carlo Maria Giulini cond. Chicago Symphony (RCA Victor).
Sessions: Violin Concerto. Paul Zukofsky; with Gunther Schuller cond. ORTF Orch. (CRI).
Shostakovich: Symphonies Nos. 2 & 3. Morton Gould cond. Royal Philharmonic Orch. & Chorus (RCA Victor).
J. Strauss: Overtures; Waltzes; Polkas. Herbert von Karajan cond. Berlin Philharmonic (DGG).
R. Strauss: Horn Concertos Nos. 1 & 2. F. Strauss: Concerto. Barry Tuckwell; with István Kertész cond. London Symphony Orch. (London).
Stravinsky: Piano Concerto (composer conducting); Capriccio (Robert Craft cond.). Philippe Entremont; with Columbia Symphony Orch. (Columbia).
Stravinsky: Le Sacre du printemps. Yevgeny Svetlanov, USSR Symphony Orch. (Melodiya/Angel).
Szervánszky: Serenade for String Orchestra. Vilmos Tátrai cond. Hungarian Chamber Orch. Petrovics: Quartet. Tátrai Quartet (Qualiton).
Tchaikovsky: Serenade for Strings; Nutcracker Suite. Karajan, Berlin Philharmonic (DGG).
Vaughan Williams: A London Symphony. Barbirolli, Hallé Orch. (Angel).
Wagner: Tristan, Parsifal, etc. (excerpts). Furtwängler cond. Berlin & Vienna Philharmonic Orchs. (Seraphim, M).
Weill: Symphonies Nos. 1 & 2. Gary Bertini cond. BBC Symphony Orch. (Angel).
French Ceremonial Marches. Désiré Dondeyne cond. Musique des Gardiens de la Paix (Music Guild, 2 vols.).
Russian Music (Borodin, Glinka, Mussorgsky). Georg Solti, London Symphony Orch. (London).

Instrumental and Chamber Music

Bach: Sonata No. 1 & Partita No. 1 for solo violin. Ruggiero Ricci (Decca).
Bartók: 44 Duos for Violins. André Gertler & Josef Suk (Crossroads).
Beethoven: Six Quartets, Op. 18. Barylli Quartet (Westminster, E).
†Beethoven: Quartets, Opp. 59, 74, & 95. Guarneri Quartet (RCA Victor).
Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Nos. 4, 25, & 31. Wilhelm Backhaus (London).
Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Nos. 23 & 27. Ivan Moravec (Connoisseur Society).
Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Nos. 8, 14, 26. Daniel Barenboim (Angel).
Beethoven: Sonata No. 29. ("Hammerklavier"). Vladimir Ashkenazy (London).
Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Nos. 30 & 32; Nos. 8 & 17. Bruce Hungerford (Vanguard/Cardinal).
Brahms: Clarinet Sonatas Nos. 1 & 2. Harold Wright, clarinet; Harris Goldsmith, piano (Crossroads).
Brahms: Sonata for 2 Pianos. Saint-Saëns: Beethoven Variations. Eden and Tamir (London).
Brahms: Violin Sonatas Nos. 1-3. Josef Suk, violin; Julius Katchen, piano (London).
Britten: Phantasy Quartet. Hubert Lucarelli, oboe; & New Art String Trio; Suite, Op. 6. Gerald Tarack, violin; Thomas Grubb, piano; Six Metamorphoses after Ovid. Lucarelli, oboe (Lyrichord).
†Chopin: Etudes, Opp. 10 & 25. Agustin Anievas (Seraphim).
Crumb: Night Music I. Louise Toth, soprano; composer cond. ensemble. Erickson: Chamber Concerto. Ralph Shapey cond. Hartt Chamber Players (CRI).
Dowland: Dances. Julian Bream, lute (RCA Victor).
Dvorák: Quintet in G, Op. 18/77. Dvorák Quartet with F. Pošta, double bass (Crossroads).
Françaix: String Trio. J. Heifetz, J. de Pasquale, G. Piatigorsky (RCA Victor).
Gottschalk: Piano Music. Amiram Rigai (Decca).
Gould: Formations; Revolutionary Prelude; Santa Fe Saga; Prologue and Battle Hymn. Morton Gould cond. Knightsbridge Symphonic Band (Gallery).
Hindemith: Viola Sonatas. Walter Trampler; with Ronald Turini, piano (RCA Victor).
Honegger: Quartet No. 2. Dvorák Quartet. Hindemith: Quartet No. 3. Prague City Quartet (Crossroads).
Ives: Piano Music (complete). Alan Mandel (Desto).

Ives: Quartets Nos. 1 & 2. Juilliard Quartet (Columbia).
Mozart: Divertimento in E-flat, K. 563. Grumiaux Trio (Philips).
Mozart: Piano Quartets Nos. 1 & 2. David Hancock & New Art String Trio (Turnabout).
Mozart: Violin Sonatas (Four). Rafael Druian, violin; George Szell, piano (Columbia).
Mussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition. Vladimir Ashkenazy, piano (London).
Nielsen: Piano Music. John Ogdon (RCA Victor).
Ohana: 4 Etudes chorégraphiques. Kabelac: Eight Inventions. Les Percussions de Strassbourg (Limelight).
Poulenc: Clarinet Sonata; Oboe Sonata.
Schumann: Fantasiestucke, Op. 73, for Oboe. David Weber, clarinet; Harry Shulman, oboe; Harriet Wingreen, piano (Lyrichord).
Prokofiev: Piano Music (complete). György Sándor (Vox Boxes).
Rachmaninoff: Etudes-Tableaux, Opp. 33 & 39. Beveridge Webster (Dover).
Ravel: Gaspard de la Nuit; Valses nobles et sentimentales; La Valse. Ruth Laredo, piano (Connoisseur Society).
Satie: Piano Music. Aldo Ciccolini (Angel, 3 LPs).
Schubert: Quartets in A minor & G minor. Amadeus Quartet (DGG).
Schubert: "Trout" Quintet. Rudolf Serkin, Jaime Laredo, et al. (Columbia).
Schumann: Carnaval; Fantasia in C. Claudia Arrau, piano (Philips).
Schumann: Kinderszenen; Intermezzi; Abegg Variations; Waldszenen (excerpts). Christoph Eschenbach, piano (DGG).
Stibilj: Epervier de la faiblesse; Domine. Shinohara: Alterances. Schat: Signalement. Les Percussions de Strasbourg (Philips).
R. Strauss: Cello Sonata. Mendelssohn: Sonata No. 2. Gregor Piatigorsky & Leonard Pennario (RCA Victor).
Stravinsky: Petrouchka. Brahms: Intermezzi; Rhapsody. Misha Dichter, piano (RCA Victor).
Turina: Piano Music. Alicia de Larrocha (Epic).
Vivaldi: Chamber Concertos & Sonatas. Baroque Ensemble of Paris (Epic).
Siegfried Behrend: Guitar Recital (DGG).
E. Power Biggs: Spanish Organ Music (Columbia).
Oscar Ghiglia: Guitar Recital (Angel).
Eastman Brass Quintet: Works of Scheidt, Weelkes, et al. (Candide).
Steven Staryk: 400 Years of the Violin (Everest).

Vocal

Beethoven: Fidelio. Furtwängler cond. Vienna State Opera production (Seraphim, M).
Berlioz: Te Deum. Sir Thomas Beecham cond. Royal Philharmonic Orch. & Chorus; with Alexander Young, tenor (Odyssey, E).
Borodin: Prince Igor. Boris Christoff et al., Sofia Opera production cond. by Jerzy Semków (Angel).
Britten: The Burning Fiery Furnace. Peter Pears et al., composer conducting (London).
Britten: Les Illuminations (Peter Pears); Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge. Composer cond. English Chamber Orch. (London).
Britten: A Midsummer Night's Dream. Composer conducting; with Alfred Deller, Peter Pears, Heather Harper, et al. (London).
Gay & Pepusch: The Beggar's Opera. Sir Malcolm Sargent conducting (Seraphim).
Ginastera: Bomarzo. Julius Rudel cond. Opera Society of Washington (CBS).
Gluck: Orfeo ed Euridice. Grace Bumbry, Anneliese Rothenberger, et al., Václav Neumann conducting (Angel).
Handel: Giulio Cesare. Beverly Sills, Maureen Forrester, Norman Treigle, New

(Continued on page 79)

Year's Best

Continued from page 73

York City Opera under Julius Rudel (RCA Victor).
Haydn: The Seasons. Gundula Janowitz, Peter Schreier, Martti Talvela, Vienna Symphony Orch. & Chorus under Karl Böhm (DGG).
Henze: Der junge Lord. Christoph von Dohnányi cond. Deutsche Oper. production (DGG).
Henze: The Muses of Sicily; Moralities. Dresden Church Choir et al., cond. by composer (DGG).
B. Herrmann: Moby Dick. Composer cond. Aeolian Singers, London Philharmonic Orch., et al. (Pye Virtuoso import).
Janácek: The Makropoulos Case. Bohumil Gregor cond. Prague Opera (Epic).
Lehár: The Land of Smiles. Giuseppe di Stefano et al., Heinz Lambrecht cond. Volksoper Orch. (London).
Lortzing: Zar und Zimmermann. Robert Heger conducting; with Erika Köth, Peter Schreier, Nicolai Gedda, Hermann Prey, Gottlob Frick (Seraphim).
Mahler: Das klagende Lied. Teresa Zylis-Gara, Anna Reynolds, Andor Kaposy; with Wyn Morris cond. New Philharmonia Orch. & Ambrosian Singers (Angel).
Monteverdi: Scherzi musicali. Hugues Cuénod, Charles Bressler, et al. (Project 3).
Mozart: La Betulia liberata. Adriana Lazzarini, Emilia Cundari, Petre Munteanu, Paolo Washington, orch. & chorus under C. F. Cillario (Victrola).
†Mozart: The Comic Mozart (ensemble songs & canons). Erika Köth, Peter Schreier, Hermann Prey, Walter Berry, Akademie Kammerchor, etc. (Seraphim).
Mozart: Don Giovanni. Birgit Nilsson, Fischer-Dieskau et al., Karl Böhm cond. Prague Opera (DGG).
Mozart: Entführung aus dem Serail & Zauberflöte (excerpts). Fritz Wunderlich et al. (DGG).
Mozart: Masonic Music (complete). Peter Maag conducting Volksoper Orch., soloists, chorus (Turnabout).
Mozart: Il re pastore. Reri Grist, Lucia Popp, et al., Denis Vaughan conducting (RCA Victor).
Orff: Catulli Carmina. Ormandy, Philadelphia Orch. members, soloists, & chorus under Robert Page (Columbia).
Orff: Oedipus der Tyrann. Rafael Kubelik cond. Bavarian Radio Orch. & Chorus, with Astrid Varnay, Gerhard Stolze, Kieth Engen (DGG).
†Penderecki: St. Luke Passion. Henryk Czyz cond. Cracow Philharmonia et al.; To the Victims of Hiroshima. Witold Rowicki cond. Warsaw Philharmonic (Philips).
†Poulenc: Four Song Cycles. Gerard Souzay; with Dalton Baldwin, piano (Philips).
Schoeck: Notturno. Barber: Dover Beach. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, with the Juilliard Quartet (Columbia).
Schoenberg: Pierrot Lunaire. Helga Pilarczyk; with Pierre Boulez cond. Domaine Musical Ensemble (Everest).
Schoenberg: Serenade. Boulez conducting; with Louis-Jacques Rondeleux, baritone (Everest).

(Continued on page 83)

Continued from page 79

Shostakovich: Symphony No. 13 ("Babi Yar"). Kiril Kondrashin cond. Moscow Philharmonic Orch. & Chorus; with Vitaly Gromadsky, basso (Everest, E).
Sibelius: Songs. Tom Krause (London).
R. Strauss: Frau ohne Schatten, Rosenkavalier, & Elektra (excerpts). Christa Ludwig, Walter Berry, Sieglinde Wagner (Victrola).
R. Strauss: Rosenkavalier (scenes). Lisa della Casa & Anneliese Rothenberger; Rudolf Neuhaus cond. (Angel).
Stravinsky: Cantata; Mass; In Memoriam Dylan Thomas. Composer conducting chamber ensemble; with Adrienne Albert, Alexander Young, & Gregg Smith Singers (Columbia).
Szokolay: Blood Wedding. Andras Korody cond. Hungarian State Opera (Qualiton).
Tchaikovsky: The Queen of Spades. Boris Khaikin cond. Bolshoi Opera (Melodiya/Angel).
Verdi: Otello (excerpts). Helen Jepson, Giovanni Martinelli, Lawrence Tibbett, Metropolitan Opera Orch. under W. Pelletier (Victrola, M).
Verdi: Rarities. Montserrat Caballé (RCA Victor).
Wagner & Verdi: Songs. Sándor Kónya (Decca).
Wolf: Spanisches Liederbuch. Elisabeth Schwarzkopf & Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau; with Gerald Moore (DGG).
Yardumian: Mass "Come Creator Spirit." Lili Chookasian; with Anshel Brusilow cond. Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia & Choruses (RCA Victor).
Janet Baker: English Songs (Angel).
Montserrat Caballé & Bernabé Martí: Zarzuela Duets (RCA Victor).
Tom Krause: Opera Arias (London).
Lotte Lehmann: Brahms & Wolf Songs (Victrola, E) and Operatic Arias (Seraphim, M).
Zinka Milanov: Opera Arias (Victrola).
Marni Nixon: Songs of Ives, A. Goehr & Schürmann (Nonesuch).
Wilhelm Pitz: Cond. New Philharmonia Chorus & Orch. in Bruckner, Beethoven, Brahms, etc. (Angel).
Boris Shtokolov: Russian Songs and Arias (Melodiya/Angel).
Gérard Souzay: Cantatas by Rameau, Courbois, Boismortier, & Campra; with Paillard Chamber Orch. (Epic).
Teresa Stich-Randall: Italian Operatic Arias (Westminster).
Nancy Tatum: American Songs (London).
Lawrence Tibbett: Opera and Song (Victrola, E).

—COMPILED BY RICHARD FREED.

The Detroit Free Press
D. 590,546 SUN. 631,175
NOV 24 1968

93

COLLINS GEORGE: CLASSICAL RECORDS

A Passionate New Concerto

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
NOV 30 1968

Elliott Carter's Piano Concerto, performed on record by Jacob Lateiner: Not a work of popular appeal, but dramatic and well-constructed—and admirably performed.

BY COLLINS GEORGE
Free Press Music Writer

The policy of presenting new or unfamiliar works, which the Detroit Symphony Orchestra now does in its Saturday concerts, does not seem to extend to piano concertos. One must turn to records if one wants to hear something other than the old warhorses.

Elliott Carter's Piano Concerto, with Jacob Lateiner at the keyboard and Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not have wide popular appeal, Carter's musical thought being fiercely intellectual.

But it is a dramatic work, well-constructed and passionate and presented here in a performance that does it full justice.

On the other side is a delightfully descriptive work Michael Colgrass' "As Quiet As..." which Ehrling played for his Saturday audiences recently. (Victor LSC 3001).

Much more exciting is the Piano Concerto by Alberto Ginastera (Victor LSC 3029). Ginastera, an Argentinian, brings the traditional fire of South America to his work, thus you have here all the throbbing and complex rhythms, all the color, the occasional mad rapidity that make all Ginastera's works so rousing.

The pianist here is a Brazilian, still in his twenties, Joao Carlos Martins, who displays a real affinity for this brilliant, difficult music. He is with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf.

* * *

OK, so you know that hyperbol isn't just what happens New Year's morning.

...you feel if you had four heads? Many brands hav... tape decks have separate heads for record, ...verse, and this model has four. (No hyperbo... ...ngement of these four heads lets you monitor as ...the tape a split second later, or combine both moni... ...our own echo chamber effect.

Besides ... the A-3500 has exclusive ADD recording for simu... playback and recording on separate tracks. And a unique automa... system for up to four hours uninterrupted performance. Other fe... this page, but wouldn't you rather give a listen than get a lesson? your head will tell you the difference in ours.

• Two exclusive eddy current outer rotor motors for reel drive • Dual-speed hysteresis for capstan drive • All-pushbutton controls — touch and go! • Automatic shutoff • Independent LINE and MIC input controls • Choice of cabinet or portable styling

So what else is new?

Look to TEAC
2000 Colorado Avenue, Santa

liams; with Charles Groves cond. English Chamber Orch. (Columbia).

Rossini: Overtures. Szell, Cleveland Orch. (Columbia).

Rubinstein: Piano Concerto No. 4. Liszt: Solo pieces. Oscar Levant; with Mitropoulos cond. New York Philharmonic (Odyssey, M).

Schoenberg: Pelleas und Melisande. Barbirolli, New Philharmonia (Angel).

Schumann: Piano Concerto; Noveletten Nos. 1 & 2. Artur Rubinstein; with Carlo Maria Giulini cond. Chicago Symphony (RCA Victor).

Sessions: Violin Concerto. Paul Zukofsky; with Gunther Schuller cond. ORTF Orch. (CRI).

Shostakovich: Symphonies Nos. 2 & 3. Morton Gould cond. Royal Philharmonic Orch. & Chorus (RCA Victor).

J. Strauss: Overtures; Waltzes; Polkas. Herbert von Karajan cond. Berlin Philharmonic (DGG).

R. Strauss: Horn Concertos Nos. 1 & 2. F. Strauss: Concerto. Barry Tuckwell; with István Kertész cond. London Symphony Orch. (London).

Stravinsky: Piano Concerto (composer conducting); Capriccio (Robert Craft cond.). Philippe Entremont; with Columbia Symphony Orch. (Columbia).

Stravinsky: Le Sacre du printemps. Yevgeny Svetlanov, USSR Symphony Orch. (Melodiya/Angel).

Szervánszky: Serenade for String Orchestra. Vilmos Tátrai cond. Hungarian Chamber Orch. Petrovics: Quartet. Tátrai Quartet (Qualiton).

Tchaikovsky: Serenade for Strings; Nutcracker Suite. Karajan, Berlin Philharmonic (DGG).

Vaughan Williams: A London Symphony. Barbirolli, Hallé Orch. (Angel).

Wagner: Tristan, Parsifal, etc. (excerpts). Furtwängler cond. Berlin & Vienna Philharmonic Orchs. (Seraphim, M).

Weill: Symphonies Nos. 1 & 2. Gary Bertini cond. BBC Symphony Orch. (Angel).

French Ceremonial Marches. Désiré Dondeyne cond. Musique des Gardiens de la Paix (Music Guild, 2 vols.).

Russian Music (Borodin, Glinka, Mussorgsky). Georg Solti, London Symphony Orch. (London).

Instrumental and Chamber Music

Bach: Sonata No. 1 & Partita No. 1 for solo violin. Ruggiero Ricci (Decca).

Bartók: 44 Duos for Violins. André Gertler & Josef Suk (Crossroads).

Beethoven: Six Quartets, Op. 18. Barylli Quartet (Westminster, E).

†Beethoven: Quartets, Opp. 59, 74, & 95. Guarneri Quartet (RCA Victor).

Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Nos. 4, 25, & 31. Wilhelm Backhaus (London).

Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Nos. 23 & 27. Ivan Moravec (Connoisseur Society).

Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Nos. 8, 14, 26. Daniel Barenboim (Angel).

Beethoven: Sonata No. 29, ("Hammerklavier"). Vladimir Ashkenazy (London).

Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Nos. 30 & 32; Nos. 8 & 17. Bruce Hungerford (Vanguard/Cardinal).

Brahms: Clarinet Sonatas Nos. 1 & 2. Harold Wright, clarinet; Harris Goldsmith, piano (Crossroads).

Brahms: Sonata for 2 Pianos. Saint-Saëns: Beethoven Variations. Eden and Tamir (London).

Brahms: Violin Sonatas Nos. 1-3. Josef Suk, violin; Julius Katchen, piano (London).

Britten: Phantasy Quartet. Hubert Lucarelli, oboe; & New Art String Trio; Suite, Op. 6. Gerald Tarack, violin; Thomas Grubb, piano; Six Metamorphoses after Ovid. Lucarelli, oboe (Lyrichord).

†Chopin: Etudes, Opp. 10 & 25. Agustin Anievas (Seraphim).

Crumb: Night Music I. Louise Toth, soprano; composer cond. ensemble. Erickson: Chamber Concerto. Ralph Shapey cond. Hartt Chamber Players (CRI).

Dowland: Dances. Julian Bream, lute (RCA Victor).

Dvorák: Quintet in G, Op. 18/77. Dvorák Quartet with F. Pošta, double bass (Crossroads).

Françaix: String Trio. J. Heifetz, J. de Pasquale, G. Piatigorsky (RCA Victor).

Gottschalk: Piano Music. Amiram Rigai (Decca).

Gould: Formations; Revolutionary Prelude; Santa Fe Saga; Prologue and Battle Hymn. Morton Gould cond. Knightsbridge Symphonic Band (Gallery).

Hindemith: Viola Sonatas. Walter Trampler; with Ronald Turini, piano (RCA Victor).

Honegger: Quartet No. 2. Dvorák Quartet. Hindemith: Quartet No. 3. Prague City Quartet (Crossroads).

Ives: Piano Music (complete). Alan Mandel (Desto).

Ives: Quartets Nos. 1 & 2. Juilliard Quartet (Columbia).

Mozart: Divertimento in E-flat, K. 563. Grumiaux Trio (Philips).

Mozart: Piano Quartets Nos. 1 & 2. David Hancock & New Art String Trio (Turnabout).

Mozart: Violin Sonatas (Four). Rafael Druian, violin; George Szell, piano (Columbia).

Mussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition. Vladimir Ashkenazy, piano (London).

Nielsen: Piano Music. John Ogdon (RCA Victor).

Ohana: 4 Etudes chorégraphiques. Kabelac: Eight Inventions. Les Percussions de Strassbourg (Limelight).

Poulenc: Clarinet Sonata; Oboe Sonata. Schumann: Fantasiestucke, Op. 73, for Oboe. David Weber, clarinet; Harry Shulman, oboe; Harriet Wingreen, piano (Lyrichord).

Prokofiev: Piano Music (complete). György Sándor (Vox Boxes).

Rachmaninoff: Etudes-Tableaux, Opp. 33 & 39. Beveridge Webster (Dover).

Ravel: Gaspard de la Nuit; Valses nobles et sentimentales; La Valse. Ruth Laredo, piano (Connoisseur Society).

Satie: Piano Music. Aldo Ciccolini (Angel, 3 LPs).

Schubert: Quartets in A minor & G minor. Amadeus Quartet (DGG).

Schubert: "Trout" Quintet. Rudolf Serkin, Jaime Laredo, et al. (Columbia).

Schumann: Carnaval; Fantasia in C. Claudia Arrau, piano (Philips).

Schumann: Kinderszenen; Intermezzi; Abegg Variations; Waldszenen (excerpts). Christoph Eschenbach, piano (DGG).

Stibilj: Epervier de la faiblesse; Domine. Shinohara: Alterances. Schat: Signalement. Les Percussions de Strasbourg (Philips).

R. Strauss: Cello Sonata. Mendelssohn: Sonata No. 2. Gregor Piatigorsky & Leonard Pennario (RCA Victor).

Stravinsky: Petrouchka. Brahms: Intermezzi; Rhapsody. Misha Dichter, piano (RCA Victor).

Turina: Piano Music. Alicia de Larrocha (Epic).

Vivaldi: Chamber Concertos & Sonatas. Baroque Ensemble of Paris (Epic).

Siegfried Behrend: Guitar Recital (DGG).

E. Power Biggs: Spanish Organ Music (Columbia).

Oscar Ghiglia: Guitar Recital (Angel).

Eastman Brass Quintet: Works of Scheidt, Weelkes, et al. (Candide).

Steven Staryk: 400 Years of the Violin (Everest).

Vocal

Beethoven: Fidelio. Furtwängler cond. Vienna State Opera production (Seraphim, M).

Berlioz: Te Deum. Sir Thomas Beecham cond. Royal Philharmonic Orch. & Chorus; with Alexander Young, tenor (Odyssey, E).

Borodin: Prince Igor. Boris Christoff et al., Sofia Opera production cond. by Jerzy Semkow (Angel).

Britten: The Burning Fiery Furnace. Peter Pears et al., composer conducting (London).

Britten: Les Illuminations (Peter Pears); Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge. Composer cond. English Chamber Orch. (London).

Britten: A Midsummer Night's Dream. Composer conducting; with Alfred Deller, Peter Pears, Heather Harper, et al. (London).

Gay & Pepusch: The Beggar's Opera. Sir Malcolm Sargent conducting (Seraphim).

Ginastera: Bomarzo. Julius Rudel cond. Opera Society of Washington (CBS).

Gluck: Orfeo ed Euridice. Grace Bumbry, Anneliese Rothenberger, et al., Václav Neumann conducting (Angel).

Handel: Giulio Cesare. Beverly Sills, Maureen Forrester, Norman Treigle, New

(Continued on page 79)

Year's Best

Continued from page 73

York City Opera under Julius Rudel (RCA Victor).

Haydn: The Seasons. Gundula Janowitz, Peter Schreier, Martti Talvela, Vienna Symphony Orch. & Chorus under Karl Böhm (DGG).

Henze: Der junge Lord. Christoph von Dohnányi cond. Deutsche Oper. production (DGG).

Henze: The Muses of Sicily; Moralities. Dresden Church Choir et al., cond. by composer (DGG).

B. Herrmann: Moby Dick. Composer cond. Aeolian Singers, London Philharmonic Orch., et al. (Pye Virtuoso import).

Janácek: The Makropoulos Case. Bohumil Gregor cond. Prague Opera (Epic).

Lehár: The Land of Smiles. Giuseppe di Stefano et al., Heinz Lambrecht cond. Volksoper Orch. (London).

Lortzing: Zar und Zimmermann. Robert Heger conducting; with Erika Köth, Peter Schreier, Nicolai Gedda, Hermann Prey, Gottlob Frick (Seraphim).

Mahler: Das klagende Lied. Teresa Zylis-Gara, Anna Reynolds, Andor Kaposy; with Wyn Morris cond. New Philharmonia Orch. & Ambrosian Singers (Angel).

Monteverdi: Scherzi musicali. Hugues Cuénod, Charles Bressler, et al. (Project 3).

Mozart: La Betulia liberata. Adriana Lazzarini, Emilia Cundari, Petre Munteanu, Paolo Washington, orch. & chorus under C. F. Cillario (Victrola).

†Mozart: The Comic Mozart (ensemble songs & canons). Erika Köth, Peter Schreier, Hermann Prey, Walter Berry, Akademie Kammerchor, etc. (Seraphim).

Mozart: Don Giovanni. Birgit Nilsson, Fischer-Dieskau et al., Karl Böhm cond. Prague Opera (DGG).

Mozart: Entführung aus dem Serail & Zauberflöte (excerpts). Fritz Wunderlich et al. (DGG).

Mozart: Masonic Music (complete). Peter Maag conducting Volksoper Orch., soloists, chorus (Turnabout).

Mozart: Il re pastore. Reri Grist, Lucia Popp, et al., Denis Vaughan conducting (RCA Victor).

Orff: Catulli Carmina. Ormandy, Philadelphia Orch. members, soloists, & chorus under Robert Page (Columbia).

Orff: Oedipus der Tyrann. Rafael Kubelik cond. Bavarian Radio Orch. & Chorus, with Astrid Varnay, Gerhard Stolze, Kieth Engen (DGG).

†Penderecki: St. Luke Passion. Henryk Czyz cond. Cracow Philharmonia et al.; To the Victims of Hiroshima. Witold Rowicki cond. Warsaw Philharmonic (Philips).

†Poulenc: Four Song Cycles. Gerard Souzay; with Dalton Baldwin, piano (Philips).

Schoeck: Notturno. Barber: Dover Beach. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, with the Juilliard Quartet (Columbia).

Schoenberg: Pierrot Lunaire. Helga Pilarczyk; with Pierre Boulez cond. Domaine Musical Ensemble (Everest).

Schoenberg: Serenade. Boulez conducting; with Louis-Jacques Rondeleux, baritone (Everest).

(Continued on page 83)

Continued from page 79

Shostakovich: Symphony No. 13 ("Babi Yar"). Kiril Kondrashin cond. Moscow Philharmonic Orch. & Chorus; with Vitály Gromadsky, basso (Everest, E).

Sibelius: Songs. Tom Krause (London).

R. Strauss: Frau ohne Schatten, Rosenkavalier, & Elektra (excerpts). Christa Ludwig, Walter Berry, Sieglinde Wagner (Victrola).

R. Strauss: Rosenkavalier (scenes). Lisa della Casa & Anneliese Rothenberger; Rudolf Neuhaus cond. (Angel).

Stravinsky: Cantata; Mass; In Memoriam Dylan Thomas. Composer conducting chamber ensemble; with Adrienne Albert, Alexander Young, & Gregg Smith Singers (Columbia).

Szokolay: Blood Wedding. Andras Korody cond. Hungarian State Opera (Qualiton).

Tchaikovsky: The Queen of Spades. Boris Khaikin cond. Bolshoi Opera (Melodiya/Angel).

Verdi: Otello (excerpts). Helen Jepson, Giovanni Martinelli, Lawrence Tibbett, Metropolitan Opera Orch. under W. Pelletier (Victrola, M).

Verdi: Rarities. Montserrat Caballé (RCA Victor).

Wagner & Verdi: Songs. Sándor Kónya (Decca).

Wolf: Spanisches Liederbuch. Elisabeth Schwarzkopf & Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau; with Gerald Moore (DGG).

Yardumian: Mass "Come Creator Spirit." Lili Chookasian; with Anshel Brusilow cond. Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia & Choruses (RCA Victor).

Janet Baker: English Songs (Angel).

Montserrat Caballé & Bernabé Marti: Zarzuela Duets (RCA Victor).

Tom Krause: Opera Arias (London).

Lotte Lehmann: Brahms & Wolf Songs (Victrola, E) and Operatic Arias (Seraphim, M).

Zinka Milanov: Opera Arias (Victrola).

Marni Nixon: Songs of Ives, A. Goehr & Schürmann (Nonesuch).

Wilhelm Pitz: Cond. New Philharmonia Chorus & Orch. in Bruckner, Beethoven, Brahms, etc. (Angel).

Boris Shtokolov: Russian Songs and Arias (Melodiya/Angel).

Gérard Souzay: Cantatas by Rameau, Courbois, Boismortier, & Campra; with Paillard Chamber Orch. (Epic).

Teresa Stich-Randall: Italian Operatic Arias (Westminster).

Nancy Tatum: American Songs (London).

Lawrence Tibbett: Opera and Song (Victrola, E).

—COMPILED BY RICHARD FREED.

94.

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, June 15, 1968

* * *

AS MOST adults know, not all the hippie-appearing young geniuses of our time are concerned with protest and negation. Young Brazilian pianist Joao Carlos Martins was 20 when he gave the premier performance of Ginastèra's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra.

RCA Victor album notes and photos reveal him as a slender but unmade bed as to tailoring, but a bed with incredible springs. For this artist leaps around on the piano bench with more than exuberance in a kind of schooled frenzy.

Critics have not used these antics against him, for the playing in this album is uniquely exact, if fiery, as it should be.

The four-movement work was composed in early 1961 under commission from the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation and dedicated to the late conductor and his wife Natalie. It utilizes 10 variations, constructed in "different moods." The finale has been termed "untethered" and uniquely of today's scene.

Erich Leinsdorf grouped the entire string section of the Boston Symphony to left, woodwinds and brasses at right, solo piano and percussion in the center for this recording.

Side 2 of the album offers Ginastera's Variaciones Concertantes. a theme and 11 variations, each showcasing the special timbres of a particular instrument, the work quiet and pensive, or wild and free, ever enchanting. Players are listed in album notes. Stereo LSC-3029 RE.

* * *

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUN 1 1968

CLASSICAL

GINASTERA: PIANO CONCERTO/ VARIACIONES CONCERTANTES— Martins/Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor Red Seal LM 3029 RE (M); LSC 3029 RE (S)

Martins' strong fingers make the "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra" pound like a tidal wave as he adds color upon color in an unfaltering performance. Leinsdorf's forceful reading supplies the right dash to this exciting recipe. The "Variaciones" shows many individual performers in their best technical light.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,973 SUN. 306,989

JAN 12 1969

sion is clear).

THE SCHOENBERG Piano Concerto is a big, substantial work. Ginastera's Piano Concerto, recorded by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with pianist Joao Carlos Martins, is a dazzling showpiece, which although brilliant and exciting in places, is ultimately no more significant than tinsel (RCA LSC-3029).

Martins is convincing in the solo role — quick and responsive to the rhythmic activity, and capable of producing a full, bright piano tone. The technique is displayed to advantage in the last movement toccata. The recording also contains Ginastra's earlier "Variaciones Concertantes," which features members of the orchestra (cello, harp, flute, clarinet, viola, oboe, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, violin, French horn and double bass).

Records

Ginastera Concerto By BSO

By JOAN SIMMONS

In the rush to jump on the Ginastera bandwagon, RCA Victor has made its first Ginastera entry in its catalog.

The work is the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra played by Joao Carlos Martins and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Martins performed the concerto during the BSO's New York season earlier this year at Philharmonic Hall.

Special Demands . . .

Alberto Ginastera is an Argentinian composer of various accomplishment and is at the moment immensely popular. The Piano Concerto is one of the more valid reasons for his popularity. It is a difficult and temperamentally colorful work which places special demands on each performer from soloist to percussion.

A loud and stormy work, the concerto contrasts the deliberate and insistent piano solo with shrieking violins and heavy percussion flavoring for a preternatural feeling of power.

Martins is a powerful performer who is in no way intimidated by the demands of the work and pounces upon his notes as it fighting a duel with an unheard force.

The Boston Symphony and Leinsdorf's direction are nothing if not their own usual clean and polished brilliance. The mood of the work, which most definitely had a mood, through different handling could have been morbid or lamenting but in the performance is rather dispassionate. Martins provides the fire.

Moody Contrast . . .

Accompanying the Concerto on this particular release is Ginastera's "Variacones Concertantes," a moody and melancholy work in contrast to the concerto.

Written in 1953 the work is reputedly Argentine in flavor rather than material. It employs the form of theme and variations each variation showing a different instrument. It is played here in the typical Boston manner.

If the claim of Argentinian character is to be accepted, it is to be read as sad Latin expression. The composer's outlook may have been colored by his own depravation under Peron at the time the piece was written.

The two works represented on this recording display Ginastera as a powerful and masterful contemporary composer with romantic overtones. His style is neither avant garde nor reminiscent. The listening interest of these works is in contrast to the monotony of his most publicised work, his second opera "Bomarzo."

He also counts another opera, "Don Rodrigo" and a Violin Concerto among his major compositions.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000

JUN 15 1968

Classical Picks

GINASTERA: PIANO CONCERTO (1961)/ VARIACIONES CONCERTANTES — Martins; Boston Symphony/Leinsdorf—RCA Victor LM/LSC 3029 RE

Argentinian composer Alberto Ginastera is an artist of great stature in contemporary music, and his Piano Concerto is one of his most important works. Filled with startling rhythms, electrifying dissonances and fantastic orchestral colorations, the piece gives the listener many moments of excitement. Pianist Joao Carlos Martins and the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, turn in fine performances.

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1.293.800

OCT 18 1968

Scholastic Teacher

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SCIENCE WORLD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
16 Tl. a YR. 385.400

OCT 25 1968

Ginastera: Piano Concerto—João Carlos Martins, Boston Symphony/Erich Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC3029]. This 1961 concerto by Argentine composer Ginastera is one of the few contemporary works that never fails to bring concert audiences to their feet cheering at its end. The finale is indeed a wow—a rhythmically wild and pounding toccata that makes Khachaturian, Stravinsky, and Prokofieff seem tame in comparison. Young Brazilian pianist Martins (who premiered the concerto when he was 20) performs it brilliantly for the recording. Overside, Leinsdorf offers an earlier (1953) Ginastera work, Variaciones Concertantes, whose best sections reflect Ginastera's original use of South American rhythms. (R.H.)

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006

JUN 2 1968

Ginastera: Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Jaoa Carlos Martins (piano) with the Boston Symphony and Variaciones Concertantes. Boston Symphony. Both under Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC 3029 [LM 3029]. $5.79. The concerto strikes one as a dynamic, contemporary work that requires a tremendous technique on the part of the pianist. Martins and the orchestra come through with honors. The Argentine-colored Variaciones employs a solo chamber group. Each instrument gets a chance at the solo. Very well played. First-rate recording. AA AA

CONSUMER BULLETIN
WASHINGTON, N. J.
MONTHLY 110,000

SEP 1968

Phonograph Records

BY WALTER F. GRUENINGER

Please Note: All records heard were stereo, except those indicated by the symbol Ⓜ Ratings (AA, A, B, etc.) apply first to the quality of interpretation, second to the fidelity of the recording. Where performances are known to be available on monophonic LP records and the number differs from that of the stereo record, the "mono" number is given in brackets. Although many important new LP releases are heard, available space limits comment, generally, to those which merit high ratings. It is our view that the reader is most interested in information that leads him to records judged to be superior.

THE DAILY GLOBE
SHELBY, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 4,626

AUG-9 -68

NK

CONCERT

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI) — The young Russian pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy proved his musicianship, his techniques and his nerve when he recorded the "Hammerklavier" sonata, the biggest and mightiest of Beethoven's 32 in what it demands of the performer and of the listener.

The best compliment that can be paid Ashkenazy is that he made the task of the listener easier, by the clarity of his playing which involved complicated adjustments of weights and balances that usually go beyond the capacities of pianists as young as he.

Fortunately the young ones ordinarily leave the "Hammerklavier," alone. This spares them performing debacles. But Ashkenazy evidently knew he was ready, if prematurely. Through his fingers and musical mind it became the turbulent emotional experience it can be when masterfully played —and to seem much less prolonged than it actually is (London-6563.)

Unlike Ashkenazy who has been proving himself with the tough pieces of the established repertoire, the young English pianist John Ogdon goes for the works of obscure masters who may be said to have been neglected by their posterity. His latest such master is Carl Nielsen whose symphonies are occasionally played but whose piano music is almost forgotten.

Ogdon recorded a large sample of it covering 37 years of the composer's creative life. Generally it is unpianistic in the conventional sense, beginning under the pervading influence of Brahms and ending in a still weighty and somewhat plodding manner that at least is quite original. Your main impression is of Ogdon's shining merit as a pianist. It could be the unfamiliar music will grow on you with repetition (RCA Victor-3002.)

All of this applies also to the Brazilian pianist Jaoa Carlos Martins and to his recorded performance of Alberto Ginastera's piano concerto with the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Ginastera is a musical sensationalist, using practically all the devices developed by more original 20th century composers.

There was no demand for hearings of his piano concerto until his recent North American successes with two sensational operas. Only Martins had performed it and he was the qualified pianist for its first recording now that its composer is a big musical name. It is the sort of piece which can tear a piano apart and Martins is a pianist who uses it for that purpose (RCA Victor-3029.)

94

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, June 15, 1968

AS MOST adults know, not all the hippie-appearing young geniuses of our time are concerned with protest and negation. Young Brazilian pianist Joao Carlos Martins was 20 when he gave the premier performance of Ginastèra's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra.

RCA Victor album notes and photos reveal him as a slender but unmade bed as to tailoring, but a bed with incredible springs. For this artist leaps around on the piano bench with more than exuberance in a kind of schooled frenzy.

Critics have not used these antics against him, for the playing in this album is uniquely exact, if fiery, as it should be.

The four-movement work was composed in early 1961 under commission from the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation and dedicated to the late conductor and his wife Natalie. It utilizes 10 variations, constructed in "different moods." The finale has been termed "untethered" and uniquely of today's scene.

Erich Leinsdorf grouped the entire string section of the Boston Symphony to left, woodwinds and brasses at right, solo piano and percussion in the center for this recording.

Side 2 of the album offers Ginastera's Variaciones Concertantes. a theme and 11 variations, each showcasing the special timbres of a particular instrument, the work quiet and pensive, or wild and free, ever enchanting. Players are listed in album notes. Stereo LSC-3029 RE.

* * *

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUN 1 1968

CLASSICAL

GINASTERA: PIANO CONCERTO/ VARIACIONES CONCERTANTES— Martins/Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor Red Seal LM 3029 RE (M); LSC 3029 RE (S)

Martins' strong fingers make the "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra" pound like a tidal wave as he adds color upon color in an unfaltering performance. Leinsdorf's forceful reading supplies the right dash to this exciting recipe. The "Variaciones" shows many individual performers in their best technical light.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,973 SUN. 306,989

JAN 12 1969

sion is clear).

THE SCHOENBERG Piano Concerto is a big, substantial work. Ginastera's Piano Concerto, recorded by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with pianist Joao Carlos Martins, is a dazzling showpiece, which although brilliant and exciting in places, is ultimately no more significant than tinsel (RCA LSC-3029).

Martins is convincing in the solo role — quick and responsive to the rhythmic activity, and capable of producing a full, bright piano tone. The technique is displayed to advantage in the last movement toccata. The recording also contains Ginastra's earlier "Variaciones Concertantes," which features members of the orchestra (cello, harp, flute, clarinet, viola, oboe, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, violin, French horn and double bass).

Records

Ginastera Concerto By BSO

By JOAN SIMMONS

In the rush to jump on the Ginastera bandwagon, RCA Victor has made its first Ginastera entry in its catalog.

The work is the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra played by Joao Carlos Martins and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Martins performed the concerto during the BSO's New York season earlier this year at Philharmonic Hall.

Special Demands . . .

Alberto Ginastera is an Argentinian composer of various accomplishment and is at the moment immensely popular. The Piano Concerto is one of the more valid reasons for his popularity. It is a difficult and temperamentally colorful work which places special demands on each performer from soloist to percussion.

A loud and stormy work, the concerto contrasts the deliberate and insistent piano solo with shrieking violins and heavy percussion flavoring for a preternatural feeling of power.

Martins is a powerful performer who is in no way intimidated by the demands of the work and pounces upon his notes as it fighting a duel with an unheard force.

The Boston Symphony and Leinsdorf's direction are nothing if not their own usual clean and polished brilliance. The mood of the work, which most definitely had a mood, through different handling could have been morbid or lamenting but in the performance is rather dispassionate. Martins provides the fire.

Moody Contrast . . .

Accompanying the Concerto on this particular release is Ginastera's "Variacones Concertantes," a moody and melancholy work in contrast to the concerto.

Written in 1953 the work is reputedly Argentine in flavor rather than material. It employs the form of theme and variations each variation showing a different instrument. It is played here in the typical Boston manner.

If the claim of Argentinian character is to be accepted, it is to be read as sad Latin expression. The composer's outlook may have been colored by his own depravation under Peron at the time the piece was written.

The two works represented on this recording display Ginastera as a powerful and masterful contemporary composer with romantic overtones. His style is neither avant garde nor reminiscent.

The listening interest of these works is in contrast to the monotony of his most publicised work, his second opera "Bomarzo."

He also counts another opera, "Don Rodrigo" and a Violin Concerto among his major compositions.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000

JUN 15 1968

Classical Picks

GINASTERA: PIANO CONCERTO (1961)/ VARIACIONES CONCERTANTES — Martins; Boston Symphony/Leinsdorf—RCA Victor LM/LSC 3029 RE

Argentinian composer Alberto Ginastera is an artist of great stature in contemporary music, and his Piano Concerto is one of his most important works. Filled with startling rhythms, electrifying dissonances and fantastic orchestral colorations, the piece gives the listener many moments of excitement. Pianist Joao Carlos Martins and the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, turn in fine performances.

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800

OCT 18 1968

Scholastic Teacher

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SCIENCE WORLD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
16 Tl. a YR. 385,400

OCT 25 1968

Ginastera: Piano Concerto—João Carlos Martins, Boston Symphony/Erich Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC3029]. This 1961 concerto by Argentine composer Ginastera is one of the few contemporary works that never fails to bring concert audiences to their feet cheering at its end. The finale is indeed a wow—a rhythmically wild and pounding toccata that makes Khachaturian, Stravinsky, and Prokofieff seem tame in comparison. Young Brazilian pianist Martins (who premiered the concerto when he was 20) performs it brilliantly for the recording. Overside, Leinsdorf offers an earlier (1953) Ginastera work, Variaciones Concertantes, whose best sections reflect Ginastera's original use of South American rhythms. (R.H.)

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006

JUN 2 1968

Ginastera: Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Jaoa Carlos Martins (piano) with the Boston Symphony and Variaciones Concertantes. Boston Symphony. Both under Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC 3029 [LM 3029]. $5.79. The concerto strikes one as a dynamic, contemporary work that requires a tremendous technique on the part of the pianist. Martins and the orchestra come through with honors. The Argentine-colored Variaciones employs a solo chamber group. Each instrument gets a chance at the solo. Very well played. First-rate recording. AA AA

CONSUMER BULLETIN
WASHINGTON, N. J.
MONTHLY 110,000

SEP 1968

Phonograph Records

BY WALTER F. GRUENINGER

Please Note: All records heard were stereo, except those indicated by the symbol (M) Ratings (AA, A, B, etc.) apply first to the quality of interpretation, second to the fidelity of the recording. Where performances are known to be available on monophonic LP records and the number differs from that of the stereo record, the "mono" number is given in brackets. Although many important new LP releases are heard, available space limits comment, generally, to those which merit high ratings. It is our view that the reader is most interested in information that leads him to records judged to be superior.

THE DAILY GLOBE
SHELBY, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 4,626

AUG-9 -68

NK

CONCERT

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI) — The young Russian pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy proved his musicianship, his techniques and his nerve when he recorded the "Hammerklavier" sonata, the biggest and mightiest of Beethoven's 32 in what it demands of the performer and of the listener.

The best compliment that can be paid Ashkenazy is that he made the task of the listener easier, by the clarity of his playing which involved complicated adjustments of weights and balances that usually go beyond the capacities of pianists as young as he.

Fortunately the young ones ordinarily leave the "Hammerklavier," alone. This spares them performing debacles. But Ashkenazy evidently knew he was ready, if prematurely. Through his fingers and musical mind it became the turbulent emotional experience it can be when masterfully played —and to seem much less prolonged than it actually is (London-6563.)

Unlike Ashkenazy who has been proving himself with the tough pieces of the established repertoire, the young English pianist John Ogdon goes for the works of obscure masters who may be said to have been neglected by their posterity. His latest such master is Carl Nielsen whose symphonies are occasionally played but whose piano music is almost forgotten.

Ogdon recorded a large sample of it covering 37 years of the composer's creative life. Generally it is unpianistic in the conventional sense, beginning under the pervading influence of Brahms and ending in a still weighty and somewhat plodding manner that at least is quite original. Your main impression is of Ogdon's shining merit as a pianist. It could be the unfamiliar music will grow on you with repetition (RCA Victor-3002.)

All of this applies also to the Brazilian pianist Jaoa Carlos Martins and to his recorded performance of Alberto Ginastera's piano concerto with the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Ginastera is a musical sensationalist, using practically all the devices developed by more original 20th century composers.

There was no demand for hearings of his piano concerto until his recent North American successes with two sensational operas. Only Martins had performed it and he was the qualified pianist for its first recording now that its composer is a big musical name. It is the sort of piece which can tear a piano apart and Martins is a pianist who uses it for that purpose (RCA Victor-3029.)

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227
JUN 1 1969

GINASTERA: Piano Concerto; Variaciones Concertantes. (Joao Carlos Martins, piano; Boston Symphony; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor.) Victor LSC-3029.

Funny disc! Quite the contrary of expectations, it is the early Variations of 1953 which makes this record so desirable. These are written for solo combinations from a pastoral - pretty tune. The style is the mild polytonality typical of the late 40's and early '50's, written before Ginastera turned to his mature 12-tone works. It forms a wonderful display piece for the Boston Symphony's first - chair men.

The Piano Concerto (a Piano Concerto No. 2 has already appeared) calls for large orchestra against the piano, and is in four movements rather than the traditional three. To my ears, it comes off as a confused bramble of noise and rather obvious effects. Key to this impression is the crude, slam-bang piano playing of pianist Martins, who is efficient but as totally lacking in poetry as any pianist in memory.

When Leinsdorf's tenure in Boston is added up, it may well be the modern things for which he is best and most fondly remembered. Tircuit

---

ELLIOTT CARTER: "Piano Concerto," Jacob Lateiner, pianist; Michael Colgrass: "As Quiet As," Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA-Victor)

Carter's Piano Concerto is like a gigantic tree full of notes dangling from branches. In a storm they rattle and clang against one another with a fury, in a lesser wind they jangle and clatter; in a breeze there is only a tinkle of notes. Carter's music does not follow the normal patterns of symphonic music where themes are revived and varied as the composition progresses. His compositions develop and flow away from the beginning, are always on their way somewhere, rarely returning. He regards his scores as auditory scenarios for performers as individuals and as participants in the ensemble.

Lateiner's performance is brilliant, electric. Of necessity he is in competition with Leinsdorf and the orchestra, for Carter does not allow the soloist a privileged or heroic position in the composition. The concerto has none of the classical order of music—it is like listening to a Jackson Pollock painting.

Colgrass' "As Quiet As" was inspired by some school children's responses when asked to complete the sentence "Let's be as quiet as. . . ." Colgrass composed around seven of the 21 children's answers which were printed in the New York Times in 1961. The seven thematic elements of the music consequently are as quiet as a leaf turning, an uninhabited creek, an ant walking, children sleeping, time passing, a soft rainfall, as the first star coming out. The result is a fascinating piece of modern music. N.M.

New Haven Register
Aug. 4, '68

---

the AMERICAN record guide

JULY, 1968

AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL OF OPINION

Erich Leinsdorf

Leinsdorf's Brahms—warm, powerful

LEINSDORF'S Brahms E minor is a powerful performance that challenges all the favored editions. The last two movements are the most striking. Leading with tremendous energy, Leinsdorf never lets up (except for the Trio) to the very end. The Scherzo has virtually no humor; Leinsdorf obviously views it as part of the very somber proceedings in the other three movements. Agree with him or not, this is a great orchestra masterfully led and it is certain to keep you riveted to your chair.

The BSO's extra-large contingent of double-basses makes some wonderful effects in the finale, where much of the success is due also to the engineer. The music demands the utmost clarity, and here we have it with the proper weight. (It is so boring to hear soggy Brahms.) Leinsdorf's opening movement is also superb, e.g. the sheer emotional force of the violins ten measures from the end. The violins are expressive all the way through, but their sadness at this particular point is so intense that only the timpani have enough strength to dispel their effect. The second movement is forthright, though in a few places the wind phrasing slips below the generally high standard.

In the past, any attack on Leinsdorf as a conductor was perhaps most easily refuted with his old Rochester recording of the Eroïca. Now we need go back to that no longer. Surely this Brahms Fourth has enough drive and enough warmth to satisfy anyone. —M.N.K.

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-3010 or Stereo LSC-3010, $5.79.

Klemperer, Philharmonia.....Angel S-35546
Rudolf, Cincinnati.....Decca ®710128
Walter, Col. Sym.....Columbia MS-6113

From DGG, Philips, and RCA Victor—

Three Bruckner Fourths

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 4 in E flat ("Romantic") (Critical Edition, Nowak, 1953); Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Eugen Jochum; Five Motets (Locus iste, Ave Maria, Tota pulchra es, Virga Jesse, Ecce sacerdos); Richard Holm (tenor); Ludwig Laberer, Josef Hahn, and Alfons Hertenstein (trombones); Hedwig Bilgram (organ); Bavarian Radio Chorus conducted by Eugen Jochum. Deutsche Grammophon Stereo (only) set 139 134/5, four sides, $11.58. (64, 24 mins.)

▼

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 4 in E flat ("Romantic") (Critical Edition, Nowak, 1953); Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam conducted by Bernard Haitink. Philips Stereo (only) 900-171, $5.79. (63¾')

▼

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 4 in E flat ("Romantic") (Critical Edition, Nowak, 1953); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2915, or Stereo LSC-2915, $5.79. (60¼')

▼

BRUCKNER: Five Unaccompanied Motets (Locus iste, Os justi, Ave Maria, Christus factus est, Virga Jesse); New Philharmonia Chorus conducted by Wilhelm Pitz; WOLF: Morgenhymnus; VAN NUFFEL: In convertendo Dominus, Op. 32; BRAHMS: Nänie, Op. 82; MOZART: Ave, verum corpus, K. 618; BEETHOVEN (arr. Mottl): Die Ehre Gottes aus der Natur, Op. 48, No. 4; New Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra conducted by Wilhelm Pitz. Angel Stereo (only) 36428, $5.79. (17, 4, 9, 13, 2¾, 3¼')

Symphony;
Walter, Columbia Sym. (Haas).....Col. ®622
Klemperer. Philharmonia (Nowak)..Ang. ®36245
Kertész, London Sym. (Nowak).....Lon. ®6480
Motets;
(Locus, Virga, Christus, Os, Ave)
Gillesberger, Vienna Cha. Choir....Amad. 6064
(Locus, Ave)
Gillesberger, Vienna Cha. Choir....Lyri. ®7136
(Os, Ave)
Meyer, Vienna Cha. Choir.....Mace ®9061

ALL due credit to DGG for devoting as many sides to each Bruckner symphony as it naturally takes and comfortably needs, and for filling the odd sides, when they occur, with Bruckner's seldom-heard motets and other choral works.

As far as the "Romantic" Symphony is concerned, we now have, among the major current issues, two 3-sided and four 2-sided pressings. And it may or may not be pure coincidence that the 3-sided versions of this work, which lasts upward of an hour—that of Walter on Columbia, and now of Jochum on DGG—both have a bass response decidedly superior to that of any of the 2-sided ones. Nevertheless I am still immensely fond of the lateral balance and the sheer stereo spread of the Klemperer/Angel, notably the lateral spread of the violins, which does much for this ingratiating work. And the likewise somewhat top-heavy Haitink/Philips and Leinsdorf/RCA Victor versions also have certain attractive compensations. A peculiarity of the Leinsdorf, which may be equally the conductor's and RCA Victor's doing, is that the brass, and especially the trumpets, seldom dominate the tuttis as much as they usually do; this permits the strings in particular to come through. An example is to be found in the distinctive texture of the passage with brass chorale about half way through the first movement (bar 297), where the shimmering violins and striding violas are permitted to be clearly heard above and through the fortissimo trumpets and trombones—and what a glorious sound altogether!

Both Haitink and Leinsdorf strike me as sympathetic interpreters of this work, and each has especially attractive moments. In the second movement, Leinsdorf seems to hit off the marchlike C-minor Andante quasi Allegretto with exactly the right inflection, both he and Haitink being just a shade faster than Jochum and Kertész, a shade slower than Klemperer. In the hunting Scherzo Haitink leads a merry chase indeed, and brings it off

---

CONSUMER REPORTS
MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,000,000
NOV 1968

DVORAK: Symphony No. 6 in D; Slavonic Dances in E minor and A flat, Op. 72, Nos. 2 and 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA LSC 3017, $5.79.

Erich Leinsdorf's credentials as a conductor of this Dvorak symphony go back at least a quarter-of-a-century, to the time when he recorded the first American-made performance of the score with the Cleveland Orchestra. That Columbia recording was an ebullient and generally rollicking performance that even saw service as a re-issue in the early years of the LP era. Leinsdorf's new recording of the symphony is a sad disappointment. Gone is the sparkle and spontaneity that made his earlier version such a delight. We have instead a heavy-handed, lustreless performance that communicates very little of the joy and good humor to be found in this idyllic score. To make matters worse, the RCA engineers, by whatever reverse alchemy, have here contrived one of the worst-sounding Boston Symphony recordings in years. The orchestra's sumptuous string section sounds completely undernourished, and the woodwinds are dry and devitalized. The performance and the recording of the two Slavonic Dances that fill out the second side are much better. But the symphony, which is after all the main consideration, is very nearly a total loss.

THE BRYAN TIMES
BRYAN, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 6,324
NOV-8--68

a pianist and conductor into converting the implicit into the maudlin.

Two brilliantly interpreted Dvorak symphonies are at hand. One is Erich Leinsdorf's spirited yet relaxed management of the D major, the 6th, with the Boston Symphony. It came from the composer spontaneously, or so it seemed, and Leinsdorf's version comes from the record that way (RCA Victor-3017). The other is Eugene Ormandy's loving projection of [illegible] the "New World." [illegible] London

AUBURN CITIZEN ADVERTISER
Friday, November 1, 1968

CLASSICAL

DVORAK: SYMPHONY No. 6/ SLAVONIC DANCES Nos. 2 & 8— Boston Symphony Orch. (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor Red Seal LM 3017 (M); LSC 3017 (S)

Leinsdorf puts the "Symphony No. 6" through vigorous paces with a precisely executed and a straightforward reading which is exciting to hear. A pure gem. And, in the two Slavonic pieces, he recaptures the charm and grace of a period gone by.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUL 6 1968

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
AUG 31 1968

Dvořák: Symphony No. 6 in D; Slavonic Dances in E minor (No. 2) and B flat (No. 8). Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor stereo, LSC-3017; mono, LM-3017; $5.79.

Leinsdorf's estimate of this work is close to the mark in his judgement of tempi, his feeling for its sobriety and musical aspirations (it was the first of his works in this form that Dvořák allowed to be published and was long known as No. 1). The sound he draws from the orchestra is broad and colorful, likewise its reproduction. Where points of view diverge, they relate to a heaviness of emphasis (the bass end of the sound spectrum is consistently overstressed) and a lack of the lightness and bounce that are so characteristic a part of Dvořák's personality, especially in his scherzi and dance movements generally. The two dances are impeccably chosen to provide the listener with those he already knows best, but they also rank high in musical values. Virtues and shortcomings are much as in the symphony. The annotation by Robert T. Jones is full of basic information, but, surely, the listener should not have to stop the record to find out whether the slow movement is an adagio, or the scherzo a polka (it is actually a furiant). The tempo designations appear no place in the commentary.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227

JUN 1 1969

GINASTERA: Piano Concerto; Variaciones Concertantes. (Joao Carlos Martins, piano; Boston Symphony; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor.) Victor LSC-3029.

Funny disc! Quite the contrary of expectations, it is the early Variations of 1953 which makes this record so desirable. These are written for solo combinations from a pastoral - pretty tune. The style is the mild polytonality typical of the late 40's and early '50's, written before Ginastera turned to his mature 12-tone works. It forms a wonderful display piece for the Boston Symphony's first - chair men.

The Piano Concerto (a Piano Concerto No. 2 has already appeared) calls for large orchestra against the piano, and is in four movements rather than the traditional three. To my ears, it comes off as a confused bramble of noise and rather obvious effects. Key to this impression is the crude, slam-bang piano playing of pianist Martins, who is efficient but as totally lacking in poetry as any pianist in memory.

When Leinsdorf's tenure in Boston is added up, it may well be the modern things for which he is best and most fondly remembered.

ELLIOTT CARTER: "Piano Concerto," Jacob Lateiner, pianist; Michael Colgrass: "As Quiet As," Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA-Victor)

Carter's Piano Concerto is like a gigantic tree full of notes dangling from branches. In a storm they rattle and clang against one another with a fury, in a lesser wind they jangle and clatter; in a breeze there is only a tinkle of notes. Carter's music does not follow the normal patterns of symphonic music where themes are revived and varied as the composition progresses. His compositions develop and flow away from the beginning, are always on their way somewhere, rarely returning. He regards his scores as auditory scenarios for performers as individuals and as participants in the ensemble.

Lateiner's performance is brilliant, electric. Of necessity he is in competition with Leinsdorf and the orchestra, for Carter does not allow the soloist a privileged or heroic position in the composition. The concerto has none of the classical order of music—it is like listening to a Jackson Pollock painting.

Colgrass' "As Quiet As" was inspired by some school children's responses when asked to complete the sentence "Let's be as quiet as. . . ." Colgrass composed around seven of the 21 children's answers which were printed in the New York Times in 1961. The seven thematic elements of the music consequently are as quiet as a leaf turning, an uninhabited creek, an ant walking, children sleeping, time passing, a soft rainfall, as the first star coming out. The result is a fascinating piece of modern music.

N.M.

New Haven Register
Aug. 4, '68

CONSUMER REPORTS
MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,000,000

NOV 1968

DVORAK: Symphony No. 6 in D; Slavonic Dances in E minor and A flat, Op. 72, Nos. 2 and 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA LSC 3017, $5.79.

Erich Leinsdorf's credentials as a conductor of this Dvorak symphony go back at least a quarter-of-a-century, to the time when he recorded the first American-made performance of the score with the Cleveland Orchestra. That Columbia recording was an ebullient and generally rollicking performance that even saw service as a re-issue in the early years of the LP era. Leinsdorf's new recording of the symphony is a sad disappointment. Gone is the sparkle and spontaneity that made his earlier version such a delight. We have instead a heavy-handed, lustreless performance that communicates very little of the joy and good humor to be found in this idyllic score. To make matters worse, the RCA engineers, by whatever reverse alchemy, have here contrived one of the worst-sounding Boston Symphony recordings in years. The orchestra's sumptuous string section sounds completely undernourished, and the woodwinds are dry and devitalized. The performance and the recording of the two Slavonic Dances that fill out the second side are much better. But the symphony, which is after all the main consideration, is very nearly a total loss.

THE BRYAN TIMES
BRYAN, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 6,324

NOV-8--68

a pianist and conductor into converting the implicit into the maudlin.

Two brilliantly interpreted Dvorak symphonies are at hand. One is Erich Leinsdorf's spirited yet relaxed management of the D major, the 6th, with the Boston Symphony. It came from the composer spontaneously, or so it seemed, and Leinsdorf's version comes from the record that way (RCA Victor-3017). The other is Eugene Ormandy's loving projection of [illegible] the "New World."

— London

AUBURN CITIZEN ADVERTISER
Friday, November 1, 1968

---

the AMERICAN record guide

JULY 1963

AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL OF OPINION

Erich Leinsdorf

Leinsdorf's Brahms—warm, powerful

LEINSDORF'S Brahms E minor is a powerful performance that challenges all the favored editions. The last two movements are the most striking. Leading with tremendous energy, Leinsdorf never lets up (except for the Trio) to the very end. The Scherzo has virtually no humor; Leinsdorf obviously views it as part of the very somber proceedings in the other three movements. Agree with him or not, this is a great orchestra masterfully led and it is certain to keep you riveted to your chair.

The BSO's extra-large contingent of double-basses makes some wonderful effects in the finale, where much of the success is due also to the engineer. The music demands the utmost clarity, and here we have it with the proper weight. (It is so boring to hear soggy Brahms.) Leinsdorf's opening movement is also superb, e.g. the sheer emotional force of the violins ten measures from the end. The violins are expressive all the way through, but their sadness at this particular point is so intense that only the timpani have enough strength to dispel their effect. The second movement is forthright, though in a few places the wind phrasing slips below the generally high standard.

In the past, any attack on Leinsdorf as a conductor was perhaps most easily refuted with his old Rochester recording of the Eroïca. Now we need go back to that no longer. Surely this Brahms Fourth has enough drive and enough warmth to satisfy anyone. —M.N.K.

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-3010 or Stereo LSC-3010, $5.79.

Klemperer, Philharmonia.....Angel S-35546
Rudolf, Cincinnati.....Decca 710128
Walter, Col. Sym.....Columbia MS-6113

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUL 6 1968

CLASSICAL

DVORAK: SYMPHONY No. 6/ SLAVONIC DANCES Nos. 2 & 8— Boston Symphony Orch. (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor Red Seal LM 3017 (M); LSC 3017 (S)

Leinsdorf puts the "Symphony No. 6" through vigorous paces with a precisely executed and a straightforward reading which is exciting to hear. A pure gem. And, in the two Slavonic pieces, he recaptures the charm and grace of a period gone by.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000

AUG 31 1968

Dvořák: Symphony No. 6 in D; Slavonic Dances in E minor (No. 2) and B flat (No. 8). Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor stereo, LSC-3017; mono, LM-3017; $5.79.

Leinsdorf's estimate of this work is close to the mark in his judgement of tempi, his feeling for its sobriety and musical aspirations (it was the first of his works in this form that Dvořák allowed to be published and was long known as No. 1). The sound he draws from the orchestra is broad and colorful, likewise its reproduction. Where points of view diverge, they relate to a heaviness of emphasis (the bass end of the sound spectrum is consistently overstressed) and a lack of the lightness and bounce that are so characteristic a part of Dvořák's personality, especially in his scherzi and dance movements generally. The two dances are impeccably chosen to provide the listener with those he already knows best, but they also rank high in musical values. Virtues and shortcomings are much as in the symphony. The annotation by Robert T. Jones is full of basic information, but, surely, the listener should not have to stop the record to find out whether the slow movement is an adagio, or the scherzo a polka (it is actually a furiant). The tempo designations appear no place in the commentary.

From DGG, Philips, and RCA Victor—

Three Bruckner Fourths

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 4 in E flat ("Romantic") (Critical Edition, Nowak, 1953); Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Eugen Jochum; Five Motets (Locus iste, Ave Maria, Tota pulchra es, Virga Jesse, Ecce sacerdos); Richard Holm (tenor): Ludwig Laberer, Josef Hahn, and Alfons Hertenstein (trombones); Hedwig Bilgram (organ); Bavarian Radio Chorus conducted by Eugen Jochum. Deutsche Grammophon Stereo (only) set 139 134/5, four sides, $11.58. (64, 24 mins.)

▼

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 4 in E flat ("Romantic") (Critical Edition, Nowak, 1953); Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam conducted by Bernard Haitink. Philips Stereo (only) 900-171, $5.79. (63¾′)

▼

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 4 in E flat ("Romantic") (Critical Edition, Nowak, 1953); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2915, or Stereo LSC-2915, $5.79. (60¼′)

▼

BRUCKNER: Five Unaccompanied Motets (Locus iste, Os justi, Ave Maria, Christus factus est, Virga Jesse); New Philharmonia Chorus conducted by Wilhelm Pitz; WOLF: Morgenhymnus; VAN NUFFEL: In convertendo Dominus, Op. 32; BRAHMS: Nänie, Op. 82; MOZART: Ave, verum corpus, K. 618; BEETHOVEN (arr. Mottl): Die Ehre Gottes aus der Natur, Op. 48, No. 4; New Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra conducted by Wilhelm Pitz. Angel Stereo (only) 36428, $5.79. (17, 4, 9, 13, 2¾′, 3¼′)

Symphony;
Walter, Columbia Sym. (Haas).....Col. 622
Klemperer, Philharmonia (Nowak)..Ang. 36245
Kertész, London Sym. (Nowak).....Lon. 6480
Motets;
(Locus, Virga, Christus, Os, Ave)
Gillesberger, Vienna Cha. Choir....Amad. 6064
(Locus, Ave)
Gillesberger, Vienna Cha. Choir....Lyri. 7136
(Os, Ave)
Meyer, Vienna Cha. Choir.....Mace 9061

(Locus, Ave)

(Os, Ave)

(Locus, Ave)

(Os, Ave)

(Locus, Ave)

(Os, Ave)

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227
JUN 1 1969

GINASTERA: Piano Concerto; Variaciones Concertantes. (Joao Carlos Martins, piano; Boston Symphony; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor.) Victor LSC-3029.

Funny disc! Quite the contrary of expectations, it is the early Variations of 1953 which makes this record so desirable. These are written for solo combinations from a pastoral - pretty tune. The style is the mild polytonality typical of the late 40's and early '50's, written before Ginastera turned to his mature 12-tone works. It forms a wonderful display piece for the Boston Symphony's first - chair men.

The Piano Concerto (a Piano Concerto No. 2 has already appeared) calls for large orchestra against the piano, and is in four movements rather than the traditional three. To my ears, it comes off as a confused bramble of noise and rather obvious effects. Key to this impression is the crude, slam-bang piano playing of pianist Martins, who is efficient but as totally lacking in poetry as any pianist in memory.

When Leinsdorf's tenure in Boston is added up, it may well be the modern things for which he is best and most fondly remembered. Mercur

ELLIOTT CARTER: "Piano Concerto," Jacob Lateiner, pianist; Michael Colgrass: "As Quiet As," Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA-Victor)

Carter's Piano Concerto is like a gigantic tree full of notes dangling from branches. In a storm they rattle and clang against one another with a fury, in a lesser wind they jangle and clatter; in a breeze there is only a tinkle of notes. Carter's music does not follow the normal patterns of symphonic music where themes are revived and varied as the composition progresses. His compositions develop and flow away from the beginning, are always on their way somewhere, rarely returning. He regards his scores as auditory scenarios for performers as individuals and as participants in the ensemble.

Lateiner's performance is brilliant, electric. Of necessity he is in competition with Leinsdorf and the orchestra, for Carter does not allow the soloist a privileged or heroic position in the composition. The concerto has none of the classical order of music—it is like listening to a Jackson Pollock painting.

Colgrass' "As Quiet As" was inspired by some school children's responses when asked to complete the sentence "Let's be as quiet as. . . ." Colgrass composed around seven of the 21 children's answers which were printed in the New York Times in 1961. The seven thematic elements of the music consequently are as quiet as a leaf turning, an uninhabited creek, an ant walking, children sleeping, time passing, a soft rainfall, as the first star coming out. The result is a fascinating piece of modern music.

N.M.

New Haven Register
Aug. 4, '68

the AMERICAN record guide
JULY 1963
AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL OF OPINION

Erich Leinsdorf

Leinsdorf

(S)LEINSDORF'S Brah powerful performance t
the favored editions. T
ments are the most striki

splendidly. I love the little chromatic snarl, or yelp, which he obtains from the trumpet figure at bar 143, even though it is marked only pianissimo in the score. But I also like the more deliberate handling of the Scherzo by Klemperer and the Philharmonia. Kertész's version is the sad case of a generally superb performance rather swallowed up by too-distant placement.

Walter and Jochum give heavier interpretations of the Andante (suggesting the qualification quasi Larghetto more than the acqui quasi Allegretto, with Walter lingering particularly in the long tune for the violas), and of the outer movements. Jochum, as usual, employs the broader of his tempi frequently to bring out fine points and subtleties which not even Walter hits upon. Occasionally, though, this becomes downright fussiness; and his annoying habit of speeding up suddenly in a crescendo is much in evidence, more than once destroying the effect of Bruckner's built-in rhythmic stretto. An early example occurs before letter D (bar 119) in the first movement. Jochum even speeds up (Finale, bar 405, before Q) where Bruckner has written "Langsamer". And he inserts his own timp cues whenever he feels the urge, evidently prompted in this by habits derived from the old corrupt editions.

So it ends up not too easy to recommend either a 2-sided or a 3-sided version, for various reasons. Of the former, my overall preferences would probably be Haitink for performance, and Klemperer for sound. Of the latter, both with harmonic sound, I find the Berlin Philharmonic's technique slightly superior, but Walter's interpretation more loving and natural. As soon as the fourth or "filler" side enters the picture, however, that balance is knocked utterly askew. The choice between a not very inspired reading of the Overture and "Venusberg Music" from Tannhäuser and five exceptionally beautiful Bruckner motets should not be a very hard one to make. It is surely here, more than in technical quality, that the 1961 Columbia album shows its age.

The Jochum performances with the Bavarian Radio Chorus also show up well beside the motets released by Angel under Wilhelm Pitz, of which three motets are duplicated in both: Locus iste, Ave Maria, and Virga Jesse. In respect to the latter, I awaited with warm anticipation this full record devoted to placing the New Philharmonia Chorus, under its regular director, right in the spotlight where it has so often deserved to be. But in regard to the Bruckner part of this recital both performance and recording leave something to be desired. The rather large choral body employed here, while impressive in choral harmony, does not articulate things like the Lydian fugue (in Os justi) upon the words "et lingua ejus loquetur judicium"—"and his tongue speaketh of judgment"—so well as it should. Even so, these singers are more incisive than Jochum's on the final Alleluja's of Virga Jesse, that lovely work based partly on the music of the Dresden Amen so familiar from Parsifal. A strange melodic variant by Pitz in Ave Maria does no real harm. But the Angel recording is muggier than DGG's, with slight overloading and distortion on top and too little definition on the bottom.

As a matter of fact, another recording of some of these motets, which I still consider my favorite, is even more overloaded on top, often to the point of making one almost wince. But that, if you can take it or adjust to it, is compensated by an excellent bass response and the best balancing of Bruckner's part-writing I have heard. I refer to the Amadeo monoonly recording by the Vienna Chamber Choir under Hans Gillesberger. Their performance of the sublime Christus factus est, for example, is incomparable. Locus iste and Ave Maria are also heard, better recorded and in mono/stereo, under Gillesberger on the Lyrichord label (with the Mass in E minor). Since I first reviewed these two Gillesberger discs, indeed, my regard for his interpretative prowess has been further increased by the appearance of the Mace recording (again derived from Amadeo) in which the same chorus sings Os justi and Ave Maria under Xaver Meyer's direction. The difference in the way they perform is quite notable, especially with respect to the all-important Bruckner stresses, to which Meyer often permits the chorus to pay no attention whatever.

Jochum does not interpret the pieces quite so well as Gillesberger either, in my estimation, though certainly with far more than average flair. But what really adds significantly to the recorded Bruckner canon is Jochum's inclusion of two accompanied motets which are rarely performed, and which have never before been recorded. Tota pulchra es, another hymn to the Virgin (1878), is an E-major antiphon written for tenor solo, four-part chorus, and organ. And Ecce sacerdos ("Behold a great priest"), composed in 1885, is an A-minor gradual, marked Maestoso, for seven-part chorus, organ, and three trombones. Despite the fact that the trombones are relegated far too much to the background for ideal balance in this recording, the magnificence of this musical pendant to the 1884 Te Deum, with its closing six-bar diminuendo from fff to ppp, strikes with considerable force. (All the motets involved here are separately available in score from C. F. Peters.)

Most of the short choral works with orchestral accompaniment to which the rest of the Wilhelm Pitz record is devoted are similarly rare. Brahms's Nänie (after Schiller's poem) is also heard in a two-record set under Ansermet (London 4265/(S)1265) that is otherwise devoted to the German Requiem and the Alto Rhapsody. It receives here its only current discing on a single record. In convertendo Dominus is a rather sentimental setting of the 126th Psalm. We are told that its composer, the Belgian organist Jules van Nuffel, lived from 1883 to 1953, but we are not told when this particular piece was written. Hugo Wolf's short and very atmospheric Morning Hymn dates from 1896, and is a choral resetting by Wolf of one of his songs. The effusive romanticism of all these works seems better adapted, on the whole, to the size of the ensemble at hand. Anyway, they are sympathetically performed and fairly well recorded although, again, what comes off the record often lacks a suitable degree of articulation. The very short pieces by Mozart and Beethoven which frame the motets on the Bruckner side are more familiar stuff. I don't care at all for Beethoven's pantheistic solo hymn in Mottl's stiff, stagey, stodgy arrangement.

—J.D.

CONSUMER REPORTS
MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,000,000
NOV 1968

DVORAK: Symphony No. 6 in D; Slavonic Dances in E minor and A flat, Op. 72, Nos. 2 and 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA LSC 3017, $5.79.

Erich Leinsdorf's credentials as a conductor of this Dvorak symphony go back at least a quarter-of-a-century, to the time when he recorded the first American-made performance of the score with the Cleveland Orchestra. That Columbia recording was an ebullient and generally rollicking performance that even saw service as a re-issue in the early years of the LP era. Leinsdorf's new recording of the symphony is a sad disappointment. Gone is the sparkle and spontaneity that made his earlier version such a delight. We have instead a heavy-handed, lustreless performance that communicates very little of the joy and good humor to be found in this idyllic score. To make matters worse, the RCA engineers, by whatever reverse alchemy, have here contrived one of the worst-sounding Boston Symphony recordings in years. The orchestra's sumptuous string section sounds completely undernourished, and the woodwinds are dry and devitalized. The performance and the recording of the two Slavonic Dances that fill out the second side are much better. But the symphony, which is after all the main consideration, is very nearly a total loss.

THE BRYAN TIMES
BRYAN, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 6,324
NOV-8--68

a pianist and conductor into converting the implicit into the maudlin.

Two brilliantly interpreted Dvorak symphonies are at hand. One is Erich Leinsdorf's spirited yet relaxed management of the D major, the 6th, with the Boston Symphony. It came from the composer spontaneously, or so it seemed, and Leinsdorf's version comes from the record that way (RCA Victor-3017). The other is Eugene Ormandy's loving projection of [illegible] the "New World." [illegible] London

AUBURN CITIZEN ADVERTISER
Friday, November 1, 1968

CLASSICAL

DVORAK: SYMPHONY No. 6/ SLAVONIC DANCES Nos. 2 & 8— Boston Symphony Orch. (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor Red Seal LM 3017 (M); LSC 3017 (S)

Leinsdorf puts the "Symphony No. 6" through vigorous paces with a precisely executed and a straightforward reading which is exciting to hear. A pure gem. And, in the two Slavonic pieces, he recaptures the charm and grace of a period gone by.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUL 6 1968

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
AUG 31 1968

Dvořák: Symphony No. 6 in D; Slavonic Dances in E minor (No. 2) and B flat (No. 8). Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor stereo, LSC-3017; mono, LM-3017; $5.79.

Leinsdorf's estimate of this work is close to the mark in his judgement of tempi, his feeling for its sobriety and musical aspirations (it was the first of his works in this form that Dvořák allowed to be published and was long known as No. 1). The sound he draws from the orchestra is broad and colorful, likewise its reproduction. Where points of view diverge, they relate to a heaviness of emphasis (the bass end of the sound spectrum is consistently overstressed) and a lack of the lightness and bounce that are so characteristic a part of Dvořák's personality, especially in his scherzi and dance movements generally. The two dances are impeccably chosen to provide the listener with those he already knows best, but they also rank high in musical values. Virtues and shortcomings are much as in the symphony. The annotation by Robert T. Jones is full of basic information, but, surely, the listener should not have to stop the record to find out whether the slow movement is an adagio, or the scherzo a polka (it is actually a furiant). The tempo designations appear no place in the commentary.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227
JUN 1 1969

GINASTERA: Piano Concerto; Variaciones Concertantes. (Joao Carlos Martins, piano; Boston Symphony; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor.) Victor LSC-3029.

Funny disc! Quite the contrary of expectations, it is the early Variations of 1953 which makes this record so desirable. These are written for solo combinations from a pastoral - pretty tune. The style is the mild polytonality typical of the late 40's and early '50's, written before Ginastera turned to his mature 12-tone works. It forms a wonderful display piece for the Boston Symphony's first - chair men.

The Piano Concerto (a Piano Concerto No. 2 has already appeared) calls for large orchestra against the piano, and is in four movements rather than the traditional three. To my ears, it comes off as a confused bramble of noise and rather obvious effects. Key to this impression is the crude, slam-bang piano playing of pianist Martins, who is efficient but as totally lacking in poetry as any pianist in memory.

When Leinsdorf's tenure in Boston is added up, it may well be the modern things for which he is best and most fondly remembered. Mercer

New Haven Register
Aug. 4, '68

ELLIOTT CARTER: "Piano Concerto," Jacob Lateiner, pianist; Michael Colgrass: "As Quiet As," Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA-Victor)

Carter's Piano Concerto is like a gigantic tree full of notes dangling from branches. In a storm they rattle and clang against one another with a fury, in a lesser wind they jangle and clatter; in a breeze there is only a tinkle of notes. Carter's music does not follow the normal patterns of symphonic music where themes are revived and varied as the composition progresses. His compositions develop and flow away from the beginning, are always on their way somewhere, rarely returning. He regards his scores as auditory scenarios for performers as individuals and as participants in the ensemble.

Lateiner's performance is brilliant, electric. Of necessity he is in competition with Leinsdorf and the orchestra, for Carter does not allow the soloist a privileged or heroic position in the composition. The concerto has none of the classical order of music—it is like listening to a Jackson Pollock painting.

Colgrass' "As Quiet As" was inspired by some school children's responses when asked to complete the sentence "Let's be as quiet as. . . ." Colgrass composed around seven of the 21 children's answers which were printed in the New York Times in 1961. The seven thematic elements of the music consequently are as quiet as a leaf turning, an uninhabited creek, an ant walking, children sleeping, time passing, a soft rainfall, as the first star coming out. The result is a fascinating piece of modern music.

N.M.

the AMERICAN
record guide
JULY, 1963
AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL OF OPINION

Erich Leinsdorf

Leinsdorf's

(S)LEINSDORF'S Brah
powerful performance t
the favored editions. T
ments are the most striki

splendidly. I love the little chromatic snarl, or yelp, which he obtains from the trumpet figure at bar 143, even though it is marked only pianissimo in the score. But I also like the more deliberate handling of the Scherzo by Klemperer and the Philharmonia. Kertész's version is the sad case of a generally superb performance rather swallowed up by too-distant placement.

Walter and Jochum give heavier interpretations of the Andante (suggesting the qualification quasi Larghetto more than the actual quasi Allegretto, with Walter lingering particularly in the long tune for the violas), and of the outer movements. Jochum, as usual, employs the broader of his tempi frequently to bring out fine points and subtleties which not even Walter hits upon. Occasionally, though, this becomes downright fussiness; and his annoying habit of speeding up suddenly in a crescendo is much in evidence, more than once destroying the effect of Bruckner's built-in rhythmic stretto. An early example occurs before letter D (bar 119) in the first movement. Jochum even speeds up (Finale, bar 405, before Q) where Bruckner has written "Langsamer". And he inserts his own timp cues whenever he feels the urge, evidently prompted in this by habits derived from the old corrupt editions.

So it ends up not too easy to recommend either a 2-sided or a 3-sided version, for various reasons. Of the former, my overall preferences would probably be Haitink for performance, and Klemperer for sound. Of the latter, both with handsome sound, I find the Berlin Philharmonic's technique slightly superior, but Walter's interpretation more loving and natural. As soon as the fourth or "filler" side enters the picture, however, that balance is knocked utterly askew. The choice between a not very inspired reading of the Overture and "Venusberg Music" from Tannhäuser and five exceptionally beautiful Bruckner motets should not be a very hard one to make. It is surely here, more than in technical quality, that the 1961 Columbia album shows its age.

The Jochum performances with the Bavarian Radio Chorus also show up well beside the motets released by Angel under Wilhelm Pitz, of which three motets are duplicated in both: Locus iste, Ave Maria, and Virga Jesse. In respect to the latter, I awaited with warm anticipation this full record devoted to placing the New Philharmonia Chorus, under its regular director, right in the spotlight where it has so often deserved to be. But in regard to the Bruckner part of this recital both performance and recording leave something to be desired. The rather large choral body employed here, while impressive in choral harmony, does not articulate things like the Lydian fugue (in Os justi) upon the words "et lingua ejus loquetur judicium"—and his tongue speaketh of judgment"—so well as it should. Even so, these singers are more incisive than Jochum's on the final Alleluja's of Virga Jesse, that lovely work based partly on the music of the Dresden Amen so familiar from Parsifal. A strange melodic variant by Pitz in Ave Maria does no real harm. But the Angel recording is muggier than DGG's, with slight overloading and distortion on top and too little definition on the bottom.

As a matter of fact, another recording of some of these motets, which I still consider my favorite, is even more overloaded on top, often to the point of making one almost wince. But that, if you can take it or adjust to it, is compensated by an excellent bass response and the best balancing of Bruckner's part-writing I have heard. I refer to the Amadeo monoonly recording by the Vienna Chamber Choir under Hans Gillesberger. Their performance of the sublime Christus factus est, for example, is incomparable. Locus iste and Ave Maria are also heard, better recorded and in mono/stereo, under Gillesberger on the Lyrichord label (with the Mass in E minor). Since I first reviewed these two Gillesberger discs, indeed, my regard for his interpretative prowess has been further increased by the appearance of the Mace recording (again derived from Amadeo) in which the same chorus sings Os justi and Ave Maria under Xaver Meyer's direction. The difference in the way they perform is quite notable, especially with respect to the all-important Bruckneran stresses, to which Meyer often permits the chorus to pay no attention whatever.

Jochum does not interpret the pieces quite so well as Gillesberger either, in my estimation, though certainly with far more than average flair. But what really adds significantly to the recorded Bruckner canon is Jochum's inclusion of two accompanied motets which are rarely performed, and which have never before been recorded. Tota pulchra es, another hymn to the Virgin (1878), is an E-major antiphon written for tenor solo, four-part chorus, and organ. And Ecce sacerdos ("Behold a great priest"), composed in 1885, is an A-minor gradual, marked Maestoso, for seven-part chorus, organ, and three trombones. Despite the fact that the trombones are relegated far too much to the background for ideal balance in this recording, the magnificence of this musical pendant to the 1884 Te Deum, with its closing six-bar diminuendo from fff to ppp, strikes with considerable force. (All the motets involved here are separately available in score from C. F. Peters.)

Most of the short choral works with orchestral accompaniment to which the rest of the Wilhelm Pitz record is devoted are similarly rare. Brahms's Nänie (after Schiller's poem) is also heard in a two-record set under Ansermet (London 4265/(S)1265) that is otherwise devoted to the German Requiem and the Alto Rhapsody. It receives here its only current discing on a single record. In convertendo Dominus is a rather sentimental setting of the 126th Psalm. We are told that its composer, the Belgian organist Jules van Nuffel, lived from 1883 to 1953, but we are not told when this particular piece was written. Hugo Wolf's short and very atmospheric Morning Hymn dates from 1896, and is a choral resetting by Wolf of one of his songs. The effusive romanticism of all these works seems better adapted, on the whole, to the size of the ensemble at hand. Anyway, they are sympathetically performed and fairly well recorded although, again, what comes off the record often lacks a suitable degree of articulation. The very short pieces by Mozart and Beethoven which frame the motets on the Bruckner side are more familiar stuff. I don't care at all for Beethoven's pantheistic solo hymn in Mottl's stiff, stagey, stodgy arrangement.

—J.D.

CONSUMER REPORTS
MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,000,000
NOV 1968

DVORAK: Symphony No. 6 in D; Slavonic Dances in E minor and A flat, Op. 72, Nos. 2 and 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA LSC 3017, $5.79.

Erich Leinsdorf's credentials as a conductor of this Dvorak symphony go back at least a quarter-of-a-century, to the time when he recorded the first American-made performance of the score with the Cleveland Orchestra. That Columbia recording was an ebullient and generally rollicking performance that even saw service as a re-issue in the early years of the LP era. Leinsdorf's new recording of the symphony is a sad disappointment. Gone is the sparkle and spontaneity that made his earlier version such a delight. We have instead a heavy-handed, lustreless performance that communicates very little of the joy and good humor to be found in this idyllic score. To make matters worse, the RCA engineers, by whatever reverse alchemy, have here contrived one of the worst-sounding Boston Symphony recordings in years. The orchestra's sumptuous string section sounds completely undernourished, and the woodwinds are dry and devitalized. The performance and the recording of the two Slavonic Dances that fill out the second side are much better. But the symphony, which is after all the main consideration, is very nearly a total loss.

THE BRYAN TIMES
BRYAN, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 6,324
NOV-8--68

a pianist and conductor into converting the implicit into the maudlin.

Two brilliantly interpreted Dvorak symphonies are at hand. One is Erich Leinsdorf's spirited yet relaxed management of the D major, the 6th, with the Boston Symphony. It came from the composer spontaneously, or so it seemed, and Leinsdorf's version comes from the record that way (RCA Victor-3017). The other is Eugene Ormandy's loving projection of [illegible] the "New World." [illegible] London

AUBURN CITIZEN ADVERTISER
Friday, November 1, 1968

CLASSICAL

DVORAK: SYMPHONY No. 6/ SLAVONIC DANCES Nos. 2 & 8— Boston Symphony Orch. (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor Red Seal LM 3017 (M); LSC 3017 (S)

Leinsdorf puts the "Symphony No. 6" through vigorous paces with a precisely executed and a straightforward reading which is exciting to hear. A pure gem. And, in the two Slavonic pieces, he recaptures the charm and grace of a period gone by.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUL 6 1968

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
AUG 31 1968

Dvořák: Symphony No. 6 in D; Slavonic Dances in E minor (No. 2) and B flat (No. 8). Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor stereo, LSC-3017; mono, LM-3017; $5.79.

Leinsdorf's estimate of this work is close to the mark in his judgement of tempi, his feeling for its sobriety and musical aspirations (it was the first of his works in this form that Dvořák allowed to be published and was long known as No. 1). The sound he draws from the orchestra is broad and colorful, likewise its reproduction. Where points of view diverge, they relate to a heaviness of emphasis (the bass end of the sound spectrum is consistently overstressed) and a lack of the lightness and bounce that are so characteristic a part of Dvořák's personality, especially in his scherzi and dance movements generally. The two dances are impeccably chosen to provide the listener with those he already knows best, but they also rank high in musical values. Virtues and shortcomings are much as in the symphony. The annotation by Robert T. Jones is full of basic information, but, surely, the listener should not have to stop the record to find out whether the slow movement is an adagio, or the scherzo a polka (it is actually a furiant). The tempo designations appear no place in the commentary.

96

On the Records

Boston Orchestra Director Leinsdorf Presents Four Uncommon Recordings

By CHARLES F. KINZLY

NO ONE can say that Erich Leinsdorf is "tapering off" as he approaches retirement from his busy life as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The post presents demands not only for planning the winter concert series in Symphony Hall and the summer enterprises at Tanglewood but also what must be a full schedule of recording dates. Leinsdorf and the Boston orchestra are now current with no less than four recordings for RCA Victor.

MOREOVER, it would appear that the maestro might be anxious to top off his career by cleaning up some chores that have been on his mind for some time by recording material not overly crowded in the Schwann catalogue. On one disc he paired Haydn's Symphonies No. 93 and 96; on another are Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 and selections from the same composer's "Creatures of Prometheus." The third new record contains a collaboration with John Browning in Prokofieff's Piano Concertos 3 and 4. The fourth combines Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 and two of the same composer's Slavonic Dances.

ALL FOUR are excellent, bearing the stamp of intense musicianship and studied elegance which are synonymous with Leinsdorf. It is all happy music. The Haydn symphonies on LSC-3030 are resplendent with that composer's mature charm and witty invention fostered by the freedom and security of his visit to England. Beethoven's early intellectual genius is reflected admirably in the D-Major symphony and in the accompanying Prometheus ballet music on LSC-3032. The Prokofieff concertos on LSC-3019 are superbly done by pianist Browning with knowing support by the conductor, especially in the tricky fourth concerto written for left hand alone. Leinsdorf evokes the cheerful sonorities and enchanting melodies of Dvorak beautifully in LSC 3017 which contains the sixth symphony (old No. 1) and the Slavonic Dances No. 2 in E Minor and No. 8 in A Flat.

Erich Leinsdorf
...busy conductor

strained, however, and the serene symphony moves smoothly to its cheerfully energetic conclusion with orchestral artistry to spare.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,973 SUN. 306,989
SEP 8 1968

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
AUG 31 1968

CLASSICAL

HAYDN: SYMPHONIES NOS. 93 & 96—Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LSC 3030 (S)

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony excel in this coupling of these two Haydn symphonies. The paucity of recordings of the "Symphony No. 93" adds to the attractiveness of this set. While there are more versions of the "Symphony No. 96 (Miracle)," it also is by no means in the warhorse category.

Unhesitatingly recommended: Leinsdorf's Haydn

SZELL'S renown as a Haydn interpreter is well-deserved; indeed, here is the finest performance of the Symphony in G that I have heard on records. But it would be a mistake to miss Leinsdorf's disc. It is surely among the finest of many albums devoted to Haydn's Salomon Symphonies as well as an outstanding example of Leinsdorf's best work with the Boston Symphony. Both Szell and Leinsdorf have recorded first-class editions of the delightful Symphony No. 93, which is perhaps neglected because it has no nickname. Karl Geiringer (writing for RCA) calls the first movement "amiable". H. C. Robbins Landon (Columbia) disagrees: "This is a vigorous and highly masculine movement, boldly orchestrated and remindful of the fact that Beethoven was once Haydn's pupil." It is true that the beginning of the Allegro assai is surprisingly gentle; but other sections, notably the recapitulation and the coda, fit Landon's description. Both performances are effective in their different ways. Leinsdorf is a bit mechanical at first, while Szell is playful. But later on, especially in the coda, Leinsdorf wins by a large margin because he makes the movement a more serious utterance. Both Szell and Leinsdorf play the statement of the Largo cantabile theme in the string-quartet form that Haydn used at the première. It is a lovely effect, though I must admit that I prefer Boston's (Joseph Silverstein's) bowing to Cleveland's (Rafael Druian's). Landon's apt image for the minor section of the slow movement, "a massive Handelian splendor", is clearer on Leinsdorf's record. There is clarity and natural balance on RCA, which has arrived at an excellent Boston sound. That from Cleveland is a bit muddy. There is not so much clarity of instrumental sections as we hear on RCA (nor on the other side of the Columbia album for that matter). A pity, for Szell's is a fine alternate interpretation. Leinsdorf lays greater stress on cantabile, so that the bassoon interruption at the end is prankish both as a sound and in relation to what came before. Szell is slower, and is more consciously striving for "art"—certainly not a fruitless search in this case. The Cleveland bassoon is vulgar and obscene as both annotators describe the section, not only because it sounds so lecherous but also because the beauty it interrupts is more intense. Both performances of the Minuet are excellent; the Trios, however, are not. Szell's timpanist too far overwhelms the trumpets; Leinsdorf's balance is good, even if the instruments are shy. Szell seems to me to be too fast in the finale, which is marked Presto, ma non troppo. His is not a bad tempo, but Leinsdorf's is much better. Though slower than Szell's it is fast enough, and here it is Leinsdorf who emphasizes the playfulness of the music. Szell's performance is generally more mannered than Leinsdorf's; one admittedly felicitous example (annoying ones could be cited, too) occurs just before the last time around in the Minuet. The other Symphony in D on Leinsdorf's disc is the more famous and widely played No. 96. Leinsdorf's performance is again a model in every way; the last-movement coda is just the sort to get an audience on its feet. I certainly hope we shall be getting more of Leinsdorf's Haydn. It would be valuable if only for the proper weight he gives to these symphonies. They are not cheerful, pretty nothings. For once we have Haydn perceived as a suitable springboard for Beethoven without crushing Haydn's own personality. RCA's "Miracle" recording is excellent, and Boston's oboe soloist deserves highest praise for sensitive musicianship. As to the "Surprise" it may be taken as an indication of the generally deplorable state of Haydn performance today that Szell's recording readily surpasses its competition. Szell should not have it so easy here. Though his Minuet and Trio are basically graceful, there are two blatant ritardandi which I find offensive. Furthermore, when the Minuet is repeated after the Trio it is about six quarters per minute faster than when we first heard it; it sounds much more nervous than it should. Even the mostly excellent first movement is marred just before letter F by a big ritenuto. The Andante is a little stiff, but on the other hand the "surprise" chord is held the proper length and the tempo is a good one. My last complaint has to do with a curious flub by the timpanist one measure before letter R (measure 233) which should have been edited out. All of these are small faults, but if the competition were stiffer they would make for a close contest. As it is, Szell's faultless balances, sensitive phrasing, and beautifully managed rhythms leave all current competition behind. In the first movement, for example, the syncopations on the 6/8 meter are boisterously clear; and the music from letter C (measure 80) on is lovingly shaped. In the finale the celli and basses stride forward impressively in the exposition codetta. Szell's is comparatively a fine performance, then; but it calls for no special imagination to see how it could have been better.

If you could afford but one full-priced Haydn record for your collection right now, I would unhesitatingly recommend Leinsdorf's. —M.N.K.

HAYDN: Symphony No. 93 in D; Symphony No. 96 in D ("Miracle"); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Stereo LSC-3030, $5.79.

HAYDN: Symphony No. 93 in D; Symphony No. 94 in G ("Surprise"); Cleveland Orchestra conducted by George Szell. Columbia Stereo MS-7006, $5.79.

JANUARY, 1969

THE CLASSICS

Must Genius Suffer?

By Mark A. Stuart

THERE'S A Mozart-Haydn festival at Lincoln Center this summer and the odds are it's Mozart who's getting the attention.

The public is captivated by doomed genius. The young, facile Mozart, able to compose masterworks almost at a suggestion, doing so much in so short a lifetime, is irresistible. He should be, for his music is ageless, full of grace and indubitable beauty.

But must we dismiss Haydn just because he was a success? Haydn was immensely fecund. By the time he was 59 years old and established as the court musician for the Esterhazys, the composer was an object of veneration.

Must we disparage genius because it did not suffer?

Here is a man who composed 90-odd symphonies by the time he was in his 50s, each as vibrant and as relevant today as they were in 1791. He composed music, as one critic has said, of wit, charm, and richly flowing invention.

Erich Leinsdorf

Erich Leinsdorf tries to prove this with a new recording of Symphones No. 93 and 96 on RC with the Boston Symphony. (LSC-3030). The Boston was never more pristine, Leinsdorf never in better command.

No. 96, of course, is known erroneously as the "Miracle" symphony. Supposedly the audience was so taken with this work that when it was all over, those in the stalls rushed to the front of the hall the better to see Haydn. At this moment, a huge chandelier came crashing down which would have killed many of those in the audience if they had not rushed up front.

Actually, this occurrence did take place, but it was at a playing of Symphony No. 102, four years later.

Number 93 was a later hit, in circumstances that must have pleased Haydn immensely. A star all over Europe, he was invited to visit London in 1791, and commissioned by an eminent violinist-impresario to write some new symphonies.

He spent four seasons among the British and composed 12 new symphonies for a hingry public. That's right, 12 in four seasons. Number 96 had its premiere there and the audience, from all accounts, went into a frenzy.

But even hits have their headaches. London was full of rival managers, each anxious to corral the big stars for their concerts. A rival of Haydn's first impresario tried to entice the hit composer away. Haydn was nothing if not faithful to his commitments. Spurned, the rival began spreading rumors of Haydn's declining health, his failing musical powers, and his inability to do a good job. To add sugar to the rumor, they began pushing a young pupil of Haydn's named Ignaz Pleyel, who appeared to have gotten himself a big (though short-lived) name in those years.

The rival managers, known as Professional Concerts, began a series of buildups that resulted in the drawing rooms of London breaking down into two factions, pro- and anti-Haydn. The best way to silence the rumors and shut up the imitators was to put up.

And Haydn did just that. He spent the months before his second season in London working on Number 93. In February 1792 the 93 was premiered and the battle was over almost before it had begun. Even Haydn was stunned by his reception.

Haydn was a man so beloved that a monument was built to him in his own lifetime. A man so prolific that his works include 125 major symphonies, 80 string quartets, several operas, concertos for cello and harpsichord, cantatas, and an oratorio, "The Creation," second only in greatness to Handel's heavenly "Messiah". He composed the national anthem of his country and was so deeply religious he began every manuscript with the words "in nomine Domini" and ended with "Laus Deo".

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 145,566
AUG 24 1968

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 243,165
MAR 15 1969

THAT MASTER of repertory, Erich Leinsdorf, has been thumbing through the Haydn Symphonies. He chose to record Nos. 93 and 96 with the Boston Symphony. Both belong to the master's 12 London symphonies.

Without making an ostentatious big deal of it, Leinsdorf is acute with such matters, and also in delineating structure and lofty sentiment, those being other admirable wonders of Haydn's culminating symphonies (RCA Victor-3030).

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, September 8, 1968

Boston symphony displays its talent

By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

RECORD REVIEWS

Versatile is a tired and very overworked adjective to apply to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its associated groups. But what other adjective can so succinctly describe this almost miraculously perfect instrument?

Its current recorded endeavors shows just how wide-ranging its abilities are. The first of three Boston discs presents the orchestra under Leinsdorf in Beethoven, the Second Symphony and Selections from the ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus." To be sure, the playing throughout is superlative, the attention to detail almost unbellevable, and the recording brilliant and immaculate. The performance itself is straightforward in both instances, impressive though hardly of the type to overtake a number of others still holding forth honorably in the catalogs (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3032).

Haydn occupies the Bostonians' attentions on a second disc which couples the Symphony No. 93 with the Symphony No. 96 ("Miracle"). The rich tone of the orchestra to these ears seems somewhat weighty for the fragile Haydn works, though once again the playing is as impressive as one could possibly want. A lighter touch is what is required; Leinsdorf is altogether too serious (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3030).

Contrast

Far more persuasive, and the best of the three LPs, is the pairing of the Prokofieff Piano Concertos, Nos. 3 and 4, powerfully realized by soloist John Browning with Leinsdorf and the magnificent Bostonians providing breathtaking orchestral support. These showy but wholly worthwhile works find all the participants at their best, and all are particularly well-served by the Victor engineers. These are now the recommended versions in a field hardly devoid of competition (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3019).

Haydn: Symphonies No. 93 & 96—Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC3030]. Leinsdorf has long been one of the best Haydn conductors around, but until he went to Boston he rarely had an orchestra superior enough to do his interpretations justice. He has it now—and uses it to bring just the right amount of formal elegance and tongue-in-cheek verve to these two delightful (and not often recorded) symphonies. (R.H.)

SENIOR SCHOLASTIC

96

On the Records

Boston Orchestra Director Leinsdorf Presents Four Uncommon Recordings

By CHARLES F. KINZLY

NO ONE can say that Erich Leinsdorf is "tapering off" as he approaches retirement from his busy life as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The post presents demands not only for planning the winter concert series in Symphony Hall and the summer enterprises at Tanglewood but also what must be a full schedule of recording dates. Leinsdorf and the Boston orchestra are now curtent with no less than four recordings for RCA Victor.

MOREOVER, it would appear that the maestro might be anxious to top off his career by cleaning up some chores that have been on his mind for some time by recording material not overly crowded in the Schwann catalogue. On one disc he paired Haydn's Symphonies No. 93 and 96; on another are Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 and selections from the same composer's "Creatures of Prometheus." The third new record contains a collaboration with John Browning in Prokofieff's Piano Concertos 3 and 4. The fourth combines Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 and two of the same composer's Slavonic Dances.

ALL FOUR are excellent, bearing the stamp of intense musicianship and studied elegance which are synonymous with Leinsdorf. It is all happy music. The Haydn symphonies on LSC-3030 are resplendent with that composer's mature charm and witty invention fostered by the freedom and security of his visit to England. Beethoven's early intellectual genius is reflected admirably in the D-Major symphony and in the accompanying Prometheus ballet music on LSC-3032. The Prokofieff concertos on LSC-3019 are superbly done by pianist Browning with knowing support by the conductor, especially in the tricky fourth concerto written for left hand alone. Leinsdorf evokes the cheerful sonorities and enchanting melodies of Dvorak beautifully in LSC 3017 which contains the sixth symphony (old No. 1) and the Slavonic Dances No. 2 in E Minor and No. 8 in A Flat.

Erich Leinsdorf
... busy conductor

strained, however, and the serene symphony moves smoothly to its cheerfully energetic conclusion with orchestral artistry to spare.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,973 SUN. 306,989
SEP 8 1968

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
AUG 3-1 1968

CLASSICAL

HAYDN: SYMPHONIES NOS. 93 & 96—Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LSC 3030 (S)

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony excel in this coupling of these two Haydn symphonies. The paucity of recordings of the "Symphony No. 93" adds to the attractiveness of this set. While there are more versions of the "Symphony No. 96 (Miracle)," it also is by no means in the warhorse category.

Unhesitatingly recommended: Leinsdorf's Haydn

SZELL'S renown as a Haydn interpreter is well-deserved; indeed, here is the finest performance of the Symphony in G that I have heard on records. But it would be a mistake to miss Leinsdorf's disc. It is surely among the finest of many albums devoted to Haydn's Salomon Symphonies as well as an outstanding example of Leinsdorf's best work with the Boston Symphony. Both Szell and Leinsdorf have recorded first-class editions of the delightful Symphony No. 93, which is perhaps neglected because it has no nickname. Karl Geiringer (writing for RCA) calls the first movement "amiable". H. C. Robbins Landon (Columbia) disagrees: "This is a vigorous and highly masculine movement, boldly orchestrated and remindful of the fact that Beethoven was once Haydn's pupil." It is true that the beginning of the Allegro assai is surprisingly gentle; but other sections, notably the recapitulation and the coda, fit Landon's description. Both performances are effective in their different ways. Leinsdorf is a bit mechanical at first, while Szell is playful. But later on, especially in the coda, Leinsdorf wins by a large margin because he makes the movement a more serious utterance. Both Szell and Leinsdorf play the statement of the Largo cantabile theme in the string-quartet form that Haydn used at the première. It is a lovely effect, though I must admit that I prefer Boston's (Joseph Silverstein's) bowing to Cleveland's (Rafael Druian's). Landon's apt image for the minor section of the slow movement, "a massive Handelian splendor", is clearer on Leinsdorf's record. There is clarity and natural balance on RCA, which has arrived at an excellent Boston sound. That from Cleveland is a bit muddy. There is not so much clarity of instrumental sections as we hear on RCA (nor on the other side of the Columbia album for that matter). A pity, for Szell's is a fine alternate interpretation. Leinsdorf lays greater stress on cantabile, so that the bassoon interruption at the end is prankish both as a sound and in relation to what came before. Szell is slower, and is more consciously striving for "art"—certainly not a fruitless search in this case. The Cleveland bassoon is vulgar and obscene as both annotators describe the section, not only because it sounds so lecherous but also because the beauty it interrupts is more intense. Both performances of the Minuet are excellent; the Trios, however, are not. Szell's timpanist too far overwhelms the trumpets; Leinsdorf's balance is good, even if the instruments are shy. Szell seems to me to be too fast in the finale, which is marked Presto, ma non troppo. His is not a bad tempo, but Leinsdorf's is much better. Though slower than Szell's it is fast enough, and here it is Leinsdorf who emphasizes the playfulness of the music. Szell's performance is generally more mannered than Leinsdorf's; one admittedly felicitous example (annoying ones could be cited, too) occurs just before the last time around in the Minuet. The other Symphony in D on Leinsdorf's disc is the more famous and widely played No. 96. Leinsdorf's performance is again a model in every way; the last-movement coda is just the sort to get an audience on its feet. I certainly hope we shall be getting more of Leinsdorf's Haydn. It would be valuable if only for the proper weight he gives to these symphonies. They are not cheerful, pretty nothings. For once we have Haydn perceived as a suitable springboard for Beethoven without crushing Haydn's own personality. RCA's "Miracle" recording is excellent, and Boston's oboe soloist deserves highest praise for sensitive musicianship. As to the "Surprise" it may be taken as an indication of the generally deplorable state of Haydn performance today that Szell's recording readily surpasses its competition. Szell should not have it so easy here. Though his Minuet and Trio are basically graceful, there are two blatant ritardandi which I find offensive. Furthermore, when the Minuet is repeated after the Trio it is about six quarters per minute faster than when we first heard it; it sounds much more nervous than it should. Even the mostly excellent first movement is marred just before letter F by a big ritenuto. The Andante is a little stiff, but on the other hand the "surprise" chord is held the proper length and the tempo is a good one. My last complaint has to do with a curious flub by the timpanist one measure before letter R (measure 233) which should have been edited out. All of these are small faults, but if the competition were stiffer they would make for a close contest. As it is, Szell's faultless balances, sensitive phrasing, and beautifully managed rhythms leave all current competition behind. In the first movement, for example, the syncopations on the 6/8 meter are boisterously clear; and the music from letter C (measure 80) on is lovingly shaped. In the finale the celli and basses stride forward impressively in the exposition codetta. Szell's is comparatively a fine performance, then; but it calls for no special imagination to see how it could have been better.

If you could afford but one full-priced Haydn record for your collection right now, I would unhesitatingly recommend Leinsdorf's. —M.N.K.

HAYDN: Symphony No. 93 in D; Symphony No. 96 in D ("Miracle"); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Stereo LSC-3030, $5.79.

HAYDN: Symphony No. 93 in D; Symphony No. 94 in G ("Surprise"); Cleveland Orchestra conducted by George Szell. Columbia Stereo MS-7006, $5.79.

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, September 8, 1968

Boston symphony displays its talent

By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

RECORD REVIEWS

Versatile is a tired and very overworked adjective to apply to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its associated groups. But what other adjective can so succinctly describe this almost miraculously perfect instrument?

Its current recorded endeavors shows just how wide-ranging its abilities are. The first of three Boston discs presents the orchestra under Leinsdorf in Beethoven, the Second Symphony and Selections from the ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus." To be sure, the playing throughout is superlative, the attention to detail almost unbelievable, and the recording brilliant and immaculate. The performance itself is straightforward in both instances, impressive though hardly of the type to overtake a number of others still holding forth honorably in the catalogs (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3032).

Haydn occupies the Bostonians' attentions on a second disc which couples the Symphony No. 93 with the Symphony No. 96 ("Miracle"). The rich tone of the orchestra to these ears seems somewhat weighty for the fragile Haydn works, though once again the playing is as impressive as one could possibly want. A lighter touch is what is required; Leinsdorf is altogether too serious (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3030).

Contrast

Far more persuasive, and the best of the three LPs, is the pairing of the Prokofieff Piano Concertos, Nos. 3 and 4, powerfully realized by soloist John Browning with Leinsdorf and the magnificent Bostonians providing breathtaking orchestral support. These showy but wholly worthwhile works find all the participants at their best, and all are particularly well-served by the Victor engineers. These are now the recommended versions in a field hardly devoid of competition (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3019).

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 243,165
MAR 15 1969

THAT MASTER of repertory, Erich Leinsdorf, has been thumbing through the Haydn Symphonies. He chose to record Nos. 93 and 96 with the Boston Symphony. Both belong to the master's 12 London symphonies.

Without making an ostentatious big deal of it, Leinsdorf is acute with such matters, and also in delineating structure and lofty sentiment, those being other admirable wonders of Haydn's culminating symphonies (RCA Victor-3030).

Haydn: Symphonies No. 93 & 96—Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC3030]. Leinsdorf has long been one of the best Haydn conductors around, but until he went to Boston he rarely had an orchestra superior enough to do his interpretations justice. He has it now—and uses it to bring just the right amount of formal elegance and tongue-in-cheek verve to these two delightful (and not often recorded) symphonies. (R.H.)

SENIOR SCHOLASTIC

THE CLASSICS

Must Genius Suffer?

By Mark A. Stuart

THERE'S A Mozart-Haydn festival at Lincoln Center this summer and the odds are it's Mozart who's getting the attention.

The public is captivated by doomed genius. The young, facile Mozart, able to compose masterworks almost at a suggestion, doing so much in so short a lifetime, is irresistible. He should be, for his music is ageless, full of grace and indubitable beauty.

But must we dismiss Haydn just because he was a success? Haydn was immensely fecund. By the time he was 59 years old and established as the court musician for the Esterhazys, the composer was an object of veneration.

Must we disparage genius because it did not suffer?

Here is a man who composed 90-odd symphonies by the time he was in his 50s, each as vibrant and as relevant today as they were in 1791. He composed music, as one critic has said, of wit, charm, and richly flowing invention.

Erich Leinsdorf

Erich Leinsdorf tries to prove this with a new recording of Symphones No. 93 and 96 on RC with the Boston Symphony. (LSC-3030). The Boston was never more pristine, Leinsdorf never in better command.

No. 96, of course, is known erroneously as the "Miracle" symphony. Supposedly the audience was so taken with this work that when it was all over, those in the stalls rushed to the front of the hall the better to see Haydn. At this moment, a huge chandelier came crashing down which would have killed many of those in the audience if they had not rushed up front.

Actually, this occurrence did take place, but it was at a playing of Symphony No. 102, four years later.

Number 93 was a later hit, in circumstances that must have pleased Haydn immensely. A star all over Europe, he was invited to visit London in 1791, and commissioned by an eminent violinist-impresario to write some new symphonies.

He spent four seasons among the British and composed 12 new symphonies for a hingry public. That's right, 12 in four seasons. Number 96 had its premiere there and the audience, from all accounts, went into a frenzy.

But even hits have their headaches. London was full of rival managers, each anxious to corral the big stars for their concerts. A rival of Haydn's first impresario tried to entice the hit composer away. Haydn was nothing if not faithful to his commitments. Spurned, the rival began spreading rumors of Haydn's declining health, his failing musical powers, and his inability to do a good job. To add sugar to the rumor, they began pushing a young pupil of Haydn's named Ignaz Pleyel, who appeared to have gotten himself a big (though short-lived) name in those years.

The rival managers, known as Professional Concerts, began a series of buildups that resulted in the drawing rooms of London breaking down into two factions, pro- and anti-Haydn. The best way to silence the rumors and shut up the imitators was to put up.

And Haydn did just that. He spent the months before his second season in London working on Number 93. In February 1792 the 93 was premiered and the battle was over almost before it had begun. Even Haydn was stunned by his reception.

Haydn was a man so beloved that a monument was built to him in his own lifetime. A man so prolific that his works include 125 major symphonies, 80 string quartets, several operas, concertos for cello and harpsichord, cantatas, and an oratorio, "The Creation," second only in greatness to Handel's heavenly "Messiah". He composed the national anthem of his country and was so deeply religious he began every manuscript with the words "in nomine Domini" and ended with "Laus Deo".

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 145,566
AUG 24 1968

96

On the Records

Boston Orchestra Director Leinsdorf Presents Four Uncommon Recordings

By CHARLES F. KINZLY

NO ONE can say that Erich Leinsdorf is "tapering off" as he approaches retirement from his busy life as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The post presents demands not only for planning the winter concert series in Symphony Hall and the summer enterprises at Tanglewood but also what must be a full schedule of recording dates. Leinsdorf and the Boston orchestra are now current with no less than four recordings for RCA Victor.

MOREOVER, it would appear that the maestro might be anxious to top off his career by cleaning up some chores that have been on his mind for some time by recording material not overly crowded in the Schwann catalogue. On one disc he paired Haydn's Symphonies No. 93 and 96; on another are Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 and selections from the same composer's "Creatures of Prometheus." The third new record contains a collaboration with John Browning in Prokofieff's Piano Concertos 3 and 4. The fourth combines Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 and two of the same composer's Slavonic Dances.

ALL FOUR are excellent, bearing the stamp of intense musicianship and studied elegance which are synonymous with Leinsdorf. It is all happy music. The Haydn symphonies on LSC-3030 are resplendent with that composer's mature charm and witty invention fostered by the freedom and security of his visit to England. Beethoven's early intellectual genius is reflected admirably in the D-Major symphony and in the accompanying Prometheus ballet music on LSC-3032. The Prokofieff concertos on LSC-3019 are superbly done by pianist Browning with knowing support by the conductor, especially in the tricky fourth concerto written for left hand alone. Leinsdorf evokes the cheerful sonorities and enchanting melodies of Dvorak beautifully in LSC 3017 which contains the sixth symphony (old No. 1) and the Slavonic Dances No. 2 in E Minor and No. 8 in A Flat.

Erich Leinsdorf
... busy conductor

strained, however, and the serene symphony moves smoothly to its cheerfully energetic conclusion with orchestral artistry to spare.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,973 SUN. 306,989
SEP 8 1968

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 243,165
MAR 15 1969

THAT MASTER of repertory, Erich Leinsdorf, has been thumbing through the Haydn Symphonies. He chose to record Nos. 93 and 96 with the Boston Symphony. Both belong to the master's 12 London symphonies.

Without making an ostentatious big deal of it, Leinsdorf is acute with such matters, and also in delineating structure and lofty sentiment, those being other admirable wonders of Haydn's culminating symphonies (RCA Victor-3030).

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
AUG 31 1968

CLASSICAL

HAYDN: SYMPHONIES NOS. 93 & 96—Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LSC 3030 (S)

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony excel in this coupling of these two Haydn symphonies. The paucity of recordings of the "Symphony No. 93" adds to the attractiveness of this set. While there are more versions of the "Symphony No. 96 (Miracle)," it also is by no means in the warhorse category.

Unhesitatingly recommended: Leinsdorf's Haydn

SZELL'S renown as a Haydn interpreter is well-deserved; indeed, here is the finest performance of the Symphony in G that I have heard on records. But it would be a mistake to miss Leinsdorf's disc. It is surely among the finest of many albums devoted to Haydn's Salomon Symphonies as well as an outstanding example of Leinsdorf's best work with the Boston Symphony. Both Szell and Leinsdorf have recorded first-class editions of the delightful Symphony No. 93, which is perhaps neglected because it has no nickname. Karl Geiringer (writing for RCA) calls the first movement "amiable". H. C. Robbins Landon (Columbia) disagrees: "This is a vigorous and highly masculine movement, boldly orchestrated and remindful of the fact that Beethoven was once Haydn's pupil." It is true that the beginning of the Allegro assai is surprisingly gentle; but other sections, notably the recapitulation and the coda, fit Landon's description. Both performances are effective in their different ways. Leinsdorf is a bit mechanical at first, while Szell is playful. But later on, especially in the coda, Leinsdorf wins by a large margin because he makes the movement a more serious utterance. Both Szell and Leinsdorf play the statement of the Largo cantabile theme in the string-quartet form that Haydn used at the première. It is a lovely effect, though I must admit that I prefer Boston's (Joseph Silverstein's) bowing to Cleveland's (Rafael Druian's). Landon's apt image for the minor section of the slow movement, "a massive Handelian splendor", is clearer on Leinsdorf's record. There is clarity and natural balance on RCA, which has arrived at an excellent Boston sound. That from Cleveland is a bit muddy. There is not so much clarity of instrumental sections as we hear on RCA (nor on the other side of the Columbia album for that matter). A pity, for Szell's is a fine alternate interpretation. Leinsdorf lays greater stress on cantabile, so that the bassoon interruption at the end is prankish both as a sound and in relation to what came before. Szell is slower, and is more consciously striving for "art"—certainly not a fruitless search in this case. The Cleveland bassoon is vulgar and obscene as both annotators describe the section, not only because it sounds so lecherous but also because the beauty it interrupts is more intense. Both performances of the Minuet are excellent; the Trios, however, are not. Szell's timpanist too far overwhelms the trumpets; Leinsdorf's balance is good, even if the instruments are shy. Szell seems to me to be too fast in the finale, which is marked Presto, ma non troppo. His is not a bad tempo, but Leinsdorf's is much better. Though slower than Szell's it is fast enough, and here it is Leinsdorf who emphasizes the playfulness of the music. Szell's performance is generally more mannered than Leinsdorf's; one admittedly felicitous example (annoying ones could be cited, too) occurs just before the last time around in the Minuet. The other Symphony in D on Leinsdorf's disc is the more famous and widely played No. 96. Leinsdorf's performance is again a model in every way; the last-movement coda is just the sort to get an audience on its feet. I certainly hope we shall be getting more of Leinsdorf's Haydn. It would be valuable if only for the proper weight he gives to these symphonies. They are not cheerful, pretty nothings. For once we have Haydn perceived as a suitable springboard for Beethoven without crushing Haydn's own personality. RCA's "Miracle" recording is excellent, and Boston's oboe soloist deserves highest praise for sensitive musicianship. As to the "Surprise" it may be taken as an indication of the generally deplorable state of Haydn performance today that Szell's recording readily surpasses its competition. Szell should not have it so easy here. Though his Minuet and Trio are basically graceful, there are two blatant ritardandi which I find offensive. Furthermore, when the Minuet is repeated after the Trio it is about six quarters per minute faster than when we first heard it; it sounds much more nervous than it should. Even the mostly excellent first movement is marred just before letter F by a big ritenuto. The Andante is a little stiff, but on the other hand the "surprise" chord is held the proper length and the tempo is a good one. My last complaint has to do with a curious flub by the timpanist one measure before letter R (measure 233) which should have been edited out. All of these are small faults, but if the competition were stiffer they would make for a close contest. As it is, Szell's faultless balances, sensitive phrasing, and beautifully managed rhythms leave all current competition behind. In the first movement, for example, the syncopations on the 6/8 meter are boisterously clear; and the music from letter C (measure 80) on is lovingly shaped. In the finale the celli and basses stride forward impressively in the exposition codetta. Szell's is comparatively a fine performance, then; but it calls for no special imagination to see how it could have been better.

If you could afford but one full-priced Haydn record for your collection right now, I would unhesitatingly recommend Leinsdorf's. —M.N.K.

HAYDN: Symphony No. 93 in D; Symphony No. 96 in D ("Miracle"); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Stereo LSC-3030, $5.79.

HAYDN: Symphony No. 93 in D; Symphony No. 94 in G ("Surprise"); Cleveland Orchestra conducted by George Szell. Columbia Stereo MS-7006, $5.79.

JANUARY, 1969

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, September 8, 1968

Boston symphony displays its talent

By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

RECORD REVIEWS

Versatile is a tired and very overworked adjective to apply to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its associated groups. But what other adjective can so succinctly describe this almost miraculously perfect instrument?

Its current recorded endeavors shows just how wide-ranging its abilities are. The first of three Boston discs presents the orchestra under Leinsdorf in Beethoven, the Second Symphony and Selections from the ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus." To be sure, the playing throughout is superlative, the attention to detail almost unbelievable, and the recording brilliant and immaculate. The performance itself is straightforward in both instances, impressive though hardly of the type to overtake a number of others still holding forth honorably in the catalogs (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3032).

Haydn occupies the Bostonians' attentions on a second disc which couples the Symphony No. 93 with the Symphony No. 96 ("Miracle"). The rich tone of the orchestra to these ears seems somewhat weighty for the fragile Haydn works, though once again the playing is as impressive as one could possibly want. A lighter touch is what is required; Leinsdorf is altogether too serious (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3030).

Contrast

Far more persuasive, and the best of the three LPs, is the pairing of the Prokofieff Piano Concertos, Nos. 3 and 4, powerfully realized by soloist John Browning with Leinsdorf and the magnificent Bostonians providing breathtaking orchestral support. These showy but wholly worthwhile works find all the participants at their best, and all are particularly well-served by the Victor engineers. These are now the recommended versions in a field hardly devoid of competition (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3019).

SENIOR SCHOLASTIC

Haydn: Symphonies No. 93 & 96—Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC3030]. Leinsdorf has long been one of the best Haydn conductors around, but until he went to Boston he rarely had an orchestra superior enough to do his interpretations justice. He has it now—and uses it to bring just the right amount of formal elegance and tongue-in-cheek verve to these two delightful (and not often recorded) symphonies. (R.H.)

THE CLASSICS

Must Genius Suffer?

By Mark A. Stuart

THERE'S A Mozart-Haydn festival at Lincoln Center this summer and the odds are it's Mozart who's getting the attention.

The public is captivated by doomed genius. The young, facile Mozart, able to compose masterworks almost at a suggestion, doing so much in so short a lifetime, is irresistible. He should be, for his music is ageless, full of grace and indubitable beauty.

But must we dismiss Haydn just because he was a success? Haydn was immensely fecund. By the time he was 59 years old and established as the court musician for the Esterhazys, the composer was an object of veneration.

Must we disparage genius because it did not suffer?

Here is a man who composed 90-odd symphonies by the time he was in his 50s, each as vibrant and as relevant today as they were in 1791. He composed music, as one critic has said, of wit, charm, and richly flowing invention.

Erich Leinsdorf

Erich Leinsdorf tries to prove this with a new recording of Symphones No. 93 and 96 on RC with the Boston Symphony. (LSC-3030). The Boston was never more pristine, Leinsdorf never in better command.

No. 96, of course, is known erroneously as the "Miracle" symphony. Supposedly the audience was so taken with this work that when it was all over, those in the stalls rushed to the front of the hall the better to see Haydn. At this moment, a huge chandelier came crashing down which would have killed many of those in the audience if they had not rushed up front.

Actually, this occurrence did take place, but it was at a playing of Symphony No. 102, four years later.

Number 93 was a later hit, in circumstances that must have pleased Haydn immensely. A star all over Europe, he was invited to visit London in 1791, and commissioned by an eminent violinist-impresario to write some new symphonies.

He spent four seasons among the British and composed 12 new symphonies for a hingry public. That's right, 12 in four seasons. Number 96 had its premiere there and the audience, from all accounts, went into a frenzy.

But even hits have their headaches. London was full of rival managers, each anxious to corral the big stars for their concerts. A rival of Haydn's first impresario tried to entice the hit composer away. Haydn was nothing if not faithful to his commitments. Spurned, the rival began spreading rumors of Haydn's declining health, his failing musical powers, and his inability to do a good job. To add sugar to the rumor, they began pushing a young pupil of Haydn's named Ignaz Pleyel, who appeared to have gotten himself a big (though short-lived) name in those years.

The rival managers, known as Professional Concerts, began a series of buildups that resulted in the drawing rooms of London breaking down into two factions, pro- and anti-Haydn. The best way to silence the rumors and shut up the imitators was to put up.

And Haydn did just that. He spent the months before his second season in London working on Number 93. In February 1792 the 93 was premiered and the battle was over almost before it had begun. Even Haydn was stunned by his reception.

Haydn was a man so beloved that a monument was built to him in his own lifetime. A man so prolific that his works include 125 major symphonies, 80 string quartets, several operas, concertos for cello and harpsichord, cantatas, and an oratorio, "The Creation," second only in greatness to Handel's heavenly "Messiah". He composed the national anthem of his country and was so deeply religious he began every manuscript with the words "in nomine Domini" and ended with "Laus Deo".

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 145,566
AUG 24 1968

96

On the Records

Boston Orchestra Director Leinsdorf Presents Four Uncommon Recordings

By CHARLES F. KINZLY

NO ONE can say that Erich Leinsdorf is "tapering off" as he approaches retirement from his busy life as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The post presents demands not only for planning the winter concert series in Symphony Hall and the summer enterprises at Tanglewood but also what must be a full schedule of recording dates. Leinsdorf and the Boston orchestra are now current with no less than four recordings for RCA Victor.

Erich Leinsdorf
... busy conductor

MOREOVER, it would appear that the maestro might be anxious to top off his career by cleaning up some chores that have been on his mind for some time by recording material not overly crowded in the Schwann catalogue. On one disc he paired Haydn's Symphonies No. 93 and 96; on another are Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 and selections from the same composer's "Creatures of Prometheus." The third new record contains a collaboration with John Browning in Prokofieff's Piano Concertos 3 and 4. The fourth combines Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 and two of the same composer's Slavonic Dances.

ALL FOUR are excellent, bearing the stamp of intense musicianship and studied elegance which are synonymous with Leinsdorf. It is all happy music. The Haydn symphonies on LSC-3030 are resplendent with that composer's mature charm and witty invention fostered by the freedom and security of his visit to England. Beethoven's early intellectual genius is reflected admirably in the D-Major symphony and in the accompanying Prometheus ballet music on LSC-3032. The Prokofieff concertos on LSC-3019 are superbly done by pianist Browning with knowing support by the conductor, especially in the tricky fourth concerto written for left hand alone. Leinsdorf evokes the cheerful sonorities and enchanting melodies of Dvorak beautifully in LSC 3017 which contains the sixth symphony (old No. 1) and the Slavonic Dances No. 2 in E Minor and No. 8 in A Flat.

strained, however, and the serene symphony moves smoothly to its cheerfully energetic conclusion with orchestral artistry to spare.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,973 SUN. 306,989
SEP 8 1968

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
AUG 31 1968

CLASSICAL

HAYDN: SYMPHONIES NOS. 93 & 96—Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LSC 3030 (S)

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony excel in this coupling of these two Haydn symphonies. The paucity of recordings of the "Symphony No. 93" adds to the attractiveness of this set. While there are more versions of the "Symphony No. 96 (Miracle)," it also is by no means in the warhorse category.

Unhesitatingly recommended: Leinsdorf's Haydn

SZELL'S renown as a Haydn interpreter is well-deserved; indeed, here is the finest performance of the Symphony in G that I have heard on records. But it would be a mistake to miss Leinsdorf's disc. It is surely among the finest of many albums devoted to Haydn's Salomon Symphonies as well as an outstanding example of Leinsdorf's best work with the Boston Symphony. Both Szell and Leinsdorf have recorded first-class editions of the delightful Symphony No. 93, which is perhaps neglected because it has no nickname. Karl Geiringer (writing for RCA) calls the first movement "amiable". H. C. Robbins Landon (Columbia) disagrees: "This is a vigorous and highly masculine movement, boldly orchestrated and remindful of the fact that Beethoven was once Haydn's pupil." It is true that the beginning of the Allegro assai is surprisingly gentle; but other sections, notably the recapitulation and the coda, fit Landon's description. Both performances are effective in their different ways. Leinsdorf is a bit mechanical at first, while Szell is playful. But later on, especially in the coda, Leinsdorf wins by a large margin because he makes the movement a more serious utterance. Both Szell and Leinsdorf play the statement of the Largo cantabile theme in the string-quartet form that Haydn used at the première. It is a lovely effect, though I must admit that I prefer Boston's (Joseph Silverstein's) bowing to Cleveland's (Rafael Druian's). Landon's apt image for the minor section of the slow movement, "a massive Handelian splendor", is clearer on Leinsdorf's record. There is clarity and natural balance on RCA, which has arrived at an excellent Boston sound. That from Cleveland is a bit muddy. There is not so much clarity of instrumental sections as we hear on RCA (nor on the other side of the Columbia album for that matter). A pity, for Szell's is a fine alternate interpretation. Leinsdorf lays greater stress on cantabile, so that the bassoon interruption at the end is prankish both as a sound and in relation to what came before. Szell is slower, and is more consciously striving for "art"—certainly not a fruitless search in this case. The Cleveland bassoon is vulgar and obscene as both annotators describe the section, not only because it sounds so lecherous but also because the beauty it interrupts is more intense. Both performances of the Minuet are excellent; the Trios, however, are not. Szell's timpanist too far overwhelms the trumpets; Leinsdorf's balance is good, even if the instruments are shy. Szell seems to me to be too fast in the finale, which is marked Presto, ma non troppo. His is not a bad tempo, but Leinsdorf's is much better. Though slower than Szell's it is fast enough, and here it is Leinsdorf who emphasizes the playfulness of the music. Szell's performance is generally more mannered than Leinsdorf's; one admittedly felicitous example (annoying ones could be cited, too) occurs just before the last time around in the Minuet. The other Symphony in D on Leinsdorf's disc is the more famous and widely played No. 96. Leinsdorf's performance is again a model in every way; the last-movement coda is just the sort to get an audience on its feet. I certainly hope we shall be getting more of Leinsdorf's Haydn. It would be valuable if only for the proper weight he gives to these symphonies. They are not cheerful, pretty nothings. For once we have Haydn perceived as a suitable springboard for Beethoven without crushing Haydn's own personality. RCA's "Miracle" recording is excellent, and Boston's oboe soloist deserves highest praise for sensitive musicianship. As to the "Surprise" it may be taken as an indication of the generally deplorable state of Haydn performance today that Szell's recording readily surpasses its competition. Szell should not have it so easy here. Though his Minuet and Trio are basically graceful, there are two blatant ritardandi which I find offensive. Furthermore, when the Minuet is repeated after the Trio it is about six quarters per minute faster than when we first heard it; it sounds much more nervous than it should. Even the mostly excellent first movement is marred just before letter F by a big ritenuto. The Andante is a little stiff, but on the other hand the "surprise" chord is held the proper length and the tempo is a good one. My last complaint has to do with a curious flub by the timpanist one measure before letter R (measure 233) which should have been edited out. All of these are small faults, but if the competition were stiffer they would make for a close contest. As it is, Szell's faultless balances, sensitive phrasing, and beautifully managed rhythms leave all current competition behind. In the first movement, for example, the syncopations on the 6/8 meter are boisterously clear; and the music from letter C (measure 80) on is lovingly shaped. In the finale the celli and basses stride forward impressively in the exposition codetta. Szell's is comparatively a fine performance, then; but it calls for no special imagination to see how it could have been better.

If you could afford but one full-priced Haydn record for your collection right now, I would unhesitatingly recommend Leinsdorf's. —M.N.K.

HAYDN: Symphony No. 93 in D; Symphony No. 96 in D ("Miracle"); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Stereo LSC-3030, $5.79.

HAYDN: Symphony No. 93 in D; Symphony No. 94 in G ("Surprise"); Cleveland Orchestra conducted by George Szell. Columbia Stereo MS-7006, $5.79.

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 243,165
MAR 15 1969

THAT MASTER of repertory, Erich Leinsdorf, has been thumbing through the Haydn Symphonies. He chose to record Nos. 93 and 96 with the Boston Symphony. Both belong to the master's 12 London symphonies.

Without making an ostentatious big deal of it, Leinsdorf is acute with such matters, and also in delineating structure and lofty sentiment, those being other admirable wonders of Haydn's culminating symphonies (RCA Victor-3030).

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, September 8, 1968

Boston symphony displays its talent

NE

By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

RECORD REVIEWS

Versatile is a tired and very overworked adjective to apply to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its associated groups. But what other adjective can so succinctly describe this almost miraculously perfect instrument?

Its current recorded endeavors shows just how wide-ranging its abilities are. The first of three Boston discs presents the orchestra under Leinsdorf in Beethoven, the Second Symphony and Selections from the ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus." To be sure, the playing throughout is superlative, the attention to detail almost unbelievable, and the recording brilliant and immaculate. The performance itself is straightforward in both instances, impressive though hardly of the type to overtake a number of others still holding forth honorably in the catalogs (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3032).

Haydn occupies the Bostonians' attentions on a second disc which couples the Symphony No. 93 with the Symphony No. 96 ("Miracle"). The rich tone of the orchestra to these ears seems somewhat weighty for the fragile Haydn works, though once again the playing is as impressive as one could possibly want. A lighter touch is what is required; Leinsdorf is altogether too serious (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3030).

Contrast

Far more persuasive, and the best of the three LPs, is the pairing of the Prokofieff Piano Concertos, Nos. 3 and 4, powerfully realized by soloist John Browning with Leinsdorf and the magnificent Bostonians providing breathtaking orchestral support. These showy but wholly worthwhile works find all the participants at their best, and all are particularly well-served by the Victor engineers. These are now the recommended versions in a field hardly devoid of competition (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3019).

Haydn: Symphonies No. 93 & 96—Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC3030]. Leinsdorf has long been one of the best Haydn conductors around, but until he went to Boston he rarely had an orchestra superior enough to do his interpretations justice. He has it now—and uses it to bring just the right amount of formal elegance and tongue-in-cheek verve to these two delightful (and not often recorded) symphonies. (R.H.)

SENIOR SCHOLASTIC

THE CLASSICS

Must Genius Suffer?

By Mark A. Stuart

THERE'S A Mozart-Haydn festival at Lincoln Center this summer and the odds are it's Mozart who's getting the attention.

The public is captivated by doomed genius. The young, facile Mozart, able to compose masterworks almost at a suggestion, doing so much in so short a lifetime, is irresistible. He should be, for his music is ageless, full of grace and indubitable beauty.

But must we dismiss Haydn just because he was a success? Haydn was immensely fecund. By the time he was 59 years old and established as the court musician for the Esterhazys, the composer was an object of veneration.

Must we disparage genius because it did not suffer?

Here is a man who composed 90-odd symphonies by the time he was in his 50s, each as vibrant and as relevant today as they were in 1791. He composed music, as one critic has said, of wit, charm, and richly flowing invention.

Erich Leinsdorf

Erich Leinsdorf tries to prove this with a new recording of Symphones No. 93 and 96 on RC with the Boston Symphony. (LSC-3030). The Boston was never more pristine, Leinsdorf never in better command.

No. 96, of course, is known erroneously as the "Miracle" symphony. Supposedly the audience was so taken with this work that when it was all over, those in the stalls rushed to the front of the hall the better to see Haydn. At this moment, a huge chandelier came crashing down which would have killed many of those in the audience if they had not rushed up front.

Actually, this occurrence did take place, but it was at a playing of Symphony No. 102, four years later.

Number 93 was a later hit, in circumstances that must have pleased Haydn immensely. A star all over Europe, he was invited to visit London in 1791, and commissioned by an eminent violinist-impresario to write some new symphonies.

He spent four seasons among the British and composed 12 new symphonies for a hingry public. That's right, 12 in four seasons. Number 96 had its premiere there and the audience, from all accounts, went into a frenzy.

But even hits have their headaches. London was full of rival managers, each anxious to corral the big stars for their concerts. A rival of Haydn's first impresario tried to entice the hit composer away. Haydn was nothing if not faithful to his commitments. Spurned, the rival began spreading rumors of Haydn's declining health, his failing musical powers, and his inability to do a good job. To add sugar to the rumor, they began pushing a young pupil of Haydn's named Ignaz Pleyel, who appeared to have gotten himself a big (though short-lived) name in those years.

The rival managers, known as Professional Concerts, began a series of buildups that resulted in the drawing rooms of London breaking down into two factions, pro- and anti-Haydn. The best way to silence the rumors and shut up the imitators was to put up.

And Haydn did just that. He spent the months before his second season in London working on Number 93. In February 1792 the 93 was premiered and the battle was over almost before it had begun. Even Haydn was stunned by his reception.

Haydn was a man so beloved that a monument was built to him in his own lifetime. A man so prolific that his works include 125 major symphonies, 80 string quartets, several operas, concertos for cello and harpsichord, cantatas, and an oratorio, "The Creation," second only in greatness to Handel's heavenly "Messiah". He composed the national anthem of his country and was so deeply religious he began every manuscript with the words "in nomine Domini" and ended with "Laus Deo".

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 145,556
AUG 24 1968

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
JUL 7 1968
New England Newsclip

...ptured beautifully in stereo by Angel . . . Another Mahler work of considerable consequence, the Symphony No. 3 in D Minor, gets a rewarding performance from the Boston Symphony, under Leinsdorf. Shirley Verrett is the star in the vocal portion of this work. It's RCA Victor.

...AN SUTHERLAND has a... "The Golden Age ... has ev...

Clas...

Fur-Lined Mozart; ...

By CARL CUNNINGHAM

MOZART: SYMPHONY NUMBER 36 (LINZ"); SYMPHONY NUMBER 39—Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony. RCA Victor LSC-3097.

MOZART: THREE DIVERTIMENTOS, K. 136, 137, 138 ("SALZBURG SYMPHONIES"); SIX COUNTRY DANCES, K. 606—Karl Ristenpart conducting the Chamber Orchestra of the Saar. Nonesuch H-71279.

MOZART: SINFONIA CONCERTANTE FOR WOODWINDS AND ORCHESTRA IN E - FLAT, K. 297b; HAYDN: SINFONIA CONCERTANTE FOR WOODWINDS IN AND ORCHESTRA IN B-FLAT, OPUS 84—Daniel Barenboim conducting the English Chamber Orchestra. Angel S-36582.

Two of Mozart's big mature symphonies of his last years in spacious, relaxed performances by Leinsdorf and company. Number 39 is really the more memorable of the two, set forth with extraordinary perceptiveness to tiny detail which heightens the meaning the whole structure of the symphony. Needless to say, the tone of the Boston Symphony has that fur-lined elegance that makes one hope this is the start of a whole new Mozart cycle by Leinsdorf.

Nonesuch's recording, the last one ever for them made by the late Karl Ristenpart, concerns itself with three works from the ...poser's Salzburg years (1772) that a... three-movement symphonies ... though they officially go... They are sunny, ex... most substan... F-major, ... side...

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
MAY 1969

The Houston Post
D. 289,385 SUN. 322,763
AUG 3 1969

POST (M)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 467,500
MAR 30 1969
New England Newsclip

Record Player

mous composer's complete symphonic output is grounds enough to justify this excellent recording of such feeble material.

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 2; also Lt. Kije Suite. Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf with David Clatworthy, baritone. Victor 3061.

Prokofieff wrote his Second Symphony, he said, "to prove that he could write the last word in modernity, a work of iron and steel." He later included it in a threesome (with the quintet and Fifth Piano Sonata) as "the most chromatic things I have done." Today the symphony fails because of its doctrinal aggressiveness, and the absence of the lyrical qualities that mark his finer works.

Written shortly after the "Love for Three Oranges," but also after his bitter disillusionment in this country, it reflects a young composer not yet able to find a way to tranquility in a time of general confusion.

Leinsdorf gives the work an excellent reading. The humors of Lt. Kije, however, are rather straitened in the conductor's somewhat unbending manner.

Dvorak: Slavonic Dances. Cleveland Orchestra under Szell. Columbia MS 7208.

All on a single disc, the dances of Opera 46 and 72 are immaculately played, but fast. They just miss that little leeway for relaxation that made Szell's earlier recording irresistible. Almost every dance is faster than in its previous recording. I like it better the other way.

—Paul Hume

THE ATLANTIC Aug. 1968

Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet (Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony; RCA Victor LSC-2994). Less than the complete score, but a generous serving of excerpts. Romeo and Juliet is Prokofiev's finest ballet score, and one of the most satisfying recordings Leinsdorf has achieved in Boston.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
JUL 1968

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

PROKOFIEV: Scythian Suite, Op. 20; Symphony No. 3, Op. 44; Romeo and Juliet: Ballet Excerpts, Op. 64. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR (S) TR 3 5025 $10.95.

Performance: Brilliant
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Very good
Speed and Playing Time: 3¾ ips; 104'49"

Here is a handsome Prokofiev package for which there is no serious competition in four-track tape format. Not only does this reel present the cream of Leinsdorf's performances from his Boston Symphony Prokofiev series, but it also offers key works from the three major periods of the composer's creative life: the scintillating and sophisticated "neo-barbarism" of World War I vintage (Scythian Suite); the transition from Parisian-conditioned style mécanique to impassioned Romanticism represented by the Third Symphony of 1928 (built on materials from the 1923-25 opera The Flaming Angel); and the mature lyrical and dramatic musical language of Romeo and Juliet, written upon the composer's return to Russia. Their juxtaposition on this tape lends it a special value as a listening experience. The sunrise finale of the Scythian Suite, the eerie scherzo of the Symphony, and the greater part of the Romeo and Juliet music—Leinsdorf's sequence comprises about one-third of the whole score, arranged in order of the stage action—are for me the high points of the package. The BSO's playing is superb and the recorded sound is stunning—though I wish it had been possible to achieve here the sonic finesse and better signal-to-noise ratio that characterizes the 7½-ips speed.

D. H.

RCA VICTOR

ERICH LEINSDORF
The cream of his Prokofiev series on tape

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
PRACTICAL ENGLISH
W. 231,000
MAR 14 1969

DISCussions

THE BEST OF THE NEW LPs

BY ROY HEMMING
with Dave Finkle
Ed Couch, Buzz Royden

CLASSICAL ALBUM OF THE WEEK

Leinsdorf: just right

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 2; & Lt. Kije—Erich Leinsdorf/Boston Symphony [RCA Victor LSC-3061]. It's fashionable in some musical quarters these days to dismiss Leinsdorf's tenure in Boston by saying that (unlike his predecessors Koussevitzky and Munch) there's no composer he performs better than anyone else. Well, there is — and it's Prokofieff. Leinsdorf has brought just the right balance of propulsive energy and lyrical beauty to all the works he's done so far in RCA's Prokofieff series — an admirable series of really first-rate performances of the music of one of this century's genuine (if sometimes underappreciated) greats. The thunderous 2nd symphony, written for Koussevitzky in 1924 and sadly neglected for years, receives a knockout performance from Leinsdorf and the Bostonians. Overside, Leinsdorf offers a wryly frisky performance of Prokofieff's music for the film Lt. Kije. As in his earlier London recording of Kije [on Capitol SP8508] Leinsdorf uses the vocal version, with Michigan baritone David Clatworthy singing the part with just the right mock seriousness. (R.H.)

97.

From Boston,

A smashing interpretation of Prokofiev's Second Symphony

THE COMPOSER called his 1924 work "a symphony of iron and steel". It was definitely not a success in Paris, though introduced by Koussevitzky, and has been little revived since. But Prokofiev evidently remained fond of it, and in the very last year of his life—following by six years his revision of the Fourth Symphony—he had mapped out a plan to revise this work also. The Second Symphony's two-movement form, consisting of a propulsive Sonata-Allegro and an expansive set of variations incorporating the elements of Andante, Scherzo, and Finale in turn, follows in the select line of Beethoven's Piano Sonata No. 32, Tchaikovsky's Trio in A minor, and Mahler's Symphony No. 8. The present work's harsh counterpoint and equally dissonant block-harmonies, its sinister and brutal elements, make it a piece for the musically tender to beware. However, it also has its vein of warm and eloquent lyricism centered in the Andante theme—almost crushed to death at the final climax, to be sure, but reviving in the quiet epilogue. At times closely allied in style to the Scythian Suite (1914), the Third Symphony (1928), and the latter work's operatic counterpart The Flaming Angel, the Second still remains unique in Prokofiev's output. I find it thoroughly fantastic and stimulating.

So, evidently, does Leinsdorf, who follows up his resounding Prokofiev Third with a smashing interpretation of its predecessor. It is a strong interpretation which nevertheless sails through the contrapuntal complexities as if they were as easy as Three blind mice. I would personally have liked more broadening-out for the horrendous climax of Variation VI; the score at this point is marked Assai meno mosso (much less quickly), with individual cues marked pesantissimo (with utmost heaviness)! I had to make the same criticism of Rozhdestvensky's performance. (See the ARG for July, 1964.) But the latter was doubly sabotaged by the extreme lack of percussion sound in the recording. Now, with all the drums pounding away on the big chords, I must report that Leinsdorf's fast reading of the passage makes a far more satisfactory effect, even though I can't altogether agree with it. It still passes by too symphonies on Melodiya—a cycle from which we already have Nos. 1, 4, 6, and 7. Leinsdorf's current score is tied with this, on Nos, 2, 3, 5, and 6.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Op. 40; Lieutenant Kijé—Symphonic Suite, Op. 60; David Clatworthy (baritone), Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Stereo LSC-3061, $5.98. (31½, 19½ mins.)

Symphony:
Rozhdestvensky.....Ever. ⑧3214

Leinsdorf is also in evident sympathy with Prokofiev's view of the Lieutenant Kijé Suite, and I am in complete sympathy with both. In the first place, in direct contrast to the Second Symphony everything in Kijé ought to be as light as swan's down—and this is much to Leinsdorf's taste—everything except, of course, that ridiculous and pompous piece of "big brass" which thrice punctuates The Wedding of Kijé (No. III), and this he likewise projects to perfection. Secondly, the score of this extremely popular Suite contains complete alternate versions of the Romance (No. II) and Troika (No. IV)—one with baritone solo in each case (as in the 1933 film from which the Suite is derived) and one with the vocal part split up among instruments and otherwise varied. But Prokofiev has the vocal version of each movement printed to the others, skillful as they are, begin to verge on the over-cute in the long run. The singer, on the other hand, imparts a more robust and explicit kind of humor to the music just where it is needed. I wish that Clatworthy did it as well as Iordachescu, but the fact is that he doesn't get half the fun out of the role that the Rumanian baritone did. In the Romance, there was a farcical mock-tragedy in the latter's voice as he sang, for instance,

> But my heart could answer nothing,
> Beating fast in my poor breast.

In the Troika, marked Allegro con brio, Clatworthy manages to negotiate a faster tempo, but at the price of seeming to have to keep his mind on his driving, whereas Iordachescu seemed to have time to flirt as well, and even made the horses (Maestro Leinsdorf) change pace at his will on the reprise of

> Come here I say, come here I say,
> And have no fear with me.

However, the voice is better balanced with urge all prospective Kijeans to investigate Clatworthy cum Leinsdorf. —J.D.

Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet (excerpts). Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, RCA Victor stereo, LSC 2994; mono, LM 2994; $5.79.

Textually, this is something of a mixture of the several forms in which Prokofiev's score has been represented on records. That is, it is neither the commonly encountered Suites (of which there are three) or anything like the whole ballet (which has been recorded more than once in Russia, on six sides). It makes a sequence of the best known elements in the Suites, beginning with dawn in Verona and ending with the death of the principals (with, of course, much left out along the way). It also makes a strong case for Leinsdorf as a Prokofiev interpreter, blending a meticulous treatment of the musical text with a penetrating sense of the dramatic values it contains. Throughout, the orchestra performs with an uncommonly good sound, and the reproduction of it is skillfully managed.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
MAY 25 1968

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 285,000
OCT 1968

... proving that Prokofiev became a great composer only after he returned to the Soviet Union.

The current Schwann record catalogue offers a broad view of Prokofiev's achievement, for it ranges from early piano pieces like the Visions Fugitives to the Symphony No. 7, written in his next-to-last year. Two major recording projects are devoted to a systematic presentation of Prokofiev's music. One is Erich Leinsdorf's plan to record all the major orchestral works with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This now encompasses nine releases, among them such notable recordings as Itzhak Perlman's performance of the Violin Concerto No. 2 in G Minor (RCA Victor LSC-2962), the Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra with Samuel Mayes as soloist (LSC-2703), and a dramatic reading of the Romeo and Juliet ballet music (LSC-2994).

Critic's Choice

Scholastic editors: ... of Henry Mancini (RCA Victor PBS1128).

Light Classics:* Offenbach Gaité Parisienne & Khachaturian Gayne, Boston Pops (RCA Victor RBS10003); Nero Goes Pops, Peter Nero, Arthur Fiedler (RCA Victor RBS1035); Concertos & Rhapsodies Under the Stars, Hollywood Bowl Orchestra (Capitol Twin-Pack SX2P8636).

Classics:* Van Cliburn: Tchaikovsky & Rachmaninoff Piano Concertos (RCA Victor Twin-Pack RBS5011); Prokofieff Romeo and Juliet, Boston Symphony (RCA Victor RBS1088); Mozart Piano Concerto No. 21 (Elvira Madigan) & 17, Geza Anda (Deutsche Grammophon DGM-88783); Great Moments from Grand Opera: Price, Caballé, etc. (RCA Victor RBS5044). Ormandy-Philadelphia Greatest Hits (Columbia 1811-0050).

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINES INC.
50 WEST 44TH STREET, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10036

Your attention is called to attached tearsheet of our record review column as it appears in the current issue of

- [x] Senior Scholastic (circ. 500,000)
- [x] World Week (circ. 500,000)
- [x] Practical English (circ. 425,000)
- [x] Senior Science (circ. 150,000)
- [ ] Coed (circ. 850,000)
- [ ] Junior Scholastic (circ. 1,300,000)
- [x] Scholastic Teacher (circ. 180,000)

From ROY HEMMING
Executive Editor for Social Studies Magazines & Audio Visual Projects, Scholastic Magazines Inc.
and Editor, Senior Scholastic

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
JUL 7 1968
New England Newsclip

...ster.
...pured beautifully in stereo by Angel ... Another Mahler work of considerable consequence, the Symphony No. 3 in D Minor, gets a rewarding performance from the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. Shirley Verrett is the star in the vocal portion of this work. It's RCA Victor.

...AN SUTHERLAND has a... the Golden Age ... has ev...

Clas...

Fur-Lined Mozart; ...

By CARL CUNNINGHAM

MOZART: SYMPHONY NUMBER 36 (LINZ"); SYMPHONY NUMBER 39—Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony. RCA Victor LSC-3097.
MOZART: THREE DIVERTIMENTOS, K. 136, 137, 138 ("SALZBURG SYMPHONIES"); SIX COUNTRY DANCES, K. 606—Karl Ristenpart conducting the Chamber Orchestra of the Saar. Nonesuch 1-71217.
MOZART: SINFONIA CONCERTANTE FOR WOODWINDS AND ORCHESTRA IN E-FLAT, K. 297b; HAYDN: SINFONIA CONCERTANTE FOR WOODWINDS IN AND ORCHESTRA IN B-FLAT, OPUS 84—Daniel Barenboim conducting the English Chamber Orchestra. Angel S-36582.

Two of Mozart's big mature symphonies of his last years in spacious, relaxed performances by Leinsdorf and company. Number 39 is really the more memorable of the two, set forth with extraordinary perceptiveness to tiny detail which heightens the meaning the whole structure of the symphony. Needless to say, the tone of the Boston Symphony has that fur-lined elegance that makes one hope this is the start of a whole new Mozart cycle by Leinsdorf.

Nonesuch's recording, the last one ever for them made by the late Karl Ristenpart, concerns itself with three works from the ...poser's Salzburg years (1772) that a... three-movement symphonies ... though they officially ... They are sunny, ex... most substan... F-major, ... side...

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
MAY 1969

The Houston Post
D: 289,385 SUN. 322,763
AUG 3 1969

DISCussions

THE BEST OF THE NEW LPs

BY ROY HEMMING
with Dave Finkle
Ed Coach, Buzz Royden

CLASSICAL ALBUM OF THE WEEK

Leinsdorf: just right

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 2; & Lt. Kije—Erich Leinsdorf/Boston Symphony [RCA Victor LSC3061]. It's fashionable in some musical quarters these days to dismiss Leinsdorf's tenure in Boston by saying that (unlike his predecessors Koussevitzky and Munch) there's no composer he performs better than anyone else. Well, there is — and. it's Prokofieff. Leinsdorf has brought just the right balance of propulsive energy and lyrical beauty to all the works he's done so far in RCA's Prokofieff series — an admirable series of really first-rate performances of the music of one of this century's genuine (if sometimes underappreciated) greats. The thunderous 2nd symphony, written for Koussevitzky in 1924 and sadly neglected for years, receives a knockout performance from Leinsdorf and the Bostonians. Overside, Leinsdorf offers a wryly frisky performance of Prokofieff's music for the film Lt. Kije. As in his earlier London recording of Kije [on Capitol SP8508] Leinsdorf uses the vocal version, with Michigan baritone David Clatworthy singing the part with just the right mock seriousness. (R.H.)

quickly, leaving the full two-minute literal reprise of the Andante theme to round things off and to remain much more firmly fixed in the memory. For me, this closing portion of the Symphony (Variation VI and Tema) was ideally negotiated by Charles Bruck in a long-deleted French Pathé recording.

But that recording would be just as technically superseded as Rozhdestvensky's if it were current today. In 1964 I was dealing with a mono MK recording (Rozhdestvensky), with passing references back to the mono Pathé. Since then, the Soviet conductor's version has been tricked out in "stereo" by Everest, but it remains as resolutely one-dimensional in effect as before. RCA's stereo clarifies the tutti texture of the Second Symphony—which Prokofiev freely admitted is pretty dense—by virtue of more breathing space than I have heard it accorded ere now (never having experienced a "live" performance of the work), and as a result I love it more than ever. RCA has a turnover between Variations V and VI. I understand, by the way, that Rozhdestvensky is engaged in recording or re-recording all the Prokofiev symphonies on Melodiya—a cycle from which we already have Nos. 1, 4, 6, and 7. Leinsdorf's current score is tied with this, on Nos, 2, 3, 5, and 6.

Leinsdorf is also in evident sympathy with Prokofiev's view of the Lieutenant Kijé Suite, and I am in complete sympathy with both. In the first place, in direct contrast to the Second Symphony everything in Kijé ought to be as light as swan's down—and this is much to Leinsdorf's taste—everything except, of course, that ridiculous and pompous piece of "big brass" which thrice punctuates The Wedding of Kijé (No. III), and this he likewise projects to perfection. Secondly, the score of this extremely popular Suite contains complete alternate versions of the Romance (No. II) and Troika (No. IV)—one with baritone solo in each case (as in the 1933 film from which the Suite is derived) and one with the vocal part split up among instruments and otherwise varied. But Prokofiev has the vocal version of each movement printed first in the score, with the words "II bis" and "IV bis" over the instrumental versions. In other words, the latter are the "variantes", in his view. Yet out of all the numerous recordings, Leinsdorf is the only conductor who has bothered to engage a singer, except in the case of a wretched, pseudonymous mono version from the early '50s on the Royale label, with the part sung in German instead of Russian! (The two songs are distinctly derived from the style of Russian folksong.) And Leinsdorf has now done it twice: first on a deleted 1960 Capitol mono/stereo record with baritone Dan Iordachescu and the Philharmonia Orchestra, and now with David Clatworthy and the BSO.

Well, I favor the use of the baritone because the very sound and inflection of the words (whether one understands Russian directly or not) create a welcome variety within the verses of the songs, as well as a much-needed over-all contrast between these numbers and the odd-numbered movements. There are already more than enough perky tunes in Kijé for anybody's taste, and the instrumental treatments of these particular tunes added to the others, skillful as they are, begin to verge on the over-cute in the long run. The singer, on the other hand, imparts a more robust and explicit kind of humor to the music just where it is needed. I wish that Clatworthy did it as well as Iordachescu, but the fact is that he doesn't get half the fun out of the role that the Rumanian baritone did. In the Romance, there was a farcical mock-tragedy in the latter's voice as he sang, for instance,

> But my heart could answer nothing,
> Beating fast in my poor breast.

In the Troika, marked Allegro con brio, Clatworthy manages to negotiate a faster tempo, but at the price of seeming to have to keep his mind on his driving, whereas Iordachescu seemed to have time to flirt as well, and even made the horses (Maestro Leinsdorf) change pace at his will on the reprise of

> Come here I say, come here I say,
> And have no fear with me.

However, the voice is better balanced with urge all prospective Kijeans to investigate Clatworthy cum Leinsdorf. —J.D.

POST (M)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 467,500
MAR 30 1969
New England Newsclip

Record Player

mous composer's complete symphonic output is grounds enough to justify this excellent recording of such feeble material.

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 2; also Lt. Kije Suite. Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf, with David Clatworthy, baritone. Victor 3061.

Prokofieff wrote his Second Symphony, he said, "to prove that he could write the last word in modernity, a work of iron and steel." He later included it in a threesome (with the quintet and Fifth Piano Sonata) as "the most chromatic things I have done." Today the symphony fails because of its doctrinal aggressiveness, and the absence of the lyrical qualities that mark his finer works.

Written shortly after the "Love for Three Oranges," but also after his bitter disillusionment in this country, it reflects a young composer not yet able to find a way to tranquility in a time of general confusion.

Leinsdorf gives the work an excellent reading. The humors of Lt. Kije, however, are rather straitened in the conductor's somewhat unbending manner.

Dvorak: Slavonic Dances. Cleveland Orchestra under Szell. Columbia MS 7208.

All on a single disc, the dances of Opera 46 and 72 are immaculately played, but fast. They just miss that little leeway for relaxation that made Szell's earlier recording irresistible. Almost every dance is faster than in its previous recording. I like it better the other way.

—Paul Hume

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
PRACTICAL ENGLISH
W. 231,000
MAR 14 1969

THE ATLANTIC Aug 1968

Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet (Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony; RCA Victor LSC-2994). Less than the complete score, but a generous serving of excerpts. Romeo and Juliet is Prokofiev's finest ballet score, and one of the most satisfying recordings Leinsdorf has achieved in Boston.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
JUL 1968

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

PROKOFIEV: Scythian Suite, Op. 20; Symphony No. 3, Op. 44; Romeo and Juliet: Ballet Excerpts, Op. 64. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR (S) TR 3 5025 $10.95.

Performance: Brilliant
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Very good
Speed and Playing Time: 3¾ ips; 104'49"

Here is a handsome Prokofiev package for which there is no serious competition in four-track tape format. Not only does this reel present the cream of Leinsdorf's performances from his Boston Symphony Prokofiev series, but it also offers key works from the three major periods of the composer's creative life: the scintillating and sophisticated "neo-barbarism" of World War I vintage (Scythian Suite); the transition from Parisian-conditioned style mécanique to impassioned Romanticism represented by the Third Symphony of 1928 (built on materials from the 1923-25 opera The Flaming Angel); and the mature lyrical and dramatic musical language of Romeo and Juliet, written upon the composer's return to Russia. Their juxtaposition on this tape lends it a special value as a listening experience. The sunrise finale of the Scythian Suite, the eerie scherzo of the Symphony, and the greater part of the Romeo and Juliet music—Leinsdorf's sequence comprises about one-third of the whole score, arranged in order of the stage action—are for me the high points of the package. The BSO's playing is superb and the recorded sound is stunning—though I wish it had been possible to achieve here the sonic finesse and better signal-to-noise ratio that characterizes the 7½-ips speed.

D. H.

RCA VICTOR

ERICH LEINSDORF
The cream of his Prokofiev series on tape

The Houston Post
D: 289,385 SUN. 322,763
AUG 3 1969

Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet (excerpts). Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, RCA Victor stereo, LSC 2994; mono, LM 2994; $5.79.

Textually, this is something of a mixture of the several forms in which Prokofiev's score has been represented on records. That is, it is neither the commonly encountered Suites (of which there are three) or anything like the whole ballet (which has been recorded more than once in Russia, on six sides). It makes a sequence of the best known elements in the Suites, beginning with dawn in Verona and ending with the death of the principals (with, of course, much left out along the way). It also makes a strong case for Leinsdorf as a Prokofiev interpreter, blending a meticulous treatment of the musical text with a penetrating sense of the dramatic values it contains. Throughout, the orchestra performs with an uncommonly good sound, and the reproduction of it is skillfully managed.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
MAY 25 1968

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 285,000
OCT 1968

...proving that Prokofiev became a great composer only after he returned to the Soviet Union.

The current Schwann record catalogue offers a broad view of Prokofiev's achievement, for it ranges from early piano pieces like the Visions Fugitives to the Symphony No. 7, written in his next-to-last year. Two major recording projects are devoted to a systematic presentation of Prokofiev's music. One is Erich Leinsdorf's plan to record all the major orchestral works with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This now encompasses nine releases, among them such notable recordings as Itzhak Perlman's performance of the Violin Concerto No. 2 in G Minor (RCA Victor LSC-2962), the Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra with Samuel Mayes as soloist (LSC-2703), and a dramatic reading of the Romeo and Juliet ballet music (LSC-2994).

Critic's Choice

Scholastic editor Dr. Henry Mancini (RCA Victor P8S1128).
Light Classics: Offenbach Gaité Parisienne & Khachaturian Gayne, Boston Pops (RCA Victor R8S10003); Nero Goes Pops, Peter Nero, Arthur Fiedler (RCA Victor R8S1035); Concertos & Rhapsodies Under the Stars, Hollywood Bowl Orchestra (Capitol Twin-Pack 8X2P8636).
Classics: Van Cliburn: Tchaikovsky & Rachmaninoff Piano Concertos (RCA Victor Twin-Pack R8S5011); Prokofieff Romeo and Juliet, Boston Symphony (RCA Victor R8S1088); Mozart Piano Concerto No. 21 (Elvira Madigan) & 17, Geza Anda (Deutsche Grammophon DGM-88783); Great Moments from Grand Opera: Price, Caballé, etc. (RCA Victor R8S5044). Ormandy-Philadelphia Greatest Hits (Columbia 1811-0050).

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINES INC.
50 WEST 44TH STREET, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10036

Your attention is called to attached tearsheet of our record review column as it appears in the current issue of

- [x] Senior Scholastic (circ. 500,000)
- [x] World Week (circ. 500,000)
- [x] Practical English (circ. 425,000)
- [x] Senior Science (circ. 150,000)
- [ ] Coed (circ. 850,000)
- [ ] Junior Scholastic (circ. 1,300,000)
- [x] Scholastic Teacher (circ. 180,000)

From ROY HEMMING
Executive Editor for Social Studies Magazines & Audio Visual Projects, Scholastic Magazines Inc. and Editor, Senior Scholastic

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
JUL 7 1968
New England Newsclip

...uster.

...pured beautifully in stereo by Angel ... Another Mahler work of considerable consequence, the Symphony No. 3 in D Minor, gets a rewarding performance from the Boston Symphony, under Leinsdorf. Shirley Verrett is the star in the vocal portion of this work. It's RCA Victor.

...AN SUTHERLAND has a "The Golden Age ... has ev-"

Class...
AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
MAY 1969

Fur-Lined Mozart; ...

By CARL CUNNINGHAM

MOZART: SYMPHONY NUMBER 36 (LINZ"); SYMPHONY NUMBER 39—Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony. RCA Victor LSC-3097.

MOZART: THREE DIVERTIMENTOS, K. 136, 137, 138 ("SALZBURG SYMPHONIES"); SIX COUNTRY DANCES, K. 606—Karl Ristenpart conducting the Chamber Orchestra of the Saar. Nonesuch H-72027.

MOZART: SINFONIA CONCERTANTE FOR WOODWINDS AND ORCHESTRA IN E - FLAT, K. 297b; HAYDN: SINFONIA CONCERTANTE FOR WOODWINDS IN AND ORCHESTRA IN B-FLAT, OPUS 84—Daniel Barenboim conducting the English Chamber Orchestra. Angel S-36582.

Two of Mozart's big mature symphonies of his last years in spacious, relaxed performances by Leinsdorf and company. Number 39 is really the more memorable of the two, set forth with extraordinary perceptiveness to tiny detail which heightens the meaning the whole structure of the symphony. Needless to say, the tone of the Boston Symphony has that fur-lined elegance that makes one hope this is the start of a whole new Mozart cycle by Leinsdorf.

Nonesuch's recording, the last one ever for them made by the late Karl Ristenpart, concerns itself with three works from the poser's Salzburg years (1772) that a... three-movement symphonies ... though they officially go... They are sunny, ex... most substanc... F-major, B... side...

The Houston Post
D. 289,385 SUN. 322,763
AUG 3 1969

DISCussions

THE BEST OF THE NEW LPs

BY ROY HEMMING
with Dave Finkle
Ed Coach, Buzz Royden

CLASSICAL ALBUM OF THE WEEK

Leinsdorf: just right

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 2; & Lt. Kije—Erich Leinsdorf/Boston Symphony [RCA Victor LSC3061]. It's fashionable in some musical quarters these days to dismiss Leinsdorf's tenure in Boston by saying that (unlike his predecessors Koussevitzky and Munch) there's no composer he performs better than anyone else. Well, there is — and it's Prokofieff. Leinsdorf has brought just the right balance of propulsive energy and lyrical beauty to all the works he's done so far in RCA's Prokofieff series — an admirable series of really first-rate performances of the music of one of this century's genuine (if sometimes underappreciated) greats. The thunderous 2nd symphony, written for Koussevitzky in 1924 and sadly neglected for years, receives a knockout performance from Leinsdorf and the Bostonians. Overside, Leinsdorf offers a wryly frisky performance of Prokofieff's music for the film Lt. Kije. As in his earlier London recording of Kije [on Capitol SP8508] Leinsdorf uses the vocal version, with Michigan baritone David Clatworthy singing the part with just the right mock seriousness. (R.H.)

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
PRACTICAL ENGLISH
W. 231,...
MAR 14 1969

quickly, leaving the full two-minute literal reprise of the Andante theme to round things off and to remain much more firmly fixed in the memory. For me, this closing portion of the Symphony (Variation VI and Tema) was ideally negotiated by Charles Bruck in a long-deleted French Pathé recording.

But that recording would be just as technically superseded as Rozhdestvensky's if it were current today. In 1964 I was dealing with a mono MK recording (Rozhdestvensky), with passing references back to the mono Pathé. Since then, the Soviet conductor's version has been tricked out in "stereo" by Everest, but it remains as resolutely one-dimensional in effect as before. RCA's stereo clarifies the tutti texture of the Second Symphony—which Prokofiev freely admitted is pretty dense—by virtue of more breathing space than I have heard it accorded ere now (never having experienced a "live" performance of the work), and as a result I love it more than ever. RCA has a turnover between Variations V and VI. I understand, by the way, that Rozhdestvensky is engaged in recording or re-recording all the Prokofiev symphonies on Melodiya—a cycle from which we already have Nos. 1, 4, 6, and 7. Leinsdorf's current score is tied with this, on Nos. 2, 3, 5, and 6.

Leinsdorf is also in evident sympathy with Prokofiev's view of the Lieutenant Kijé Suite, and I am in complete sympathy with both. In the first place, in direct contrast to the Second Symphony everything in Kijé ought to be as light as swan's down—and this is much to Leinsdorf's taste—everything except, of course, that ridiculous and pompous piece of "big brass" which thrice punctuates The Wedding of Kijé (No. III), and this he likewise projects to perfection. Secondly, the score of this extremely popular Suite contains complete alternate versions of the Romance (No. II) and Troika (No. IV)—one with baritone solo in each case (as in the 1933 film from which the Suite is derived) and one with the vocal part split up among instruments and otherwise varied. But Prokofiev has the vocal version of each movement printed first in the score, with the words "II bis" and "IV bis" over the instrumental versions. In other words, the latter are the "variantes", in his view. Yet out of all the numerous recordings, Leinsdorf is the only conductor who has bothered to engage a singer, except in the case of a wretched, pseudonymous mono version from the early '50s on the Royale label, with the part sung in German instead of Russian! (The two songs are distinctly derived from the style of Russian folksong.) And Leinsdorf has now done it twice: first on a deleted 1960 Capitol mono/stereo record with baritone Dan Iordachescu and the Philharmonia Orchestra, and now with David Clatworthy and the BSO.

Well, I favor the use of the baritone because the very sound and inflection of the words (whether one understands Russian directly or not) create a welcome variety within the verses of the songs, as well as a much-needed over-all contrast between these numbers and the odd-numbered movements. There are already more than enough perky tunes in Kijé for anybody's taste, and the instrumental treatments of these particular tunes added to the others, skillful as they are, begin to verge on the over-cute in the long run. The singer, on the other hand, imparts a more robust and explicit kind of humor to the music just where it is needed. I wish that Clatworthy did it as well as Iordachescu, but the fact is that he doesn't get half the fun out of the role that the Rumanian baritone did. In the Romance, there was a farcical mock-tragedy in the latter's voice as he sang, for instance,

> But my heart could answer nothing,
> Beating fast in my poor breast.

In the Troika, marked Allegro con brio, Clatworthy manages to negotiate a faster tempo, but at the price of seeming to have to keep his mind on his driving, whereas Iordachescu seemed to have time to flirt as well, and even made the horses (Maestro Leinsdorf) change pace at his will on the reprise of

> Come here I say, come here I say,
> And have no fear with me.

However, the voice is better balanced with Clatworthy cum Leinsdorf. —J.D.

urge all prospective Kijeans to investigate

POST (M)
WASH. D. C
CIRC. 467,500
MAR 30 1969
New England Newsclip

Record Player

mous composer's complete symphonic output is grounds enough to justify this excellent recording of such feeble material.

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 2; also Lt. Kije Suite. Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf, with David Clatworthy, baritone. Victor 3061.

Prokofieff wrote his Second Symphony, he said, "to prove that he could write the last word in modernity, a work of iron and steel." He later included it in a threesome (with the quintet and Fifth Piano Sonata) as "the most chromatic things I have done." Today the symphony fails because of its doctrinal aggressiveness, and the absence of the lyrical qualities that mark his finer works.

Written shortly after the "Love for Three Oranges," but also after his bitter disillusionment in this country, it reflects a young composer not yet able to find a way to tranquility in a time of general confusion.

Leinsdorf gives the work an excellent reading. The humors of Lt. Kije, however, are rather straitened in the conductor's somewhat unbending manner.

Dvorak: Slavonic Dances. Cleveland Orchestra under Szell. Columbia MS 7208.

All on a single disc, the dances of Opera 46 and 72 are immaculately played, but fast. They just miss that little leeway for relaxation that made Szell's earlier recording irresistible. Almost every dance is faster than in its previous recording. I like it better the other way.

—Paul Hume

THE ATLANTIC Aug 1968

Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet (Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony; RCA Victor LSC-2994). Less than the complete score, but a generous serving of excerpts. Romeo and Juliet is Prokofiev's finest ballet score, and one of the most satisfying recordings Leinsdorf has achieved in Boston.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
JUL 1968

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

PROKOFIEV: Scythian Suite, Op. 20; Symphony No. 3, Op. 44; Romeo and Juliet: Ballet Excerpts, Op. 64. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR (S) TR 3-5025 $10.95.

Performance: Brilliant
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Very good
Speed and Playing Time: 3¾ ips; 104'49"

Here is a handsome Prokofiev package for which there is no serious competition in four-track tape format. Not only does this reel present the cream of Leinsdorf's performances from his Boston Symphony Prokofiev series, but it also offers key works from the three major periods of the composer's creative life: the scintillating and sophisticated "neo-barbarism" of World War I vintage (Scythian Suite); the transition from Parisian-conditioned style mécanique to impassioned Romanticism represented by the Third Symphony of 1928 (built on materials from the 1923-25 opera The Flaming Angel); and the mature lyrical and dramatic musical language of Romeo and Juliet, written upon the composer's return to Russia. Their juxtaposition on this tape lends it a special value as a listening experience. The sunrise finale of the Scythian Suite, the eerie scherzo of the Symphony, and the greater part of the Romeo and Juliet music—Leinsdorf's sequence comprises about one-third of the whole score, arranged in order of the stage action—are for me the high points of the package. The BSO's playing is superb and the recorded sound is stunning—though I wish it had been possible to achieve here the sonic finesse and better signal-to-noise ratio that characterizes the 7½-ips speed.

D. H.

RCA VICTOR

ERICH LEINSDORF
The cream of his Prokofiev series on tape

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
MAY 25 1968

Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet (excerpts). Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor stereo, LSC 2994; mono, LM 2994; $5.79.

Textually, this is something of a mixture of the several forms in which Prokofiev's score has been represented on records. That is, it is neither the commonly encountered Suites (of which there are three) or anything like the whole ballet (which has been recorded more than once in Russia, on six sides). It makes a sequence of the best known elements in the Suites, beginning with dawn in Verona and ending with the death of the principals (with, of course, much left out along the way). It also makes a strong case for Leinsdorf as a Prokofiev interpreter, blending a meticulous treatment of the musical text with a penetrating sense of the dramatic values it contains. Throughout, the orchestra performs with an uncommonly good sound, and the reproduction of it is skillfully managed.

...proving that Prokofiev became a great composer only after he returned to the Soviet Union.

The current Schwann record catalogue offers a broad view of Prokofiev's achievement, for it ranges from early piano pieces like the Visions Fugitives to the Symphony No. 7, written in his next-to-last year. Two major recording projects are devoted to a systematic presentation of Prokofiev's music. One is Erich Leinsdorf's plan to record all the major orchestral works with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This now encompasses nine releases, among them such notable recordings as Itzhak Perlman's performance of the Violin Concerto No. 2 in G Minor (RCA Victor LSC-2962), the Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra with Samuel Mayes as soloist (LSC-2703), and a dramatic reading of the Romeo and Juliet ballet music (LSC-2994).

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY
OCT 1968

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINES INC.
50 WEST 44TH STREET, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10036

Your attention is called to attached tearsheet of our record review column as it appears in the current issue of

- [x] Senior Scholastic (circ. 500,000)
- [x] World Week (circ. 500,000)
- [x] Practical English (circ. 425,000)
- [x] Senior Science (circ. 150,000)
- [ ] Coed (circ. 850,000)
- [ ] Junior Scholastic (circ. 1,300,000)
- [x] Scholastic Teacher (circ. 180,000)

From ROY HEMMING
Executive Editor for Social Studies Magazines & Audio Visual Projects, Scholastic Magazines Inc.
and Editor, Senior Scholastic

Critic's Choice

Scholastic editor Dr. Hugh Phillips (RCA Victor P8S1128).

Light Classics: Offenbach Gaité Parisienne & Khachaturian Gayne, Boston Pops (RCA Victor R8S10003); Nero Goes Pops, Peter Nero, Arthur Fiedler (RCA Victor R8S1035); Concertos & Rhapsodies Under the Stars, Hollywood Bowl Orchestra (Capitol Twin-Pack 8X2P8636).

Classics: Van Cliburn: Tchaikovsky & Rachmaninoff Piano Concertos (RCA Victor Twin-Pack R8S5011); Prokofieff Romeo and Juliet, Boston Symphony (RCA Victor R8S1088); Mozart Piano Concerto No. 21 (Elvira Madigan) & 17, Geza Anda (Deutsche Grammophon DGM-88783); Great Moments from Grand Opera: Price, Caballé, etc. (RCA Victor R8S5044). Ormandy-Philadelphia Greatest Hits (Columbia 1811-0050).

u've
tting on..

PIONEER®

It's taken you only a year to make Pioneer one of the fastest selling headsets in America today!

Take our SE-50 (so many of you have!), its quality literally speaks for itself. We've miniaturized Big Speaker System design and sound into each of its lightweight, comfortable, vinyl covered earcups. It features cone-type woofers and mylar-diaphragmed tweeters, resulting in extraordinarily smooth response from 20 Hz to 20 kHz. The SE-50's performance and features, at only $49.95 are in a class by themselves. That sounds astounding, but so does the SE-50!

The Pioneer SE-20 ($19.95) and the Pioneer SE-30 ($29.95) equal and surpass the performance of headsets far more costly: and every Pioneer headset is supplied complete with its own permanent storage case. Pioneer has a reputation to live up to, and these headsets are fine examples of how we go about it.

Why don't you p sound discovery Insist on a Pione fidelity dealers.
the entire Pionee your nearest fran

SE-30

PIONEER
...More Value All-Ways!

PIONEER ELECTRONICS U.S.A. CORP., 140 Smith Street, Farmingdale, L

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
JUL 7 1968
New England Newsclip

...uster.
...ptured beautifully in stereo by Angel ... Another Mahler work of considerable consequence, the Symphony No. 3 in D Minor, gets a rewarding performance from the Boston Symphony, under Leinsdorf. Shirley Verrett is the star in the vocal portion of this work. It's RCA Victor.

...AN SUTHERLAND has a ...the Golden Age ... has ev-

Clas...

Fur-Lined Mozart; ...

By CARL CUNNINGHAM

MOZART: SYMPHONY NUMBER 38 (LINZ"); SYMPHONY NUMBER 39—Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony. RCA Victor LSC-3097.

MOZART: THREE DIVERTIMENTOS, K. 136, 137, 138 ("SALZBURG SYMPHONIES"); SIX COUNTRY DANCES, K. 606—Karl Ristenpart conducting the Chamber Orchestra of the Sorr... Nonesuch 1-71277.

MOZART: SINFONIA CONCERTANTE FOR WOODWINDS AND ORCHESTRA IN E - FLAT, K. 297b; HAYDN: SINFONIA CONCERTANTE FOR WOODWINDS IN AND ORCHESTRA IN B-FLAT, OPUS 84—Daniel Barenboim conducting the English Chamber Orchestra. Angel S-36587.

Two of Mozart's big mature symphonies of his last years in spacious, relaxed performances by Leinsdorf and company. Number 39 is really the more memorable of the two, set forth with extraordinary perceptiveness to tiny detail which heightens the meaning the whole structure of the symphony. Needless to say, the tone of the Boston Symphony has that fur-lined elegance that makes one hope this is the start of a whole new Mozart cycle by Leinsdorf.

Nonesuch's recording, the last one ever for them made by the late Karl Ristenpart, concerns itself with three works from the ...poser's Salzburg years (1772) that a... three-movement symphonies ... though they officially go... They are sunny, ex... most substanc... F-major, ... side...

AMERICAN RECORD GU...
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
MAY 1969

The Houston Post
D. 289,385 SUN. 322,763
AUG 3 1969

DISCussions

THE BEST OF THE NEW LPs

BY ROY HEMMING
with Dave Finkle
Ed Coach, Buzz Royden

CLASSICAL ALBUM OF THE WEEK

Leinsdorf: just right

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 2; & Lt. Kije—Erich Leinsdorf/Boston Symphony [RCA Victor LSC3061]. It's fashionable in some musical quarters these days to dismiss Leinsdorf's tenure in Boston by saying that (unlike his predecessors Koussevitzky and Munch) there's no composer he performs better than anyone else. Well, there is — and it's Prokofieff. Leinsdorf has brought just the right balance of propulsive energy and lyrical beauty to all the works he's done so far in RCA's Prokofieff series — an admirable series of really first-rate performances of the music of one of this century's genuine (if sometimes underappreciated) greats. The thunderous 2nd symphony, written for Koussevitzky in 1924 and sadly neglected for years, receives a knockout performance from Leinsdorf and the Bostonians. Overside, Leinsdorf offers a wryly frisky performance of Prokofieff's music for the film Lt. Kije. As in his earlier London recording of Kije [on Capitol SP8508] Leinsdorf uses the vocal version, with Michigan baritone David Clatworthy singing the part with just the right mock seriousness. (R.H.)

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
PRACTICAL ENGLISH
W. 231,000
MAR 14 1969

POST (M)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 467,500
0417
MAR 30 1969
New England Newsclip

Record Player

mous composer's complete symphonic output is grounds enough to justify this excellent recording of such feeble material.

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 2; also Lt. Kije Suite. Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf, with David Clatworthy, baritone. Victor 3061.

Prokofieff wrote his Second Symphony, he said, "to prove that he could write the last word in modernity, a work of iron and steel." He later included it in a threesome (with the quintet and Fifth Piano Sonata) as "the most chromatic things I have done." Today the symphony fails because of its doctrinal aggressiveness, and the absence of the lyrical qualities that mark his finer works.

Written shortly after the "Love for Three Oranges," but also after his bitter disillusionment in this country, it reflects a young composer not yet able to find a way to tranquility in a time of general confusion.

Leinsdorf gives the work an excellent reading. The humors of Lt. Kije, however, are rather straitened in the conductor's somewhat unbending manner.

Dvorak: Slavonic Dances. Cleveland Orchestra under Szell. Columbia MS 7208.

All on a single disc, the dances of Opera 46 and 72 are immaculately played, but fast. They just miss that little leeway for relaxation that made Szell's earlier recording irresistible. Almost every dance is faster than in its previous recording. I like it better the other way.

—Paul Hume

THE ATLANTIC MAY 1968

Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet (Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony; RCA Victor LSC-2994). Less than the complete score, but a generous serving of excerpts. Romeo and Juliet is Prokofiev's finest ballet score, and one of the most satisfying recordings Leinsdorf has achieved in Boston.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
JUL 1968

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

PROKOFIEV: Scythian Suite, Op. 20; Symphony No. 3, Op. 44; Romeo and Juliet: Ballet Excerpts, Op. 64. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR ⓢ TR 3 5025 $10.95.

Performance: Brilliant
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Very good
Speed and Playing Time: 3¾ ips; 104'49"

Here is a handsome Prokofiev package for which there is no serious competition in four-track tape format. Not only does this reel present the cream of Leinsdorf's performances from his Boston Symphony Prokofiev series, but it also offers key works from the three major periods of the composer's creative life: the scintillating and sophisticated "neo-barbarism" of World War I vintage (Scythian Suite); the transition from Parisian-conditioned style mécanique to impassioned Romanticism represented by the Third Symphony of 1928 (built on materials from the 1923-25 opera The Flaming Angel); and the mature lyrical and dramatic musical language of Romeo and Juliet, written upon the composer's return to Russia. Their juxtaposition on this tape lends it a special value as a listening experience. The sunrise finale of the Scythian Suite, the eerie scherzo of the Symphony, and the greater part of the Romeo and Juliet music—Leinsdorf's sequence comprises about one-third of the whole score, arranged in order of the stage action—are for me the high points of the package. The BSO's playing is superb and the recorded sound is stunning—though I wish it had been possible to achieve here the sonic finesse and better signal-to-noise ratio that characterizes the 7½-ips speed.

D. H.

RCA VICTOR

ERICH LEINSDORF
The cream of his Prokofiev series on tape

Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet (excerpts). Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, RCA Victor stereo, LSC 2994; mono, LM 2994; $5.79.

Textually, this is something of a mixture of the several forms in which Prokofiev's score has been represented on records. That is, it is neither the commonly encountered Suites (of which there are three) or anything like the whole ballet (which has been recorded more than once in Russia, on six sides). It makes a sequence of the best known elements in the Suites, beginning with dawn in Verona and ending with the death of the principals (with, of course, much left out along the way). It also makes a strong case for Leinsdorf as a Prokofiev interpreter, blending a meticulous treatment of the musical text with a penetrating sense of the dramatic values it contains. Throughout, the orchestra performs with an uncommonly good sound, and the reproduction of it is skillfully managed.

the orchestra this time. On Capitol it tended to blanket too much of the accompanying detail; today, the stereophonic knack of making the solo voice seem to occur from within the orchestral body is better appreciated.

A couple of significant things I do not care for in the recording jobs either on Capitol or RCA are that (1) the Troika's sleigh-bells are not sufficiently audible, and (2) the offstage trumpet solos in Nos. I and V ("in distanza") are too audible. Otherwise the technical improvement made under RCA's Richard Mohr is noteworthy. If the version featuring Iordachescu were still around, I would recommend it nonetheless. As it is, I urge all prospective Kijéans to investigate Clatworthy cum Leinsdorf. —J.D.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
MAY 25 1968

... proving that Prokofiev became a great composer only after he returned to the Soviet Union.

The current Schwann record catalogue offers a broad view of Prokofiev's achievement, for it ranges from early piano pieces like the Visions Fugitives to the Symphony No. 7, written in his next-to-last year. Two major recording projects are devoted to a systematic presentation of Prokofiev's music. One is Erich Leinsdorf's plan to record all the major orchestral works with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This now encompasses nine releases, among them such notable recordings as Itzhak Perlman's performance of the Violin Concerto No. 2 in G Minor (RCA Victor LSC-2962), the Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra with Samuel Mayes as soloist (LSC-2703), and a dramatic reading of the Romeo and Juliet ballet music (LSC-2994).

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 285,000
OCT 1968

Critic's Choice

Scholastic editor Dr. Victor Fusco of Henry Mancini (RCA Victor PSS1128).

Light Classics:* Offenbach Galté Parisienne & Khachaturian Gayne, Boston Pops (RCA Victor RSS10003); Nero Goes Pope, Peter Nero, Arthur Fiedler (RCA Victor RSS1035); Concertos & Rhapsodies Under the Stars, Hollywood Bowl Orchestra (Capitol Twin-Pack SX2P8636).

Classics:* Van Cliburn: Tchaikovsky & Rachmaninoff Piano Concertos (RCA Victor Twin-Pack RSS5011); Prokofieff Romeo and Juliet, Boston Symphony (RCA Victor RSS1088); Mozart Piano Concerto No. 21 (Elvira Madigan) & 17, Geza Anda (Deutsche Grammophon DGM-58783); Great Moments from Grand Opera: Price, Caballé, etc. (RCA Victor RSS5044). Ormandy-Philadelphia Greatest Hits (Columbia 1811-0050).

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINES INC.
50 WEST 44TH STREET, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10036

Your attention is called to attached tearsheet of our record review column as it appears in the current issue of

- [x] Senior Scholastic (circ. 500,000)
- [x] World Week (circ. 500,000)
- [x] Practical English (circ. 425,000)
- [x] Senior Science (circ. 150,000)
- [ ] Coed (circ. 850,000)
- [ ] Junior Scholastic (circ. 1,300,000)
- [x] Scholastic Teacher (circ. 180,000)

From ROY HEMMING
Executive Editor for Social Studies Magazines & Audio Visual Projects, Scholastic Magazines Inc. and Editor, Senior Scholastic

98

TWO PROKOFIEV SYMPHONIES —A LOGICAL SECOND AND A LYRICAL FIFTH

by Philip Hart

NO ONE CONDUCTOR has yet recorded an integral set of Prokofiev's seven symphonies, but collectors may now assemble their own complete package by choosing from various projects more or less officially under way. Leinsdorf's planned comprehensive survey of the orchestral Prokofiev now includes Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, and 6. Rozhdestvensky's series of new performances on Melodiya/Angel presently offers Nos. 1, 4, 6, and 7. And there are, of course, numerous other recordings of Prokofiev symphonies—Nos. 1 and 5 in particular are available in many different versions—from which to select a representative survey of one of the century's most important symphonic masters.

Each of these new releases merits more than passing interest: Leinsdorf's because it offers the first thoroughly adequate recording of Prokofiev's least-known symphony; and Karajan's because it offers a highly individual and superbly engineered version of a major contemporary work.

Long regarded as the most difficult of the seven (even by the composer himself), the Second sounds considerably less formidable than it must have over forty years ago, when its unfavorably received first performance virtually consigned the work to oblivion. The two-movement symphony, modeled on Beethoven's last piano sonata, is certainly straightforward enough: a violently energetic yet classically developed sonata form followed by a series of variations on a lyrical theme.

Leinsdorf presents the first movement in the most intelligible reading it has yet enjoyed on disc. His direction, the playing of the Boston Symphony, and the fine reproduction, all contribute to the clarification of an extremely dense texture. Moreover, Leinsdorf discovers more coherent expression, musical logic, and subtle dynamic variation in this problematical music than any previous conductor on records. The same elements are strongly evident in the long variation movement.

The conductor is somewhat less successful in finding the proper satiric bite and folklike quality of the Lieutenant Kijé Suite. Other conductors, notably Reiner and Ormandy, achieve happier results with this lighthearted score. To Leinsdorf's credit, however, one must note that he includes the optional (but certainly preferable) vocal parts in two of the Suite's movements. David Clatworthy, a fine-sounding young baritone, sings these in what seems to be good but not completely idiomatic Russian.

There are several ways of interpreting the Prokofiev Fifth Symphony. Karajan quite predictably opts for the lyric approach, and no conductor today can match him when it comes to conjuring up long, expressive orchestral lines. This luminous performance and recording immediately takes its place among the best versions of Prokofiev's most popular large-scale symphony. Karajan's songfulness is totally antithetical to the equally valid epical approaches taken by Ormandy, in a still viable though tubbily recorded performance, and more recently by Bernstein, where energy and sonority sometimes overcome orchestral precision.

The recording that comes closest to Karajan's interpretation is the version by the late Ernest Ansermet, who often excelled in the twentieth-century Russian repertoire, Prokofiev in particular. Ansermet projects his lyricism with more intensity than Karajan, and he favors a richer, more generalized sonority. But Karajan draws a far finer, more extraordinarily subtle orchestral sound and texture from the Berlin Philharmonic. By refining the typically warm, rich sound of his brass and lower strings, and by his incredible control of the intonation and vibrato of the upper strings, Karajan achieves a texture comparable to the luminescence one associates with good string quartet playing. At the same time, this refined sonic medium is made to complement a musical conception in which the lyrical line and phrase are developed in a most sophisticated manner. One may or may not care for Karajan's treatment of Prokofiev, but it is impossible to deny the perfection with which every detail is executed. To my mind the lyric is certainly one very valid approach to Prokofiev, especially here in the Fifth Symphony.

Finally, I must compliment DGG's engineers and producers for the beautifully balanced stereo ambience, the ungimmicked recording, and the tasteful fidelity with which the orchestra's dynamics and tone color have been reproduced. This is everything that an orchestral record should be and nowadays so seldom is.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Op. 40; Lieutenant Kijé: Suite, Op. 60

David Clatworthy, baritone (in the Lieutenant Kijé); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA RED SEAL LSC 3061, $5.98.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 5, in B flat, Op. 100

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Herbert von Karajan, cond. DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON 139040, $5.79. Tape: ◐◐ C9040, 7½ ips, $7.95; ▣ M89040, $6.95.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JUN 1969

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 2, in D Minor, Op. 40; Lieutenant Kijé—Suite, Op. 60. David Clatworthy (baritone); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA Ⓢ LSC 3061 $5.98.

Performance: Clean and crisp
Recording: Full-bodied
Stereo Quality: Good

Far be it from me to complain about having Prokofiev's block-busting 1924 symphony "of iron and steel" achieve its first stereo recording, but I do wish that Mr. Leinsdorf and RCA had been daring enough to couple it with the even more remarkable Chaldean invocation Seven, They are Seven, Op. 30, rather than the innocuous, though charming, Lt. Kijé film music. In the Symphony Leinsdorf does not achieve quite the volatility and ferocity that Rozhdestvensky does with the Moscow Radio Symphony on the Russian MK mono disc I have on hand, but he does have the benefit of topflight stereo sonics, which reveal considerably more detail, particularly in the kaleidoscopic variation movement that makes up the latter two-thirds of the work. As in his 1960 Capitol recording, Leinsdorf opts for the vocal versions of the Romance and Troika movements in Lt. Kijé, and the delightful texts are excellently sung in the original Russian by New York City Opera baritone David Clatworthy. This is the only currently available recording of the score in this form. The performance as a whole is more neat than spontaneous, but beautifully recorded for all that. The balances in the final Burial of Kijé movement, with its tricky combination of themes from the second and third movements, are especially felicitous. D. H.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

MAY 1969

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 24,000

MAY 1969

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 2; Lieutenant Kije Suite. D. Clatworthy, bar., Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC 3061 stereo ($5.95)

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 2; Symphony No. 7. USSR State Radio Symphony, State Philharmonic Orchs., Rozhdestvensky. Everest 3214 (sim.) stereo ($4.98)

Two choices here for the loudest, brassiest, most dissonant of Prokofieff's symphonies, the No. 2, a work straight out of the depths of the 1920s and heretofore tactfully ignored—for it is an earful! But today, we are beginning to enjoy this kind of earful. It is so very "modern," and so very dated. Rather nice to hear all that old fashioned cacophony, especially in stereo hi fi. The two discs offer contrasting material to accompany No. 2. Everest has the last of the symphonies, No. 7 of 1952, a sweet, ingratiating, nostalgic piece and the last work the invalid composer managed to complete. From Boston, on RCA Victor, we get the familiar Lieutenant Kije, the man who never was, his little trumpet tune hopping unexpectedly from key to key—but here with a difference. Two items in the original film score were sung by a baritone; here these two revert to the original format, for a change. (I prefer the instrumental version, thanks.)

RCA's Symphony No. 2 is a big, fat, shiny production, massively recorded, as befits the august BSO. Good performance. Everest's, via the USSR Radio Symphony (assuming they haven't reversed their labeling—see below) is even a little better, a drier sound and a tighter playing to emphasize the 1920s seriousness of all this dissonance, an effort by the young Prokofieff to show that he could be as modern as anybody at the time. This is a true stereo recording if I hear it rightly, and a good one of its dry sort.

Everest's No. 7, on the reverse side, has the same conductor, but the other orchestra—whichever one it may be. It is well enough played, though I have heard more persuasive versions, even USSR recording outfit.

Performances: A, A+ Sound: A, B—

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 3, in C minor, Op. 44. Moscow Radio Symphony Orchestra, Gennady Rozhdestvensky cond. Melodiya/Angel SR 40092, $5.98.

With this performance of the Third Symphony, Rozhdestvensky approaches the conclusion of his notable Prokofiev symphony series for Melodiya/Angel: only the Second and the Fifth remain. Again, it should be noted that this record, like other Melodiya/Angel releases, should not be confused with earlier, far inferior recordings by the same conductor offered on other labels.

The composer explicitly stated in his autobiography that, though based on thematic material from his opera The Flaming Angel, the Third Symphony should be taken on its own terms as pure symphonic music. The same holds true of his Fourth Symphony, based on material from the ballet The Prodigal Son. In the case of the Third, however, Prokofiev's later revisions removed it even further from its theatrical context. Even so, this work is probably the composer's weakest symphonic effort. Of its four movements, only the third—a superbly original Scherzo—can claim real distinction. One might say that the Third Symphony's bombastic theatrical rhetoric was eventually refined into a genuinely symphonic statement in the far more successful Fifth Symphony. The slow move- also offers a rousing performance of the Scythian Suite, while the Melodiya/Angel disc spaces the thirty-three-minute Symphony over two full sides. P.H.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

AUG 1969

Prokofiev: Concertos Nos. 3 and 4. John Browning, piano; with the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor, stereo, LSC 3019; mono, LM 3019; $5.79.

In this combination of the most- and least-recorded concerti of Prokofiev, Browning affirms the wisdom of his choice to record most (if not all) of the works in that literature. In No. 3 Browning and Leinsdorf re-create a result they had achieved previously for Capitol, with perhaps even a swifter, more compelling blend of animation and insight. For my taste, the recording tends to overstress some of the percussive values in the score, as though the mere incidence of a timpani under the piano required a bump like an antique Ford crossing a railroad track. However, what Browning has to provide in the way of impulse and facility are so essentially Prokofievian that the totality levels out the occasional inequalities. In the work for left hand (written, as was Ravel's similar concerto, for Paul Wittgenstein), Browning defines its premises and argues its logics with great persuasiveness. And what it contains of later, greater Prokofiev is also expounded to excellent effect by Leinsdorf.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000

OCT 26 1968

It's Special for Left-Handed Pianist

By Stephen A. Sharp
Special to The Virginian-Pilot

In a recent release on the RCA Victor label, two works by the late Sergei Prokovieff are featured with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. John Browning is the pianist in this performance of Concerto No. 3 in C, Op. 26, and Concerto No. 4 in B-flat, Op. 53 (LSC-3019).

The fourth concerto is different from most concerti in that it is written for the left hand only. It was premiered in 1956, by a one-armed German pianist, 25 years after it was written. The cleft shifts and the changes in strength written into the score make this piece a difficult one to perform. Browning rises to the challenge with ample success.

Leinsdorf and Browning combine in an effective performance, technically perfect and aesthetically delightful. Browning's every motion at the keyboard and every nuance add to the total greatness of this recording. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony have been issuing recordings of the works of the Russian composer for some time, which RCA bills appropriately as the "Prokovieff Series."

Also in this RCA release package is Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony performing Symphony No. 93 in D and Symphony No. 96 in D ("Miracle") by Franz Joseph Haydn. (LSC-3030). Perhaps the precision and clarity of the Boston Symphony with Leinsdorf at the helm along with its ability to sense and portray the mood of a piece are ample reasons to support the claim that it is "The Aristocrat of Orchestras." Certainly there can be no quarrel in this recording.

The Virginian-Pilot
NORFOLK, VA.
D. 125,503 SUN. 170,122

SEP 1 1968

PIANIST John Browning continues his association with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with beautiful performances of two Prokofieff piano concertos on a new RCA Victor stereo album (LSC-3019).

Browning performs the spirited and melodious Prokofieff Concerto No. 3 in C with great skill and with near perfect nuances. He had had some practice on this particular work. A few years back, when he was just making a name for himself, Browning recorded this concerto for Capitol Records with Leinsdorf and the Philharmonic Orchestra.

JOHN BROWNING

Practice makes perfect, they say. So, Browning and Leinsdorf once again teamed up on the concerto with this rewarding result. The pianist's technique shows great improvement over the years – there's more maturity to the keyboard touch. The concerto is a pianistic art. It is full of melodic writing of the highest caliber, and Browning accepts the challenge and gives Prokofieff his due. It is in the popular category of Tchaikovsky's and Rachmaninoff's concertos.

Browning also gives a skillful performance of Prokofieff's No. 4 in B-Flat on the second side of this disc. This is a terrific undertaking since it is written for the left hand. It isn't in the lyrical category of the third, but is more of a chamber work. It's beautifully performed by Browning with an excellent backing by the Bostonians under Leinsdorf.

Previously, Browning had teamed with Leinsdorf and the Boston orchestra for recordings of Prokofieff's first and second concertos. They turn out to be quite a team. I was fortunate to hear Browning in a recital a few months back at DePauw University. He has terrific ability and potential not yet tapped.

LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL AND COURIER
D. 45,500

AUG 24 1968

Leinsdorf Recordings Rated Fine

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—Now that Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony and merely another entry on the list of available guest conductors, it is time to wonder about his future as a recording conductor.

His tenure as head music man in Boston put him among the most prolific recorders but the record-maker, RCA, has always done much with the orchestra regardless of who was the music director. It may well be Leinsdorf will now have fewer recording opportunities.

But whatever his future, his recent past as recorder is a glorious one, a fact underlined by the newly released record completing his series devoted to Prokofieff's five piano concertos, with John Browning as soloist (3121).

It is the fifth concerto and again you are given the conviction that conductor and soloist understood the composer precisely the same way and better probably than any other conductor - soloist combination ever did. Leinsdorf's strength is in conveying unquestioned authority.

Presumably he has completed the project of recording all the Prokofieff symphonies with the Boston. The 3rd, 5th and 6th he has done and the 2nd is newly released (3061). Also newsly at hand are his interpretations of Beethoven's 1st and 8th symphonies, on one record (3098). But he served all the masters, modern and classical, well in Boston and may the recordings long survive!

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
(E) 13,611

AUG 27 1969

New England Newsclip

Albany Knickerbocker News
Thursday, September 4, 1969

Leinsdorf's Reputation Secure With Recordings of Prokieff

NEW YORK (UP) — Now that Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony and merely another entry on the list of available guest conductors, it is time to wonder about his future as a recording conductor.

His tenure as head music man in Boston put him among the most prolfic recorders but the record-maker, RCA, has always done much with the orchestra regardless of who was the music director. It may well be Leinsdorf will now have fewer recording opportunities.

But whatever his future, his recent past as recorder is a glorious one, a fact underlined by the newly released record completing his series devoted to Prokofieff's five piano concertos, with John Browning as soloist (3121).

It is the fifth concerto and again you are given the conviction that conductor and soloist understood the composer precisely the same way and better probably than any other conductor-soloist combination ever did. Leinsdorf's strength is in conveying unquestioned authority.

Presumably he has completed the project of recording all the Prokofieff symphonies with the Boston. The 3d, 5th, and 6th he has done and the 2d is newly released (3061). Also newly at hand are his interpretations of Beethoven's 1st and 8th symphonies, on one record (3098). But he served all the masters, modern and classical, well in Boston and may the recordings long survive.

CONSUMER BULLETIN
WASHINGTON, N. J.
MONTHLY 110,000

FEB 1969

---

and next year's ...
tion of Beethoven's ...

Another Beethoven album offers a recital by pianist Jacob Lateiner. Carl Weinrich is the soloist in a two-record set of Handel organ concertos with the Arthur Fiedler Sinfonietta under Fiedler.

Continuing his Prokofiev series, Erich Leinsdorf completes the four piano concertos conducting soloist John Browning and the Boston Symphony in a coupling of the last two. Leinsdorf also conducts the Boston in a Dvorak pressing.

Morton Gould co... the Chicago Sym... pairing of ... Rimsky ...

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUN 1 1968

Prokofiev: Piano Concertos Nos. 3 and 4. John Browning (piano) with the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC 3019 [LM 3019]. $5.79. Continuing its Prokofiev series, the BSO with pianist Browning play the jaunty, spirited Concerto No. 3 and the puzzling No. 4 written for the one-armed Austrian pianist, Paul Wittgenstein. Orchestra and soloist are at their best. There is excitement, wit, and warmth where demanded. It is difficult to fault anyone, including the engineers. AA AA

98

TWO PROKOFIEV SYMPHONIES —A LOGICAL SECOND AND A LYRICAL FIFTH

by Philip Hart

No one conductor has yet recorded an integral set of Prokofiev's seven symphonies, but collectors may now assemble their own complete package by choosing from various projects more or less officially under way. Leinsdorf's planned comprehensive survey of the orchestral Prokofiev now includes Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, and 6. Rozhdestvensky's series of new performances on Melodiya/Angel presently offers Nos. 1, 4, 6, and 7. And there are, of course, numerous other recordings of Prokofiev symphonies—Nos. 1 and 5 in particular are available in many different versions—from which to select a representative survey of one of the century's most important symphonic masters.

Each of these new releases merits more than passing interest: Leinsdorf's because it offers the first thoroughly adequate recording of Prokofiev's least-known symphony; and Karajan's because it offers a highly individual and superbly engineered version of a major contemporary work.

Long regarded as the most difficult of the seven (even by the composer himself), the Second sounds considerably less formidable than it must have over forty years ago, when its unfavorably received first performance virtually consigned the work to oblivion. The two-movement symphony, modeled on Beethoven's last piano sonata, is certainly straightforward enough: a violently energetic yet classically developed sonata form followed by a series of variations on a lyrical theme.

Leinsdorf presents the first movement in the most intelligible reading it has yet enjoyed on disc. His direction, the playing of the Boston Symphony, and the fine reproduction, all contribute to the clarification of an extremely dense texture. Moreover, Leinsdorf discovers more coherent expression, musical logic, and subtle dynamic variation in this problematical music than any previous conductor on records. The same elements are strongly evident in the long variation movement.

The conductor is somewhat less successful in finding the proper satiric bite and folklike quality of the Lieutenant Kijé Suite. Other conductors, notably Reiner and Ormandy, achieve happier results with this lighthearted score. To Leinsdorf's credit, however, one must note that he includes the optional (but certainly preferable) vocal parts in two of the Suite's movements. David Clatworthy, a fine-sounding young baritone, sings these in what seems to be good but not completely idiomatic Russian.

There are several ways of interpreting the Prokofiev Fifth Symphony. Karajan quite predictably opts for the lyric approach, and no conductor today can match him when it comes to conjuring up long, expressive orchestral lines. This luminous performance and recording immediately takes its place among the best versions of Prokofiev's most popular large-scale symphony. Karajan's songfulness is totally antithetical to the equally valid epical approaches taken by Ormandy, in a still viable though tubbily recorded performance, and more recently by Bernstein, where energy and sonority sometimes overcome orchestral precision.

The recording that comes closest to Karajan's interpretation is the version by the late Ernest Ansermet, who often excelled in the twentieth-century Russian repertoire, Prokofiev in particular. Ansermet projects his lyricism with more intensity than Karajan, and he favors a richer, more generalized sonority. But Karajan draws a far finer, more extraordinarily subtle orchestral sound and texture from the Berlin Philharmonic. By refining the typically warm, rich sound of his brass and lower strings, and by his incredible control of the intonation and vibrato of the upper strings, Karajan achieves a texture comparable to the luminescence one associates with good string quartet playing. At the same time, this refined sonic medium is made to complement a musical conception in which the lyrical line and phrase are developed in a most sophisticated manner. One may or may not care for Karajan's treatment of Prokofiev, but it is impossible to deny the perfection with which every detail is executed. To my mind the lyric is certainly one very valid approach to Prokofiev, especially here in the Fifth Symphony.

Finally, I must compliment DGG's engineers and producers for the beautifully balanced stereo ambience, the ungimmicked recording, and the tasteful fidelity with which the orchestra's dynamics and tone color have been reproduced. This is everything that an orchestral record should be and nowadays so seldom is.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Op. 40; Lieutenant Kijé: Suite, Op. 60

David Clatworthy, baritone (in the Lieutenant Kijé); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC 3061, $5.98.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 5, in B flat, Op. 100

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Herbert von Karajan, cond. Deutsche Grammophon 139040, $5.79. Tape: ●● C9040, 7½ ips, $7.95; ■ M89040, $6.95.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
JUN 1969

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 2, in D Minor, Op. 40; Lieutenant Kijé—Suite, Op. 60. David Clatworthy (baritone); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA Ⓢ LSC 3061 $5.98.

Performance: Clean and crisp
Recording: Full-bodied
Stereo Quality: Good

Far be it from me to complain about having Prokofiev's block-busting 1924 symphony "of iron and steel" achieve its first stereo recording, but I do wish that Mr. Leinsdorf and RCA had been daring enough to couple it with the even more remarkable Chaldean invocation Seven, They are Seven; Op. 30, rather than the innocuous, though charming, Lt. Kijé film music. In the Symphony Leinsdorf does not achieve quite the volatility and ferocity that Rozhdestvensky does with the Moscow Radio Symphony on the Russian MK mono disc I have on hand, but he does have the benefit of topflight stereo sonics, which reveal considerably more detail, particularly in the kaleidoscopic variation movement that makes up the latter two-thirds of the work. As in his 1960 Capitol recording, Leinsdorf opts for the vocal versions of the Romance and Troika movements in Lt. Kijé, and the delightful texts are excellently sung in the original Russian by New York City Opera baritone David Clatworthy. This is the only currently available recording of the score in this form. The performance as a whole is more neat than spontaneous, but beautifully recorded for all that. The balances in the final Burial of Kijé movement, with its tricky combination of themes from the second and third movements, are especially felicitous. D. H.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
MAY 1969

Non-Electronic Tuning

Those methods of tuning are visual: you see when the tuning is correct. Some still prefer to use their ears, in one or other method that employs audible indications of pitch differences. The trick here is to use a beat that is slow enough to count. The slowest beat in the tempered musical scale is the major fifth: it is close to a frequency ratio of 3:2.

The mathematical interval is 1.4983, as opposed to the ratio that would give zero beat, of 1.5. If the actual frequencies were 1,000 and 1498.3 Hz, they would produce a beat of 3.4 warbles per second, because the 3rd harmonic of the first, 3000 Hz, would beat with the second harmonic of the second, at 2996.6 Hz.

So you tune the upper note of the fifth interval flat of the zero beat to give a specified number of beats. Figure 9 1 shows the count of beats in 5 seconds, which is easier to do accurately than so many beats per second, working on frequencies between F♯ at 369.99 Hz and C at 1046.5 Hz.

As shown, the tuning follows a downward order from C, so F would be tuned sharp to get the requisite num- [illegible] When you including Ormandy's on Columbia. But the recording on this side is another story. As you flip, the sound deteriorates; this is out of a wholly different set-up, even with the same conductor. Moreover (says my ear), this appears to be a simulated stereo, out of a mono original, even if it doesn't say so. And those vague stirrings in the background—are they a "live" audience? Is this from a broadcast? Could be, even if, supposedly, the other side is the "Radio" orchestra. (The ascriptions are casually reversed, you'll note, as they appear on the backside of the jacket.) So who knows? The conductor does. He conducted both. Go ask him, if you want to know.

Just to confuse the issue, I note that Angel also offers the same Symphony No. 7 with the very same conductor, on its Melodiya label! There, the orchestra is listed as the Moscow Radio Symphony. And the recording on that one is in full stereo.

One thing is definite. It'll cost you more to hear No. 7 conducted by Rozhdestvensky via Melodiya, the official USSR recording outfit.

Performances: A, A+ Sound: A, B—

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 3, in C minor, Op. 44. Moscow Radio Symphony Orchestra, Gennady Rozhdestvensky cond. Melodiya/Angel SR 40092, $5.98.

With this performance of the Third Symphony, Rozhdestvensky approaches the conclusion of his notable Prokofiev symphony series for Melodiya/Angel: only the Second and the Fifth remain. Again, it should be noted that this record, like other Melodiya/Angel releases, should not be confused with earlier, far inferior recordings by the same conductor offered on other labels.

The composer explicitly stated in his autobiography that, though based on thematic material from his opera The Flaming Angel, the Third Symphony should be taken on its own terms as pure symphonic music. The same holds true of his Fourth Symphony, based on material from the ballet The Prodigal Son. In the case of the Third, however, Prokofiev's later revisions removed it even further from its theatrical context. Even so, this work is probably the composer's weakest symphonic effort. Of its four movements, only the third—a superbly original Scherzo—can claim real distinction. One might say that the Third Symphony's bombastic theatrical rhetoric was eventually refined into a genuinely symphonic statement in the far more successful Fifth Symphony. The slow move- also offers a rousing performance of the Scythian Suite, while the Melodiya/Angel disc spaces the thirty-three-minute Symphony over two full sides. P.H.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
AUG 1969

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
OCT 26 1968

Prokofiev: Concertos Nos. 3 and 4. John Browning, piano; with the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor, stereo, LSC 3019; mono, LM 3019; $5.79.

In this combination of the most- and least-recorded concerti of Prokofiev, Browning affirms the wisdom of his choice to record most (if not all) of the works in that literature. In No. 3 Browning and Leinsdorf re-create a result they had achieved previously for Capitol, with perhaps even a swifter, more compelling blend of animation and insight. For my taste, the recording tends to overstress some of the percussive values in the score, as though the mere incidence of a timpani under the piano required a bump like an antique Ford crossing a railroad track. However, what Browning has to provide in the way of impulse and facility are so essentially Prokofievian that the totality levels out the occasional inequalities. In the work for left hand (written, as was Ravel's similar concerto, for Paul Wittgenstein), Browning defines its premises and argues its logics with great persuasiveness. And what it contains of later, greater Prokofiev is also expounded to excellent effect by Leinsdorf.

It's Special for Left-Handed Pianist

By Stephen A. Sharp

Special to The Virginian-Pilot

In a recent release on the RCA Victor label, two works by the late Sergei Prokovieff are featured with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. John Browning is the pianist in this performance of Concerto No. 3 in C, Op. 26, and Concerto No. 4 in B-flat, Op. 53 (LSC-3019).

The fourth concerto is different from most concerti in that it is written for the left hand only. It was premiered in 1956, by a one-armed German pianist, 25 years after it was written. The cleft shifts and the changes in strength written into the score make this piece a difficult one to perform. Browning rises to the challenge with ample success.

Leinsdorf and Browning combine in an effective performance, technically perfect and aesthetically delightful. Browning's every motion at the keyboard and every nuance add to the total greatness of this recording. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony have been issuing recordings of the works of the Russian composer for some time, which RCA bills appropriately as the "Prokovieff Series."

Also in this RCA release package is Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony performing Symphony No. 93 in D and Symphony No. 96 in D ("Miracle") by Franz Joseph Haydn. (LSC-3030). Perhaps the precision and clarity of the Boston Symphony with Leinsdorf at the helm along with its ability to sense and portray the mood of a piece are ample reasons to support the claim that it is "The Aristocrat of Orchestras." Certainly there can be no quarrel in this recording.

The Virginian-Pilot
NORFOLK, VA.
D. 125,503 SUN. 170,122
SEP 1 1968

PIANIST John Browning continues his association with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with beautiful performances of two Prokofieff piano concertos on a new RCA Victor stereo album (LSC-3019).

Browning performs the spirited and melodious Prokofieff Concerto No. 3 in C with great skill and with near perfect nuances. He had had some practice on this particular work. A few years back, when he was just making a name for himself, Browning recorded this concerto for Capitol Records with Leinsdorf and the Philharmonic Orchestra.

JOHN BROWNING

Practice makes perfect, they say. So, Browning and Leinsdorf once again teamed up on the concerto with this rewarding result. The pianist's technique shows great improvement over the years—there's more maturity to the keyboard touch. The concerto is a pianistic art. It is full of melodic writing of the highest caliber, and Browning accepts the challenge and gives Prokofieff his due. It is in the popular category of Tchaikovsky's and Rachmaninoff's concertos.

Browning also gives a skillful performance of Prokofieff's No. 4 in B-Flat on the second side of this disc. This is a terrific undertaking since it is written for the left hand. It isn't in the lyrical category of the third, but is more of a chamber work. It's beautifully performed by Browning with an excellent backing by the Bostonians under Leinsdorf.

Previously, Browning had teamed with Leinsdorf and the Boston orchestra for recordings of Prokofieff's first and second concertos. They turn out to be quite a team. I was fortunate to hear Browning in a recital a few months back at DePauw University. He has terrific ability and potential not yet tapped.

LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL AND COURIER
D. 45,500
AUG 24 1968

Leinsdorf Recordings Rated Fine

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—Now that Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony and merely another entry on the list of available guest conductors, it is time to wonder about his future as a recording conductor.

His tenure as head music man in Boston put him among the most prolific recorders but the record-maker, RCA, has always done much with the orchestra regardless of who was the music director. It may well be Leinsdorf will now have fewer recording opportunities.

But whatever his future, his recent past as recorder is a glorious one, a fact underlined by the newly released record completing his series devoted to Prokofieff's five piano concertos, with John Browning as soloist (3121).

It is the fifth concerto and again you are given the conviction that conductor and soloist understood the composer precisely the same way and better probably than any other conductor-soloist combination ever did. Leinsdorf's strength is in conveying unquestioned authority.

Presumably he has completed the project of recording all the Prokofieff symphonies with the Boston. The 3rd, 5th and 6th he has done and the 2nd is newly released (3061). Also newsly at hand are his interpretations of Beethoven's 1st and 8th symphonies, on one record (3098). But he served all the masters, modern and classical, well in Boston and may the recordings long survive!

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
(E) 13,611
AUG 27 1969
New England Newsclip

Albany Knickerbocker News
Thursday, September 4, 1969

Leinsdorf's Reputation Secure With Recordings of Prokieff

NEW YORK (UP) — Now that Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony and merely another entry on the list of available guest conductors, it is time to wonder about his future as a recording conductor.

His tenure as head music man in Boston put him among the most prolfic recorders but the record-maker, RCA, has always done much with the orchestra regardless of who was the music director. It may well be Leinsdorf will now have fewer recording opportunities.

But whatever his future, his recent past as recorder is a glorious one, a fact underlined by the newly released record completing his series devoted to Prokofieff's five piano concertos, with John Browning as soloist (3121).

It is the fifth concerto and again you are given the conviction that conductor and soloist understood the composer precisely the same way and better probably than any other conductor-soloist combination ever did. Leinsdorf's strength is in conveying unquestioned authority.

Presumably he has completed the project of recording all the Prokofieff symphonies with the Boston. The 3d, 5th, and 6th he has done and the 2d is newly released (3061). Also newly at hand are his interpretations of Beethoven's 1st and 8th symphonies, on one record (3098). But he served all the masters, modern and classical, well in Boston and may the recordings long survive.

CONSUMER BULLETIN
WASHINGTON, N. J.
MONTHLY 110,000
FEB 1969

and next year's [illegible]
tion of Beethoven's birth.

Another Beethoven album offers a recital by pianist Jacob Lateiner. Carl Weinrich is the soloist in a two-record set of Handel organ concertos with the Arthur Fiedler Sinfonietta under Fiedler.

Continuing his Prokofiev series, Erich Leinsdorf completes the four piano concertos conducting soloist John Browning and the Boston Symphony in a coupling of the last two. Leinsdorf also conducts the Boston in a Dvorak pressing.

Morton Gould co[illegible] the Chicago Sym[illegible] pairing of [illegible] Rimsky [illegible]

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUN 1 1968

Prokofiev: Piano Concertos Nos. 3 and 4. John Browning (piano) with the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC 3019 [LM 3019]. $5.79. Continuing its Prokofiev series, the BSO with pianist Browning play the jaunty, spirited Concerto No. 3 and the puzzling No. 4 written for the one-armed Austrian pianist, Paul Wittgenstein. Orchestra and soloist are at their best. There is excitement, wit, and warmth where demanded. It is difficult to fault anyone, including the engineers. AA AA

98

TWO PROKOFIEV SYMPHONIES —A LOGICAL SECOND AND A LYRICAL FIFTH

by Philip Hart

#5454

No one conductor has yet recorded an integral set of Prokofiev's seven symphonies, but collectors may now assemble their own complete package by choosing from various projects more or less officially under way. Leinsdorf's planned comprehensive survey of the orchestral Prokofiev now includes Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, and 6. Rozhdestvensky's series of new performances on Melodiya/Angel presently offers Nos. 1, 4, 6, and 7. And there are, of course, numerous other recordings of Prokofiev symphonies—Nos. 1 and 5 in particular are available in many different versions—from which to select a representative survey of one of the century's most important symphonic masters.

Each of these new releases merits more than passing interest: Leinsdorf's because it offers the first thoroughly adequate recording of Prokofiev's least-known symphony; and Karajan's because it offers a highly individual and superbly engineered version of a major contemporary work.

Long regarded as the most difficult of the seven (even by the composer himself), the Second sounds considerably less formidable than it must have over forty years ago, when its unfavorably received first performance virtually consigned the work to oblivion. The two-movement symphony, modeled on Beethoven's last piano sonata, is certainly straightforward enough: a violently energetic yet classically developed sonata form followed by a series of variations on a lyrical theme.

Leinsdorf presents the first movement in the most intelligible reading it has yet enjoyed on disc. His direction, the playing of the Boston Symphony, and the fine reproduction, all contribute to the clarification of an extremely dense texture. Moreover, Leinsdorf discovers more coherent expression, musical logic, and subtle dynamic variation in this problematical music than any previous conductor on records. The same elements are strongly evident in the long variation movement.

The conductor is somewhat less successful in finding the proper satiric bite and folklike quality of the Lieutenant Kijé Suite. Other conductors, notably Reiner and Ormandy, achieve happier results with this lighthearted score. To Leinsdorf's credit, however, one must note that he includes the optional (but certainly preferable) vocal parts in two of the Suite's movements. David Clatworthy, a fine-sounding young baritone, sings these in what seems to be good but not completely idiomatic Russian.

There are several ways of interpreting the Prokofiev Fifth Symphony. Karajan quite predictably opts for the lyric approach, and no conductor today can match him when it comes to conjuring up long, expressive orchestral lines. This luminous performance and recording immediately takes its place among the best versions of Prokofiev's most popular large-scale symphony. Karajan's songfulness is totally antithetical to the equally valid epical approaches taken by Ormandy, in a still viable though tubbily recorded performance, and more recently by Bernstein, where energy and sonority sometimes overcome orchestral precision.

The recording that comes closest to Karajan's interpretation is the version by the late Ernest Ansermet, who often excelled in the twentieth-century Russian repertoire, Prokofiev in particular. Ansermet projects his lyricism with more intensity than Karajan, and he favors a richer, more generalized sonority. But Karajan draws a far finer, more extraordinarily subtle orchestral sound and texture from the Berlin Philharmonic. By refining the typically warm, rich sound of his brass and lower strings, and by his incredible control of the intonation and vibrato of the upper strings, Karajan achieves a texture comparable to the luminescence one associates with good string quartet playing. At the same time, this refined sonic medium is made to complement a musical conception in which the lyrical line and phrase are developed in a most sophisticated manner. One may or may not care for Karajan's treatment of Prokofiev, but it is impossible to deny the perfection with which every detail is executed. To my mind the lyric is certainly one very valid approach to Prokofiev, especially here in the Fifth Symphony.

Finally, I must compliment DGG's engineers and producers for the beautifully balanced stereo ambience, the ungimmicked recording, and the tasteful fidelity with which the orchestra's dynamics and tone color have been reproduced. This is everything that an orchestral record should be and nowadays so seldom is.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Op. 40; Lieutenant Kijé: Suite, Op. 60

David Clatworthy, baritone (in the Lieutenant Kijé); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC 3061, $5.98.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 5, in B flat, Op. 100

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Herbert von Karajan, cond. Deutsche Grammophon 139040, $5.79. Tape: ⬭ C9040, 7½ ips, $7.95; ⬬ M89040, $6.95.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
JUN 1969

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 2, in D Minor, Op. 40; Lieutenant Kijé—Suite, Op. 60. David Clatworthy (baritone); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA Ⓢ LSC 3061 $5.98.

Performance: Clean and crisp
Recording: Full-bodied
Stereo Quality: Good

Far be it from me to complain about having Prokofiev's block-busting 1924 symphony "of iron and steel" achieve its first stereo recording, but I do wish that Mr. Leinsdorf and RCA had been daring enough to couple it with the even more remarkable Chaldean invocation Seven, They are Seven, Op. 30, rather than the innocuous, though charming, Lt. Kijé film music. In the Symphony Leinsdorf does not achieve quite the volatility and ferocity that Rozhdestvensky does with the Moscow Radio Symphony on the Russian MK mono disc I have on hand, but he does have the benefit of topflight stereo sonics, which reveal considerably more detail, particularly in the kaleidoscopic variation movement that makes up the latter two-thirds of the work. As in his 1960 Capitol recording, Leinsdorf opts for the vocal versions of the Romance and Troika movements in Lt. Kijé, and the delightful texts are excellently sung in the original Russian by New York City Opera baritone David Clatworthy. This is the only currently available recording of the score in this form. The performance as a whole is more neat than spontaneous, but beautifully recorded for all that. The balances in the final Burial of Kijé movement, with its tricky combination of themes from the second and third movements, are especially felicitous. D. H.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
MAY 1969

Non-Electronic Tuning

These methods of tuning are visual: you see when the tuning is correct. Some still prefer to use their ears, in one or other method that employs audible indications of pitch differences. The trick here is to use a beat that is slow enough to count. The slowest beat in the tempered musical scale is the major fifth: it is close to a frequency ratio of 3:2.

The mathematical interval is 1.4983, as opposed to the ratio that would give zero beat, of 1.5. If the actual frequencies were 1,000 and 1498.3 Hz, they would produce a beat of 3.4 warbles per second, because the 3rd harmonic of the first, 3000 Hz, would beat with the second harmonic of the second, at 2996.6 Hz.

So you tune the upper note of the fifth interval flat of the zero beat to give a specified number of beats. Figure 9 1 shows the count of beats in 5 seconds, which is easier to do accurately than so many beats per second, working on frequencies between F# at 369.99 Hz and C at 1046.5 Hz.

As shown, the tuning follows a downward order from C, so F would be tuned sharp to get the requisite num-

When you want music you don't wa war.
So the first thing you should do is check out your equipment.
If everything checks out it might be your tape.
To record beautiful music you have to use a tape that doesn't cut off the highs or the lows.
Like RCA's Red Seal.
It's made under white room conditions so it won't distort or blur or fight with whatever you record.
Red Seal is formulated with newsmen.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Op. 40; Lieutenant Kijé: Suite, Op. 60

David Clatworthy, baritone (in the Lieutenant Kijé); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC 3061, $5.98.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 5, in B flat, Op. 100

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Herbert von Karajan, cond. Deutsche Grammophon 139040, $5.79. Tape: ⬭ C9040, 7½ ips, $7.95; ⬬ M89040, $6.95.

including Ormandy's on Columbia. But the recording on this side is another story. As you flip, the sound deteriorates; this is out of a wholly different set-up, even with the same conductor. Moreover (says my ear), this appears to be a simulated stereo, out of a mono original, even if it doesn't say so. And those vague stirrings in the background—are they a "live" audience? Is this from a broadcast? Could be, even if, supposedly, the other side is the "Radio" orchestra. (The ascriptions are casually reversed, you'll note, as they appear on the backside of the jacket.) So who knows? The conductor does. He conducted both. Go ask him, if you want to know.

Just to confuse the issue, I note that Angel also offers the same Symphony No. 7 with the very same conductor, on its Melodiya label! There, the orchestra is listed as the Moscow Radio Symphony. And the recording on that one is in full stereo.

ment, for instance, begins with a warm lyrical idea which is inflated out of all proportion: at this point, Prokofiev seemed unable to sustain lyrical sentiments on a symphonic scale.

Much as I admire Rozhdestvensky's sensitive reading here, I find that Leinsdorf's superior orchestra makes a choice between the two versions very difficult. In the more rhetorical passages, the Boston Symphony sounds less effortful than the Moscow Radio Symphony Orchestra, and the technical difficulties of the third movement are solved to far better advantage by the American ensemble. Rozhdestvensky, on the other hand, offers niceties of expression, texture, and phrasing that are noticeably absent in Leinsdorf's rather insensitive handling of the score. To make the choice even more difficult, the Boston/Leinsdorf record also offers a rousing performance of the Scythian Suite, while the Melodiya/Angel disc spaces the thirty-three-minute Symphony over two full sides. P.H.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
AUG 1969

Prokofiev: Concertos Nos. 3 and 4. John Browning, piano; with the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor, stereo, LSC 3019; mono, LM 3019; $5.79.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
OCT 26 1968

In this combination of the most- and least-recorded concerti of Prokofiev, Browning affirms the wisdom of his choice to record most (if not all) of the works in that literature. In No. 3 Browning and Leinsdorf re-create a result they had achieved previously for Capitol, with perhaps even a swifter, more compelling blend of animation and insight. For my taste, the recording tends to overstress some of the percussive values in the score, as though the mere incidence of a timpani under the piano required a bump like an antique Ford crossing a railroad track. However, what Browning has to provide in the way of impulse and facility are so essentially Prokofievian that the totality levels out the occasional inequalities. In the work for left hand (written, as was Ravel's similar concerto, for Paul Wittgenstein), Browning defines its premises and argues its logics with great persuasiveness. And what it contains of later, greater Prokofiev is also expounded to excellent effect by Leinsdorf.

It's Special for Left-Handed Pianist

By Stephen A. Sharp
Special to The Virginian-Pilot

In a recent release on the RCA Victor label, two works by the late Sergei Prokovieff are featured with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. John Browning is the pianist in this performance of Concerto No. 3 in C, Op. 26, and Concerto No. 4 in B-flat, Op. 53 (LSC-3019).

The fourth concerto is different from most concerti in that it is written for the left hand only. It was premiered in 1956, by a one-armed German pianist, 25 years after it was written. The cleft shifts and the changes in strength written into the score make this piece a difficult one to perform. Browning rises to the challenge with ample success.

Leinsdorf and Browning combine in an effective performance, technically perfect and aesthetically delightful. Browning's every motion at the keyboard and every nuance add to the total greatness of this recording. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony have been issuing recordings of the works of the Russian composer for some time, which RCA bills appropriately as the "Prokovieff Series."

Also in this RCA release package is Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony performing Symphony No. 93 in D and Symphony No. 96 in D ("Miracle") by Franz Joseph Haydn. (LSC-3030). Perhaps the precision and clarity of the Boston Symphony with Leinsdorf at the helm along with its ability to sense and portray the mood of a piece are ample reasons to support the claim that it is "The Aristocrat of Orchestras." Certainly there can be no quarrel in this recording.

The Virginian-Pilot
NORFOLK, VA.
D. 125,503 SUN. 170,122
SEP 1 1968

PIANIST John Browning continues his association with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with beautiful performances of two Prokofieff piano concertos on a new RCA Victor stereo album (LSC-3019).

Browning performs the spirited and melodious Prokofieff Concerto No. 3 in C with great skill and with near perfect nuances. He had had some practice on this particular work. A few years back, when he was just making a name for himself, Browning recorded this concerto for Capitol Records with Leinsdorf and the Philharmonic Orchestra.

JOHN BROWNING

Practice makes perfect, they say. So, Browning and Leinsdorf once again teamed up on the concerto with this rewarding result. The pianist's technique shows great improvement over the years—there's more maturity to the keyboard touch. The concerto is a pianistic art. It is full of melodic writing of the highest caliber, and Browning accepts the challenge and gives Prokofieff his due. It is in the popular category of Tchaikovsky's and Rachmaninoff's concertos.

Browning also gives a skillful performance of Prokofieff's No. 4 in B-Flat on the second side of this disc. This is a terrific undertaking since it is written for the left hand. It isn't in the lyrical category of the third, but is more of a chamber work. It's beautifully performed by Browning with an excellent backing by the Bostonians under Leinsdorf.

Previously, Browning had teamed with Leinsdorf and the Boston orchestra for recordings of Prokofieff's first and second concertos. They turn out to be quite a team. I was fortunate to hear Browning in a recital a few months back at DePauw University. He has terrific ability and potential not yet tapped.

LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL AND COURIER
D. 45,500
AUG 24 1968

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
(E) 13,611
AUG 27 1969
New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Recordings Rated Fine

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—Now that Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony and merely another entry on the list of available guest conductors, it is time to wonder about his future as a recording conductor.

His tenure as head music man in Boston put him among the most prolific recorders but the record-maker, RCA, has always done much with the orchestra regardless of who was the music director. It may well be Leinsdorf will now have fewer recording opportunities.

But whatever his future, his recent past as recorder is a glorious one, a fact underlined by the newly released record completing his series devoted to Prokofieff's five piano concertos, with John Browning as soloist (3121).

It is the fifth concerto and again you are given the conviction that conductor and soloist understood the composer precisely the same way and better probably than any other conductor-soloist combination ever did. Leinsdorf's strength is in conveying unquestioned authority.

Presumably he has completed the project of recording all the Prokofieff symphonies with the Boston. The 3rd, 5th and 6th he has done and the 2nd is newly released (3061). Also newsly at hand are his interpretations of Beethoven's 1st and 8th symphonies, on one record (3098). But he served all the masters, modern and classical, well in Boston and may the recordings long survive!

Albany Knickerbocker News
Thursday, September 4, 1969

Leinsdorf's Reputation Secure With Recordings of Prokieff

NEW YORK (UP) — Now that Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony and merely another entry on the list of available guest conductors, it is time to wonder about his future as a recording conductor.

His tenure as head music man in Boston put him among the most prolfic recorders but the record-maker, RCA, has always done much with the orchestra regardless of who was the music director. It may well be Leinsdorf will now have fewer recording opportunities.

But whatever his future, his recent past as recorder is a glorious one, a fact underlined by the newly released record completing his series devoted to Prokofieff's five piano concertos, with John Browning as soloist (3121).

It is the fifth concerto and again you are given the conviction that conductor and soloist understood the composer precisely the same way and better probably than any other conductor-soloist combination ever did. Leinsdorf's strength is in conveying unquestioned authority.

Presumably he has completed the project of recording all the Prokofieff symphonies with the Boston. The 3d, 5th, and 6th he has done and the 2d is newly released (3061). Also newly at hand are his interpretations of Beethoven's 1st and 8th symphonies, on one record (3098). But he served all the masters, modern and classical, well in Boston and may the recordings long survive.

CONSUMER BULLETIN
WASHINGTON, N. J.
MONTHLY 110,000
FEB 1969

and next year's ...
tion of Beethoven's ...

Another Beethoven album offers a recital by pianist Jacob Lateiner. Carl Weinrich is the soloist in a two-record set of Handel organ concertos with the Arthur Fiedler Sinfonietta under Fiedler.

Continuing his Prokofiev series, Erich Leinsdorf completes the four piano concertos conducting soloist John Browning and the Boston Symphony in a coupling of the last two. Leinsdorf also conducts the Boston in a Dvorak pressing.

Morton Gould co... the Chicago Sym... pairing of ... Rimsky ...

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUN 1 1968

Prokofiev: Piano Concertos Nos. 3 and 4. John Browning (piano) with the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC 3019 [LM 3019]. $5.79. Continuing its Prokofiev series, the BSO with pianist Browning play the jaunty, spirited Concerto No. 3 and the puzzling No. 4 written for the one-armed Austrian pianist, Paul Wittgenstein. Orchestra and soloist are at their best. There is excitement, wit, and warmth where demanded. It is difficult to fault anyone, including the engineers. AA AA

98

TWO PROKOFIEV SYMPHONIES —A LOGICAL SECOND AND A LYRICAL FIFTH

by Philip Hart

No one conductor has yet recorded an integral set of Prokofiev's seven symphonies, but collectors may now assemble their own complete package by choosing from various projects more or less officially under way. Leinsdorf's planned comprehensive survey of the orchestral Prokofiev now includes Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, and 6. Rozhdestvensky's series of new performances on Melodiya/Angel presently offers Nos. 1, 4, 6, and 7. And there are, of course, numerous other recordings of Prokofiev symphonies—Nos. 1 and 5 in particular are available in many different versions—from which to select a representative survey of one of the century's most important symphonic masters.

Each of these new releases merits more than passing interest: Leinsdorf's because it offers the first thoroughly adequate recording of Prokofiev's least-known symphony; and Karajan's because it offers a highly individual and superbly engineered version of a major contemporary work.

Long regarded as the most difficult of the seven (even by the composer himself), the Second sounds considerably less formidable than it must have over forty years ago, when its unfavorably received first performance virtually consigned the work to oblivion. The two-movement symphony, modeled on Beethoven's last piano sonata, is certainly straightforward enough: a violently energetic yet classically developed sonata form followed by a series of variations on a lyrical theme.

Leinsdorf presents the first movement in the most intelligible reading it has yet enjoyed on disc. His direction, the playing of the Boston Symphony, and the fine reproduction, all contribute to the clarification of an extremely dense texture. Moreover, Leinsdorf discovers more coherent expression, musical logic, and subtle dynamic variation in this problematical music than any previous conductor on records. The same elements are strongly evident in the long variation movement.

The conductor is somewhat less successful in finding the proper satiric bite and folklike quality of the Lieutenant Kijé Suite. Other conductors, notably Reiner and Ormandy, achieve happier results with this lighthearted score. To Leinsdorf's credit, however, one must note that he includes the optional (but certainly preferable) vocal parts in two of the Suite's movements. David Clatworthy, a fine-sounding young baritone, sings these in what seems to be good but not completely idiomatic Russian.

There are several ways of interpreting the Prokofiev Fifth Symphony. Karajan quite predictably opts for the lyric approach, and no conductor today can match him when it comes to conjuring up long, expressive orchestral lines. This luminous performance and recording immediately takes its place among the best versions of Prokofiev's most popular large-scale symphony. Karajan's songfulness is totally antithetical to the equally valid epical approaches taken by Ormandy, in a still viable though tubbily recorded performance, and more recently by Bernstein, where energy and sonority sometimes overcome orchestral precision.

The recording that comes closest to Karajan's interpretation is the version by the late Ernest Ansermet, who often excelled in the twentieth-century Russian repertoire, Prokofiev in particular. Ansermet projects his lyricism with more intensity than Karajan, and he favors a richer, more generalized sonority. But Karajan draws a far finer, more extraordinarily subtle orchestral sound and texture from the Berlin Philharmonic. By refining the typically warm, rich sound of his brass and lower strings, and by his incredible control of the intonation and vibrato of the upper strings, Karajan achieves a texture comparable to the luminescence one associates with good string quartet playing. At the same time, this refined sonic medium is made to complement a musical conception in which the lyrical line and phrase are developed in a most sophisticated manner. One may or may not care for Karajan's treatment of Prokofiev, but it is impossible to deny the perfection with which every detail is executed. To my mind the lyric is certainly one very valid approach to Prokofiev, especially here in the Fifth Symphony.

Finally, I must compliment DGG's engineers and producers for the beautifully balanced stereo ambience, the ungimmicked recording, and the tasteful fidelity with which the orchestra's dynamics and tone color have been reproduced. This is everything that an orchestral record should be and nowadays so seldom is.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Op. 40; Lieutenant Kijé: Suite, Op. 60

David Clatworthy, baritone (in the Lieutenant Kijé); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC 3061, $5.98.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 5, in B flat, Op. 100

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Herbert von Karajan, cond. Deutsche Grammophon 139040, $5.79. Tape: ●● C9040, 7½ ips, $7.95; ■ M89040, $6.95.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 2, in D Minor, Op. 40; Lieutenant Kijé—Suite, Op. 60. David Clatworthy (baritone); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA Ⓢ LSC 3061 $5.98.

Performance: Clean and crisp
Recording: Full-bodied
Stereo Quality: Good

Far be it from me to complain about having Prokofiev's block-busting 1924 symphony "of iron and steel" achieve its first stereo recording, but I do wish that Mr. Leinsdorf and RCA had been daring enough to couple it with the even more remarkable Chaldean invocation Seven, They are Seven, Op. 30, rather than the innocuous, though charming, Lt. Kijé film music. In the Symphony Leinsdorf does not achieve quite the volatility and ferocity that Rozhdestvensky does with the Moscow Radio Symphony on the Russian MK mono disc I have on hand, but he does have the benefit of topflight stereo sonics, which reveal considerably more detail, particularly in the kaleidoscopic variation movement that makes up the latter two-thirds of the work. As in his 1960 Capitol recording, Leinsdorf opts for the vocal versions of the Romance and Troika movements in Lt. Kijé, and the delightful texts are excellently sung in the original Russian by New York City Opera baritone David Clatworthy. This is the only currently available recording of the score in this form. The performance as a whole is more neat than spontaneous, but beautifully recorded for all that. The balances in the final Burial of Kijé movement, with its tricky combination of themes from the second and third movements, are especially felicitous. D. H.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
JUN 1969

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 150,000
MAY 1969

Non-Electronic Tuning

Those methods of tuning are visual: you see when the tuning is correct. Some still prefer to use their ears, in one or other method that employs audible indications of pitch differences. The trick here is to use a beat that is slow enough to count. The slowest beat in the tempered musical scale is the major fifth: it is close to a frequency ratio of 3:2.

The mathematical interval is 1.4983, as opposed to the ratio that would give zero beat, of 1.5. If the actual frequencies were 1,000 and 1498.3 Hz, they would produce a beat of 3.4 wavbles per second, because the 3rd harmonic of the first, 3000 Hz, would beat with the second harmonic of the second, at 2996.6 Hz.

So you tune the upper note of the fifth interval flat of the zero beat to give a specified number of beats. Figure 9 1 shows the count of beats in 5 seconds, which is easier to do accurately than so many beats per second, working on frequencies between F# at 369.99 Hz and C at 1046.5 Hz.

As shown, the tuning follows a downward order from C, so F would be tuned sharp to get the requisite number of beats. When you including Ormandy's on Columbia. But the recording on this side is another story. As you flip, the sound deteriorates; this is out of a wholly different set-up, even with the same conductor. Moreover (says my ear), this appears to be a simulated stereo, out of a mono original, even if it doesn't say so. And those vague stirrings in the background—are they a "live" audience? Is this from a broadcast? Could be, even if, supposedly, the other side is the "Radio" orchestra. (The ascriptions are casually reversed, you'll note, as they appear on the backside of the jacket.) So who knows? The conductor does. He conducted both. Go ask him, if you want to know.

Just to confuse the issue, I note that Angel also offers the same Symphony No. 7 with the very same conductor, on its Melodiya label! There, the orchestra is listed as the Moscow Radio Symphony. And the recording on that one is in full stereo.

newsmen.
When you want music you don't war war.
So the first thing you should do is check out your equipment.
If everything checks out it might be your tape.
To record beautiful music you have to use a tape that doesn't cut off the highs or the lows.
Like RCA's Red Seal.
It's made under white room conditions so it won't distort or blur or light with whatever you record.
Red Seal is formulated with

ment, for instance, begins with a warm lyrical idea which is inflated out of all proportion: at this point, Prokofiev seemed unable to sustain lyrical sentiments on a symphonic scale.

Much as I admire Rozhdestvensky's sensitive reading here, I find that Leinsdorf's superior orchestra makes a choice between the two versions very difficult. In the more rhetorical passages, the Boston Symphony sounds less effortful than the Moscow Radio Symphony Orchestra, and the technical difficulties of the third movement are solved to far better advantage by the American ensemble. Rozhdestvensky, on the other hand, offers niceties of expression, texture, and phrasing that are noticeably absent in Leinsdorf's rather insensitive handling of the score. To make the choice even more difficult, the Boston/Leinsdorf record also offers a rousing performance of the Scythian Suite, while the Melodiya/Angel disc spaces the thirty-three-minute Symphony over two full sides. P.H.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 150,000
AUG 1969

Prokofiev: Concertos Nos. 3 and 4. John Browning, piano; with the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor, stereo, LSC 3019; mono, LM 3019; $5.79.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y
W. 413,000
OCT 26 1968

In this combination of the most- and least-recorded concerti of Prokofiev, Browning affirms the wisdom of his choice to record most (if not all) of the works in that literature. In No. 3 Browning and Leinsdorf re-create a result they had achieved previously for Capitol, with perhaps even a swifter, more compelling blend of animation and insight. For my taste, the recording tends to overstress some of the percussive values in the score, as though the mere incidence of a timpani under the piano required a bump like an antique Ford crossing a railroad track. However, what Browning has to provide in the way of impulse and facility are so essentially Prokofievian that the totality levels out the occasional inequalities. In the work for left hand (written, as was Ravel's similar concerto, for Paul Wittgenstein), Browning defines its premises and argues its logics with great persuasiveness. And what it contains of later, greater Prokofiev is also expounded to excellent effect by Leinsdorf.

It's Special for Left-Handed Pianist

By Stephen A. Sharp

Special to The Virginian-Pilot

In a recent release on the RCA Victor label, two works by the late Sergei Prokovieff are featured with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. John Browning is the pianist in this performance of Concerto No. 3 in C, Op. 26, and Concerto No. 4 in B-flat, Op. 53 (LSC-3019).

The fourth concerto is different from most concerti in that it is written for the left hand only. It was premiered in 1956, by a one-armed German pianist, 25 years after it was written. The cleft shifts and the changes in strength written into the score make this piece a difficult one to perform. Browning rises to the challenge with ample success.

Leinsdorf and Browning combine in an effective performance, technically perfect and aesthetically delightful. Browning's every motion at the keyboard and every nuance add to the total greatness of this recording. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony have been issuing recordings of the works of the Russian composer for some time, which RCA bills appropriately as the "Prokovieff Series."

Also in this RCA release package is Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony performing Symphony No. 93 in D and Symphony No. 96 in D ("Miracle") by Franz Joseph Haydn. (LSC-3030). Perhaps the precision and clarity of the Boston Symphony with Leinsdorf at the helm along with its ability to sense and portray the mood of a piece are ample reasons to support the claim that it is "The Aristocrat of Orchestras." Certainly there can be no quarrel in this recording.

The Virginian-Pilot
NORFOLK, VA.
D. 125,503 SUN. 170,122
SEP 1 1968

PIANIST John Browning continues his association with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with beautiful performances of two Prokofieff piano concertos on a new RCA Victor stereo album (LSC-3019).

Browning performs the spirited and melodious Prokofieff

JOHN BROWNING

Concerto No. 3 in C with great skill and with near perfect nuances. He had had some practice on this particular work. A few years back, when he was just making a name for himself, Browning recorded this concerto for Capitol Records with Leinsdorf and the Philharmonic Orchestra.

Practice makes perfect, they say. So, Browning and Leinsdorf once again teamed up on the concerto with this rewarding result. The pianist's technique shows great improvement over the years—there's more maturity to the keyboard touch. The concerto is a pianistic art. It is full of melodic writing of the highest caliber, and Browning accepts the challenge and gives Prokofieff his due. It is in the popular category of Tchaikovsky's and Rachmaninoff's concertos.

Browning also gives a skillful performance of Prokofieff's No. 4 in B-Flat on the second side of this disc. This is a terrific undertaking since it is written for the left hand. It isn't in the lyrical category of the third, but is more of a chamber work. It's beautifully performed by Browning with an excellent backing by the Bostonians under Leinsdorf.

Previously, Browning had teamed with Leinsdorf and the Boston orchestra for recordings of Prokofieff's first and second concertos. They turn out to be quite a team. I was fortunate to hear Browning in a recital a few months back at DePauw University. He has terrific ability and potential not yet tapped.

LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL AND COURIER
D. 45,500
AUG 24 1968

Leinsdorf Recordings Rated Fine

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—Now that Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony and merely another entry on the list of available guest conductors, it is time to wonder about his future as a recording conductor.

His tenure as head music man in Boston put him among the most prolific recorders but the record-maker, RCA, has always done much with the orchestra regardless of who was the music director. It may well be Leinsdorf will now have fewer recording opportunities.

But whatever his future, his recent past as recorder is a glorious one, a fact underlined by the newly released record completing his series devoted to Prokofieff's five piano concertos, with John Browning as soloist (3121).

It is the fifth concerto and again you are given the conviction that conductor and soloist understood the composer precisely the same way and better probably than any other conductor-soloist combination ever did. Leinsdorf's strength is in conveying unquestioned authority.

Presumably he has completed the project of recording all the Prokofieff symphonies with the Boston. The 3rd, 5th and 6th he has done and the 2nd is newly released (3061). Also newly at hand are his interpretations of Beethoven's 1st and 8th symphonies, on one record (3098). But he served all the masters, modern and classical, well in Boston and may the recordings long survive!

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
(E) 13,611
AUG 27 1969

New England Newsclip

Albany Knickerbocker News
Thursday, September 4, 1969

and next year's ...
tion of Beethoven's bi...

Another Beethoven album offers a recital by pianist Jacob Lateiner. Carl Weinrich is the soloist in a two-record set of Handel organ concertos with the Arthur Fiedler Sinfonietta under Fiedler.

Continuing his Prokofiev series, Erich Leinsdorf completes the four piano concertos conducting soloist John Browning and the Boston Symphony in a coupling of the last two. Leinsdorf also conducts the Boston in a Dvorak pressing.

Morton Gould co... the Chicago Sym... pairing of ... Rimsky

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUN 1 1968

Prokofiev: Piano Concertos Nos. 3 and 4. John Browning (piano) with the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC 3019 [LM 3019]. $5.79. Continuing its Prokofiev series, the BSO with pianist Browning play the jaunty, spirited Concerto No. 3 and the puzzling No. 4 written for the one-armed Austrian pianist, Paul Wittgenstein. Orchestra and soloist are at their best. There is excitement, wit, and warmth where demanded. It is difficult to fault anyone, including the engineers. AA AA

Leinsdorf's Reputation Secure With Recordings of Prokieff

NEW YORK (UP) — Now that Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony and merely another entry on the list of available guest conductors, it is time to wonder about his future as a recording conductor.

His tenure as head music man in Boston put him among the most prolfic recorders but the record maker, RCA, has always done much with the orchestra regardless of who was the music director. It may well be Leinsdorf will now have fewer recording opportunities.

But whatever his future, his recent past as recorder is a glorious one, a fact underlined by the newly released record completing his series devoted to Prokofieff's five piano concertos, with John Browning as soloist (3121).

It is the fifth concerto and again you are given the conviction that conductor and soloist understood the composer precisely the same way and better probably than any other conductor-soloist combination ever did. Leinsdorf's strength is in conveying unquestioned authority.

Presumably he has completed the project of recording all the Prokofieff symphonies with the Boston. The 3d, 5th, and 6th he has done and the 2d is newly released (3061). Also newly at hand are his interpretations of Beethoven's 1st and 8th symphonies, on one record (3098). But he served all the masters, modern and classical, well in Boston and may the recordings long survive.

CONSUMER BULLETIN
WASHINGTON, N. J.
MONTHLY
FEB 1969

99.

RECORDINGS OF SPECIAL MERIT

TCHAIKOVSKY: Concerto In D, Op. 35, for Violin and Orchestra. DVOŘÁK: Romance in F, Op. 11. Itzhak Perlman (violin); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR Ⓢ LSC 3014, Ⓜ LM 3014* $5.79.

Performance: Excellent
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Good

It's rather nice to discover that this sort of fiddle playing is not entirely dying out with the older generation. Within certain limits, Perlman essays the grand style, and by and large succeeds at it. He is not overly Romantic in the lman manner, but then that kind of playing would seem very affected today—like old silent-film acting. But Perlman has a good, rich sound, plenty of swing in his bow arm, and all the grand rhetorical gestures in good working order. Leinsdorf and the orchestra are right there with him; Leinsdorf lets the sentiment in the music take care of itself, but that's quite all right with me. I am, I must admit, no Tchaikovsky Concerto connoisseur, but I enjoyed this performance. The Dvořák, although a little overlong in its dogged Dvořákian lyricism, is a pleasant extra, and the sound is as good as or better than anything that RCA has come up with from Boston. E. S.

RCA

ITZHAK PERLMAN
The grand style in good working order

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163.400

AUG 1968

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

JUL 1968

TCHAIKOVSKY: Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in D, Op. 35
†Dvořák: Romance for Violin and Orchestra, in F, Op. 11

Itzhak Perlman, violin; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM 3014 or LSC 3014, $5.79.

As sheer violinism, Itzhak Perlman's second disc for RCA Victor is beyond cavil, distinguished by solid, luscious tone and impressively secure technique. Interpretatively, however, the performance of the Tchaikovsky Concerto reveals that this brilliant young artist has yet to achieve the individual touches that would give his work flair. The over-all effect is blandly impersonal.

Perlman does little to add expressive nuance, or to mold phrases in a manner that would lend them the shape and direction they must have if they are not to degenerate into perfunctory passagework. Curiously lacking drive and urgency, the first movement does not rouse itself until the coda. The Canzonetta is attractively played, but the opportunity the second theme offers for a change of mood, tonal color, and shading is passed by. Perlman lunges into the finale with grim determination. Though he restores all seven traditional minor cuts (none amounting to more than twelve bars), thus allowing us to hear fifty-six measures usually excised, his bowing is too heavy for the gossamer, scherzolike quality of the music. When the final victory comes, it is joyless. In all, then, this is not an interpretation that will quicken many pulses. The Heifetz/Reiner and Oistrakh/Ormandy versions are to be preferred.

That Perlman can move the heart is demonstrated by his ravishing performance of Dvořák's exquisite Romance in F, suffused with smoldering ardor.

Murky, overresonant sonics—severely attenuated in highs, with considerable overloading distortion in the orchestral tuttis. And there is a noticeable tape splice eleven bars before the last entrance of the main theme in the Tchaikovsky finale—the violin suddenly jumps towards the left speaker. M.S.

TCHAIKOVSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1. Mischa Dichter, piano; Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra. STRAVINSKY: Three Movements from "Petrouchka." BRAHMS: piano pieces. Dichter, piano RCA Victor TR3-5026, 3¾ ips. Sound: very good, even if a bit brittle and treble-strong when compared with the disc version (LSC 2954 and 2970). Music: the ultimate warhorse concerto, a virtuoso recital vehicle (Stravinsky) and some of Brahms' most attractive short piano pieces. Interpretation: unhurriedly poetic in the Tchaikovsky, refreshing after so many driven versions. Stravinsky: OK. Brahms: Dichter, in his early twenties, has a lifetime to refine his good natural feeling for such pieces as the Intermezzo in A, op. 118, no. 2. Competition: considerable for Tchaikovsky, non-existent for the others.

PROKOFIEFF: Violin Concerto No. 2. SIBELIUS: Violin Concerto. TCHAIKOVSKY: Violin Concerto. DVORAK: Romance, op. 11. Itzhak Perlman, violin; Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor TR3-5029, 3¾ ips stuff, although less easeful of string sound, less open overall than these performances on disc (LSC 2962 and 3014). Music: three standard violin concerto favorites, with a lovely shorter piece, less often heard (the Dvorak) as an attractive extra. Interpretation: youthful, enjoyable. Competition: save for the Dvorak, a tape debut, considerable; most of it is at 7½ ips, too.

SIGHT AND SOUND
MARKETING
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

SEP 1968

... to
...user, for
... and develops
... long-established
...ional frameworks.
..., though hardly all, concerti and symphonies come generally within this framework.

Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto presents only one real challenge to the recording engineer; how to fit the middle and final movements onto the disc without a break, as Tchaikovsky composed it. The problem is compounded by the fact that an uncut performance usually runs about eighteen plus seventeen minutes, leaving little time for a fill-up on either disc side. Itzhak Perlman proves the trick can be done, by mis-shaping Tchaikovsky's lyricism to achieve a thirty-three minute concerto.

The Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf, matches Perlman's astonishing technique, but the result is still willfully wrong-headed, particularly in the Canzonetta. The lengthy Dvorak Romance in F that fills out the disc is hardly justification for tempi that distort the main work. Irving Kolodin's jacket notes are perhaps the most inane of his otherwise distinguished career. "Possibly December 4, 1881, fell on a Saturday . . . If not, it was philosophically a Saturday . . ." he writes. Since this point is central to his rhetoric, could he not have spent the three minutes necessary to calculate that it was a Saturday in fact?

Another of the five DGG discs in the Furtwangler com...orative album has been re... bargain Heliodor ... Schubert "Great" ... It is a ly... ...ngler

---

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JUN 27 1968

New England Newsclip

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

JUN 23 1968

New England Newsclip

...istian
... the love of
...nis selections on
...ve an intermingling of
...earness of pattern with Ger...
...structure. The music naturally is more like early Haydn or Mozart than that of "Father Bach" and is delightful listening.

TWO FAMILIAR concertos are on two separate RCA Victor albums: Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto, performed by Itzhak Perlman, violinist, the disc finishing with Dvorak's Romance in F; and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Artur Rubinstein as piano soloist. Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony in both works.

The album containing the Beethoven First is simply marvelous. Rubinstein is still among the "greats" as far as I am concerned, and in this recording, Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony lend wonderful support.

I wish I could exult over the Tchaikovsky album. I am aware of the technical brilliance of young Mr. Perlman, and he is note perfect in his performance of the Violin concerto, but there is a certain lackluster here that is disconcerting. Where's the exciting buildup that we come to expect from this work? Alas, it may be my liver kicking up again, but something is certainly lacking.

THE SYMPHONY in E Flat, No. 5 by ... is the composer's birthday sym... first performed in 1915 on ...helius' 50th birthday. ...f the symphony ...ere, Sib... on

---

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, September 21, 1968

Tchaikovsky Gets Russian and American Treatments

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—Americans can now hear a full-scale Russian appreciation Tchaikovsky the symphonist as recorded by a representative Russian conductor with a Russian orchestra in Russia.

Offhand you could think we might learn something, since Tchaikovsky was so very Russian. Such is in no way so. The Russian appreciation is not substantially different from that of any conductor and orchestra in any country. But that jibes. Even Russian musical geniuses are universal.

Yevgeny Svetlanov, conducting the USSR Symphony, recorded all six of his symphonies and the symphony length symphonic poem, "Manfred," on seven records, each one of which is available separately (Melodiya-Angel.)

At very least Svetlanov's appreciation is officially Russian. He bears the title, "People's Artist." It is a little more lush than that of many western conductors who at times appear embarrassed by the composer's heart-on-sleeve postures and try to deemphasize.

Svetlanov doesn't. In fact, he is emphatically the other way. He makes Tchaikovsky a square in all dimensions, and, no matter what the self-styled moderns say, that's the powerfully evocative Tchaikovsky.

Itzhak Perlman, the brilliant young Israeli violinist, has recorded Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf, and at its full length which makes it fill both record sides (RCA Victor-3014.) It's more than worthy of being left as the composer made it, particularly with a Perlman playing.

Like all the big-name conductors, Leonard Bernstein has now recorded, with the New York Philharmonic, "Wagner Orchestral Favorites," and the usual ones such as the "Love-Death," the ride of the Valkyries and magic fire music, the act 3 prelude of "Lohengrin" and so forth. He was conscientious about it, of course, but his efforts add up to just another "favorites" record (Columbia-7141.)

Among the new tapes, the reviewer was enthralled by these: Pierre Fournier playing Elgar's cello concerto with the Berlin Philharmonic with fine grace, keen sensibilities and a sumptuous tone (Deutsche Grammophon-Ampex 9128).

Also Georg Solti conducting the Vienna Philharmonic in Bruckner's 8th symphony with compelling conviction London-Ampex 80201.

Rafael Kubelik conducting the Bavarian Radio Symphony in Mahler's 3rd symphony, largely because the fabulous alto, Marjorie Thomas, was soloist (Deutsche Grammophon-Ampex 9338.)

...ciation, then dashed

...st summer, after one of his concerts at Waterloo Village, Miss Horne raved backstage to us that her husband was a genius. He can now return the compliment.

If you'd like to hear these protagonists in records, you have a wide choice. Leinsdorf and the Boston have a recording featuring the overtures to the "Flying Dutchman" and "Tanhaeuser" and the preludes to "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger." (RCA LSC-3011). For Beethoven you can try an unusual Symphony No. 4 and the Leonore Overture No. 2. (RCA LSC-3006). Then if you want find out how Leinsdorf is as an accompanying conductor in a concerto, you can try the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with Itzhak Perlman as soloist. (RCA LSC-3014).

As for Miss Horne, she used to record quite a bit on London with other artists. Some ...the best were the Mozart Requiem with Elly ...mo, Benelli, and Tugomir Franc. ... Beethoven Symphony No. ...onic under Hans ...nd, James proof... ers' errors slip ...

---

The album has the number CS-6605-Stereo (London).

OTHER NEW LP'S

SCHARWENKA: Concerto No. 1, for Piano and Orchesanist and the Boston Symtra, Opus 32: Earl Wild, piphony Orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf: RCA-Victor-(Red Seal)-Stereo: LSC-3080: Why this 1877-vintage melange of about six or

---

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 189,425 SUN. 302,445

SEP 7 1969

seven other composers' works was ever hauled out of its obscure grave is beyond me. The only point in buying the recording would be to hear how expertly Earl Wild dashes off its more brilliant passages and how rich (as always) the sound of the Boston comes though even in a mediocre opus.

Three solo piano compositions by Balakireff, Medtner and d'Albert round out the recording.

THE UNIQUE ART OF ... SEGOVIA: An... classical

...gorous read... ...full-blooded treatment may not be everyman's idea of Haydn, but it is invigorating and very much in the spirit of the work (25073).

By approaching an overplayed concerto with the unhackneyed eye of a youthful, serious and technically endowed artist, 23-year-old Israeli violinist Itzhak Perlman proves again that familiarity need not necessarily breed contempt. His playing of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto is subtle, beautiful and exciting in its freshness and abandon. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provide understanding support. Also on the disc is a lovely rendition of Dvorak's Lyrical Romance. (RCA 3014).

STONY POINT MESSENGER
Thursday, August 29, 1968

Tchaikovsky: Violin Concerto (Itzhak Perlman, Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony; RCA Victor LSC-3014). The loveliest recording of this work in recent years; a dream.

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 285,000

JUL 1968

HACKENSACK, N.J.
RECORD CALL
SUN CIRC. N. AVAIL

NOV 3 1968

RECORDINGS OF SPECIAL MERIT

TCHAIKOVSKY: Concerto In D, Op. 35, for Violin and Orchestra. DVORAK: Romance in F, Op. 11. Itzhak Perlman (violin); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR (S) LSC 3014, (M) LM 3014* $5.79.

Performance: Excellent
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Good

It's rather nice to discover that this sort of fiddle playing is not entirely dying out with the older generation. Within certain limits, Perlman essays the grand style, and by and large succeeds at it. He is not overly Romantic in the lman manner, but then that kind of playing would seem very affected today—like old silent-film acting. But Perlman has a good, rich sound, plenty of swing in his bow arm, and all the grand rhetorical gestures in good working order. Leinsdorf and the orchestra are right there with him; Leinsdorf lets the sentiment in the music take care of itself, but that's quite all right with me. I am, I must admit, no Tchaikovsky Concerto connoisseur, but I enjoyed this performance. The Dvořák, although a little overlong in its dogged Dvořákian lyricism, is a pleasant extra, and the sound is as good as or better than anything that RCA has come up with from Boston. E. S.

RCA

ITZHAK PERLMAN
The grand style in good working order

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

AUG 1968

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

JUL 1968

TCHAIKOVSKY: Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in D, Op. 35
†Dvořák: Romance for Violin and Orchestra, in F, Op. 11

Itzhak Perlman, violin; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM 3014 or LSC 3014, $5.79.

As sheer violinism, Itzhak Perlman's second disc for RCA Victor is beyond cavil, distinguished by solid, luscious tone and impressively secure technique. Interpretatively, however, the performance of the Tchaikovsky Concerto reveals that this brilliant young artist has yet to achieve the individual touches that would give his work flair. The over-all effect is blandly impersonal.

Perlman does little to add expressive nuance, or to mold phrases in a manner that would lend them the shape and direction they must have if they are not to degenerate into perfunctory passagework. Curiously lacking drive and urgency, the first movement does not rouse itself until the coda. The Canzonetta is attractively played, but the opportunity the second theme offers for a change of mood, tonal color, and shading is passed by. Perlman lunges into the finale with grim determination. Though he restores all seven traditional minor cuts (none amounting to more than twelve bars), thus allowing us to hear fifty-six measures usually excised, his bowing is too heavy for the gossamer, scherzolike quality of the music. When the final victory comes, it is joyless. In all, then, this is not an interpretation that will quicken many pulses. The Heifetz/Reiner and Oistrakh/Ormandy versions are to be preferred.

That Perlman can move the heart is demonstrated by his ravishing performance of Dvořák's exquisite Romance in F, suffused with smoldering ardor.

Murky, overresonant sonics—severely attenuated in highs, with considerable overloading distortion in the orchestral tuttis. And there is a noticeable tape splice eleven bars before the last entrance of the main theme in the Tchaikovsky finale—the violin suddenly jumps towards the left speaker. M.S.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, September 21, 1968

TCHAIKOVSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1. Mischa Dichter, piano; Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra. STRAVINSKY: Three Movements from "Petrouchka." BRAHMS: piano pieces. Dichter, piano RCA Victor TR3-5026, 3¾ ips. Sound: very good, even if a bit brittle and treble-strong when compared with the disc version (LSC 2954 and 2970). Music: the ultimate warhorse concerto, a virtuoso recital vehicle (Stravinsky) and some of Brahms' most attractive short piano pieces. Interpretation: unhurriedly poetic in the Tchaikovsky, refreshing after so many driven versions. Stravinsky: OK. Brahms: Dichter, in his early twenties, has a lifetime to refine his good natural feeling for such pieces as the Intermezzo in A, op. 118, no. 2. Competition: considerable for Tchaikovsky, non-existent for the others.

PROKOFIEFF: Violin Concerto No. 2. SIBELIUS: Violin Concerto. TCHAIKOVSKY: Violin Concerto. DVORAK: Romance, op. 11. Itzhak Perlman, violin; Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor TR3-5029, 3¾ ips stuff, although less easeful of string sound, less open overall than these performances on disc (LSC 2962 and 3014). Music: three standard violin concerto favorites, with a lovely shorter piece, less often heard (the Dvorak) as an attractive extra. Interpretation: youthful, enjoyable. Competition: save for the Dvorak, a tape debut, considerable; most of it is at 7½ ips, too.

SIGHT AND SOUND
MARKETING
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

SEP 1968

99

... to
...oser, for
..., and develops
... long-established
...ional frameworks.
..., though hardly all, con-concerti and symphonies come generally within this framework.

Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto presents only one real challenge to the recording engineer; how to fit the middle and final movements onto the disc without a break, as Tchaikovsky composed it. The problem is compounded by the fact that an uncut performance usually runs about eighteen plus seventeen minutes, leaving little time for a fill-up on either disc side. Itzhak Perlman proves the trick can be done, by mis-shaping Tchaikovsky's lyricism to achieve a thirty-three minute concerto.

The Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf, matches Perlman's astonishing technique, but the result is still willfully wrong-headed, particularly in the Canzonetta. The lengthy Dvorak Romance in F that fills out the disc is hardly justification for tempi that distort the main work. Irving Kolodin's jacket notes are perhaps the most inane of his otherwise distinguished career. "Possibly December 4, 1881, fell on a Saturday . . . If not, it was philosophically a Saturday . . . " he writes. Since this point is central to his rhetoric, could he not have spent the three minutes necessary to calculate that it was a Saturday in fact?

Another of the five DGG discs in the Furtwangler com-
...orative album has been re-
... bargain Heliodor
... Schubert "Great"
... It is a ly-
...angler

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JUN 27 1968

New England Newsclip

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

JUN 23 1968

New England Newsclip

...istian
... the love of
... his selections on
...ve an intermingling of
...earness of pattern with Ger-
... structure. The music naturally is more like early Haydn or Mozart than that of "Father Bach" and is delightful listening.

TWO FAMILIAR concertos are on two separate RCA Victor albums: Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto, performed by Itzhak Perlman, violinist, the disc finishing with Dvorak's Romance in F; and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Artur Rubinstein as piano soloist. Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony in both works.

The album containing the Beethoven First is simply marvelous. Rubinstein is still among the "greats" as far as I am concerned, and in this recording, Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony lend wonderful support.

I wish I could exult over the Tchaikovsky album. I am aware of the technical brilliance of young Mr. Perlman, and he is note perfect in his performance of the Violin concerto, but there is a certain lackluster here that is disconcerting. Where's the exciting buildup that we come to expect from this work? Alas, it may be my liver kicking up again, but something is certainly lacking.

THE SYMPHONY in E Flat, No. 5 by ... is the composer's birthday sym-
... first performed in 1915 on
...ibelius' 50th birthday,
... the symphony
...miere, Sib-
...d on

Tchaikovsky Gets Russian and American Treatments

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—Americans can now hear a full-scale Russian appreciation Tchaikovsky the symphonist as recorded by a representative Russian conductor with a Russian orchestra in Russia.

Offhand you could think we might learn something, since Tchaikovsky was so very Russian. Such is in no way so. The Russian appreciation is not substantially different from that of any conductor and orchestra in any country. But that jibes. Even Russian musical geniuses are universal.

Yevgeny Svetlanov, conducting the USSR Symphony, recorded all six of his symphonies and the symphony length symphonic poem, "Manfred," on seven records, each one of which is available separately (Melodiya-Angel.)

At very least Svetlanov's appreciation is officially Russian. He bears the title, "People's Artist." It is a little more lush than that of many western conductors who at times appear embarrassed by the composer's heart-on-sleeve postures and try to deemphasize.

Svetlanov doesn't. In fact, he is emphatically the other way. He makes Tchaikovsky a square in all dimensions, and, no matter what the self-styled moderns say, that's the powerfully evocative Tchaikovsky.

Itzhak Perlman, the brilliant young Israeli violinist, has recorded Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf, and at its full length which makes it fill both record sides (RCA Victor 3014.) It's more than worthy of being left as the composer made it, particularly with a Perlman playing.

Like all the big-name conductors, Leonard Bernstein has now recorded, with the New York Philharmonic, "Wagner Orchestral Favorites," and the usual ones such as the "Love-Death," the ride of the Valkyries and magic fire music, the act 3 prelude of "Lohengrin" and so forth. He was conscientious about it, of course, but his efforts add up to just another "favorites" record (Columbia-7141.)

Among the new tapes, the reviewer was enthralled by these: Pierre Fournier playing Elgar's cello concerto with the Berlin Philharmonic with fine grace, keen sensibilities and a sumptuous tone (Deutsche Grammophon-Ampex 9128).

Also Georg Solti conducting the Vienna Philharmonic in Bruckner's 8th symphony with compelling conviction London-Ampex 80201.

Rafael Kubelik conducting the Bavarian Radio Symphony in Mahler's 3rd symphony, largely because the fabulous alto, Marjorie Thomas, was soloist (Deutsche Grammophon-Ampex 9338.)

...ciation, then dashed

...ast summer, after one of his concerts at Waterloo Village, Miss Horne raved backstage to us that her husband was a genius. He can now return the compliment.

If you'd like to hear these protagonists in records, you have a wide choice. Leinsdorf and the Boston have a recording featuring the overtures to the "Flying Dutchman" and "Tanhaeuser" and the preludes to "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger." (RCA LSC-3011). For Beethoven you can try an unusual Symphony No. 4 and the Leonore Overture No. 2. (RCA LSC-3006). Then if you want find out how Leinsdorf is as an accompanying conductor in a concerto, you can try the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with Itzhak Perlman as soloist. (RCA LSC-3014).

As for Miss Horne, she used to record quite a bit on London with other artists. Some ...the best were the Mozart Requiem with Elly ...ino, Benelli, and Tugomir Franc. ... Beethoven Symphony No. ...monic under Hans ...nd, James proofreaders' errors slip ...

The album has the number CS-6605-Stereo (London).

OTHER NEW LP'S

SCHARWENKA: Concerto No. 1, for Piano and Orchestra, Opus 32: Earl Wild, piano Orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf: RCA-Victor-(Red Seal)-Stereo: LSC-3080: Why this 1877-vintage melange of about six or seven other composers' works was ever hauled out of its obscure grave is beyond me. The only point in buying the recording would be to hear how expertly Earl Wild dashes off its more brilliant passages and how rich (as always) the sound of the Boston comes though even in a mediocre opus.

Three solo piano compositions by Balakireff, Medtner and d'Albert round out the recording.

THE UNIQUE ART OF ... SEGOVIA: An-
... classical

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 189,425 SUN. 302,445

SEP 7 1969

...ous read-
... full-blooded treatment may not be everyman's idea of Haydn, but it is invigorating and very much in the spirit of the work (25073).

By approaching an overplayed concerto with the unhackneyed eye of a youthful, serious and technically endowed artist, 23-year-old Israeli violinist Itzhak Perlman proves again that familiarity need not necessarily breed contempt. His playing of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto is subtle, beautiful and exciting in its freshness not abandon. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provide understanding support. Also on the disc is a lovely rendition of Dvorak's Lyrical Romance. (RCA 3014).

STONY POINT MESSENGER
Thursday, August 29, 1968

Tchaikovsky: Violin Concerto (Itzhak Perlman, Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony; RCA Victor LSC-3014). The loveliest recording of this work in recent years; a dream.

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 305,000

JUL 1968

HACKENSACK, N.J.
RECORD CALL
SUN CIRC. N. AVAIL

NOV 3 1968

100.

The Cleveland Press
D. 389,695
AUG 27 1968

CLASSICAL RECORDS

Erich Leinsdorf Stars in Beethoven, Wagner

By TOM VILLELLA

Erich Leinsdorf, the volatile music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and an artist whose imminent retirement plagues the Boston administration and subscribers alike, is no stranger to the unusual.

When barely 26, he replaced an ailing Artur Bodansky in a Met performance of "Die Walkuere." The star lineup that night—Jan. 21, 1938—would have staggered a less gifted individual.

Besides the great Kirsten Flagstead, the audience applauded the voices of Elisabeth Rethberg, Kerstin Thorborg, Paul Althouse, Emanuel List, and Ludwig Hofmann.

LEINSDORF, IN FULL COMMAND OF his orchestra and the million dollar resources singing on stage, reaped Toscanini-like reviews. He went on to become a firm part of the Met. He also conducted the Cleveland Orchestra for a brief period.

Today, with his Boston retirement announced due to "overwork," RCA Victor is faced with a backlog of Leinsdorf recordings.

Once the Toscanini disciple is absent from the podium, it is reasonable to expect a drop in Boston Symphony record sales. Thus, RCA's rush to place as many discs before the public prior to Leinsdorf's departure.

The Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 1, with the octogenarian miracle, Artur Rubinstein, in full possession of his magical interpretive powers, is heard on LSC-3013. It is a magnificent recording triumph for both artists.

It's Beethoven again, this time the Symphony No. 2, on LSC-3032. This prelude to the "Eroica" has its own beauty and charm. Here, in this energetic reading, Leinsdorf's orchestra glows.

The flip side has selections from "The Creatures of Prometheus." In addition to the well-known overture, the listener is rewarded with the Act II Adagio and Finale, and brief passages from the Pastorale (No. 10) and the allegro section of No. 11 (Andante).

"Leinsdorf Conducts Wagner," on LSC-3011, is more concerned with musical values than sonic splendor. Although, sonically, there is plenty to rave about, it is the maestro's treatment of Wagner's overtures and preludes that compels attention.

Included are the overtures to "Tannhauser," and "The Flying Dutchman." The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and "Tristan and Isolde" fill the remaining portion of the LP. In this issue, the Tristan prelude is sans the famous "Liebestod." The conductor insisted upon using Wagner' original ending for concert hall use.

The New York critics have heaped an array of superlatives on Alberto Ginaster's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra played by Joao Carlos Martins, a pianist who practically grew up with the work.

This contemporary work, available on LSC-3029 with Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, is interesting, colorful and certainly inventive.

It's also noisy, bombastic and, after three hearings, a worx which leaves me cold.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
OCT 1968

WAGNER: Overtures: Der fliegende Holländer; Tannhäuser; Preludes: Tristan und Isolde; Die Meistersinger

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA RED SEAL LM 3011 or LSC 3011, $5.79.

When Theodore Thomas was conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and first received the orchestra parts of The Ride of the Valkyries, he started rehearsals with a session for strings alone. The experience, he reported, was sheer disaster. Only when he played the score with full orchestra, blending the difficult string parts into the sonorous whole, did the music emerge intelligibly.

The notoriously monotonous violin figuration in the climax of the Tannhäuser Overture might serve as another case in point: it must be played with some degree of chiaroscuro. With the magnificent Boston Symphony at his disposal, Erich Leinsdorf projects the literal text of such a passage with awe-inspiring accuracy—but at the expense of both tempo and musical line. More drama and less ponderous precision in both of the early Overtures here would have been welcome. Again, in the Tristan Prelude (here offered without the Liebestod and with Wagner's concert ending) emphasis on details and languid tempos do nothing to convey either inner tension or true feeling of climax. Of the four pieces on the record, the Prelude to Die Meistersinger fares best, though it is more pompous than celebrative. P.H.

CLASSICAL

LEINSDORF CONDUCTS WAGNER—Boston Symphony. RCA Victor Red Seal LSC 3011 (S)

Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony are in top form with warhorse Wagner repertoire—Overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" and preludes to "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger." Leinsforf and Wagner are a happy combination.

WAGNER: "Der fliegende Holländer"—Overture; "Die Meistersinger"—Prelude to Act I; "Tristan und Isolde"—Prelude to Act I (Concert Version); "Tannhäuser"—Overture (Dresden Version); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-3011 or Stereo LSC-3011, $5.79. (10, 9¾, 11¾, 13½ mins.)

⑧IT has been such a very long time since most of us have heard the Tristan Prelude with Wagner's concert ending that I think we might do well to recall, on this occasion, what Sir Donald Tovey had to say about it in his Essays in Musical Analysis: "Of all excerpts from Wagner's later operas, this suffers least from adaptation to the concert-room—except indeed when it is welded together with the arrangement of Isolde's Liebestod, which is in a totally different group of keys and only destroys the impression. . . .But Wagner has furnished three most convincing pages of exquisite scoring and subtle rhythm to round off this Vorspiel in its own proper key [A major-minor], which makes it all the more surprising and regrettable that it is so seldom heard alone with this finish."

One might add that, although the final harmonic resolution of the score is introduced therein, the exact duplicate of these three pages is not to be heard in the entire opera. What we have is roughly analogous to the end of the Holländer Overture, where the Redemption motive is lightly sketched in by way of a resolving coda. What we get with the now all-familiar Prelude and Liebestod concoction is a simply incredible piling-up of Mount Pelion upon Mount Ossa. Tovey called it "a monstrosity"—one whose unthinking acceptance has contributed and is contributing (a) to "the destruction of all critical standards of composition" and (b) to the delusion that Wagner's mind was "a mush" like our own, instead of one by which he composed for his revolutionary Tristan und Isolde a Prelude "as coherent and as exact in its proportions as any movement by Bach."

Now, referring briefly to the common coupling of Prelude and Liebestod, Francis Robinson (Assistant Manager of the Metropolitan Opera) writes in the present record liner: "This is incorrect, Mr. Leinsdorf maintains, since the Liebestod is a vocal number. Wagner wrote an ending to the Prelude for use in the concert hall. . .and early in his career Mr. Leinsdorf hunted it down." (A familiar situation indeed, having to hunt for a beautiful original when sham pastiches are everywhere at hand!) This is not to say that Leinsdorf has never recorded the Prelude-Liebestod amalgam himself. He has; but that was on the Capitol label, so RCA Victor should worry. Nonetheless, as Robinson does point out, Leinsdorf is also a stanch adherent of uncut Wagner in the opera house—e.g., he was responsible for the first complete "Ring" at the Met in 17 years—so his credentials as a musicianly musician are still pretty good.

Appropriately his Tristan Prelude, which is very moving, shares side two with a playing of the original Dresden version of the Tannhäuser Overture—another thing I would like to hear much more often. I always feel fobbed-off when the wind and brass music of the Pilgrim's Chorus fails to come back, accompanied in the strings by what Wagner aptly described as "that whirring and murmuring in the air, which only now sounded like the horrible wail of the damned, [giving] way to more joyful strains." Leinsdorf's Holländer may not be quite the most dramatic in memory, nor his Meistersinger quite the most commanding; but these are solid interpretations, and far better than average. All are heard in a rich, deep sound with much prominence given to the soloistic bits for the bass tuba.

In short, here is that rarity: a thoroughly artistic all-Wagner disc. —J.D.

The American Record Guide September, 1968

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,973 SUN. 306,989
JUN 16 1968

Erich Leinsdorf
...plays Wagner

ERICH LEINSDORF, the man who learned about Wagner as assistant conductor to Toscanini at German festivals before starting his career as conductor, displays those scholarly qualities with the Boston orchestra in a program of Wagner's music on a new RCA Victor LP entitled "Leinsdorf Conducts Wagner" (LSC 3011). Dramatic tension and excitement congeal from the Leinsdorf readings of a well-balanced program which includes overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" and the preludes to Acts I of "Die Meistersinger" and "Tristan and Isolde," respectively.

ALSO IMPRESSIVE is the dedicated artistry of Felix Ayo and his fellows of I Musici in a

By RUTH TRIPP

(RCA-LSC-3011) features two important musical names, Wagner and Leinsdorf. The "aristocrat of orchestras," as all RCA labels proclaim, plays under Erich Leinsdorf's direction and in the best Boston Symphony tradition we hear overtures from "Tannhauser" and "The Flying Dutchman" as well as the Preludes to "Die Meistersinger" and to "Tristan and Isolde."

Leinsdorf's authoritative manner with his Wagner scores comes from direct operatic experience on the Metropolitan Opera Podium in the early days of his career. He was within two weeks of being 26 when he was called on to replace Artur Bodansky who was ill. Singers during his tenure of an assistant conductorship at the Metropolitan were Flagstad, Rethberg, Thorborg, Althouse and Hofmann. This would have been in the late 30s. And some of this achievement must be in the style of the interpretation we hear on this Red Seal release.

The interesting program notes are by Francis Robinson, the assistant manager of the Metropolitan Opera, whose radio talks on famous personalities of early days in opera are so attractive to music lovers. His Newport Festival lectures were among the best attended of the ancillary events of the gay days of last summer at Festival Field.

THREE more of the "Immortal Performances" series in the RCA Victrola catalogue are available. Toscanini is the co[illegible] ductor and the orchestra [illegible] Symphony. I am e[illegible] ful for the [illegible] includ[illegible]

SINGHAMTON PRESS
Saturday, August 24, 1968

★ ★ ★

TO RECOVER from the shocks which, by the way, are tolerable and at times stimulating, you can turn to Erich Leinsdorf conducting Wagner, with the Boston Symphony.

The pieces are the overtures of "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" and the preludes of "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger."

Leinsdorf's way with Wagner is highly invocative, as everyone must know by now. It's at its best here. (RCA Victor-3011.)

★ ★ ★

HIS CURRENT feelings for Brahms are also compelling, as judged from Brahm's 4th symphony also recorded with the Boston Symphony (RCA Victor-3010.

In this invocative musicianship category are Georges [illegible] conducting the New [illegible] in Sibelius' 5th [illegible] Victor-2996) [illegible]

[illegible], (from [illegible] intermezzo No. [illegible] Op. 76) the Caprice [illegible] in C sharp minor. An interesting assortment which every pianist should play.

ANOTHER RCA release

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800
JUN 23 1968
New England Newsclip

THE INDIANAPOLIS NEWS
D. 197,305
JUN 19 1968

RECORD NEWS WORLD

from "Othello," corresponding to Verdi's more familiar setting; and the pyrotechnics of the big "Tancredi" scene.

A new stack of Boston Symphony Orchestra recordings, conducted by Eric Leinsdorf, feature Beethoven, Wagner, Dvorak and Ginastera. Wagner's overtures to "Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger (LM-3011) tend to waddle around showing their heavy German brass bottoms under Leinsdorf's direction.

With Beethoven's First Piano Concerto (LM-3013), actually his second in date of composing, the listener wishes Leinsdorf could match the glowing poetry of the soloist, Artur Rubinstein. The humanity of Rubinstein's second movement is the accomplishment of an artist rich in living, understanding in musicianship.

Dvorak's Symphony No. 6, once numbered as No. 1, and his second and eighth Slavonic dances make an attractive package (LM-3017) all nicely balanced musically by Leinsdorf. Jaoa Carlos Martins is soloist in Ginastera's Piano Concerto (1961) coupled with the same composer's less taxing orchestra Variaciones Concertantes (LM-3029).

The performance is less exciting than Hilde Somer's performance a season ago with conductor Izler Solomon a[illegible] the Indianapolis Sympho[illegible] Orchestra but "living [illegible] ence" does make a diff[illegible] The music itself is a[illegible] able synthesis of in[illegible] Bartok, Berg, W[illegible] vinsky — but [illegible] Ginastera's ov[illegible] feel — tropi[illegible] Both num[illegible] etudes f[illegible] brilliant[illegible]

On [illegible] has [illegible] A[illegible] i[illegible]

100.

The Cleveland Press
D. 389,695

AUG 27 1968

CLASSICAL RECORDS

Erich Leinsdorf Stars in Beethoven, Wagner

By TOM VILLELLA

Erich Leinsdorf, the volatile music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and an artist whose imminent retirement plagues the Boston administration and subscribers alike, is no stranger to the unusual.

When barely 26, he replaced an ailing Artur Bodansky in a Met performance of "Die Walkuere." The star line-up that night—Jan. 21, 1938—would have staggered a less gifted individual.

Besides the great Kirsten Flagstead, the audience applauded the voices of Elisabeth Rethberg, Kerstin Thorborg, Paul Althouse, Emanuel List, and Ludwig Hofmann.

LEINSDORF, IN FULL COMMAND OF his orchestra and the million dollar resources singing on stage, reaped Toscanini-like reviews. He went on to become a firm part of the Met. He also conducted the Cleveland Orchestra for a brief period.

Today, with his Boston retirement announced due to "overwork," RCA Victor is faced with a backlog of Leinsdorf recordings.

Once the Toscanini disciple is absent from the podium, it is reasonable to expect a drop in Boston Symphony record sales. Thus, RCA's rush to place as many discs before the public prior to Leinsdorf's departure.

The Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 1, with the octogenarian miracle, Artur Rubinstein, in full possession of his magical interpretive powers, is heard on LSC-3013. It is a magnificent recording triumph for both artists.

It's Beethoven again, this time the Symphony No. 2, on LSC-3032. This prelude to the "Eroica" has its own beauty and charm. Here, in this energetic reading, Leinsdorf's orchestra glows.

The flip side has selections from "The Creatures of Prometheus." In addition to the well-known overture, the listener is rewarded with the Act II Adagio and Finale, and brief passages from the Pastorale (No. 10) and the allegro section of No. 11 (Andante).

"Leinsdorf Conducts Wagner," on LSC-3011, is more concerned with musical values than sonic splendor. Although, sonically, there is plenty to rave about, it is the maestro's treatment of Wagner's overtures and preludes that compels attention.

Included are the overtures to "Tannhauser," and "The Flying Dutchman." The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and "Tristan and Isolde" fill the remaining portion of the LP. In this issue, the Tristan prelude is sans the famous "Liebestod." The conductor insisted upon using Wagner' original ending for concert hall use.

The New York critics have heaped an array of superlatives on Alberto Ginaster's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra played by Joao Carlos Martins, a pianist who practically grew up with the work.

This contemporary work, available on LSC-3029 with Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, is interesting, colorful and certainly inventive.

It's also noisy, bombastic and, after three hearings, a work which leaves me cold.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1968

WAGNER: Overtures: Der fliegende Holländer; Tannhäuser; Preludes: Tristan und Isolde; Die Meistersinger

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA RED SEAL LM 3011 or LSC 3011, $5.79.

When Theodore Thomas was conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and first received the orchestra parts of The Ride of the Valkyries, he started rehearsals with a session for strings alone. The experience, he reported, was sheer disaster. Only when he played the score with full orchestra, blending the difficult string parts into the sonorous whole, did the music emerge intelligibly.

The notoriously monotonous violin figuration in the climax of the Tannhäuser Overture might serve as another case in point: it must be played with some degree of chiaroscuro. With the magnificent Boston Symphony at his disposal, Erich Leinsdorf projects the literal text of such a passage with awe-inspiring accuracy—but at the expense of both tempo and musical line. More drama and less ponderous precision in both of the early Overtures here would have been welcome. Again, in the Tristan Prelude (here offered without the Liebestod and with Wagner's concert ending) emphasis on details and languid tempos do nothing to convey either inner tension or true feeling of climax. Of the four pieces on the record, the Prelude to Die Meistersinger fares best, though it is more pompous than celebrative. P.H.

CLASSICAL

LEINSDORF CONDUCTS WAGNER—Boston Symphony. RCA Victor Red Seal LSC 3011 ($)

Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony are in top form with warhorse Wagner repertoire—Overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" and preludes to "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger." Leinsdorf and Wagner are a happy combination.

WAGNER: "Der fliegende Holländer"—Overture; "Die Meistersinger"—Prelude to Act I; "Tristan und Isolde"—Prelude to Act I (Concert Version); "Tannhäuser"—Overture (Dresden Version); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-3011 or Stereo LSC-3011, $5.79. (10, 9¾, 11¾, 13½ mins.)

⑧IT has been such a very long time since most of us have heard the Tristan Prelude with Wagner's concert ending that I think we might do well to recall, on this occasion, what Sir Donald Tovey had to say about it in his Essays in Musical Analysis: "Of all excerpts from Wagner's later operas, this suffers least from adaptation to the concert-room—except indeed when it is welded together with the arrangement of Isolde's Liebestod, which is in a totally different group of keys and only destroys the impression. . . .But Wagner has furnished three most convincing pages of exquisite scoring and subtle rhythm to round off this Vorspiel in its own proper key [A major-minor], which makes it all the more surprising and regrettable that it is so seldom heard alone with this finish."

One might add that, although the final harmonic resolution of the score is introduced therein, the exact duplicate of these three pages is not to be heard in the entire opera. What we have is roughly analogous to the end of the Holländer Overture, where the Redemption motive is lightly sketched in by way of a resolving coda. What we get with the now all-familiar Prelude and Liebestod concoction is a simply incredible piling-up of Mount Pelion upon Mount Ossa. Tovey called it "a monstrosity"—one whose unthinking acceptance has contributed and is contributing (a) to "the destruction of all critical standards of composition" and (b) to the delusion that Wagner's mind was "a mush" like our own, instead of one by which he composed for his revolutionary Tristan und Isolde a Prelude "as coherent and as exact in its proportions as any movement by Bach."

Now, referring briefly to the common coupling of Prelude and Liebestod, Francis Robinson (Assistant Manager of the Metropolitan Opera) writes in the present record liner: "This is incorrect, Mr. Leinsdorf maintains, since the Liebestod is a vocal number. Wagner wrote an ending to the Prelude for use in the concert hall. . .and early in his career Mr. Leinsdorf hunted it down." (A familiar situation indeed, having to hunt for a beautiful original when sham pastiches are everywhere at hand!) This is not to say that Leinsdorf has never recorded the Prelude-Liebestod amalgam himself. He has; but that was on the Capitol label, so RCA Victor should worry. Nonetheless, as Robinson does point out, Leinsdorf is also a stanch adherent of uncut Wagner in the opera house—e.g., he was responsible for the first complete "Ring" at the Met in 17 years—so his credentials as a musicianly musician are still pretty good.

Appropriately his Tristan Prelude, which is very moving, shares side two with a playing of the original Dresden version of the Tannhäuser Overture—another thing I would like to hear much more often. I always feel fobbed-off when the wind and brass music of the Pilgrim's Chorus fails to come back, accompanied in the strings by what Wagner aptly described as "that whirring and murmuring in the air, which only now sounded like the horrible wail of the damned, [giving] way to more joyful strains." Leinsdorf's Holländer may not be quite the most dramatic in memory, nor his Meistersinger quite the most commanding; but these are solid interpretations, and far better than average. All are heard in a rich, deep sound with much prominence given to the soloistic bits for the bass tuba.

In short, here is that rarity: a thoroughly artistic all-Wagner disc. —J.D.

The American Record Guide September, 1968

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,973 SUN. 306,989

JUN 16 1968

Erich Leinsdorf
...plays Wagner

ERICH LEINSDORF, the man who learned about Wagner as assistant conductor to Toscanini at German festivals before starting his career as conductor, displays those scholarly qualities with the Boston orchestra in a program of Wagner's music on a new RCA Victor LP entitled "Leinsdorf Conducts Wagner" (LSC 3011). Dramatic tension and excitement congeal from the Leinsdorf readings of a well-balanced program which includes overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" and the preludes to Acts I of "Die Meistersinger" and "Tristan and Isolde," respectively.

ALSO IMPRESSIVE is the dedicated artistry of Felix Ayo and his fellows of I Musici in a

By RUTH TRIPP

(RCA-LSC-3011) features two important musical names, Wagner and Leinsdorf. The "aristocrat of orchestras," as all RCA labels proclaim, plays under Erich Leinsdorf's direction and in the best Boston Symphony tradition we hear overtures from "Tannhauser" and "The Flying Dutchman" as well as the Preludes to "Die Meistersinger" and to "Tristan and Isolde."

Leinsdorf's authoritative manner with his Wagner scores comes from direct operatic experience on the Metropolitan Opera Podium in the early days of his career. He was within two weeks of being 26 when he was called on to replace Artur Bodansky who was ill. Singers during his tenure of an assistant conductorship at the Metropolitan were Flagstad, Rethberg, Thorborg, Althouse and Hofmann. This would have been in the late 30s. And some of this achievement must be in the style of the interpretation we hear on this Red Seal release.

The interesting program notes are by Francis Robinson, the assistant manager of the Metropolitan Opera, whose radio talks on famous personalities of early days in opera are so attractive to music lovers. His Newport Festival lectures were among the best attended of the ancillary events of the gay days of last summer at Festival Field.

THREE more of the "Immortal Performances" series in the RCA Victrola catalogue are available. Toscanini is the co[illegible]ductor and the orchestra [illegible] Symphony. I am e[illegible]ful for the [illegible] includ[illegible]

SINGHAMTON PRESS
Saturday, August 24, 1968

★ ★ ★

TO RECOVER from the shocks which, by the way, are tolerable and at times stimulating, you can turn to Erich Leinsdorf conducting Wagner, with the Boston Symphony.

The pieces are the overtures of "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" and the preludes of "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger."

Leinsdorf's way with Wagner is highly invocative, as everyone must know by now. It's at its best here. (RCA Victor-3011.)

★ ★ ★

HIS CURRENT feelings for Brahms are also compelling, as judged from Brahm's 4th symphony also recorded with the Boston Symphony (RCA Victor-3010.

In this invocative musicianship category are Georges [illegible] conducting the New [illegible] in Sibelius' 5th [illegible] Victor-2996) [illegible]

[illegible] (from [illegible] intermezzo No. [illegible] Op. 76) the Caprice [illegible] in C sharp minor. An interesting assortment which every pianist should play.

ANOTHER RCA release

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
[illegible] 204,800

JUN 23 1968

New England Newsclip

THE INDIANAPOLIS NEWS
D. 197,305

JUN 19 1968

RECORD NEWS WORLD

from "Othello," corresponding to Verdi's more familiar setting; and the pyrotechnics of the big "Tancredi" scene.

A new stack of Boston Symphony Orchestra recordings, conducted by Eric Leinsdorf, feature Beethoven, Wagner, Dvorak and Ginastera. Wagner's overtures to "Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger (LM-3011) tend to waddle around showing their heavy German brass bottoms under Leinsdorf's direction.

With Beethoven's First Piano Concerto (LM-3013), actually his second in date of composing, the listener wishes Leinsdorf could match the glowing poetry of the soloist, Artur Rubinstein. The humanity of Rubinstein's second movement is the accomplishment of an artist rich in living, understanding in musicianship.

Dvorak's Symphony No. 6, once numbered as No. 1, and his second and eighth Slavonic dances make an attractive package (LM-3017) all nicely balanced musically by Leinsdorf. Jaoa Carlos Martins is soloist in Ginastera's Piano Concerto (1961) coupled with the same composer's less taxing orchestra Variaciones Concertantes (LM-3029).

The performance is less exciting than Hilde Somer's performance a season ago with conductor Izler Solomon a[illegible] the Indianapolis Symph[illegible] Orchestra but "living [illegible]ence" does make a diff[illegible] The music itself is a [illegible]able synthesis of in[illegible] Bartok, Berg, W[illegible]vinsky — but Ginastera's ow[illegible] feel — tropi[illegible] Both num[illegible] etudes f[illegible] brilliant[illegible]

On has Ar[illegible] i[illegible]

boston arts fm program guide

MARCH

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, Boston Symphony Orchestra

Minneapolis Tribune
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 238,776 SUN. 668,944

DEC 8 1968

CLASSICAL

In RCA's recent recording of Mozart's great comic opera COSI FAN TUTTE (LSC-6416) you get exceptionally strong and musical singers in all six parts. This results in beautiful solo singing and ensemble work (even more important) to match it.

All the singers except Tatiana Troyanos (Dorabella) who is with the Hamburg State Opera, are from the Metropolitan Opera. The others are Leontyne Price as Fiordiligi, Sherrill Milnes as Guglielmo, George Shirley as Ferrando, Judith Raskin as Despina and Ezio Flagello as Don Alfonso.

The seventh member of this star-studded cast is Erich Leinsdorf, who makes excellent music out of the most important and gratifying score with the New Philharmonia Orchestra. You'll seldom hear a faster nor a more solid Cosi overture.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 516,640 SUN. 936,135

DEC 8 1968

of all the excellent recorded sound and the quality of the cast, it seems like music that needs more involved performers.

Erich Leinsdorf leads a new version of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" with the New Philharmonia and singers from the Metropolitan Opera (RCA 6416).

Leinsdorf's pacing is tight and nervous. The overture sounds almost grim in its determined tempos, but the conductor knows how to balance orchestra with voice and much of the singing is carried off with the right Mozartean spirit. Leinsdorf conducts at the harpsichord and manages to preserve the feeling of ensemble and intimacy.

Leontyne Price sings Fiordiligi, a part in which her large voice is not comfortable, and Judith Raskin, as Despina, is in a role usually sung by coloratura sopranos. Her sense of comedy is sound enough and she manages the writing capably if not brilliantly.

George Shirley and Sherrill Milnes bring distinction to their roles and Tatiana Troyanos sings Dorabella with a voice full of colors and secure technique. Ezio Flagello is an engaging Alfonso and an incisive singer. RCA has captured sound and direction in a way to heighten the theatrical quality of this reading.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,924 SUN. 1,131,752

SEP 7 1969

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 30,000

FEB 10 1969

101

RECORDS

DAVID HAMILTON

MOZART: Cosi fan tutte. Leontyne Price, Judith Raskin, Tatiana Troyanos, George Shirley, Sherill Milnes, Ezio Flagello; Ambrosian Opera Chorus, New Philharmonia Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. RCA LSC-6416, $23.16.

Le Nozze di Figaro. Gundula Janowitz, Edith Mathis, Tatiana Troyanos, Hermann Prey, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, et al.; Chorus & Orchestra of the German Opera, Berlin, Karl Böhm, conductor. Deutsche Grammophon 139276/9, $23.16.

Despite one's initial qualms that the cast might be more suitable for, say, Verdi's Luisa Miller, Leinsdorf's Cosi turns out to be an impressive example of his structural grasp. Particularly striking is the careful attention to transitions between recitatives and arias or ensembles and to the pacing of recitatives, so that the opera really "plays," with a long-range sense of dramatic and musical progression, even though only two of the singers (Raskin and Flagello) offer particularly vivid characterizations. The minimal tempo inflection (within individual numbers) that aids this continuity also permits less local detail, but this is partially offset by the mellifluous and rhythmically poised orchestral playing (notably from the winds). On the vocal side, Price's Fiordiligi is rather deficient in range, intonation and agility; the others are quite satisfactory. For the first time on records, the opera is performed absolutely complete.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425

JUL 20 1969

tone might have been more resonant.

Erich Leinsdorf made a record of music of Richard Strauss some years ago, directing the Philharmonia Orchestra in the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome," the symphonic poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Leinsdorf's own orchestral suite from the opera "Die Frau Ohne Schatten." Originally issued on Capitol, it has now been reissued on the budget-priced Seraphim line (S 60097, $2.50).

It is difficult to understand some of Leinsdorf's comments on "Frau." He states it is four and a half hours long, which is untrue; he feels there are too many major characters, which is also untrue when compared with many other accepted major operas; and he also feels that "the final result (of the opera) on the operatic stage is quite monstrous," whatever that means.

Regardless, Leinsdorf has selected some of the more imposing moments from the opera in his 19-minute suite. This doesn't begin to do justice to Strauss's masterpiece, even though it is very well played.

Seraphim has also reissued Leopold Stokowski's recording with the French National Radio Orchestra of a collection of Impressionistic music, consisting from "Images" of "Nuages," and

Boston Symphony still RCA stalwart

By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

RECORD REVIEWS

Although RCA has renewed its association with the Philadelphia Orchestra, it is obvious that the label has lost no interest in its other prime orchestral property, The Boston Symphony.

Save for one recording done for Columbia in 1934, the Bostonians have been Red Seal stalwarts since 1916 and like their Quaker City counterparts, they have made recorded history — first under Karl Muck, then under Serge Koussevitzky, followed by Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and now under Erich Leinsdorf soon to be followed by William Steinberg.

In an unprecedented release of seven albums (the Philadelphians were launched with six in January), the Boston orchestra completely dominates RCA's August lists. It goes without saying that this "Aristocrat of Orchestras" is one of the world's peerless ensembles. Its playing adheres to the highest of standards, and its virtuosity and versatility probably remain unmatched anywhere.

Six of the new issues are directed by Leinsdorf, and the repertoire covers a wide area. The rarely heard Scharwenka Piano Concerto No. 1 is played by Earl Wild (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3080), while Prokofieff's Fifth Piano Concerto has the prodigious John Browning as soloist (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3121) with Weill's "Kleine Dreigroschermusik" as a tantalizing orchestral companion.

Mozart's Symphony No. 36 in C is coupled with the No. 39 in E-Flat (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3097), and four at Beethoven's symphonies have been newly-recorded. Symphony No. 1 shares an LP, with Symphony No. 8 (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3098), while an ambitious two-disc package (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 7055) contains the Ninth Symphony (with soloists Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo, and Sherill Milnes with the Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus, the Fifth Symphony, and Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" in which Milnes serves as narrator. All of this makes for a peculiar combination, though the value is apparent.

Brahms is represented by his "German Requiem" with Montserrat Caballe and Milnes with the New England Conservatory Chorus (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 7054). The fourth side of the two-record set is given over to the composer's Vier Ernste Gesaenge" with Milnes as soloist and Leinsdorf as his piano accompanist.

Finally, Georges Pretre makes his recorded debut with the orchestra in yet another reading of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique" (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3096).

Boston occupies the remainder of the RCA August list as well. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players are featured in a three-disc album which holds Schubert's Piano Quintet in A ("Trout"), Brahms' Trio in B for Piano, Violin, and Cello; Poulenc's Sextet for Piano, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon, and Horn; Webern's Concerto for Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, Trumpet, Trombone, Violin, Viola, and Piano Martinu's Nonet for Flure, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn Bassoon, Violin, Viola, Cello, and Double Bass; and Dahl's Duettino Concentrate a 1966 work for Flute and Percussion (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 6189). Wide-ranging would be the understatement of the year.

The Boston Pops hasn't been forgotten either Guitarist Chet Atkins makes a return appearance in an enterprise somewhat coyly titled "Chet Picks on the Pops" (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3104).

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, August 24, 1969

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 46,000

JUL 1969

MOZART. Cosi Fan Tutte. Price, s. Troyanos, ms. Raskin, s. Shirley, t. Milnes, b. Flagello, bs. Ambrosian Singers. New Philharmonia O, Leinsdorf, cond. Four discs. RCA LSC 6416, $23.92

For some reason Cosi Fan Tutte has not done so well on records as the other Mozart masterpieces. This star-studded cast promises something better, but I am afraid I find the set disappointing. The performance needs a general tightening up and an injection of spirit, which is the conductor's responsibility. Of course, there is good singing, but . . .

Records

Leinsdorf's Message Could Hinge on Leinsdorf's Medium

By Peter Gorner

"MR. LEINSDORF'S conducting of the orchestra was of no small aid to the protagonists on the stage. He kept the accompaniment alive and most soft all the way thru, a beautiful job. Naturally, since singing was the subject of the evening, it didn't occur to anyone to offer the conductor even a teensy-weensy curtain call."

Erich Leinsdorf has just ended his engagement as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while the above review refers to a 1943 production of "Die Walkuere" at the Met, its message parallels the present: after seven years in Boston, a quiet departure with no pomp of any circumstance. Leinsdorf's membership in the "World's Greatest Conductors" club has seldom been questioned, but he has not inspired any cults either.

When he came to Boston in 1962, he promptly proceeded to change the orchestra's Franco-Russian orientation. Where Charles Munch had been an easygoing, inspirational boss, Leinsdorf was the opposite—methodical, thoro, and demanding. His critics, including some of his players, felt his approach to be too clinical. One wrote that he seemed to regard a score as a series of problems to be solved rather than emotions to be conveyed.

Leinsdorf said he resigned from Boston because of overwork. "Nobody in the American scene has worked more than I have with the B. S. O. I'm over my 600th concert." His successor is William Steinberg, and since the two have much in common, a holding operation would seem to be in order.

Both men are precisionists and literalists, both represent the modern anti-romantic approach to music. Steinberg came up the classical German way, rising from vocal coach to conductor. His baton technique is sober, objective, and undemonstrative. ["The more they dance, the quieter I stand."] He was invited to America by Toscanini.

Leinsdorf, a superb pianist, became a Toscanini protegy [and Bruno Walter's assistant] at Salzburg. He came to the Met in 1938, and fate placed the entire German repertoire of that house in his hands when he was only 27 years old. The reigning Wagnerians, Kirsten Flagstad and Lauritz Melchior, did not like this a bit ["He's a genius, but immature"], but management stood fast, Leinsdorf learned fast, and all was well.

After four years in the pit, he mounted the podium and became music director of the Cleveland Orchestra. The war interrupted, and upon his discharge, he assumed the helm of the Rochester Philharmonic for nine years. In 1957, he was appointed music director of the New York City opera.

That same year, Rudolf Bing chose him to fill the newly-created post of music consultant at the Met, thus completing the operatic circle, and he stayed there until Boston beckoned in 1962.

His discipline and musicianship have stood him in good stead, as in 1960 when he pinch-hit for an ailing Fritz Reiner and conducted the concert and recording [Brahms Second Concerto] which introduced Sviatoslav Richter to Chicago Symphony audiences.

Leinsdorf has made more than 65 recordings with the Boston Symphony for RCA which have been rather taken for granted. I sat down with a late batch and tried to ascertain why.

The music included Beethoven symphonies [Nos. 1, 2, 5, 6, and 9], the Mozart "Linz" and 39th, the Dvorak Sixth and Prokofieff's Second. The Beethoven probably will constitute the traditional legacy afforded the conductor of a major orchestra. Expect to see them issued as a complete set.

Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony.

With the Beethoven legacies of Toscanini and Von Karajan in mind, I listened in vain for a discernible fingerprint, something which would characterize Erich Leinsdorf's Beethoven. Eventually, I caught on. The absence of a trademark is Leinsdorf's trademark.

Each performance is sublimely sculpted and beautifully wrought, a lasting tribute to Leinsdorf's awesome preparation and attention to detail. Such perfection may be attained in the cutting-room when it never could be reached in the concert hall.

The Boston Symphony remains an incomparable instrument, 104 men breathe as one. In the Mozart, the strings play with lightness and complete precision both at quick tempos and at the softest possible dynamic levels. The complete agreement of the winds and brass regarding intonation, phrasing, and articulation to the point of which notes are to be slurred and which tongued, serves as a model of accomplishment. The way forcefulness in the Beethoven is never achieved at the expense of litheness, the clashing steel and vibrant plasticity in the Prokofieff, the melting songs in the Dvorak, these, I think, are the essence of Leinsdorf.

The RCA engineers have afforded the conductor their unique and brilliant clarity of sound, joining with the orchestra in presenting recordings which bow to none in excellence.

boston arts fm program guide

MARCH

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, Boston Symphony Orchestra

Minneapolis Tribune
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN
D. 288,770 SUN. 668,944
DEC 8 1968

CLASSICAL

In RCA's recent recording of Mozart's great comic opera COSI FAN TUTTE (LSC-6416) you get exceptionally strong and musical singers in all six parts. This results in beautiful solo singing and ensemble work (even more important) to match it.

All the singers except Tatiana Troyanos (Dorabella) who is with the Hamburg State Opera, are from the Metropolitan Opera. The others are Leontyne Price as Fiordiligi, Sherrill Milnes as Guglielmo, George Shirley as Ferrando, Judith Raskin as Despina and Ezio Flagello as Don Alfonso.

The seventh member of this star-studded cast is Erich Leinsdorf, who makes excellent music out of the most important and gratifying score with the New Philharmonia Orchestra. You'll seldom hear a faster nor a more solid Cosi overture.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 516,640 SUN. 936,135
DEC 8 1968

of all the excellent recorded sound and the quality of the cast, it seems like music that needs more involved performers.

Erich Leinsdorf leads a new version of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" with the New Philharmonia and singers from the Metropolitan Opera (RCA 6416).

Leinsdorf's pacing is tight and nervous. The overture sounds almost grim in its determined tempos, but the conductor knows how to balance orchestra with voice and much of the singing is carried off with the right Mozartean spirit. Leinsdorf conducts at the harpsichord and manages to preserve the feeling of ensemble and intimacy.

Leontyne Price sings Fiordiligi, a part in which her large voice is not comfortable, and Judith Raskin, as Despina, is in a role usually sung by coloratura sopranos. Her sense of comedy is sound enough and she manages the writing capably if not brilliantly.

George Shirley and Sherrill Milnes bring distinction to their roles and Tatiana Troyanos sings Dorabella with a voice full of colors and secure technique. Ezio Flagello is an engaging Alfonso and an incisive singer. RCA has captured sound and direction in a way to heighten the theatrical quality of this reading.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 20,000
FEB 10 1969

RECORDS

DAVID HAMILTON

MOZART: Cosi fan tutte. Leontyne Price, Judith Raskin, Tatiana Troyanos, George Shirley, Sherill Milnes, Ezio Flagello; Ambrosian Opera Chorus, New Philharmonia Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. RCA LSC-6416, $23.16.

Le Nozze di Figaro. Gundula Janowitz, Edith Mathis, Tatiana Troyanos, Hermann Prey, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, et al.; Chorus & Orchestra of the German Opera, Berlin, Karl Böhm, conductor. Deutsche Grammophon 139276/9, $23.16.

Despite one's initial qualms that the cast might be more suitable for, say, Verdi's Luisa Miller, Leinsdorf's Cosi turns out to be an impressive example of his structural grasp. Particularly striking is the careful attention to transitions between recitatives and arias or ensembles and to the pacing of recitatives, so that the opera really "plays," with a long-range sense of dramatic and musical progression, even though only two of the singers (Raskin and Flagello) offer particularly vivid characterizations. The minimal tempo inflection (within individual numbers) that aids this continuity also permits less local detail, but this is partially offset by the mellifluous and rhythmically poised orchestral playing (notably from the winds). On the vocal side, Price's Fiordiligi is rather deficient in range, intonation and agility; the others are quite satisfactory. For the first time on records, the opera is performed absolutely complete.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425
JUL 20 1969

tone might have been more resonant.

Erich Leinsdorf made a record of music of Richard Strauss some years ago, directing the Philharmonia Orchestra in the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome," the symphonic poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Leinsdorf's own orchestral suite from the opera "Die Frau Ohne Schatten." Originally issued on Capitol, it has now been reissued on the budget-priced Seraphim line (S 60097, $2.50).

It is difficult to understand some of Leinsdorf's comments on "Frau." He states it is four and a half hours long, which is untrue; he feels there are too many major characters, which is also untrue when compared with many other accepted major operas; and he also feels that "the final result (of the opera) on the operatic stage is quite monstrous," whatever that means.

Regardless, Leinsdorf has selected some of the more imposing moments from the opera in his 19-minute suite. This doesn't begin to do justice to Strauss's masterpiece, even though it is very well played.

Seraphim has also reissued Leopold Stokowski's recording with the French National Radio Orchestra of a collection of Impressionistic music, consisting from "Images" of ...les," and

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,924 SUN. 1,131,752
SEP 7 1969

Records

Boston Symphony still RCA stalwart

By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

RECORD REVIEWS

Although RCA has renewed its association with the Philadelphia Orchestra, it is obvious that the label has lost no interest in its other prime orchestral property, The Boston Symphony.

Save for one recording done for Columbia in 1934, the Bostonians have been Red Seal stalwarts since 1916 and like their Quaker City counterparts, they have made recorded history — first under Karl Muck, then under Serge Koussevitzky, followed by Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and now under Erich Leinsdorf soon to be followed by William Steinberg.

In an unprecedented release of seven albums (the Philadelphians were launched with six in January), the Boston orchestra completely dominates RCA's August lists. It goes without saying that this "Aristocrat of Orchestras" is one of the world's peerless ensembles. Its playing adheres to the highest of standards, and its virtuosity and versatility probably remain unmatched anywhere.

Six of the new issues are directed by Leinsdorf, and the repertoire covers a wide area. The rarely heard Scharwenka Piano Concerto No. 1 is played by Earl Wild (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3080), while Prokofieff's Fifth Piano Concerto has the prodigious John Browning as soloist (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3121) with Weill's "Kleine Dreigroschermusik" as a tantalizing orchestral companion.

Mozart's Symphony No. 36 in C is coupled with the No. 39 in E-Flat (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3097), and four at Beethoven's symphonies have been newly-recorded. Symphony No. 1 shares an LP, with Symphony No. 8 (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3098), while an ambitious two-disc package (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 7055) contains the Ninth Symphony (with soloists Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo, and Sherill Milnes with the Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus, the Fifth Symphony, and Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" in which Milnes serves as narrator. All of this makes for a peculiar combination, though the value is apparent.

Brahms is represented by his "German Requiem" with Montserrat Caballe and Milnes with the New England Conservatory Chorus (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 7054). The fourth side of the two-record set is given over to the composer's Vier Ernste Gesaenge" with Milnes as soloist and Leinsdorf as his piano accompanist.

Finally, Georges Pretre makes his recorded debut with the orchestra in yet another reading of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique" (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3096).

Boston occupies the remainder of the RCA August list as well. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players are featured in a three-disc album which holds Schubert's Piano Quintet in A ("Trout"), Brahms' Trio in B for Piano, Violin, and Cello; Poulenc's Sextet for Piano, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon, and Horn; Webern's Concerto for Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, Trumpet, Trombone, Violin, Viola, and Piano Martinu's Nonet for Flure, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn Bassoon, Violin, Viola, Cello, and Double Bass; and Dahl's Duettino Concentrate a 1966 work for Flute and Percussion (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 6189). Wide-ranging would be the understatement of the year.

The Boston Pops hasn't been forgotten either Guitarist Chet Atkins makes a return appearance in an enterprise somewhat coyly titled "Chet Picks on the Pops" (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3104).

SYRACUSE HERALD-JOURNAL
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
Sunday, Aug. 24, 1969

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 36,000
JUL 1969

MOZART. Cosi Fan Tutte. Price, s. Troyanos, ms. Raskin, s. Shirley, t. Milnes, b. Flagello, bs. Ambrosian Singers. New Philharmonia O, Leinsdorf, cond. Four discs. RCA LSC 6416, $23.92

For some reason Cosi Fan Tutte has not done so well on records as the other Mozart masterpieces. This star-studded cast promises something better, but I am afraid I find the set disappointing. The performance needs a general tightening up and an injection of spirit, which is the conductor's responsibility. Of course, there is good singing, but . . .

Leinsdorf's Message Could Hinge on Leinsdorf's Medium

By Peter Gorner

"MR. LEINSDORF'S conducting of the orchestra was of no small aid to the protagonists on the stage. He kept the accompaniment alive and most soft all the way thru, a beautiful job. Naturally, since singing was the subject of the evening, it didn't occur to anyone to offer the conductor even a teensy-weensy curtain call."

Erich Leinsdorf has just ended his engagement as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while the above review refers to a 1943 production of "Die Walkuere" at the Met, its message parallels the present: after seven years in Boston, a quiet departure with no pomp of any circumstance. Leinsdorf's membership in the "World's Greatest Conductors" club has seldom been questioned, but he has not inspired any cults either.

When he came to Boston in 1962, he promptly proceeded to change the orchestra's Franco-Russian orientation. Where Charles Munch had been an easygoing, inspirational boss, Leinsdorf was the opposite—methodical, thoro, and demanding. His critics, including some of his players, felt his approach to be too clinical. One wrote that he seemed to regard a score as a series of problems to be solved rather than emotions to be conveyed.

Leinsdorf said he resigned from Boston because of overwork. "Nobody in the American scene has worked more than I have with the B. S. O. I'm over my 600th concert." His successor is William Steinberg, and since the two have much in common, a holding operation would seem to be in order.

Both men are precisionists and literalists, both represent the modern anti-romantic approach to music. Steinberg came up the classical German way, rising from vocal coach to conductor. His baton technique is sober, objective, and undemonstrative. ["The more they dance, the quieter I stand."] He was invited to America by Toscanini.

Leinsdorf, a superb pianist, became a Toscanini protegy [and Bruno Walter's assistant] at Salzburg. He came to the Met in 1938, and fate placed the entire German repertoire of that house in his hands when he was only 27 years old. The reigning Wagnerians, Kirsten Flagstad and Lauritz Melchior, did not like this a bit ["He's a genius, but immature"], but management stood fast, Leinsdorf learned fast, and all was well.

After four years in the pit, he mounted the podium and became music director of the Cleveland Orchestra. The war interrupted, and upon his discharge, he assumed the helm of the Rochester Philharmonic for nine years. In 1957, he was appointed music director of the New York City opera.

That same year, Rudolf Bing chose him to fill the newly-created post of music consultant at the Met, thus completing the operatic circle, and he stayed there until Boston beckoned in 1962.

His discipline and musicianship have stood him in good stead, as in 1960 when he pinch-hit for an ailing Fritz Reiner and conducted the concert and recording [Brahms Second Concerto] which introduced Sviatoslav Richter to Chicago Symphony audiences.

Leinsdorf has made more than 65 recordings with the Boston Symphony for RCA which have been rather taken for granted. I sat down with a late batch and tried to ascertain why.

The music included Beethoven symphonies [Nos. 1, 2, 5, 6, and 9], the Mozart "Linz" and 39th, the Dvorak Sixth and Prokofieff's Second. The Beethoven probably will constitute the traditional legacy afforded the conductor of a major orchestra. Expect to see them issued as a complete set.

Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony.

With the Beethoven legacies of Toscanini and Von Karajan in mind, I listened in vain for a discernible fingerprint, something which would characterize Erich Leinsdorf's Beethoven. Eventually, I caught on. The absence of a trademark is Leinsdorf's trademark.

Each performance is sublimely sculpted and beautifully wrought, a lasting tribute to Leinsdorf's awesome preparation and attention to detail. Such perfection may be attained in the cutting-room when it never could be reached in the concert hall.

The Boston Symphony remains an incomparable instrument, 104 men breathe as one. In the Mozart, the strings play with lightness and complete precision both at quick tempos and at the softest possible dynamic levels. The complete agreement of the winds and brass regarding intonation, phrasing, and articulation to the point of which notes are to be slurred and which tongued, serves as a model of accomplishment. The way forcefulness in the Beethoven is never achieved at the expense of litheness, the clashing steel and vibrant plasticity in the Prokofieff, the melting songs in the Dvorak, these, I think, are the essence of Leinsdorf.

The RCA engineers have afforded the conductor their unique and brilliant clarity of sound, joining with the orchestra in presenting recordings which bow to none in excellence.

boston arts fm program guide

MARCH

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, Boston Symphony Orchestra

Minneapolis Tribune
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 238,776 SUN. 668,944
DEC 8 1968

CLASSICAL

In RCA's recent recording of Mozart's great comic opera COSI FAN TUTTE (LSC-6416) you get exceptionally strong and musical singers in all six parts. This results in beautiful solo singing and ensemble work (even more important) to match it.

All the singers except Tatiana Troyanos (Dorabella) who is with the Hamburg State Opera, are from the Metropolitan Opera. The others are Leontyne Price as Fiordiligi, Sherrill Milnes as Guglielmo, George Shirley as Ferrando, Judith Raskin as Despina and Ezio Flagello as Don Alfonso.

The seventh member of this star-studded cast is Erich Leinsdorf, who makes excellent music out of the most important and gratifying score with the New Philharmonia Orchestra. You'll seldom hear a faster nor a more solid Cosi overture.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 516,640 SUN. 936,135
DEC 8 1968

...of all the excellent recorded sound and the quality of the cast, it seems like music that needs more involved performers.

Erich Leinsdorf leads a new version of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" with the New Philharmonia and singers from the Metropolitan Opera (RCA 6416).

Leinsdorf's pacing is tight and nervous. The overture sounds almost grim in its determined tempos, but the conductor knows how to balance orchestra with voice and much of the singing is carried off with the right Mozartean spirit. Leinsdorf conducts at the harpsichord and manages to preserve the feeling of ensemble and intimacy.

Leontyne Price sings Fiordiligi, a part in which her large voice is not comfortable, and Judith Raskin, as Despina, is in a role usually sung by coloratura sopranos. Her sense of comedy is sound enough and she manages the writing capably if not brilliantly.

George Shirley and Sherrill Milnes bring distinction to their roles and Tatiana Troyanos sings Dorabella with a voice full of colors and secure technique. Ezio Flagello is an engaging Alfonso and an incisive singer. RCA has captured sound and direction in a way to heighten the theatrical quality of this reading.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 30,000
FEB 10 1969

RECORDS

DAVID HAMILTON

MOZART: Così fan tutte. Leontyne Price, Judith Raskin, Tatiana Troyanos, George Shirley, Sherill Milnes, Ezio Flagello; Ambrosian Opera Chorus, New Philharmonia Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. RCA LSC-6416, $23.16.

Le Nozze di Figaro. Gundula Janowitz, Edith Mathis, Tatiana Troyanos, Hermann Prey, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, et al.; Chorus & Orchestra of the German Opera, Berlin, Karl Böhm, conductor. Deutsche Grammophon 139276/9, $23.16.

Despite one's initial qualms that the cast might be more suitable for, say, Verdi's Luisa Miller, Leinsdorf's Così turns out to be an impressive example of his structural grasp. Particularly striking is the careful attention to transitions between recitatives and arias or ensembles and to the pacing of recitatives, so that the opera really "plays," with a long-range sense of dramatic and musical progression, even though only two of the singers (Raskin and Flagello) offer particularly vivid characterizations. The minimal tempo inflection (within individual numbers) that aids this continuity also permits less local detail, but this is partially offset by the mellifluous and rhythmically poised orchestral playing (notably from the winds). On the vocal side, Price's Fiordiligi is rather deficient in range, intonation and agility; the others are quite satisfactory. For the first time on records, the opera is performed absolutely complete.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425
JUL 20 1969

tone might have been more resonant.

Erich Leinsdorf made a record of music of Richard Strauss some years ago, directing the Philharmonia Orchestra in the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome," the symphonic poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Leinsdorf's own orchestral suite from the opera "Die Frau Ohne Schatten." Originally issued on Capitol, it has now been reissued on the budget-priced Seraphim line (S 60097, $2.50).

It is difficult to understand some of Leinsdorf's comments on "Frau." He states it is four and a half hours long, which is untrue; he feels there are too many major characters, which is also untrue when compared with many other accepted major operas; and he also feels that "the final result (of the opera) on the operatic stage is quite monstrous," whatever that means.

Regardless, Leinsdorf has selected some of the more imposing moments from the opera in his 19-minute suite. This doesn't begin to do justice to Strauss's masterpiece, even though it is very well played.

Seraphim has also reissued Leopold Stokowski's recording with the French National Radio Orchestra of a collection of Impressionistic music, consisting from "Images" of ...les," and

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,924 SUN. 1,131,752
SEP 7 1969

Boston Symphony still RCA stalwart

NE

By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

RECORD REVIEWS

Although RCA has renewed its association with the Philadelphia Orchestra, it is obvious that the label has lost no interest in its other prime orchestral property, The Boston Symphony.

Save for one recording done for Columbia in 1934, the Bostonians have been Red Seal stalwarts since 1916 and like their Quaker City counterparts, they have made recorded history — first under Karl Muck, then under Serge Koussevitzky, followed by Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and now under Erich Leinsdorf soon to be followed by William Steinberg.

In an unprecedented release of seven albums (the Philadelphians were launched with six in January), the Boston orchestra completely dominates RCA's August lists. It goes without saying that this "Aristocrat of Orchestras" is one of the world's peerless ensembles. Its playing adheres to the highest of standards, and its virtuosity and versatility probably remain unmatched anywhere.

Six of the new issues are directed by Leinsdorf, and the repertoire covers a wide area. The rarely heard Scharwenka Piano Concerto No. 1 is played by Earl Wild (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3080), while Prokofieff's Fifth Piano Concerto has the prodigious John Browning as soloist (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3121) with Weill's "Kleine Dreigroschermusik" as a tantalizing orchestral companion.

Mozart's Symphony No. 36 in C is coupled with the No. 39 in E-Flat (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3097), and four at Beethoven's symphonies have been newly-recorded. Symphony No. 1 shares an LP, with Symphony No. 8 (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3098), while an ambitious two-disc package (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 7055) contains the Ninth Symphony (with soloists Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo, and Sherill Milnes with the Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus, the Fifth Symphony, and Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" in which Milnes serves as narrator. All of this makes for a peculiar combination, though the value is apparent.

Brahms is represented by his "German Requiem" with Montserrat Caballe and Milnes with the New England Conservatory Chorus (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 7054). The fourth side of the two-record set is given over to the composer's Vier Ernste Gesaenge" with Milnes as soloist and Leinsdorf as his piano accompanist.

Finally, Georges Pretre makes his recorded debut with the orchestra in yet another reading of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique" (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3095).

Boston occupies the remainder of the RCA August list as well. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players are featured in a three-disc album which holds Schubert's Piano Quintet in A ("Trout"), Brahms' Trio in B for Piano, Violin, and Cello; Poulenc's Sextet for Piano, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon, and Horn; Webern's Concerto for Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, Trumpet, Trombone, Violin, Viola, and Piano Martinu's Nonet for Flure, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn Bassoon, Violin, Viola, Cello, and Double Bass; and Dahl's Duettino Concentrate a 1966 work for Flute and Percussion (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 6189). Wide-ranging would be the understatement of the year.

The Boston Pops hasn't been forgotten either Guitarist Chet Atkins makes a return appearance in an enterprise somewhat coyly titled "Chet Picks on the Pops" (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3104).

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, August 10, 1969

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 46,000
JUL 1969

MOZART. Cosi Fan Tutte. Price, s. Troyanos, ms. Raskin, s. Shirley, t. Milnes, b. Flagello, bs. Ambrosian Singers. New Philharmonia O, Leinsdorf, cond. Four discs. RCA LSC 6416, $23.92

For some reason Cosi Fan Tutte has not done so well on records as the other Mozart masterpieces. This star-studded cast promises something better, but I am afraid I find the set disappointing. The performance needs a general tightening up and an injection of spirit, which is the conductor's responsibility. Of course, there is good singing, but . . .

Records

Leinsdorf's Message Could Hinge on Leinsdorf's Medium

By Peter Gorner

"MR. LEINSDORF'S conducting of the orchestra was of no small aid to the protagonists on the stage. He kept the accompaniment alive and most soft all the way thru, a beautiful job. Naturally, since singing was the subject of the evening, it didn't occur to anyone to offer the conductor even a teensy-weensy curtain call."

Erich Leinsdorf has just ended his engagement as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while the above review refers to a 1943 production of "Die Walkuere" at the Met, its message parallels the present: after seven years in Boston, a quiet departure with no pomp of any circumstance. Leinsdorf's membership in the "World's Greatest Conductors" club has seldom been questioned, but he has not inspired any cults either.

When he came to Boston in 1962, he promptly proceeded to change the orchestra's Franco-Russian orientation. Where Charles Munch had been an easygoing, inspirational boss, Leinsdorf was the opposite—methodical, thoro, and demanding. His critics, including some of his players, felt his approach to be too clinical. One wrote that he seemed to regard a score as a series of problems to be solved rather than emotions to be conveyed.

Leinsdorf said he resigned from Boston because of overwork. "Nobody in the American scene has worked more than I have with the B. S. O. I'm over my 600th concert." His successor is William Steinberg, and since the two have much in common, a holding operation would seem to be in order.

Both men are precisionists and literalists, both represent the modern anti-romantic approach to music. Steinberg came up the classical German way, rising from vocal coach to conductor. His baton technique is sober, objective, and undemonstrative. ["The more they dance, the quieter I stand."] He was invited to America by Toscanini.

Leinsdorf, a superb pianist, became a Toscanini protegy [and Bruno Walter's assistant] at Salzburg. He came to the Met in 1938, and fate placed the entire German repertoire of that house in his hands when he was only 27 years old. The reigning Wagnerians, Kirsten Flagstad and Lauritz Melchior, did not like this a bit ["He's a genius, but immature"], but management stood fast, Leinsdorf learned fast, and all was well.

After four years in the pit, he mounted the podium and became music director of the Cleveland Orchestra. The war interrupted, and upon his discharge, he assumed the helm of the Rochester Philharmonic for nine years. In 1957, he was appointed music director of the New York City opera.

That same year, Rudolf Bing chose him to fill the newly-created post of music consultant at the Met, thus completing the operatic circle, and he stayed there until Boston beckoned in 1962.

His discipline and musicianship have stood him in good stead, as in 1960 when he pinch-hit for an ailing Fritz Reiner and conducted the concert and recording [Brahms Second Concerto] which introduced Sviatoslav Richter to Chicago Symphony audiences.

Leinsdorf has made more than 65 recordings with the Boston Symphony for RCA which have been rather taken for granted. I sat down with a late batch and tried to ascertain why.

The music included Beethoven symphonies [Nos. 1, 2, 5, 6, and 9], the Mozart "Linz" and 39th, the Dvorak Sixth and Prokofieff's Second. The Beethoven probably will constitute the traditional legacy afforded the conductor of a major orchestra. Expect to see them issued as a complete set.

Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony.

With the Beethoven legacies of Toscanini and Von Karajan in mind, I listened in vain for a discernible fingerprint, something which would characterize Erich Leinsdorf's Beethoven. Eventually, I caught on. The absence of a trademark is Leinsdorf's trademark.

Each performance is sublimely sculpted and beautifully wrought, a lasting tribute to Leinsdorf's awesome preparation and attention to detail. Such perfection may be attained in the cutting-room when it never could be reached in the concert hall.

The Boston Symphony remains an incomparable instrument, 104 men breathe as one. In the Mozart, the strings play with lightness and complete precision both at quick tempos and at the softest possible dynamic levels. The complete agreement of the winds and brass regarding intonation, phrasing, and articulation to the point of which notes are to be slurred and which tongued, serves as a model of accomplishment. The way forcefulness in the Beethoven is never achieved at the expense of litheness, the clashing steel and vibrant plasticity in the Prokofieff, the melting songs in the Dvorak, these, I think, are the essence of Leinsdorf.

The RCA engineers have afforded the conductor their unique and brilliant clarity of sound, joining with the orchestra in presenting recordings which bow to none in excellence.

102.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

JUN 1969

DEBUSSY: Images for Orchestra. BARBER: Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, cond. RCA Victrola VICS 1391, $2.50 [the Debussy from RCA Victor LSC 2282, 1958; the Barber from RCA Victor LM 2197, 1957].

Munch's forthright vigor and heady exuberance, while attractive qualities in themselves, are somewhat misplaced in Debussy's delicate tone poems where balanced sonority, linear clarity, and pliantly controlled rhythms are all important. These performances are, to put it bluntly, on the crude and heavy-handed side. Monteux's brilliantly conceived version on Philips is still the choice here, although a new Boulez reading due shortly from Columbia may prove a strong competitor.

After the Debussy, unsatisfactorily performed though it may be, Barber's Medea music sounds tawdry and obvious and the excellent, letter-perfect performance only points up the fact. Sonically, this disc is still absolutely resplendent.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

APR 24 1969

New England Newsclip

St. Sebastian" is a lengthy treatment of the story of the martyred "Archer of God." Debussy "ornamented" the drama with some of his finest music. To hear the work complete as a drama with music would take several hours. An alternate method is to hear the music only, but this lacks dramatic unity. Addition of a narrator in the provincially French manner inevitably distracts from the music. Several recordings have tried various approaches and usually run to two discs of music.

Charles Munch recorded over fifty minutes of this captivating music with the BSO, New England Conservatory Chorus and Phyllis Curtin, Florence Kopleff and Catherine Akos. This performance, once available in mono, is now released in stereo on Victroal (VICS 1404). Five excerpts are presented: The Court of Lilies, the Magic Chamber, The Council of False Gods, The Broken Laurel and Paradise. For the most part Munch is in complete sympathy with the demands placed upon his orchestra and the recording achieves the correct atmosphere for this romantic masterpiece. The disc surfaces are for this release quieter than any of Victrola's more expensive parent, RCA Red Seal with "miracle surface," of recent months, including the Berlioz reviewed above.

Leopold Stokowski's formance of Glie No. 3, sub metz"

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

AUG 1969

MOZART: Clarinet Concerto, in A Major (K. 622); Clarinet Quintet, in A Major (K. 581). Benny Goodman (clarinet); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch cond.; Boston Symphony String Quartet. RCA VICTROLA VICS 1402 $2.50.

Performance: Good quintet
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Okay

Jazz clarinetist Benny Goodman's third time around with the Mozart Clarinet Quintet in 1957 (his first two were with the Budapest Quartet on 78's and with the American Art Quartet on a 1952 Columbia LP) was his most easy-swinging, as though he and the BSO first-chair players had had a chance to work things out at leisure before the "moment of truth" with the recording microphones. In any event, this Victrola disc is the first stereo release of those performances of both the Quintet and the Concerto. In the concerto, Goodman seems a little less at ease, and it would hardly be honest to say that he and Munch match in nuance and vitality the top three of the dozen or so other versions listed in the Schwann catalog. Leister-Kubelik and De Peyer-Maag, among others, are potent competition. D. H.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 429,830

JUN 15 1969

Ravel: Bolero; Rapsodie Espagnole; "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2. Orchestre de Paris; Charles Munch, conductor (Angel).

Prokofiev: Twelve Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet." Boston Symphony Orchestra; Charles Munch, conductor (RCA Victrola).

The Ravel disc represents one of the very last recordings by the late Charles Munch. Always a fine interpreter of Ravel's music, he offers here one of the best "Boleros" to be found anywhere. Slow and steady-paced—it takes a full 17 minutes—it builds up gradually, in a manner that the composer himself would have applauded. He also presents a colorful "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2 and a sensitive "Rapsodie Espagnole." The orchestral performances are all first-rate.

The Boston Symphony record, an inexpensive reissue, affords a generous sampling from the three suites that Prokofiev arranged from his evening-length Ballet "Romeo and Juliet," being danced here by both the Royal and Stuttgart companies. The excerpts on this disc, however, are played roughly in the order in which they appear in the ballet. Munch's interpretation is clear but somewhat lacking in excitement.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

SEP 1969

PROKOFIEV: Romeo and Juliet, Op. 64 (excerpts). Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, cond. RCA Victrola VICS 1412, $2.50 [from RCA Victor LM 2110, 1957].

Prokofiev's three Romeo and Juliet Suites each form a satisfying symphonic entity, but since the ballet contains so much effective music, conductors usually prefer to excerpt the score according to their own tastes. Munch's chronological selection attempts to give a sequential digest of the ballet's plot and gradually intensifying mood; this looks good on paper, but the musical effect is something of a hodgepodge. The BSO plays well enough, although such "personality" music could use even more helpings of swagger, grace, and rhythmic verve. Until a good stereo version of the complete ballet comes along, Mitropoulos' colorful edition of highlights on Odyssey remains my first choice.

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, August 11, 1968

Mancinem... patra" and the non-operatic Notturno in Flat by Martucci.

On RCA's budget Victrola label, there is a not-to-be-missed collection of French works magnificiently played and sumptuously recorded. Charles Munch had fashioned the Boston Symphony into an authentic French orchestra by the time his career here was at mid-point. It is this expertise which is so very apparent in his readings of Ravel's "Bolero" and "La Valse," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Ibert's "Escales." So much beautiful music on a single disc (RCA Victrola Stereo VICS 1323, also mono) is almost too much to hope for.

Records in Review

Symphony Hall Favorites

By WILLIAM A. STORRER

Few Bostonians are not familiar with the achievements of Charles Munch in popularizing Berlioz in America. His recordings of the Fantastique symphony and Requiem are legendary. RCA's recording of the Requiem was a stunning showpiece of orchestral virtuosity. What can a new recording offer?

Well, Dr. Munch has again recorded the Requiem, for Deutsche Gramophon, with the Bavarian Radio Symphony and Chorus. It does offer a valid alternative to the BSO performance, notably brass that are playing on the same beat in the Dies Irae. In the RCA-Symphony Hall acoustic, the brass were bathed in reverberation, and their lack of synchronization therein disguised (it becomes painfully apparent in the monophonic issue). In the DGG set the brass sound together and the acoustic seems no less warm, if slightly less reverberant.

If there is any factor which tips the scale towards this DGG set it must be the singing of Peter Schreier in the Sanctus. This is "heavenly" music and it is sung in a "heavenly" tone and manner.

It certainly cannot sway all Bostonians to this new recording. Sentimentality will prevail and cause many to obtain Dr. Munch's version with our own BSO. The new set is less "spectacular," but more poetic, and the produce of a more relaxed and mature vision of the maestro. It is DGG SLPM 139264-5.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony is a Boston favorite, with Koussevitzky, Munch and Monteux all having recorded it in Symphony Hall. Only Koussevitzky's recording is not still in the catalog.

Lorin Maazel, however, has the distinction of having twice recorded this symphony, and I have no hesitation preferring his earlier DGG recording with the Berlin Philharmonic, now re-released on Heliodor HS 25081, over the London disc with the Vienna Philharmonic. The Berlin ensemble is more virtuosic that Vienna and temps Maazel to a too fast Allegro con Fuoco Finale, but elsewhere there is a greater sense of personal commitment, and the playing is in all but the second movement oboe solo more poetic, more satisfyingly lyrical. The acoustic places the orchestra at a distance, but the pianissimo playing sounds more natural than that of London's spotlighted closeup sound. I find this Heliodor release the most satisfying account of the Fourth since Monteux last conducted it in Symphony Hall.

There are many fine recordings of Berlioz' Symphonie Fantistique, but each of the best, Munch/BSO, Paray/DSO, Davis/LSO and van Otterloo/Hague Philharmonic, has its shortcomings. Munch is the most demoniac with a terrifying Witches' Sabbath, Paray the most idiomatic with a marvelous lyricism in the Adagio, Davis the most dramatic with exceptional dynamic contrasts and van Otterloo the most consistently lyrical. Both the Munch and Davis recordings suffer from unnecessary side change-overs in the Adagio.

Now Columbia on their CBS label brings us a completely satisfying edition, with a unique bonus in a two-disc set, CBS 32 Bl 0010. Pierre Boulez leads the London Symphony in a performance that captures the best of each of the performances discussed above, falling short only of Munch's Witches' Sabbath. The recorded sound is warm, and there is great clarity, with no apparent surface noise (is Columbia using the Dolby noise reduction system?).

Berlioz expected his "nightmare" symphony to be immediately followed by performance of his "Lelio (The Return to Life)," but this convention has rarely been observed. Columbia gives us this work, with the symphony performers augmented by Jean-Louis Barrault, John Mitchinson, John Shirley-Quirk and the LSO Chorus. How much sense the Fantastique makes followed by Lelio! I would not suggest this latter work to be any masterpiece, yet it is worth hearing and even the added expense to obtain the finest Fantastique now on disc. Don't wait for Columbia to release the symphony on a single disc.

* * *

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
...26,000

OCT 10 1968

New England Newsclip

YONKERS HERALD STATESMAN
Thursday, January 23, 1969

Billion-Dollar Boom In Records 'Inundating' Nation With Music

By LOUISA KREISBERG

If sales statistics for the recording industry are any clue, Americans were inundated with music in 1968.

A BILLION DOLLARS worth of records were sold last year, with young America in large part responsible for the phenomenal growth of the industry.

A continuing flow of new titles in all categories were listed, yet of the 4,000 new long-playing records and 7,000 new single records flowing from manufacturers, it is interesting to note that a greater number of new listings than ever before appeared under the heading "classical" in the 12 monthly 1968 Schwann catalogues.

A total of 2,199 classical listings were entered, and an additional 245 for classical collections. Popular listings numbered 1,388, with folk music USA and International pop and folk adding another 690. Country and western music chalked up an additional 355 and jazz 488. The other categories — spoken arts, musical shows, religious and sacred, and children's — made up the balance.

THE YEAR'S MOST recorded composer was Mozart, with 193 new listings in the Schwann catalogues. Beethoven came in second with a chunky 99, Bach with 84, Tchaikovsky with 63 and Haydn with 55.

Runners-up were Brahms, Schubert, Chopin, Verdi, Debussy, Wagner, Ravel, Mahler and Liszt.

Out of 126 ocmposers first listed in the Schwann catalogues in 1968, 73 are living. Nineteen new electronics listings also went into the catalogue.

THE MOST recorded classical piece of music in 1968 was Mozart's Symphony No. 35 with seven recordings. Tying for the position was Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'une faune."

Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker Suite" and "Ravel's "Pavane pour une infante defunte" took second place honors with six recordings each, and in third place, with five recordings each were Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 and Piano Sonata No. 14, Berlioz' "Symphonie fantastique," Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 ,Schubert's Symphony No. 8, and Tchaikovsky's Marche Slave" and "Overture 1812."

A wide variety of unusual recordings new in 1968 included the Horowitz TV Carnegie concert; Dr. Christiaan Barnard speaking of the first human heart transplant; reissues from old cylinders of famous singers such as Bori, Hempel, Slezak, Bonci, etc.

There was a new stereo test record, a dog training course, memory course, physical fitness record, a candlelight concert from Colonial Williamsburg, another record of bird songs with booklet.

Curiously there were 41 recordings of Mozart Symphonies, not one each of the 41 of course — (four of 41, three of 40, four of 39, etc., and many of the earlier symphonies).

There was a five-record set of lute, mandolin and guitar music, a Berlioz "Requiem" became a farewell remembrance of the late Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony for 13 years, and "The Switched-On Bach" with the MOOG Synthesizer became a runaway best seller in a short time.

There were 66 opera sets among the 1968 new listings in Schwann, including two new recordings of Berg's "Lulu," both "Das Rheingold" and "Die Walkure" with Von Karajan directing.

And of course the 19-record set of Der Ring des Nibelungen with Solti (a $100 set).

Dallas Times Herald
D. 216,209 SUN. 256,250

SEP 5 1969

Like Bard Said

'Tis Best Music Sound That One Can Enjoy...

Shakespeare unwittingly formulated the best definition of high fidelity: "'Tis, as it were, to hold the mirror up to nature." For at its best, high fidelity is ... deed a true mirror for ... flecting every ... and—...

...leisure, be... that richness of high ...ity sound rivals that of an actual performance. Musicians themselves—from Harry Belafonte and Mitch Miller to Eugene Ormandy and Leopold Stokowski—have adopted high fidelity components as the logical way to listen to music at home.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Musical Director, Erich Leinsdorf, puts it, "The recording of music today has been perfected to such a degree of fidelity to live performance that records provide—particularly when aided by good playback equipment—not only keen documentation of actual performances for those in near proximity to live music, but also a means of having music for those who are too far removed from music centers to attend concerts conveniently or with any degree of regularity."

102.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

JUN 1969

DEBUSSY: Images for Orchestra. BARBER: Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, cond. RCA Victrola VICS 1391, $2.50 [the Debussy from RCA Victor LSC 2282, 1958; the Barber from RCA Victor LM 2197, 1957].

Munch's forthright vigor and heady exuberance, while attractive qualities in themselves, are somewhat misplaced in Debussy's delicate tone poems where balanced sonority, linear clarity, and pliantly controlled rhythms are all important. These performances are, to put it bluntly, on the crude and heavy-handed side. Monteux's brilliantly conceived version on Philips is still the choice here, although a new Boulez reading due shortly from Columbia may prove a strong competitor.

After the Debussy, unsatisfactorily performed though it may be, Barber's Medea music sounds tawdry and obvious and the excellent, letter-perfect performance only points up the fact. Sonically, this disc is still absolutely resplendent.

Records in Review

Symphony Hall Favorites

By WILLIAM A. STORRER

Few Bostonians are not familiar with the achievements of Charles Munch in popularizing Berlioz in America. His recordings of the Fantastique symphony and Requiem are legendary. RCA's recording of the Requiem was a stunning showpiece of orchestral virtuosity. What can a new recording offer?

Well, Dr. Munch has again recorded the Requiem, for Deutsche Gramophon, with the Bavarian Radio Symphony and Chorus. It does offer a valid alternative to the BSO performance, notably Brass that are playing on the same beat in the Dies Irae. In the RCA-Symphony Hall acoustic, the brass were bathed in reverberation, and their lack of synchronization therein disguised (it becomes painfully apparent in the monophonic issue). In the DGG set the brass sound together and the acdustic seems no less warm, if slightly less reverberant.

If there is any factor which tips the scale towards this DGG set it must be the singing of Peter Schreier in the Sanctus. This is "heavenly" music and it is sung in a "heavenly" tone and manner.

It certainly cannot sway all Bostonians to this new recording. Sentimentality will prevail and cause many to obtain Dr. Munch's version with our own BSO. The new set is less "spectacular," but more poetic, and the produce of a more relaxed and mature vision of the maestro. It is DGG SLPM 139264-5.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony is a Boston favorite, with Koussevitzky, Munch and Monteux all having recorded it in Symphony Hall. Only Koussevitzky's recording is not still in the catalog.

Lorin Maazel, however, has the distinction of having twice recorded this symphony, and I have no hesitation preferring his earlier DGG recording with the Berlin Philharmonic, now re-released on Heliodor HS 25081, over the London disc with the Vienna Philharmonic. The Berlin ensemble is more virtuosic that Vienna and temps Maazel to a too fast Allegro con Fuoco Finale, but elsewhere there is a greater sense of personal commitment, and the playing is in all but the second movement oboe solo more poetic, more satisfyingly lyrical. The acoustic places the orchestra at a distance, but the pianissimo playing sounds more natural than that of London's spotlighted closeup sound. I find this Heliodor release the most satisfying account of the Fourth since Monteux last conducted it in Symphony Hall.

There are many fine recordings of Berlioz' Symphonie Fantistique, but each of the best, Munch/BSO, Paray/DSO, Davis/LSO and van Otterloo/Hague Philharmonic, has its shortcomings. Munch is the most demoniac with a terrifying Witches' Sabbath, Paray the most idiomatic with a marvelous lyricism in the Adagio, Davis the most dramatic with exceptional dynamic contrasts and van Otterloo the most consistently lyrical. Both the Munch and Davis recordings suffer from unnecessary side change-overs in the Adagio.

Now Columbia on their CBS label brings us a completely satisfying edition, with a unique bonus in a two-disc set, CBS 32 Bl 0010. Pierre Boulez leads the London Symphony in a performance that captures the best of each of the performances discussed above, falling short only of Munch's Witches' Sabbath. The recorded sound is warm, and there is great clarity, with no apparent surface noise (is Columbia using the Dolby noise reduction system?).

Berlioz expected his "nightmare" symphony to be immediately followed by performance of his "Lelio (The Return to Life)," but this convention has rarely been observed. Columbia gives us this work, with the symphony performers augmented by Jean-Louis Barrault, John Mitchinson, John Shirley-Quirk and the LSO Chorus. How much sense the Fantastique makes followed by Lelio! I would not suggest this latter work to be any masterpiece, yet it is worth hearing and even the added expense to obtain the finest Fantastique now on disc. Don't wait for Columbia to release the symphony on a single disc.

* * *

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

APR 24 1969

New England Newsclip

St. Sebastian" is a lengthy treatment of the story of the martyred "Archer of God." Debussy "ornamented" the drama with some of his finest music. To hear the work complete as a drama with music would take several hours. An alternate method is to hear the music only, but this lacks dramatic unity. Addition of a narrator in the provincially French manner inevitably distracts from the music. Several recordings have tried various approaches and usually run to two discs of music.

Charles Munch recorded over fifty minutes of this captivating music with the BSO, New England Conservatory Chorus and Phyllis Curtin, Florence Kopleff and Catherine Akos. This performance, once available in mono, is now released in stereo on Victroal (VICS 1404). Five excerpts are presented: The Court of Lilies, the Magic Chamber, The Council of False Gods, The Broken Laurel and Paradise. For the most part Munch is in complete sympathy with the demands placed upon his orchestra and the recording achieves the correct atmosphere for this romantic masterpiece. The disc surfaces are for this release quieter than any of Victrola's more expensive parent, RCA Red Seal with "miracle surface," of recent months, including the Berlioz reviewed above.

Leopold Stokowski's formance of Glier[illegible] No. 3, su[illegible] met[illegible]"

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 429,830

JUN 15 1969

Ravel: Bolero; Rapsodie Espagnole; "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2. Orchestre de Paris; Charles Munch, conductor (Angel).

Prokofiev: Twelve Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet." Boston Symphony Orchestra; Charles Munch, conductor (RCA Victrola).

The Ravel disc represents one of the very last recordings by the late Charles Munch. Always a fine interpreter of Ravel's music, he offers here one of the best "Boleros" to be found anywhere. Slow and steady-paced—it takes a full 17 minutes—it builds up gradually, in a manner that the composer himself would have applauded. He also presents a colorful "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2 and a sensitive "Rapsodie Espagnole." The orchestral performances are all first-rate.

The Boston Symphony record, an inexpensive reissue, affords a generous sampling from the three suites that Prokofiev arranged from his evening-length Ballet "Romeo and Juliet," being danced here by both the Royal and Stuttgart companies. The excerpts on this disc, however, are played roughly in the order in which they appear in the ballet. Munch's interpretation is clear but somewhat lacking in excitement.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
[illegible],000

OCT 10 1968

New England Newsclip

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS
MONTHLY 130,000

SEP 1969

PROKOFIEV: Romeo and Juliet, Op. 64 (excerpts). Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, cond. RCA Victrola VICS 1412, $2.50 [from RCA Victor LM 2110, 1957].

Prokofiev's three Romeo and Juliet Suites each form a satisfying symphonic entity, but since the ballet contains so much effective music, conductors usually prefer to excerpt the score according to their own tastes. Munch's chronological selection attempts to give a sequential digest of the ballet's plot and gradually intensifying mood; this looks good on paper, but the musical effect is something of a hodgepodge. The BSO plays well enough, although such "personality" music could use even more helpings of swagger, grace, and rhythmic verve. Until a good stereo version of the complete ballet comes along, Mitropoulos' colorful edition of highlights on Odyssey remains my first choice.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY [illegible]

AUG 1969

MOZART: Clarinet Concerto, in A Major (K. 622); Clarinet Quintet, in A Major (K. 581). Benny Goodman (clarinet); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch cond.; Boston Symphony String Quartet. RCA VICTROLA VICS 1402 $2.50.

Performance: Good quintet
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Okay

Jazz clarinetist Benny Goodman's third time around with the Mozart Clarinet Quintet in 1957 (his first two were with the Budapest Quartet on 78's and with the American Art Quartet on a 1952 Columbia LP) was his most easy-swinging, as though he and the BSO first-chair players had had a chance to work things out at leisure before the "moment of truth" with the recording microphones. In any event, this Victrola disc is the first stereo release of those performances of both the Quintet and the Concerto. In the concerto, Goodman seems a little less at ease, and it would hardly be honest to say that he and Munch match in nuance and vitality the top three of the dozen or so other versions listed in the Schwann catalog. Leister-Kubelik and De Peyer-Maag, among others, are potent competition. D. H.

[illegible] Mancinelli [illegible] patra" and the [illegible] non-operatic Notturno in Flat by Martucci.

On RCA's budget Victrola label, there is a not-to-be-missed collection of French works magnificiently played and sumptuously recorded. Charles Munch had fashioned the Boston Symphony into an authentic French orchestra by the time his career here was at mid-point. It is this expertise which is so very apparent in his readings of Ravel's "Bolero" and "La Valse," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Ibert's "Escales." So much beautiful music on a single disc (RCA Victrola Stereo VICS 1323, also mono) is almost too much to hope for.

[illegible] HERALD AMERICAN
[illegible] 11, 1968

YONKERS HERALD STATESMAN
Thursday, January 23, 1969

Billion-Dollar Boom In Records 'Inundating' Nation With Music

By LOUISA KREISBERG

If sales statistics for the recording industry are any clue, Americans were inundated with music in 1968.

A BILLION DOLLARS worth of records were sold last year, with young America in large part responsible for the phenomenal growth of the industry.

A continuing flow of new titles in all categories were listed, yet of the 4,000 new long-playing records and 7,000 new single records flowing from manufacturers, it is interesting to note that a greater number of new listings than ever before appeared under the heading "classical" in the 12 monthly 1968 Schwann catalogues.

A total of 2,199 classical listings were entered, and an additional 245 for classical collections. Popular listings numbered 1,388, with folk music USA and international pop and folk adding another 690. Country and western music chalked up an additional 355 and jazz 488. The other categories — spoken arts, musical shows, religious and sacred, and children's — made up the balance.

THE YEAR'S MOST recorded composer was Mozart, with 193 new listings in the Schwann catalogues. Beethoven came in second with a chunky 99, Bach with 84, Tchaikovsky with 63 and Haydn with 55.

Runners-up were Brahms, Schubert, Chopin, Verdi, Debussy, Wagner, Ravel, Mahler and Liszt.

Out of 126 ocmposers first listed in the Schwann catalogues in 1968, 73 are living. Nineteen new electronics listings also went into the catalogue.

THE MOST recorded classical piece of music in 1968 was Mozart's Symphony No. 35 with seven recordings. Tying for the position was Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'une faune."

Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker Suite" and "Ravel's "Pavane pour une infante defunte" took second place honors with six recordings each, and in third place, with five recordings each were Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 and Piano Sonata No. 14, Berlioz' "Symphonie fantastique," Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 ,Schubert's Symphony No. 8, and Tchaikovsky's Marche Slave" and "Overture 1812."

A wide variety of unusual recordings new in 1968 included the Horowitz TV Carnegie concert; Dr. Christiaan Barnard speaking of the first human heart transplant; reissues from old cylinders of famous singers such as Bori, Hempel, Slezak, Bonci, etc.

There was a new stereo test record, a dog training course, memory course, physical fitness record, a candlelight concert from Colonial Williamsburg, another record of bird songs with booklet.

Curiously there were 41 recordings of Mozart Symphonies, not one each of the 41 of course — (four of 41, three of 40, four of 39, etc., and many of the earlier symphonies).

There was a five-record set of lute, mandolin and guitar music, a Berlioz "Requiem" became a farewell remembrance of the late Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony for 13 years, and "The Switched-On Bach" with the MOOG Synthesizer became a runaway best seller in a short time.

There were 66 opera sets among the 1968 new listings in Schwann, including two new recordings of Berg's "Lulu," both "Das Rheingold" and "Die Walkure" with Von Karajan directing.

And of course the 19-record set of Der Ring des Nibelungen with Solti (a $100 set).

Dallas Times Herald
D. 216,209 SUN. 256,250

SEP 5 1969

Like Bard Said

'Tis Best Music Sound That One Can Enjoy

Shakespeare unwittingly formulated the best definition of high fidelity: "'Tis, as it were, to hold the mirror up to nature." For at its best, high fidelity is [illegible] deed a true mirror for [illegible] flecting every [illegible] and—[illegible]

[illegible] leisure, be[illegible] [illegible]nal richness of high [illegible]ity sound rivals that of an actual performance. Musicians themselves—from Harry Belafonte and Mitch Miller to Eugene Ormandy and Leopold Stokowski—have adopted high fidelity components as the logical way to listen to music at home.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Musical Director, Erich Leinsdorf, puts it, "The recording of music today has been perfected to such a degree of fidelity to live performance that records provide—particularly when aided by good playback equipment—not only keen documentation of actual performances for those in near proximity to live music, but also a means of having music for those who are too far removed from music centers to attend concerts conveniently or with any degree of regularity."

By ARTHUR COHN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

ENTRANCING is the word for these chamber-music compilations, both of which abound in variety of color, unusual repertoire, and musical consequence. The scope of the 16 pieces (eight on each release) indicates conscientious planning. Fourteen different instrumental combinations are displayed, and even in the media found on both programs (string trio and piano quartet), the composers are neatly contrasted: Schubert with Fine and Mozart with Brahms, respectively. None of the compositions is overwhelmingly represented in the Schwann Catalog, and the Haieff and Piston are first recordings. The Carter and Colgrass works were once recorded but long ago deleted, and the Fine was to be heard only in a special University of Illinois album. Especially noteworthy here is the healthy balance between the classic-romantic choices and the contemporary ones; all of the latter, in turn, proceed from aesthetics that define historical interaction.

The performances are beautiful. Of course the individual talents of these musicians have long been apparent in the concerts and recordings of the Boston Symphony. Still, it is astonishing to find all of their ensembles so akin to those achieved by small groups that have been in partnership for years on end.

It is a joy to hear the Beethoven Serenade in its original form, rather than in the transcription for flute and piano. The Op. 25 is a gem of a work, too little known and too seldom performed. The clue to the entire composition lies in the qualification of the tempo marking for the last movement: (Allegro vivace) disinvolto ("free, easy, and graceful"). To this could be added "elfin, light as a bubble". But let it not be thought that this is merely a musical bonbon; there is solid covering on the creamy mellifluousness.

NOTE: Each album proper consists of six sides. In addition, the first listed contains a 10″ (double-faced) disc called "Chamber Music Discussion" in which Ustinov, Silverstein, and Erich Leinsdorf participate, with excerpts from six of the compositions. The second release also offers a bonus recording: a 12″ disc devoted to a "urbane and witty survey of chamber music" by Ustinov. —A.C.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players. MOZART: Quartet in D for Flute and Strings, K. 285; Quartet in F for Oboe and Strings, K. 370; BEETHOVEN: Serenade in D for Flute, Violin and Viola, Op. 25; BRAHMS: Quartet in C minor for Piano and Strings, Op. 60; FINE: Fantasia for String Trio (1957); COPLAND: Vitebsk (1929); CARTER: Woodwind Quintet (1948); PISTON: Divertimento for Nine Instruments (1946); Joseph Silverstein (violin); Burton Fine (viola); Jules Eskin (cello); Georges Moleux (bass); Doriot Anthony Dwyer (flute); Ralph Gomberg (oboe); Gino Cioffi (clarinet); Sherman Walt (bassoon); James Stagliano (horn); Alfred Krips (violin—associate); Claude Frank (piano—guest artist); Peter Ustinov (notes and commentary). RCA Victor set LM-6167 or Stereo LSC-6167, six sides plus 10″ disc, $17.37.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players. MOZART: Piano Quartet in G minor, K. 478; Quintet in E flat for Piano and Winds, K. 452; BRAHMS: Trio in E flat for Horn, Violin and Piano, Op. 40; SCHUBERT: String Trio No. 1 in B flat, D. 471; POULENC: Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano (1926); HAIEFF: Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon (1955); VILLA-LOBOS: Bachianas Brasileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon (1938); COLGRASS: Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957); Joseph Silverstein (violin); Burton Fine (viola); Jules Eskin (cello); Doriot Anthony Dwyer (flute); Ralph Gomberg (oboe); Gino Cioffi (clarinet); Sherman Walt (bassoon); James Stagliano (horn); Everett Firth (drums); Claude Frank (piano—guest artist); Peter Ustinov (commentary). RCA Victor set LM-6184 or Stereo LSC-6184, eight sides, $17.37.

that Ustinov is evident here. Less recordings deserve a particular award.

Disc Data

For Lovers of Chamber Music

By Boston Symphony Players

By NELL LAWSON

RCA Victor's "The Boston Symphony Chamber Players," a boxed, 4-LP album, includes a "bonus" record with spoken commentary by Peter Ustinov, and if the album doesn't come up with special awards and honors, there is something amiss among the king makers.

Although the music of Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Colgrass, Villa Lobos and Haieff are special loves of this listener and performed with something close to the celestial, we turned first to Ustinov, remembering an earlier Boston Symphony Chamber player album with Ustinov remarks, his wit tempered with knowledge of music, and the charm of the man so winning and urbane.

In the new album — LSC-6180 Stereo — he says, "Chamber music really finds you out. This most intimate form of music which the people of Mozart's day used for entertainment before TV and Monopoly."

In speaking of Poulenc: "The music is delicate, clear, limpid and complicated, ideal chamber music."

"Avante guarde composers are leading themselves into a cul-de-sac."

The music, exquisitely played: Mozart, Piano Quartet in G Minor K 478 and Quartet in E-Flat for piano and Winds K 452; Brahms Trio in E-Flat for Horn, Violin and Piano, Op 40; Schubert String Trio No. 1 in B-Flat D 471; Poulenc Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano; Alezei Haieff's Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon; Villa Lobos Bachianas Brazileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon, and Michael Colgrass' Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957). Stereo LSC-6184.

* * *

Buffalo Evening News
D. 284,568 SAT. 299,069
JUN 22 1968

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

pieces is, are more
ply more inter-
than the perform-
es allow us to hear. The performance of the G minor Quartet by Szolchany with the Hungarian Quartet (Turnabout) is more vital and gives more of the piece.

I found, too, that the Guarneri-Rubinstein reading of the much later and superb C minor Quartet hardly survives comparison with the one by Claude Frank with Silverstein, Fine and Eskin, of the Boston Symphony (RCA), though the latter performance, one of the best chamber music records ever made, though available by itself in Europe, here comes buried in an otherwise exceedingly undistinguished three-record album by the B.S.O. Chamber Players. Finally, the Guareri-Rubinstein version of the Schumann Quintet is lively, genial and attractive. RCA has done a good job with the recorded sound.

The performance of Brahms's F minor Piano Quintet with the Amadeus
tet and Christoph Es-
Deutsche Gram-
mooth

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JUN 15 1969
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS—RCA LSC/LM 6184

RCA has released the second set from the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a three-record offering featuring works by Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos, and Colgrass. Claude Frank, piano, is guest artist. A fourth record, featuring Peter Ustinov providing a humorous survey of chamber music, is included as a bonus. Handsome packaging is a plus.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000
JUN 29 1968

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 142,517 SAT. 135,513
JUN 24 1968

These We Like...

By ANTHONY CRESSWELL
Journal Staff Writer

NINE CHAMBER music players from the Boston Symphony have recorded an unusually interesting program of short works from Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos and Colgrass for a three-record boxed album. Variety of material offered is indicated by the names of the composers. It ranges from Mozart's "Quintet in E Flat for Piano and Winds" (with Claude Frank as guest pianist) to Poulenc's "Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano" and Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon." A bonus record with Peter Ustinov surveying chamber music may appeal to some. RCA Victor, LM-LSC 6184.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
OCT 1968

A VERY INTERESTING album from RCA (LSC-6184) contains a potpourri of chamber music by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group from Boston's fine orchestra. Pianist Claude Frank is "guest artist" and a special bonus record has considerable commentary by Peter Ustinov.

On the three records are Mozart's piano quartet in G minor and his quintet for piano and winds; Brahms' trio for horn, violin and piano, Opus 40; Schubert's string trio No. 1; Poulenc's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano; three bagatelles for oboe and bassoon by Haieff; Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 6 for flute and bassoon, and Colgrass' variations for four drums and viola.

Why this particular assortment was chosen is a mystery, but one could hardly quibble with the fine playing as well as with most of the music itself.

The two Mozart pieces are beautifully played (Frank is a fine piano player) and the Poulenc trio is a spirited and utterly delightful piece of music. For these three works alone, the album would be worth the money.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 209,440 SUN. 243,379
SEP 8 1968

103.

Disc Data

For Lovers of Chamber Music

✦ ✦ ✦ ✦

By Boston Symphony Players

By NELL LAWSON

RCA Victor's "The Boston Symphony Chamber Players," a boxed, 4-LP album, includes a "bonus" record with spoken commentary by Peter Ustinov, and if the album doesn't come up with special awards and honors, there is something amiss among the king makers.

Although the music of Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Colgrass, Villa Lobos and Haieff are special loves of this listener and performed with something close to the celestial, we turned first to Ustinov, remembering an earlier Boston Symphony Chamber player album with Ustinov remarks, his wit tempered with knowledge of music, and the charm of the man so winning and urbane.

In the new album — LSC-6180 Stereo — he says, "Chamber music really finds you out. This most intimate form of music which the people of Mozart's day used for entertainment before TV and Monopoly."

In speaking of Poulenc: "The music is delicate, clear, limpid and complicated, ideal chamber music."

"Avante guarde composers are leading themselves into a cul-de-sac."

The music, exquisitely played: Mozart, Piano Quartet in G Minor K 478 and Quartet in E-Flat for piano and Winds K 452; Brahms Trio in E-Flat for Horn, Violin and Piano, Op 40; Schubert String Trio No. 1 in B-Flat D 471; Poulenc Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano; Alezei Haieff's Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon; Villa Lobos Bachianas Brazileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon, and Michael Colgrass' Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957). Stereo LSC-6184.

* * *

Buffalo Evening News
D. 284,568 SAT. 299,069
JUN 22 1968

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JUN 15 1969

New England Newsclip

pieces
...s, are more
...ply more inter-
than the perform-
...es allow us to hear. The performance of the G minor Quartet by Szolchany with the Hungarian Quartet (Turnabout) is more vital and gives more of the piece.

I found, too, that the Guarneri-Rubinstein reading of the much later and superb C minor Quartet hardly survives comparison with the one by Claude Frank with Silverstein, Fine and Eskin, of the Boston Symphony (RCA), though the latter performance, one of the best chamber music records ever made, though available by itself in Europe, here comes buried in an otherwise exceedingly undistinguished three-record album by the B.S.O. Chamber Players. Finally, the Guarneri-Rubinstein version of the Schumann Quintet is lively, genial and attractive. RCA has done a good job with the recorded sound.

The performance of Brahms's F minor Piano Quintet with the Amadeus ...et and Christoph Es-
...Deutsche Gram-
...mooth

Boston Symphony maestro Erich Leinsdorf with Joseph Silverstein

This work is a historic highlight in the use of the flute in chamber music, and the Bostonians hit the jackpot with their sing-and-dance interpretation. The performance of the Schubert Trio is just as happy. It is a piece in the composer's light vein (he was just 20 when he wrote it), but relaxation does not eliminate expertness; this is music that deserves serious attention. (Schubert was just twenty when he wrote this and another string trio).

The instrumentality of the piano quartet makes possible a fullness of string grouping that can complete, if need be, much better with the sonority of the piano, inasmuch as the piano-trio medium (violin, cello, and piano) has no basic middle voice to register in full balance; a string instrument cannot be in more than one gamut at a time. The two piano quartets composed by Mozart are the first examples of the medium as we know it today. In the first work of the pair (the G minor) Mozart shows a disposition to pit the three strings (written in string-trio formations) against the piano. The Bostonians approach the music properly: there is passionate urgency in the first movement, a more relaxed attitude in the B flat slow movement, and a Haydnesque, joyous brio in the final rondo. The Brahms third and last piano quartet has no cakes-and-ale sections—the few lighter moments do not relieve the dark mood of the opening, and the scherzo is as feverish in its pace as the inquietude of the preceding movement. There is no trio in the latter; it is a one-stroke, telescoped, duple-pulsed idea. The blend of the strings with the piano throughout is wonderful, baring all of the Brahmsian bounties. Special mention must be given to the performance of the magnificent song, dimmed with tears, that marks the slow movement.

There are three other Mozart pieces: the longest and most substantial of the flute quartets (in which Doriot Anthony Dwyer shows again that she is one of the best in the big league), the quartet for oboe and string trio, and the K. 452 Quintet—a true masterpiece. Combrer is the hero of the K. 370 (the style of the piece favors the pungency of the oboe), and even in the virtuoso demeanor of the slow movement the music is never cheapened. The E flat Quintet, with its mixture of wind, brass, and keyboard instruments, though touched with feelings of concertante style, is fully in the field of chamber music. Mozart neither understated nor overestimated when he wrote his father, in 1784, that the K. 452 was "the best work I have ever composed."

One other Brahms work is included—the Op. 40 Trio for horn (or cello or viola, but either is indeed a poor substitute), violin, and piano. For rightness of phrasing, tempi, and style this performance cannot be bettered. Silverstein (who, as the only violinist present save Krips for the Piston, bears a tremendous responsibility in these recordings) is a supreme artist here; witness, e.g., the sensitive merge he makes with the horn in the darkness of the minor-keyed slow movement.

The Piston piece, with its French élan in neoclassic syntax, is properly diverting. The honet medium is a rarity in chamber music and best balanced by combining, as does Piston, two dissimilar color groups (four wind, five strings). Mainly, however, Piston originates his work as a blend of tone, its composite force being in the service of his assured, very orderly style. The antagonisms in this music are more of harmonic and contrapuntal conflict than those of color.

It is a delight to have the Colgrass in a brand-new recording. (The first was on an old MGM disc [E-3714], with the composer playing percussion and Emanuel Vardi, who commissioned the piece, as violist.) RCA Victor's liner note gives no information whatsoever about the music. Counting the introduction there are eight divisions in the work. The drums are tunable with cardboard shells (like timpani). Esoteric in timbre combination, Colgrass's duo has a cleanness, an ease of sonority that is stimulating and refreshing. The lines are tonally clear-cut and sufficiently intense without going through the dramatics of the ultrachromatic cult. Naturally rhythmic values are exploited, but such vitality is not a preoccupation. Contemporary to the hilt, unusual in coloristic formation, these Variations are conceived in the same styled beauty as any set in the classic-romantic literature.

Two other duos are included: Haieff's Bagatelles and a Bachianas Brasileiras by Villa-Lobos. A woodwind duet must, of necessity, be limited to acute particulars; purely homophonic voices are incapable of two-voiced expansion, as is the case with string duets (double-stops, for example). Haieff's three movements are contrapuntal and slightly dissonant, helping to keep the lines separate and, thus, to maintain interest. Mainly perky (close-spaced), they are examples of musical hedonism. The Villa-Lobos is still another example of the transmutation of Bachian spirit in a Brazilian manner. Both instruments are equally treated, to a degree—for, though the part-writing is proportioned, the flute is assigned most of the pyrotechnical assertion.

Elliott Carter's two-movement Woodwind Quintet was composed 20 years ago, and is rather a far cry from his latest output. Full of the pert humor that only woodwinds in combination can convey, the music has a light facture but plenty of internal strength. Rhythm has always been a strong point in Carter's work, and that fascination is evident here. Less intensity pertains to Poulenc's Trio, though his balancing of sonority is a distinct joy. The scoring is so coupled with the instruments chosen that the very essence of the composition would vanish if any substitute were made. The worst "truth" that can be hurled at this composer is that he conceives his opinions in the accent of less used but categorically associated colors.

Copland's Vitebsk, a study on a Jewish theme (as he describes it) for piano, violin, and cello, suffered many years of inattention and until recently had enjoyed but one recording (on CRI). Then there appeared a vibrantly projected performance by the New Amsterdam Trio (on Decca), and a few months ago Columbia (CBS) released a version with Copland at the piano. Now the Bostonians give us a fourth! The trio represents Copland's single use of resource from his Jewish ancestry. It is intense music, rhythmically declarative, passionately brooding—virtually three-instrument symphonicism. Despite a tripartite design, the incursivity of the writing is sustained until the final measures bring resolution. The performance is of boiling registration.

Irving Fine's Fantasia (with his Partita for winds) has been performed more than any of his other works. It represents a hybrid of dodecaphonic technique applied to free-tonality, and the twain do meet successfully. The outer movements are both in slow tempo; the first is lyrical, the other more rhapsodic. The middle movement (marked Scherzo but of mordacious content) is nervous, driven by cross-accents; it is an example of virtuosity in motival crisscross. The passion that drives the music proves Fine's inspiration, and the present performance is equal to it.

I understand that RCA Victor will continue this BSO chamber series. I fervently hope so. I hope, too, that the format will be continued—including the "urbane and witty" data furnished by the indubitably urbane and witty Peter Ustinov.

A final word: RCA Victor's packaging and sound are of the finest. These recordings deserve a particular award.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS—RCA LSC/LM 6184

RCA has released the second set from the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a three-record offering featuring works by Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos, and Colgrass. Claude Frank, piano, is guest artist. A fourth record, featuring Peter Ustinov providing a humorous survey of chamber music, is included as a bonus. Handsome packaging is a plus.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000
JUN 29 1968

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 142,517 SAT. 135,513
JUN 24 1968

These We Like...

By ANTHONY CRESSWELL
Journal Staff Writer

NINE CHAMBER music players from the Boston Symphony have recorded an unusually interesting program of short works from Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos and Colgrass for a three-record boxed album. Variety of material offered is indicated by the names of the composers. It ranges from Mozart's "Quintet in E Flat for Piano and Winds" (with Claude Frank as guest pianist) to Poulenc's "Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano" and Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon." A bonus record with Peter Ustinov surveying chamber music may appeal to some. RCA Victor, LM-LSC 6184.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
OCT 1968

A VERY INTERESTING album from RCA (LSC-6184) contains a potpourri of chamber music by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group from Boston's fine orchestra. Pianist Claude Frank is "guest artist" and a special bonus record has considerable commentary by Peter Ustinov.

On the three records are Mozart's piano quartet in G minor and his quintet for piano and winds; Brahms' trio for horn, violin and piano, Opus 40; Schubert's string trio No. 1; Poulenc's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano; three bagatelles for oboe and bassoon by Haieff; Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 6 for flute and bassoon, and Colgrass' variations for four drums and viola.

Why this particular assortment was chosen is a mystery, but one could hardly quibble with the fine playing as well as with most of the music itself.

The two Mozart pieces are beautifully played (Frank is a fine piano player) and the Poulenc trio is a spirited and utterly delightful piece of music. For these three works alone, the album would be worth the money.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 209,440 SUN. 243,379
SEP 8 1968

103

Disc Data

For Lovers of Chamber Music

✦ ✦ ✦ ✦

By Boston Symphony Players

By NELL LAWSON

RCA Victor's "The Boston Symphony Chamber Players," a boxed, 4-LP album, includes a "bonus" record with spoken commentary by Peter Ustinov, and if the album doesn't come up with special awards and honors, there is something amiss among the king makers.

Although the music of Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Colgrass, Villa Lobos and Haieff are special loves of this listener and performed with something close to the celestial, we turned first to Ustinov, remembering an earlier Boston Symphony Chamber player album with Ustinov remarks, his wit tempered with knowledge of music, and the charm of the man so winning and urbane.

In the new album — LSC-6180 Stereo — he says, "Chamber music really finds you out. This most intimate form of music which the people of Mozart's day used for entertainment before TV and Monopoly."

In speaking of Poulenc: "The music is delicate, clear, limpid and complicated, ideal chamber music."

"Avante guarde composers are leading themselves into a cul-de-sac."

The music, exquisitely played: Mozart, Piano Quartet in G Minor K 478 and Quartet in E-Flat for piano and Winds K 452; Brahms Trio in E-Flat for Horn, Violin and Piano, Op 40; Schubert String Trio No. 1 in B-Flat D 471; Poulenc Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano; Alezei Haieff's Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon; Villa Lobos Bachianas Brazileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon, and Michael Colgrass' Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957). Stereo LSC-6184.

* * *

Buffalo Evening News
D. 284,568 SAT. 299,069
JUN 22 1968

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

pieces is, are more
ply more inter-
than the perform-
es allow us to hear. The performance of the G minor Quartet by Szolchany with the Hungarian Quartet (Turnabout) is more vital and gives more of the piece.

I found, too, that the Guarneri-Rubinstein reading of the much later and superb C minor Quartet hardly survives comparison with the one by Claude Frank with Silverstein, Fine and Eskin, of the Boston Symphony (RCA), though the latter performance, one of the best chamber music records ever made, though available by itself in Europe, here comes buried in an otherwise exceedingly undistinguished three-record album by the B.S.O. Chamber Players. Finally, the Guarneri-Rubinstein version of the Schumann Quintet is lively, genial and attractive. RCA has done a good job with the recorded sound.

The performance of Brahms's F minor Piano Quintet with the Amadeus Quartet and Christoph Es-
'Deutsche Gram-smooth

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JUN 15 1969
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony maestro Erich Leinsdorf with Joseph Silverstein

This work is a historic highlight in the use of the flute in chamber music, and the Bostonians hit the jackpot with their sing-and-dance interpretation. The performance of the Schubert Trio is just as happy. It is a piece in the composer's light vein (he was just 20 when he wrote it), but relaxation does not eliminate expertness; this is music that deserves serious attention. (Schubert was just twenty when he wrote this and another string trio).

The instrumentality of the piano quartet makes possible a fullness of string grouping that can compete, if need be, much better with the sonority of the piano, inasmuch as the piano-trio medium (violin, cello, and piano) has no basic middle voice to register in full balance: a string instrument cannot be in more than one gamut at a time. The two piano quartets composed by Mozart are the first examples of the medium as we know it today. In the first work of the pair (the G minor) Mozart shows a disposition to pit the three strings (written in string-trio formations) against the piano. The Bostonians approach the music properly: there is passionate urgency in the first movement, a more relaxed attitude in the B flat slow movement, and a Haydnesque, joyous brio in the final rondo. The Brahms third and last piano quartet has no cakes-and-ale sections—the few lighter moments do not relieve the dark mood of the opening, and the scherzo is as feverish in its pace as the inquietude of the preceding movement. There is no trio in the latter; it is a one-stroke, telescoped, duple-pulsed idea. The blend of the strings with the piano throughout is wonderful, baring all of the Brahmsian bounties. Special mention must be given to the performance of the magnificent song, dimmed with tears, that marks the slow movement.

There are three other Mozart pieces: the longest and most substantial of the flute quartets (in which Doriot Anthony Dwyer shows again that she is one of the best in the big league), the quartet for oboe and string trio, and the K. 452 Quintet—a true masterpiece. Gomberg is the hero of the K. 370 (the style of the piece favors the pungency of the oboe), and even in the virtuoso demeanor of the slow movement the music is never cheapened. The E flat Quintet, with its mixture of wind, brass, and keyboard instruments, though touched with feelings of concertante style, is fully in the field of chamber music. Mozart neither underrated nor overestimated when he wrote his father, in 1784, that the K. 452 was "the best work I have ever composed."

One other Brahms work is included—the Op. 40 Trio for horn (or cello or viola, but either is indeed a poor substitute), violin, and piano. For rightness of phrasing, tempi, and style this performance cannot be bettered. Silverstein (who, as the only violinist present save Krips for the Piston, bears a tremendous responsibility in these recordings) is a supreme artist here; witness, e.g., the sensitive merge he makes with the horn in the darkness of the minor-keyed slow movement.

The Piston piece, with its French élan in neoclassic syntax, is properly diverting. The nonet medium is a rarity in chamber music and best balanced by combining, as does Piston, two dissimilar color groups (four wind, five strings). Mainly, however, Piston originates his work as a blend of tone, its composite force being in the service of his assured, very orderly style. The antagonisms in this music are more of harmonic and contrapuntal conflict than those of color.

It is a delight to have the Colgrass in a brand-new recording. (The first was on an old MGM disc [E-3714], with the composer playing percussion and Emanuel Vardi, who commissioned the piece, as violist.) RCA Victor's liner note gives no information whatsoever about the music. Counting the introduction there are eight divisions in the work. The drums are tunable with cardboard shells (like timpani). Esoteric in timbre combination, Colgrass's duo has a cleanness, an ease of sonority that is stimulating and refreshing. The lines are tonally clear-cut and sufficiently intense without going through the dramatics of the ultrachromatic cult. Naturally rhythmic values are exploited, but such vitality is not a preoccupation. Contemporary to the hilt, unusual in coloristic formation, these Variations are conceived in the same styled beauty as any set in the classic-romantic literature.

Two other duos are included: Haieff's Bagatelles and a Bachianas Brasileiras by Villa-Lobos. A woodwind duet must, of necessity, be limited to acute particulars; purely homophonic voices are incapable of two-voiced expansion, as is the case with string duets (double-stops, for example). Haieff's three movements are contrapuntal and slightly dissonant, helping to keep the lines separate and, thus, to maintain interest. Mainly perky (close-spaced), they are examples of musical hedonism. The Villa-Lobos is still another example of the transmutation of Bachian spirit in a Brazilian manner. Both instruments are equally treated, to a degree—for, though the part-writing is proportioned, the flute is assigned most of the pyrotechnical assertion.

Elliott Carter's two-movement Woodwind Quintet was composed 20 years ago, and is rather a far cry from his latest output. Full of the pert humor that only woodwinds in combination can convey, the music has a light facture but plenty of internal strength. Rhythm has always been a strong point in Carter's work, and that fascination is evident here. Less intensity pertains to Poulenc's Trio, though his balancing of sonority is a distinct joy. The scoring is so coupled with the instruments chosen that the very essence of the composition would vanish if any substitute were made. The worst "truth" that can be hurled at this composer is that he conceives his opinions in the accent of less used but categorically associated colors.

Copland's Vitebsk, a study on a Jewish theme (as he describes it) for piano, violin, and cello, suffered many years of inattention and until recently had enjoyed but one recording (on CRI). Then there appeared a vibrantly projected performance by the New Amsterdam Trio (on Decca), and a few months ago Columbia (CBS) released a version with Copland at the piano. Now the Bostonians give us a fourth! The trio represents Copland's single use of resource from his Jewish ancestry. It is intense music, rhythmically declarative, passionately brooding—virtually three-instrument symphonicism. Despite a tripartite design, the incursivity of the writing is sustained until the final measures bring resolution. The performance is of boiling registration.

Irving Fine's Fantasia (with his Partita for winds) has been performed more than any of his other works. It represents a hybrid of dodecaphonic technique applied to free-tonality, and the twain do meet successfully. The outer movements are both in slow tempo; the first is lyrical, the other more rhapsodic. The middle movement (marked Scherzo but of mordacious content) is nervous, driven by cross-accents; it is an example of virtuosity in motival crisscross. The passion that drives the music proves Fine's inspiration, and the present performance is equal to it.

I understand that RCA Victor will continue this BSO chamber series. I fervently hope so. I hope, too, that the format will be continued—including the "urbane and witty" data furnished by the indubitably urbane and witty Peter Ustinov.

A final word: RCA Victor's packaging and sound are of the finest. These recordings deserve a particular award.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS—RCA LSC/LM 6184

RCA has released the second set from the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a three-record offering featuring works by Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos, and Colgrass. Claude Frank, piano, is guest artist. A fourth record, featuring Peter Ustinov providing a humorous survey of chamber music, is included as a bonus. Handsome packaging is a plus.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000
JUN 29 1968

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 142,517 SAT. 135,513
JUN 24 1968

These We Like...

By ANTHONY CRESSWELL
Journal Staff Writer

NINE CHAMBER music players from the Boston Symphony have recorded an unusually interesting program of short works from Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos and Colgrass for a three-record boxed album. Variety of material offered is indicated by the names of the composers. It ranges from Mozart's "Quintet in E Flat for Piano and Winds" (with Claude Frank as guest pianist) to Poulenc's "Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano" and Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon." A bonus record with Peter Ustinov surveying chamber music may appeal to some. RCA Victor, LM-LSC 6184.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
OCT 1968

A VERY INTERESTING album from RCA (LSC-6184) contains a potpourri of chamber music by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group from Boston's fine orchestra. Pianist Claude Frank is "guest artist" and a special bonus record has considerable commentary by Peter Ustinov.

On the three records are Mozart's piano quartet in G minor and his quintet for piano and winds; Brahms' trio for horn, violin and piano, Opus 40; Schubert's string trio No. 1; Poulenc's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano; three bagatelles for oboe and bassoon by Haieff; Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 6 for flute and bassoon, and Colgrass' variations for four drums and viola.

Why this particular assortment was chosen is a mystery, but one could hardly quibble with the fine playing as well as with most of the music itself.

The two Mozart pieces are beautifully played (Frank is a fine piano player) and the Poulenc trio is a spirited and utterly delightful piece of music. For these three works alone, the album would be worth the money.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 269,[illegible] SUN. 213,370
SEP 8 1968

By ARTHUR COHN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

ENTRANCING is the word for these chamber-music compilations, both of which abound in variety of color, unusual repertoire, and musical consequence. The scope of the 16 pieces (eight on each release) indicates conscientious planning. Fourteen different instrumental combinations are displayed, and even in the media found on both programs (string trio and piano quartet), the composers are neatly contrasted: Schubert with Fine and Mozart with Brahms, respectively. None of the compositions is overwhelmingly represented in the Schwann Catalog, and the Haieff and Piston are first recordings. The Carter and Colgrass works were once recorded but long ago deleted, and the Fine was to be heard only in a special University of Illinois album. Especially noteworthy here is the healthy balance between the classic-romantic choices and the contemporary ones: all of the latter, in turn, proceed from aesthetics that define historical interaction.

The performances are beautiful. Of course the individual talents of these musicians have long been apparent in the concerts and recordings of the Boston Symphony. Still, it is astonishing to find all of their ensembles so akin to those achieved by small groups that have been in partnership for years on end.

It is a joy to hear the Beethoven Serenade in its original form, rather than in the transcription for flute and piano. The Op. 25 is a gem of a work, too little known and too seldom performed. The clue to the entire composition lies in the qualification of the tempo marking for the last movement: (Allegro vivace) disinvolto ("free, easy, and graceful"). To this could be added "elfin, light as a bubble". But let it not be thought that this is merely a musical bonbon; there is solid covering on the creamy mellifluousness.

NOTE: Each album proper consists of six sides. In addition, the first listed contains a 10″ (double-faced) disc called "Chamber Music Discussion" in which Ustinov, Silverstein, and Erich Leinsdorf participate, with excerpts from six of the compositions. The second release also offers a bonus recording: a 12″ disc devoted to a "urbane and witty survey of chamber music" by Ustinov. —A.C.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players. MOZART: Quartet in D for Flute and Strings, K. 285; Quartet in F for Oboe and Strings, K. 370; BEETHOVEN: Serenade in D for Flute, Violin and Viola, Op. 25; BRAHMS: Quartet in C minor for Piano and Strings, Op. 60; FINE: Fantasia for String Trio (1957); COPLAND: Vitebsk (1929); CARTER: Woodwind Quintet (1948); PISTON: Divertimento for Nine Instruments (1946); Joseph Silverstein (violin); Burton Fine (viola); Jules Eskin (cello); Georges Moleux (bass); Doriot Anthony Dwyer (flute); Ralph Gomberg (oboe); Gino Cioffi (clarinet); Sherman Walt (bassoon); James Stagliano (horn); Alfred Krips (violin—associate); Claude Frank (piano—guest artist); Peter Ustinov (notes and commentary). RCA Victor set LM-6167 or Stereo LSC-6167, six sides plus 10″ disc, $17.37.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players. MOZART: Piano Quartet in G minor, K. 478; Quintet in E flat for Piano and Winds, K. 452; BRAHMS: Trio in E flat for Horn, Violin and Piano, Op. 40; SCHUBERT: String Trio No. 1 in B flat, D. 471; POULENC: Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano (1926); HAIEFF: Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon (1955); VILLA-LOBOS: Bachianas Brasileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon (1938); COLGRASS: Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957); Joseph Silverstein (violin); Burton Fine (viola); Jules Eskin (cello); Doriot Anthony Dwyer (flute); Ralph Gomberg (oboe); Gino Cioffi (clarinet); Sherman Walt (bassoon); James Stagliano (horn); Everett Firth (drums); Claude Frank (piano—guest artist); Peter Ustinov (commentary). RCA Victor set LM-6184 or Stereo LSC-6184, eight sides, $17.37.

that fascination is evident here. Less contings deserve a particular award.

Disc Data

For Lovers of Chamber Music

103

By Boston Symphony Players

By NELL LAWSON

RCA Victor's "The Boston Symphony Chamber Players," a boxed, 4-LP album, includes a "bonus" record with spoken commentary by Peter Ustinov, and if the album doesn't come up with special awards and honors, there is something amiss among the king makers.

Although the music of Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Colgrass, Villa Lobos and Haieff are special loves of this listener and performed with something close to the celestial, we turned first to Ustinov, remembering an earlier Boston Symphony Chamber player album with Ustinov remarks, his wit tempered with knowledge of music, and the charm of the man so winning and urbane.

In the new album — LSC-6180 Stereo — he says, "Chamber music really finds you out. This most intimate form of music which the people of Mozart's day used for entertainment before TV and Monopoly."

In speaking of Poulenc: "The music is delicate, clear, limpid and complicated, ideal chamber music."

"Avante guarde composers are, leading themselves into a cul-de-sac."

The music, exquisitely played: Mozart, Piano Quartet in G Minor K 478 and Quartet in E-Flat for piano and Winds K 452; Brahms Trio in E-Flat for Horn, Violin and Piano, Op 40; Schubert String Trio No. 1 in B-Flat D 471; Poulenc Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano; Alezei Haieff's Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon; Villa Lobos Bachianas Brazileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon, and Michael Colgrass' Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957). Stereo LSC-6184.

* * *

Buffalo Evening News
D. 250,261 SAT. 200,069
JUN 22 1968

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

pieces is, are more
ply more inter-
than the perform-
es allow us to hear. The performance of the G minor Quartet by Szolchany with the Hungarian Quartet (Turnabout) is more vital and gives more of the piece.

I found, too, that the Guarneri-Rubinstein reading of the much later and superb C minor Quartet hardly survives comparison with the one by Claude Frank with Silverstein, Fine and Eskin, of the Boston Symphony (RCA), though the latter performance, one of the best chamber music records ever made, though available by itself in Europe, here comes buried in an otherwise exceedingly undistinguished three-record album by the B.S.O. Chamber Players. Finally, the Guarneri-Rubinstein version of the Schumann Quintet is lively, genial and attractive. RCA has done a good job with the recorded sound.

The performance of Brahms's F minor Piano Quintet with the Amadeus
tet and Christoph Es-(Deutsche Gram-
mooth

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 565,377
JUN 15 1969
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS—RCA LSC/LM 6184

RCA has released the second set from the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a three-record offering featuring works by Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos, and Colgrass. Claude Frank, piano, is guest artist. A fourth record, featuring Peter Ustinov providing a humorous survey of chamber music, is included as a bonus. Handsome packaging is a plus.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y
W 16,000
JUN 29 1968

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 132,[illegible] SAT. [illegible]
JUN 24 1968

These We Like...

By ANTHONY CRESSWELL
Journal Staff Writer

NINE CHAMBER music players from the Boston Symphony have recorded an unusually interesting program of short works from Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos and Colgrass for a three-record boxed album. Variety of material offered is indicated by the names of the composers. It ranges from Mozart's "Quintet in E Flat for Piano and Winds" (with Claude Frank as guest pianist) to Poulenc's "Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano" and Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon." A bonus record with Peter Ustinov surveying chamber music may appeal to some. RCA Victor, LM-LSC 6184.

A VERY INTERESTING album from RCA (LSC-6184) contains a potpourri of chamber music by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group from Boston's fine orchestra. Pianist Claude Frank is "guest artist" and a special bonus record has considerable commentary by Peter Ustinov.

On the three records are Mozart's piano quartet in G minor, and his quintet for piano and winds; Brahms' trio for horn, violin and piano, Opus 40; Schubert's string trio No. 1; Poulenc's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano; three bagatelles for oboe and bassoon by Haieff; Villa Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 6 for flute and bassoon, and Colgrass' variations for four drums and viola.

Why this particular assortment was chosen is a mystery, but one could hardly quibble with the fine playing as well as with most of the music itself.

The two Mozart pieces are beautifully played (Frank is a fine piano player) and the Poulenc trio is a spirited and utterly delightful piece of music. For these three works alone, the album would be worth the money.

Dallas Times Herald
SEP 8 1968

AMERICAN [illegible]
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY [illegible]
OCT 1969

103.

Disc Data

For Lovers of Chamber Music

✦ ✦ ✦ ✦

By Boston Symphony Players

By NELL LAWSON

RCA Victor's "The Boston Symphony Chamber Players," a boxed, 4-LP album, includes a "bonus" record with spoken commentary by Peter Ustinov, and if the album doesn't come up with special awards and honors, there is something amiss among the king makers.

Although the music of Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Colgrass, Villa Lobos and Haieff are special loves of this listener and performed with something close to the celestial, we turned first to Ustinov, remembering an earlier Boston Symphony Chamber player album with Ustinov remarks, his wit tempered with knowledge of music, and the charm of the man so winning and urbane.

In the new album — LSC-6180 Stereo — he says, "Chamber music really finds you out. This most intimate form of music which the people of Mozart's day used for entertainment before TV and Monopoly."

In speaking of Poulenc: "The music is delicate, clear, limpid and complicated, ideal chamber music."

"Avante guarde composers are leading themselves into a cul-de-sac."

The music, exquisitely played: Mozart, Piano Quartet in G Minor K 478 and Quartet in E-Flat for piano and Winds K 452; Brahms Trio in E-Flat for Horn, Violin and Piano, Op 40; Schubert String Trio No. 1 in B-Flat D 471; Poulenc Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano; Alezei Haieff's Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon; Villa Lobos Bachianas Brazileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon, and Michael Colgrass' Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957). Stereo LSC-6184.

* * *

Buffalo Evening News
D. 284,568 SAT. 299,069
JUN 22 1968

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

pieces
.. is, are more
..ply more inter-
than the perform-
..es allow us to hear. The performance of the G minor Quartet by Szolchany with the Hungarian Quartet (Turnabout) is more vital and gives more of the piece.

I found, too, that the Guarneri-Rubinstein reading of the much later and superb C minor Quartet hardly survives comparison with the one by Claude Frank with Silverstein, Fine and Eskin, of the Boston Symphony (RCA), though the latter performance, one of the best chamber music records ever made, though available by itself in Europe, here comes buried in an otherwise exceedingly undistinguished three-record album by the B.S.O. Chamber Players. Finally, the Guareri-Rubinstein version of the Schumann Quintet is lively, genial and attractive. RCA has done a good job with the recorded sound.

The performance of Brahms's F minor Piano Quintet with the Amadeus ..tet and Christoph Es- ..Deutsche Gram- ..mooth

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JUN 15 1969
New England Newsclip

This work is a historic highlight in the use of the flute in chamber music, and the Bostonians hit the jackpot with their sing-and-dance interpretation. The performance of the Schubert Trio is just as happy. It is a piece in the composer's light vein (he was just 20 when he wrote it), but relaxation does not eliminate expertness; this is music that deserves serious attention. (Schubert was just twenty when he wrote this and another string trio).

The instrumentality of the piano quartet makes possible a fullness of string grouping that can compete, if need be, much better with the sonority of the piano, inasmuch as the piano-trio medium (violin, cello, and piano) has no basic middle voice to register in full balance; a string instrument cannot be in more than one gamut at a time. The two piano quartets composed by Mozart are the first examples of the medium as we know it today. In the first work of the pair (the G minor) Mozart shows a disposition to pit the three strings (written in string-trio formations) against the piano. The Bostonians approach the music properly: there is passionate urgency in the first movement, a more relaxed attitude in the B flat slow movement, and a Haydnesque, joyous brio in the final rondo. The Brahms third and last piano quartet has no cakes-and-ale sections—the few lighter moments do not relieve the dark mood of the opening, and the scherzo is as feverish in its pace as the inquietude of the preceding movement. There is no trio in the latter; it is a one-stroke, telescoped, duple-pulsed idea. The blend of the strings with the piano throughout is wonderful, baring all of the Brahmsian lountiles. Special mention must be given to the performance of the magnificent song, dimmed with tears, that marks the slow movement.

There are three other Mozart pieces; the longest and most substantial of the flute quartets (in which Dorior Anthony Dwyer shows again that she is one of the best in the big league), the quartet for oboe and string trio, and the K. 452 Quintet—a true masterpiece. Gomberg is the hero of the K. 370 (the style of the piece favors the purgency of the oboe), and even in the virtuoso demeanor of the slow movement the music is never cheapened. The E flat Quintet, with its mixture of wind, brass, and keyboard instruments, though touched with feelings of concertante style, is fully in the field of chamber music. Mozart neither understated nor overestimated when he wrote his father, in 1784, that the K. 452 was "the best work I have ever composed."

One other Brahms work is included—the Op. 40 Trio for horn (or cello or viola, but either is indeed a poor substitute), violin, and piano. For rightness of phrasing, tempi, and style this performance cannot be bettered. Silverstein (who, as the only violinist present save Kirpi for the Piston, bears a tremendous responsibility in these recordings) is a supreme artist here; witness, e.g., the sensitive merge he makes with the horn in the darkness of the minor-keyed slow movement.

The Piston piece, with its French élan in neoclassic syntax, is properly divertting. The nonet medium is a rarity in chamber music and best balanced by combining, as does Piston, two dissimilar color groups (four wind, five strings). Mainly, however, Piston originates his work as a blend of tone, its composite force being in the service of his assured, very orderly

Boston Symphony maestro Erich Leinsdorf with Joseph Silverstein

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS—RCA LSC/LM 6184

RCA has released the second set from the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a three-record offering featuring works by Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos, and Colgrass. Claude Frank, piano, is guest artist. A fourth record, featuring Peter Ustinov providing a humorous survey of chamber music, is included as a bonus. Handsome packaging is a plus.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000
JUN 29 1968

style. The antagonisms in this music are more of harmonic and contrapuntal conflict than those of color.

It is a delight to have the Colgrass in a brand-new recording. (The first was on an old MGM disc [E-3714], with the composer playing percussion and Emanuel Vardi, who commissioned the piece, as violist.) RCA Victor's liner note gives no information whatsoever about the music. Counting the introduction there are eight divisions in the work. The drums are tunable with cardboard shells (like timpani). Esoteric in timbre combination, Colgrass's duo has a cleanness, an ease of sonority that is stimulating and refreshing. The lines are tonally clear-cut and sufficiently intense without going through the dramatics of the ultrachromatic cult. Naturally rhythmic values are exploited, but such vitality is not a preoccupation. Contemporary to the hilt, unusual in coloristic formation, these Variations are conceived in the same styled beauty as any set in the classic-romantic literature.

Two other duos are included: Haieff's Bagatelles and a Bachianas Brasileiras by Villa-Lobos. A woodwind duet must, of necessity, be limited to acute particulars; purely homophonic voices are incapable of two-voiced expansion, as is the case with string duets (double-stops, for example). Haieff's three movements are contrapuntal and slightly dissonant, helping to keep the lines separate and, thus, to maintain interest. Mainly perky (close-spaced), they are examples of musical hedonism. The Villa-Lobos is still another example of the transmutation of Bachian spirit in a Brazilian manner. Both instruments are equally treated, to a degree—for, though the part-writing is proportioned, the flute is assigned most of the pyrotechnical assertion.

Elliott Carter's two-movement Woodwind Quintet was composed 20 years ago, and is rather a far cry from his latest output. Full of the pert humor that only woodwinds in combination can convey, the music has a light facture but plenty of internal strength. Rhythm has always been a strong point in Carter's work, and that fascination is evident here. Less intensity pertains to Poulenc's Trio, though his balancing of sonority is a distinct joy. The scoring is so coupled with the instruments chosen that the very essence of the composition would vanish if any substitute were made. The worst "truth" that can be hurled at this composer is that he conceives his opinions in the accent of less used but categorically associated colors.

Copland's Vitebsk, a study on a Jewish theme (as he describes it) for piano, violin, and cello, suffered many years of inattention and until recently had enjoyed but one recording (on CRI). Then there appeared a vibrantly projected performance by the New Amsterdam Trio (on Decca), and a few months ago Columbia (CBS) released a version with Copland at the piano. Now the Bostonians give us a fourth! The trio represents Copland's single use of resource from his Jewish ancestry. It is intense music, rhythmically declarative, passionately brooding—virtually three-instrument symphonicism. Despite a tripartite design, the incursivity of the writing is sustained until the final measures bring resolution. The performance is of boiling registration.

Irving Fine's Fantasia (with his Partita for winds) has been performed more than any of his other works. It represents a hybrid of dodecaphonic technique applied to free-tonality, and the twain do meet successfully. The outer movements are both in slow tempo; the first is lyrical, the other more rhapsodic. The middle movement (marked Scherzo but of mordacious content) is nervous, driven by cross-accents; it is an example of virtuosity in motival crisscross. The passion that drives the music proves Fine's inspiration, and the present performance is equal to it.

I understand that RCA Victor will continue this BSO chamber series. I fervently hope so. I hope, too, that the format will be continued—including the "urbane and witty" data furnished by the indubitably urbane and witty Peter Ustinov.

A final word: RCA Victor's packaging and sound are of the finest. These recordings deserve a particular award.

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 142,517 SAT. 135,513
JUN 24 1968

These We Like...

By ANTHONY CRESSWELL
Journal Staff Writer

NINE CHAMBER music players from the Boston Symphony have recorded an unusually interesting program of short works from Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos and Colgrass for a three-record boxed album. Variety of material offered is indicated by the names of the composers. It ranges from Mozart's "Quintet in E Flat for Piano and Winds" (with Claude Frank as guest pianist) to Poulenc's "Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano" and Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon." A bonus record with Peter Ustinov surveying chamber music may appeal to some. RCA Victor, LM-LSC 6184.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
OCT 1968

A VERY INTERESTING album from RCA (LSC-6184) contains a potpourri of chamber music by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group from Boston's fine orchestra. Pianist Claude Frank is "guest artist" and a special bonus record has considerable commentary by Peter Ustinov.

On the three records are Mozart's piano quartet in G minor and his quintet for piano and winds; Brahms' trio for horn, violin and piano, Opus 40; Schubert's string trio No. 1; Poulenc's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano; three bagatelles for oboe and bassoon by Haieff; Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 6 for flute and bassoon, and Colgrass' variations for four drums and viola.

Why this particular assortment was chosen is a mystery, but one could hardly quibble with the fine playing as well as with most of the music itself.

The two Mozart pieces are beautifully played (Frank is a fine piano player) and the Poulenc trio is a spirited and utterly delightful piece of music. For these three works alone, the album would be worth the money.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 209,[illegible] SUN. 213,379
SEP 8 1968

By ARTHUR COHN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

ENTRANCING is the word for these chamber-music compilations, both of which abound in variety of color, unusual repertoire, and musical consequence. The scope of the 16 pieces (eight on each release) indicates conscientious planning. Fourteen different instrumental combinations are displayed, and even in the media found on both programs (string trio and piano quartet), the composers are neatly contrasted: Schubert with Fine and Mozart with Brahms, respectively. None of the compositions is overwhelmingly represented in the Schwann Catalog, and the Haieff and Piston are first recordings. The Carter and Colgrass works were once recorded but long ago deleted, and the Fine was to be heard only in a special University of Illinois album. Especially noteworthy here is the healthy balance between the classic-romantic choices and the contemporary ones; all of the latter, in turn, proceed from aesthetics that define historical interaction.

The performances are beautiful. Of course the individual talents of these musicians have long been apparent in the concerts and recordings of the Boston Symphony. Still, it is astonishing to find all of their ensembles so akin to those achieved by small groups that have been in partnership for years on end.

It is a joy to hear the Beethoven Serenade in its original form, rather than in the transcription for flute and piano. The Op. 25 is a gem of a work, too little known and too seldom performed. The clue to the entire composition lies in the qualification of the tempo marking for the last movement: (Allegro vivace) disinvolto ("free, easy, and graceful"). To this could be added "elfin, light as a bubble". But let it not be thought that this is merely a musical bonbon; there is solid covering on the creamy mellifluousness.

NOTE: Each album proper consists of six sides. In addition, the first listed contains a 10″ (double-faced) disc called "Chamber Music Discussion" in which Ustinov, Silverstein, and Erich Leinsdorf participate, with excerpts from six of the compositions. The second release also offers a bonus recording: a 12″ disc devoted to a "urbane and witty survey of chamber music" by Ustinov. —A.C.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players. MOZART: Quartet in D for Flute and Strings, K. 285; Quartet in F for Oboe and Strings, K. 370; BEETHOVEN: Serenade in D for Flute, Violin and Viola, Op. 25; BRAHMS: Quartet in C minor for Piano and Strings, Op. 60; FINE: Fantasia for String Trio (1957); COPLAND: Vitebsk (1929); CARTER: Woodwind Quintet (1948); PISTON: Divertimento for Nine Instruments (1946); Joseph Silverstein (violin); Burton Fine (viola); Jules Eskin (cello); Georges Moleux (bass); Doriot Anthony Dwyer (flute); Ralph Gomberg (oboe); Gino Cioffi (clarinet); Sherman Walt (bassoon); James Stagliano (horn); Alfred Krips (violin—associate); Claude Frank (piano—guest artist); Peter Ustinov (notes and commentary). RCA Victor set LM-6167 or Stereo LSC-6167, six sides plus 10″ disc, $17.37.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players. MOZART: Piano Quartet in G minor, K. 478; Quintet in E flat for Piano and Winds, K. 452; BRAHMS: Trio in E flat for Horn, Violin and Piano, Op. 40; SCHUBERT: String Trio No. 1 in B flat, D. 471; POULENC: Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano (1926); HAIEFF: Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon (1955); VILLA-LOBOS: Bachianas Brasileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon (1938); COLGRASS: Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957); Joseph Silverstein (violin); Burton Fine (viola); Jules Eskin (cello); Doriot Anthony Dwyer (flute); Ralph Gomberg (oboe); Gino Cioffi (clarinet); Sherman Walt (bassoon); James Stagliano (horn); Everett Firth (drums); Claude Frank (piano—guest artist); Peter Ustinov (commentary). RCA Victor set LM-6184 or Stereo LSC-6184, eight sides, $17.37.

that fascination is evident here. These [illegible] deserve a particular award.

Disc Data

For Lovers of Chamber Music

103.

By Boston Symphony Players

By NELL LAWSON

RCA Victor's "The Boston Symphony Chamber Players," a boxed, 4-LP album, includes a "bonus" record with spoken commentary by Peter Ustinov, and if the album doesn't come up with special awards and honors, there is something amiss among the king makers.

Although the music of Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Colgrass, Villa Lobos and Haieff are special loves of this listener and performed with something close to the celestial, we turned first to Ustinov, remembering an earlier Boston Symphony Chamber player album with Ustinov remarks, his wit tempered with knowledge of music, and the charm of the man so winning and urbane.

In the new album — LSC-6180 Stereo — he says, "Chamber music really finds you out. This most intimate form of music which the people of Mozart's day used for entertainment before TV and Monopoly."

In speaking of Poulenc: "The music is delicate, clear, limpid and complicated, ideal chamber music."

"Avante guarde composers are leading themselves into a cul-de-sac."

The music, exquisitely played: Mozart, Piano Quartet in G Minor K 478 and Quartet in E-Flat for piano and Winds K 452; Brahms Trio in E-Flat for Horn, Violin and Piano, Op 40; Schubert String Trio No. 1 in B-Flat D 471; Poulenc Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano; Alezei Haieff's Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon; Villa Lobos Bachianas Brazileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon, and Michael Colgrass' Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957). Stereo LSC-6184.

* * *

Buffalo Evening News
D. 284,568 SAT. 299,069
JUN 22 1968

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

pieces
s, are more
ply more inter-
than the perform-
es allow us to hear. The performance of the G minor Quartet by Szolchany with the Hungarian Quartet (Turnabout) is more vital and gives more of the piece.

I found, too, that the Guarneri-Rubinstein reading of the much later and superb C minor Quartet hardly survives comparison with the one by Claude Frank with Silverstein, Fine and Eskin, of the Boston Symphony (RCA), though the latter performance, one of the best chamber music records ever made, though available by itself in Europe, here comes buried in an otherwise exceedingly undistinguished three-record album by the B.S.O. Chamber Players. Finally, the Guarneri-Rubinstein version of the Schumann Quintet is lively, genial and attractive. RCA has done a good job with the recorded sound.

The performance of Brahms's F minor Piano Quintet with the Amadeus
-tet and Christoph Es-
Deutsche Gram-
-mooth

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JUN 15 1969
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS—RCA LSC/LM 6184

RCA has released the second set from the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a three-record offering featuring works by Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos, and Colgrass. Claude Frank, piano, is guest artist. A fourth record, featuring Peter Ustinov providing a humorous survey of chamber music, is included as a bonus. Handsome packaging is a plus.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000
JUN 29 1968

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 142,517 SAT. 135,513
JUN 24 1968

These We Like...

By ANTHONY CRESSWELL
Journal Staff Writer

NINE CHAMBER music players from the Boston Symphony have recorded an unusually interesting program of short works from Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos and Colgrass for a three-record boxed album. Variety of material offered is indicated by the names of the composers. It ranges from Mozart's "Quintet in E Flat for Piano and Winds" (with Claude Frank as guest pianist) to Poulenc's "Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano" and Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon." A bonus record with Peter Ustinov surveying chamber music may appeal to some. RCA Victor, LM-LSC 6184.

AMERICAN RECORD GU
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
OCT 1968

A VERY INTERESTING album from RCA (LSC-6184) contains a potpourri of chamber music by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group from Boston's fine orchestra. Pianist Claude Frank is "guest artist" and a special bonus record has considerable commentary by Peter Ustinov.

On the three records are Mozart's piano quartet in G minor and his quintet for piano and winds; Brahms' trio for horn, violin and piano, Opus 40; Schubert's string trio No. 1; Poulenc's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano; three bagatelles for oboe and bassoon by Haieff; Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 6 for flute and bassoon, and Colgrass' variations for four drums and viola.

Why this particular assortment was chosen is a mystery, but one could hardly quibble with the fine playing as well as with most of the music itself.

The two Mozart pieces are beautifully played (Frank is a fine piano player) and the Poulenc trio is a spirited and utterly delightful piece of music. For these three works alone, the album would be worth the money.

Dallas Times Herald
D. [illegible] 213,079
SEP 8 1968

104.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's
Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,973 SUN. 306,989

JUN 9 1968

On the Records

Boston Orchestra Group Draws Praise For Ambitious Chamber Music Program

By CHARLES F. KINZLY

THE MOST ambitious and comprehensive entry in the current cataloguing of chamber music which seems to become available every spring, like love poems — in considerable amount, is a boxed collection by the Chamber Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program, ranging from classical to contemporary, is contained on three LPs. A fourth disc is devoted to a discussion of chamber music by the knowledgable Peter Ustinov. The set, catalogued by RCA Victor as LSC 6184, is the second in a series recorded by the same personnel with Ustinov as commentator.

CLAUDE FRANK, pianist, is the only guest artist in the assemblage of men and women specialists of the Boston orchestra. They include Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Doriot A. Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn and Everett Firth, drums. Their performances are exemplary and the recorded sound is very good in a sampling of considerable range.

THEREIN MAY LIE THE RUB. The producers don't say whether the discs are available singly. If not, the lover of the classsical and romantic (Mozart, Schubert and Brahms) may feel disinclined to invest in a set which also contains items of neo-classical and contemporary stamp (Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos and Colgrass) and vice versa. In favor of the purchase, however, discounting considerations of high quality already mentioned, are the unifying comments of Ustinov and the novelty of unusual woodwind and percussion combinations in the modern compositions.

THE PROGRAM includes Mozart's Piano Quartet in G Minor (K. 478) and his Quintet in E Flat for piano and winds (K. 452); the Brahms Trio in E-Flat for horn, violin and piano (Op. 40); Schubert's String Trio No. 1 in B-Flat (D. 471); Poulenc's Trio for oboe, bassoon and piano (1926); Haieff's Three Bagatelles for oboe and bassoon (1955); the Villa-Lobos "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 6 for flute and bassoon (1938) and the Colgrass Variations for four drums and viola (1957).

Two of the orchestra's offshoot groups offer the widest degree of contrast: the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and the Boston Pops. Both are currently represented on the latest lists.

Ambitious

The Chamber Players are made up of the Boston's first desk men and are, of course, musicians of the first order. Their second recorded undertaking is an ambitious one that comes in the form of a three disc album (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 6184, also mono). Included in the contents are Mozart's Piano Quartet in G Minor and his Quintet in E Flat for Piano and Winds (Claude Frank is the admirable pianist): Brahms' Trio in E Flat for Horn, Violin, and Piano; Schubert's String Trio No. 1; Poulenc's Trio for Oboe, Bassoon, and Piano; Haieff's Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon; Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasilieras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon;" and Colgrass' Variations for Four Drums and Viola. The diversity of the repertoire has only to be listed to be recognized. As an extra, Victor offers a recorded discussion of chamber music by Peter Ustinov, aptly described as witty and urbane.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

Mozart: Quartet for Piano and Strings, in G minor, K. 478; Quintet for Piano and Winds, in E flat, K. 452. Brahms: Trio for Horn, Violin, and Piano, in E flat, Op. 40. Schubert: Trio for Strings, No. 1, in B flat, D. 471. Poulenc: Trio for Oboe, Bassoon, and Piano (1926). Haieff: Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon (1955). Villa Lobos: Bachianas Brasileiras, No. 6, for Flute and Bassoon (1938). Colgrass: Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957).

Boston Symphony Chamber Players, RCA Red Seal LM 6184 or LSC 6184, $17.37 (three discs).

This disc is presumably intended to be a sort of introduction to chamber music for those record buyers who to date have managed to resist the illusive charms of this intimate art. Thus it attempts to contain a bit of everything: the compositions range in medium from duo to quintet (mixing winds, strings, and piano liberally) and in chronology from Mozart to Michael Colgrass. To sweeten the pill the producers have also included on an extra, fourth disc, a recorded "lecture" by Peter Ustinov, apparently designed to win over the reluctant consumer faced with such musical austerity. Ustinov, to his credit, seems profoundly embarrassed by the whole thing and admits straight off that he is as surprised to find himself doing this as is the listener to find him. He then mumbles through two full sides of the record, pathetically attempting to lend some degree of mirth to a hopeless situation by recounting anecdotes (mostly about his own musical background, which seems to have been singularly lacking in distinction), imitating instruments, and attacking critics and twelve-tone composers. It is all terribly dull and old-hat, except for one marvelous imitation of a Webernesque composition, a gem of musical parody which almost saves the whole record. But finally, and most seriously, there remains the fact that Ustinov says nothing about the music that will be of value to the inexperienced listener. When he confesses at one point that it took a great deal of persuasion to get him to agree to make the record, we can only wonder why he finally capitulated.

As for the music, the desire to give the listener as much variety as possible creates a strange musical smorgasbord. The organization is rather like that of a concert in that pieces from various periods are included (although representatives from the baroque are conspicuously absent). It also resembles most concerts in that the quality of the twentieth-century pieces is considerably inferior to that of the traditional ones. The latter are, without exception, major works from the standard repertoire. The newer pieces are all decidedly lightweight, attractive enough in their own way but hardly up to the standard set by their companions.

Of the eight pieces included in this set, all but two—those by Alexei Haieff and Colgrass—are already available in several different recorded versions. The performances, by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (pianist Claude Frank being listed as a "guest artist") are on the whole very good, though I would think most record buyers would prefer to make their own choice of performances among the various possibilities in the catalogue. Nevertheless, the idea behind this set must have appeal for some: it is the second such collection to come from the Boston Players. R.P.M.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

OCT 6 1968

New England Newsclip

Recordings

By STELLA MILLS

THE BOSTON Symphony Chamber Players have made a four record album of a miscellaney of Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Colgrass, Villa- Lobos and Haieff.

As a bonus is a programmatic monologue by Peter Ustinov, who sounds off in witty survey on the art of music. He lampoons the 12-tone system, lapsing quickly from his regular narrative-self to miming of all kinds, and delivers an absolutely devastating satire on electronic music. He gurgles, spits, whorgles and kleeks in a perfect reproduction of the mysterious whiggles that type 'Music' made with the tape machine and its solid-state cousins. The Boston Chamber Players aquit themselves admirably, though for most of the way they seem pre-occupied.

The program itself is wide-ranging, from Mozart's K. 452 and K. 478 (E-Flat Quintet and G Minor Piano Quartet) to the Variations for Four Drums and Viola of Colgrass (1957).

Ustinov speaks of the repertoire kindly, describes the Boston musicians as "monstrously efficient" and dwells on the various pieces lightly, as he should, with obvious affection for most of the scores.

It seems the habit of the Boston Players to make their records in clusters, combining a variation of style and school, classic to contemporary. It sounds very fair, but rare is the music lover who would be interested in so much variety. As to Ustinov, whether he is tryin to bge a flute or a tape machine, he is a marvel of wit, worth the album price by himself.

THE ATLANTIC Aug. 1968

Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein, violin, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, James Stagliano, horn, Claude Frank, piano, and others; RCA Victor LSC-6184). A chamber music ragbag, including Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Poulenc, Villa-Lobos, Alexei Haieff, and one or two others. But some of the playing is simply beautiful — the Mozart G Minor Piano Quartet and Brahms's Horn Trio in E-flat, to name two.

The only false notes are struck by Peter Ustinov in an aimless and useless spoken introduction. At least they don't charge extra for it.

Syracuse Herald American 9/8/68

PROKOFIEV: Lieutenant Kijé — Suite, Op. 60.[1] Symphony No. 2, Op. 40. [1]David Clatworthy (baritone), Boston Symphony Orchestra (Erich Leinsdorf). RCA Victor SB 6794. 12in. 43*s*. 9*d*.

THIS IS THE FIRST time Leinsdorf and Rozhdestvensky have come into competition during their surveys of the Prokofiev symphonies, and the comparison is quite revealing. The Second Symphony suits the brilliant, hard-edged precision of the Boston orchestra like a glove, and as one knows from Leinsdorf's superb recording of the Third Symphony, he is a conductor capable of sustaining enormous rhythmic drive. His very fast speed for the first movement of the Second Symphony, however, is curiously unsatisfying. The playing is staggering in its precision and bite, the whole thing being superbly confident and aggressive, but it lacks the heaviness and weight of Rozhdestvensky's performance. The Russian performance is no less brilliant or virtuoso, but it brings out more effectively the symphonic stature of the noise, thus making this extraordinary aural assault more convincing as a musical phenomenon. Leinsdorf's performance is lighter, if the word 'light' can ever be applied to this movement, and there may be plenty of people who find it more appealing than I do, so I must emphasise that this view of the music is carried through with integrity and virtuosity.

The second of the work's two movements, a theme and six variations, is one of Prokofiev's most continuously inspired symphonic pieces, and Rozhdestvensky's performance of it is one of his finest recording achievements to date, alive to every nuance of texture, emotion, and form in the music. Leinsdorf, however, is equally good here; he shows a similarly acute ear for texture and balance, and characterises the variations (which cover a wide range of moods) with great point. The gorgeous opening theme is played with wonderful expressiveness, the grotesquely witty variations with splendid point and humour. Only at the beginning of the sixth variation, a return to the strife and turmoil of the first movement, did I wish for the music to snarl and growl more viciously, as it does in the Russian performance. But Leinsdorf achieves a superbly biting climax, and leads back to the gentle coda with, if anything, a shade more sensitivity.

On the whole, then, I find that Rozhdestvensky's first movement, with its imposing grandeur, gives him a slight advantage in the symphony. On the other hand, the RCA fill-up is much more satisfactory. The Russian coupling (on HMV) is the Suite from Le Pas d'Acier, by no means a negligible piece but given a heavy-handed performance by Rozhdestvensky which misses much of the humour and has a badly shaped finale. RCA give us the Suite from Lieutenant Kijé, a more familiar work perhaps but done for once with the baritone solo in the second and fourth movements (sung in Russian).

David Clatworthy has a good strong voice and sings idiomatically and expressively, but the real joy is the cool manner in which the humorous points are made. Leinsdorf draws needle-sharp precision from the orchestra, and plays the music very straight, but with a twinkle in his eye; the bass drum thumps during the fanfares in the opening movement are just that little bit overdone to emphasise the ridiculous aspect of the pomposity, and there are plenty of other touches of restrained but pointed humour. It is altogether a complete delight, and the final movement, The Burial of Kijé, achieves a wryly touching eloquence.

The recording throughout is a model of clarity, with reasonable bite. Despite my reservations about the first movement of the symphony, there is plenty of marvellous playing throughout the record, and Leinsdorf for the most part achieves memorable results. Those who are very keen to have the symphony and aren't worried about the fill-up would be well advised to try Rozhdestvensky's first movement before deciding, but I think on balance Kijé is so marvellously done that I might be tempted to go for the Leinsdorf disc. J.McC.

Records & Recording - 7-69

104.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's
Greatest Newspaper
D. 156,973 SUN. 306,989

JUN 9 1968

On the Records

Boston Orchestra Group Draws Praise For Ambitious Chamber Music Program

By CHARLES F. KINZLY

THE MOST ambitious and comprehensive entry in the current cataloguing of chamber music which seems to become available every spring, like love poems — in considerable amount, is a boxed collection by the Chamber Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program, ranging from classical to contemporary, is contained on three LPs. A fourth disc is devoted to a discussion of chamber music by the knowledgable Peter Ustinov. The set, catalogued by RCA Victor as LSC 6184, is the second in a series recorded by the same personnel with Ustinov as commentator.

CLAUDE FRANK, pianist, is the only guest artist in the assemblage of men and women specialists of the Boston orchestra. They include Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Doriot A. Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn and Everett Firth, drums. Their performances are exemplary and the recorded sound is very good in a sampling of considerable range.

THEREIN MAY LIE THE RUB. The producers don't say whether the discs are available singly. If not, the lover of the classsical and romantic (Mozart, Schubert and Brahms) may feel disinclined to invest in a set which also contains items of neo-classical and contemporary stamp (Poulenc, Haieff, Villa-Lobos and Colgrass) and vice versa. In favor of the purchase, however, discounting considerations of high quality already mentioned, are the unifying comments of Ustinov and the novelty of unusual woodwind and percussion combinations in the modern compositions.

THE PROGRAM includes Mozart's Piano Quartet in G Minor (K. 478) and his Quintet in E Flat for piano and winds (K. 452); the Brahms Trio in E-Flat for horn, violin and piano (Op. 40); Schubert's String Trio No. 1 in B-Flat (D. 471); Poulenc's Trio for oboe, bassoon and piano (1926); Haieff's Three Bagatelles for oboe and bassoon (1955); the Villa-Lobos "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 6 for flute and bassoon (1938) and the Colgrass Variations for four drums and viola (1957).

Two of the orchestra's offshoot groups offer the widest degree of contrast: the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and the Boston Pops. Both are currently represented on the latest lists.

Ambitious

The Chamber Players are made up of the Boston's first desk men and are, of course, musicians of the first order. Their second recorded undertaking is an ambitious one that comes in the form of a three disc album (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 6184, also mono). Included in the contents are Mozart's Piano Quartet in G Minor and his Quintet in E Flat for Piano and Winds (Claude Frank is the admirable pianist); Brahms' Trio in E Flat for Horn, Violin, and Piano; Schubert's String Trio No. 1; Poulenc's Trio for Oboe, Bassoon, and Piano; Haieff's Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon; Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasilieras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon;" and Colgrass' Variations for Four Drums and Viola. The diversity of the repertoire has only to be listed to be recognized. As an extra, Victor offers a recorded discussion of chamber music by Peter Ustinov, aptly described as witty and urbane.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

Mozart: Quartet for Piano and Strings, in G minor, K. 478; Quintet for Piano and Winds, in E flat, K. 452. Brahms: Trio for Horn, Violin, and Piano, in E flat, Op. 40. Schubert: Trio for Strings, No. 1, in B flat, D. 471. Poulenc: Trio for Oboe, Bassoon, and Piano (1926). Haieff: Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon (1955). Villa Lobos: Bachianas Brasileiras, No. 6, for Flute and Bassoon (1938). Colgrass: Variations for Four Drums and Viola (1957).

Boston Symphony Chamber Players, RCA RED SEAL LM 6184 or LSC 6184, $17.37 (three discs).

This disc is presumably intended to be a sort of introduction to chamber music for those record buyers who to date have managed to resist the illusive charms of this intimate art. Thus it attempts to contain a bit of everything: the compositions range in medium from duo to quintet (mixing winds, strings, and piano liberally) and in chronology from Mozart to Michael Colgrass. To sweeten the pill the producers have also included on an extra, fourth disc, a recorded "lecture" by Peter Ustinov, apparently designed to win over the reluctant consumer faced with such musical austerity. Ustinov, to his credit, seems profoundly embarrassed by the whole thing and admits straight off that he is as surprised to find himself doing this as is the listener to find him. He then mumbles through two full sides of the record, pathetically attempting to lend some degree of mirth to a hopeless situation by recounting anecdotes (mostly about his own musical background, which seems to have been singularly lacking in distinction), imitating instruments, and attacking critics and twelve-tone composers. It is all terribly dull and old-hat, except for one marvelous imitation of a Webernesque composition, a gem of musical parody which almost saves the whole record. But finally, and most seriously, there remains the fact that Ustinov says nothing about the music that will be of value to the inexperienced listener. When he confesses at one point that it took a great deal of persuasion to get him to agree to make the record, we can only wonder why he finally capitulated.

As for the music, the desire to give the listener as much variety as possible creates a strange musical smorgasbord. The organization is rather like that of a concert in that pieces from various periods are included (although representatives from the baroque are conspicuously absent). It also resembles most concerts in that the quality of the twentieth-century pieces is considerably inferior to that of the traditional ones. The latter are, without exception, major works from the standard repertoire. The newer pieces are all decidedly lightweight, attractive enough in their own way but hardly up to the standard set by their companions.

Of the eight pieces included in this set, all but two—those by Alexei Haieff and Colgrass—are already available in several different recorded versions. The performances, by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (pianist Claude Frank being listed as a "guest artist") are on the whole very good, though I would think most record buyers would prefer to make their own choice of performances among the various possibilities in the catalogue. Nevertheless, the idea behind this set must have appeal for some: it is the second such collection to come from the Boston Players. R.P.M.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

OCT 6 1968

New England Newsclip

Recordings

By STELLA MILLS

THE BOSTON Symphony Chamber Players have made a four record album of a miscellaney of Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Poulenc, Colgrass, Villa- Lobos and Haieff.

As a bonus is a programmatic monologue by Peter Ustinov, who sounds off in witty survey on the art of music. He lampoons the 12-tone system, lapsing quickly from his regular narrative-self to miming of all kinds, and delivers an absolutely devastating satire on electronic music. He gurgles, spits, whorgles and kleeks in a perfect reproduction of the mysterious whiggles that type 'Music' made with the tape machine and its solid-state cousins. The Boston Chamber Players aquit themselves admirably, though for most of the way they seem pre-occupied.

The program itself is wide-ranging, from Mozart's K. 452 and K. 478 (E-Flat Quintet and G Minor Piano Quartet) to the Variations for Four Drums and Viola of Colgrass (1957).

Ustinov speaks of the repertoire kindly, describes the Boston musicians as "monstrously efficient" and dwells on the various pieces lightly, as he should, with obvious affection for most of the scores.

It seems the habit of the Boston Players to make their records in clusters, combining a variation of style and school, classic to contemporary. It sounds very fair, but rare is the music lover who would be interested in so much variety. As to Ustinov, whether he is tryin to bge a flute or a tape machine, he is a marvel of wit, worth the album price by himself.

The Atlantic Aug. 1968

Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein, violin, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, James Stagliano, horn, Claude Frank, piano, and others; RCA Victor LSC-6184). A chamber music ragbag, including Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Poulenc, Villa-Lobos, Alexei Haieff, and one or two others. But some of the playing is simply beautiful — the Mozart G Minor Piano Quartet and Brahms's Horn Trio in E-flat, to name two.

The only false notes are struck by Peter Ustinov in an aimless and useless spoken introduction. At least they don't charge extra for it.

Syracuse Herald American 9/8/68

PROKOFIEV: Lieutenant Kijé — Suite, Op. 60.' Symphony No. 2, Op. 40. 'David Clatworthy (baritone). Boston Symphony Orchestra (Erich Leinsdorf). RCA Victor S SB 6794. 12in. 43*s*. 9*d*.

THIS IS THE FIRST time Leinsdorf and Rozhdestvensky have come into competition during their surveys of the Prokofiev symphonies, and the comparison is quite revealing. The Second Symphony suits the brilliant, hard-edged precision of the Boston orchestra like a glove, and as one knows from Leinsdorf's superb recording of the Third Symphony, he is a conductor capable of sustaining enormous rhythmic drive. His very fast speed for the first movement of the Second Symphony, however, is curiously unsatisfying. The playing is staggering in its precision and bite, the whole thing being superbly confident and aggressive, but it lacks the heaviness and weight of Rozhdestvensky's performance. The Russian performance is no less brilliant or virtuoso, but it brings out more effectively the symphonic stature of the noise, thus making this extraordinary aural assault more convincing as a musical phenomenon. Leinsdorf's performance is lighter, if the word 'light' can ever be applied to this movement, and there may be plenty of people who find it more appealing than I do, so I must emphasise that this view of the music is carried through with integrity and virtuosity.

The second of the work's two movements, a theme and six variations, is one of Prokofiev's most continuously inspired symphonic pieces, and Rozhdestvensky's performance of it is one of his finest recording achievements to date, alive to every nuance of texture, emotion, and form in the music. Leinsdorf, however, is equally good here; he shows a similarly acute ear for texture and balance, and characterises the variations (which cover a wide range of moods) with great point. The gorgeous opening theme is played with wonderful expressiveness, the grotesquely witty variations with splendid point and humour. Only at the beginning of the sixth variation, a return to the strife and turmoil of the first movement, did I wish for the music to snarl and growl more viciously, as it does in the Russian performance. But Leinsdorf achieves a superbly biting climax, and leads back to the gentle coda with, if anything, a shade more sensitivity.

On the whole, then, I find that Rozhdestvensky's first movement, with its imposing grandeur, gives him a slight advantage in the symphony. On the other hand, the RCA fill-up is much more satisfactory. The Russian coupling (on HMV) is the Suite from Le Pas d'Acier, by no means a negligible piece but given a heavy-handed performance by Rozhdestvensky which misses much of the humour and has a badly shaped finale. RCA give us the Suite from Lieutenant Kijé, a more familiar work perhaps but done for once with the baritone solo in the second and fourth movements (sung in Russian).

David Clatworthy has a good strong voice and sings idiomatically and expressively, but the real joy is the cool manner in which the humorous points are made. Leinsdorf draws needle-sharp precision from the orchestra, and plays the music very straight, but with a twinkle in his eye; the bass drum thumps during the fanfares in the opening movement are just that little bit overdone to emphasise the ridiculous aspect of the pomposity, and there are plenty of other touches of restrained but pointed humour. It is altogether a complete delight, and the final movement, The Burial of Kijé, achieves a wryly touching eloquence.

The recording throughout is a model of clarity, with reasonable bite. Despite my reservations about the first movement of the symphony, there is plenty of marvellous playing throughout the record, and Leinsdorf for the most part achieves memorable results. Those who are very keen to have the symphony and aren't worried about the fill-up would be well advised to try Rozhdestvensky's first movement before deciding, but I think on balance Kijé is so marvellously done that I might be tempted to go for the Leinsdorf disc. J.McC.

Records & Recording - 7-69

THE MUSICIANS

105

The New Haven Register
SUNDAY, AUGUST 4, 1968

Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor Erich Leinsdorf.

Photo by Karsh of Ottawa

Boston's Leinsdorf A 'Critical Editor'

By GORDON EMERSON
Register Music Reviewer

(Editor's Note: This is the third in a series of articles concerning musical interpretation and the relationship between composer and performer.)

If one were to discuss musical interpretation prior to the early or mid-19th Century the conductor would in all probability only be fleetingly mentioned. Though the omission of this singularly important person would be unthinkable now when considering matters musical, it has not always been this way.

During the 18th Century the primary function of a "conductor" was to beat time and create temporal musical order within a large ensemble. He was usually occupied with playing an instrument himself—most frequently the harpsichord, organ or violin—and the whole notion of imposing his own musical will on the other musicians in the ensemble was not yet a major part of his function. If he had composed what was being performed, which was often the case, his "time beating," to say the least, was looked upon as reasonably authentic. Bach and Handel conducted many of their own works from the keyboard with nods of the head and occasional gestures of the hand, and Haydn and Beethoven were also early "time beaters" (often referred to in German by that name: "Taktschlaeger").

Obviously, if the composer himself was in charge of rehearsals, his will would prevail to the extent that available forces would allow it to do so, but the conductor as an interpretive middleman had not yet really come upon the scene to any large degree. Johann Wenzel Stamitz of the famous Mannheim Orchestra—a prolific composer himself—is a notable exception, and during the first half of the 18th Century his orchestra was known as a model of ensemble finesse throughout Europe due to his thorough and meticulous approach to rehearsal procedure.

The introduction of the baton around 1820 was to eventually emancipate the player—part-time conductor, and make him the focal point of what is now the most complex "instrument" in the history of music—the full symphony orchestra. Since its early use by such pioneer conductors — at least in the modern sense—as Mendelssohn, Spohr and von Bulow, the rise of the modern day "virtuoso conductor" has been swift and decisive. He has been described variously as an artist, genius, ego-maniac and martinet, in addition to other less savory epithets, but the course of music has never been quite the same since he went into musical orbit. In terms of the transmission of serious music to a large audience, the conductor is, in fact, preeminent as a musical interpreter in today's concert-world.

If one were to list the truly great present-day conductors, Erich Leinsdorf —responsible for the "Golden Roar" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1962—would surely be included. Prior to assuming his duties as Musical Director of the Boston Orchestra (affectionately referred to as the BSO by followers), Mr. Leinsdorf was principal conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra from 1943 to '47, and the Rochester Philharmonic from 1947 to '56. Born in Vienna, Austria, he was assistant to conductors Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini during the 1936 and '37 seasons of the Salzburg Festival, and made his American conducting debut on January 21, 1938, at the Metropolitan Opera through Toscanini's suggestion. The following season he became chief conductor of the German repertoire at the Met, and returned there as musical consultant and conductor after his work in Cleveland and Rochester. He has since guest - conducted leading ensembles throughout the world.

The following exclusive interview, which concerns the relationship of composer to interpreter and conductor to players, was taped recently at Tanglewood. Mr. Leinsdorf expressed an avid interest in the inherent problems that exist in musical interpretation, and his answers to relevant questions are often strikingly original, and beautifully expressed. He is an exceedingly vital man, and though English is not his native

See LEINSDORF Page 6

106

▸Leinsdorf Views Conductor's Role As 'Critical Editor'

(Continued from Page 1)

tongue, he is an uncommonly articulate and colorful speaker.

My only comment to Mr. Leinsdorf before our interview began was that the questions would be general in concept, and that he should feel free to elaborate on them as he wished. He graciously offered so much of his time and provided such an abundance of interesting and imaginative material that the present series of articles concerning musical interpretation will be extended one more week to include the conclusion of our conversation.

• • •

Is it reasonable to state that the conductor is like a performer in the sense that his instrument is the orchestra?

Absolutely yes. The orchestra is the instrument of the conductor. We can equate the conductor with any other performer since the pianist has the piano, the violinist has the violin, the string quartet has its four instruments, and the conductor works with the orchestra.

What do you feel to be the basic relationship between the composer and conductor?

The composer's score may be like a sketch of a play with some directions to the stage director, or like a blueprint which the architect supplies to the builder. It is important to distinguish between the two. Different styles and eras of composition have given more or less specific directives to the performer, and I would say, as a broad statement, that the fewer specific directives the composer gives, and the more that he relies on the actual notes only, the longer are the chances of his music surviving. I feel this to be so because it does not limit or inhibit the freedom of the performer.

The reason why the Baroque is back again with us so strongly today, is not only that it can be heard through the microphone and the amplifier, which of course has made the weak instruments audible, but it is also that the music of the Baroque gives the performer the largest leeway in interpreting the musical text. Richard Strauss' music is going to last a very short time because he gives such minute descriptions to the performer that with a change of fashion, with a change of taste, his music will not appeal anymore since it can be played only more or less in the way in which he has minutely directed and described it. If this is perhaps not clear let me state it this way: The fewer stage directions the composer gives on top of his actual text to be sung or played, the longer his music has a chance to last because he relies on the self-evidence and the flexibility of the music itself. On the other hand, the composer who thinks that he has to tell the performer everything—such as what fingering to take, what kind of harmonics to use, how fast the metronome is to go—this composer restricts the life expectancy of his work more.

That's an interesting point, and one which I have never heard expressed quite that way.

It's just the opposite of what one would expect, and when musicians say, 'why can't we have more specific indications,' I always come back with this kind of reply: 'You don't really want specific indications because it limits you.'

Leinsdorf leading Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Does your musical approach always become clear to you after studying a score?

The purpose of study is to become more at ease with the score, of course, but we must distinguish between the music that we know, and that which we don't know as well or—because it is new—don't yet know at all.

There is one type of score with which one has grown up. We might describe it with the somewhat pompous term: 'The Heritage.' You know—what we've heard when we were in our teens and when we went to the concert cycles and to the operas in Vienna, and what we were taught at the Academy. That is our so-called 'glorious tradition', and, for instance, when it comes to restudying a work by Mozart or Beethoven or Brahms before a performance, one never looks at his score. One goes maybe, for a walk and begins to think 'now how is this, and how is that, and how is the other.'

But it is completely different with things that appear on our horizon along newer lines. The new composers often use new notations, for example, and we have to study this. A composer sometimes comes to my house or to Symphony Hall to show me what it means in orchestral terms when he utilizes a certain type of graph. So I have to learn the new notations and I have to learn how to conduct some of these semi-aleotoric things where the composer wants the conductor to be the time clock rather than the musical leader. Also, of course there is some music with which we did not grow up, and one has to dig in a little more with this music and learn it, so to speak, from scratch. It's like a newer language, or a dialect of the language which you have to master.

After studying a score that is not a part of the 'glorious heritage' to which you refer, do you sometimes take an artistic chance in the sense that you intuitively want to shape or guide things in a manner that is not necessarily indicated in the score?

You are perfectly right that I have this opportunity but I will admit to you that it has not always been this way. One has to liberate oneself somewhat from the tradition that every score in our repertory is an untouchable, unchangeable, unmarkable masterwork. I have lots of ideas not only about this, but also about the approach to scores of the classical repertory which have various text versions. I have a great many different opinions from the musicologist about the performance of classical music, so when you come to that point, please do remind me to talk more about this.

Why don't you expound on it now.

There are, for instance in the case of the classical symphonies (I am speaking now primarily of the music prior to 1800), various versions and editions extant. Particularly since the early 1950s, musicologists have begun to dig around the libraries in Europe, and have come up with new versions of old works. This means that they have found manuscripts, they have located when they were made, and suddenly there has come into our lives some sort of arbitration proceeding that for every work there is supposed to be a final, authentic, last word:—you know, the 'real McCoy,' like the text of the Bible, or the folio edition of Shakespeare. Now this, is my view, is a concoction and does not really exist.

When you examine the processes not only of composition in the 18th Century, but of authorship in general, you will find that anybody who writes or composes gets, at one point, a galley proof. A reinearsal of a new work is, after all, about like a galley proof for the composer. Now, in that rehearsal he will notice things which he doesn't like. He may say to the first bassoon played, 'Would you please slur those two notes and not tongue them.' So, the bassoon player makes a pencil-mark to that effect in his part, and the composer — busy to hear the next thing—does not enter this particular advice in his own or any other score. A score will then go, after his death, into a library, to be dug-up by an eager musicologist. But no score — neither the autograph, nor the first printing, nor the coypist's copy — has this. Therefore we must presume that the tonguing is right and the slur is wrong. Well, the opposite happens to have been the truth in that particular performance.

Eternal Verities

It is perfectly possible that in a performance which I am doing today, I find that our bassoon player renders this place better if he does the slur instead of tonguing or vice versa. I am perfectly at liberty to do it either way because there are many ad hoc directives that composers give which are then made to seem eternal verities, you see? And there I think the musicologists have blown themselves up to a pompous size, and have over-awed a lot of anxious and timid people with their wisdom and their knowledge.

No one copy of any old work is, in my view, the final answer, and I think that the interpreter must consult — particularly in the works of Mozart and Haydn — every available edition, or, in the case of Bach, every available transcription of the same work because Bach used the same music over and over again, as you know. Then, in looking over these various versions he should decide, entirely according to his own taste and predilection, what to use.

Let me offer you some proof of how the musicologist and the people who edit old scores really only reprint uncritically what they find in the old copies. In the Concerto K. 491 of Mozart, in the second movement — I think it is in measure 40 — there is an error by Mozart. I sent to the Royal Library in London for a photostat of that page when I conducted 491, in order to find out if this is in fact, a Mozart writing error, or if not, where it first appeared. I am now satisfied that the error is Mozart's, and I can also tell you that it happened because Mozart filled-in the solo piano part after he had written down the orchestral score. Since Mozart wrote fast and wrote most things down from memory this is a perfectly explicable error. It's a very simple one, too, because that phrase — that passage — that bar — exists in two different harmonic versions which are incompatible with each other. But in measure 40 he puts them together at the same time, and they can't be performed at the same time. You have to decide then, either you are going to use Version A of this measure or Version B. But there is not one edition of this Concerto where there is even an asterisk which notes this to be an autograph error, and that every performer must decide how to correct it. I know, I think, four or five editions of K 491, and I have never found any comment by any editor concerning this error.

Critical Editor

So, the point is really this: At the moment you come to active performance you have to become a critical editor of the text. The main burden of my contention is that there is no one edition of any Mozart or Haydn or Bach which I will, sight unseen, accept as an authentic one, no matter how recently it has been published, and no matter whose signature it has beneath it, because I consider that the musicologists have among themselves the same kinds of dog-fights as any other profession; I am right, you are wrong, my analyst can beat your analyst—you know. I mean it is always my dad can outrun your dad, and all this sort of prestige business. Well, I don't have any part of the prestige between various musicologists, and therefore I do what I think will be best in performance. It may have been the composer's wish at the performance in Vienna or the performance in Prague, or perhaps when he assisted a performance in London, because there simply is no one definitive version.

If you will, also take the case of Handel. There are a number of versions of 'The Messiah,' and Handel changed the work to suit various performers. Well, that means there is no final authenticity to any one version, and one of my contentions is that if you must, for some reasons of your own conviction or compulsion — if you must say that there is one version to which you will subscribe wholeheartedly and make no changes, you might as well go back to the composer's first complete draft before he began to make changes. If there is one, I would never take the last one, I would always take the first one because the last one is most of the time the result of adjustments, compromises, and even changes sometimes necessitated by insufficiencies of players. These are things that one has to consider.

Last year here at Tanglewood, I presented what proved to be an American premiere of the first version (1805) of the Beethoven opera. I say the Beethoven opera because one is even dubious as to what it should be called. Beethoven wanted the title 'Leonore,' and the theatre manager insisted that it should not be called 'Leonore' because there was a competing opera called 'Leonore ou amour conjugal' by another composer named Paer. So before we ever get to any music, we start already with the fact that we don't even know how to title that work. Beethoven wanted to call it 'Leonore,' but a theatre manager worried not about Beethoven, but about his box office, and about the dismal situation in 1805 in Vienna with the French Occupation. The theatre manager says I don't want 'Leonore' or they will think that it is another rehash of the Paer opera. So they look through the text and they say that the title should be 'Fidelio.' But maybe Beethoven didn't want to call it Fidelio. Well, what should we call it? You see what I mean.

In any case, I did this performance of the 1805 version, and it was quite an event because nobody had ever heard it. Now I feel that many many things in that first version should be coming into the final version of 'Fidelio' which is the only one that has always been performed in our lifetime and prior to that. As a matter of fact, up until 1905, which was the centennial of the first 'Leonore,' no attempt was made to resuscitate that work. And then a man by the name of, I think, Prieger, did a big musicological job and reconstructed that original version. He did a superb job. But I would now want, if for instance I were asked to conduct a new production of 'Fidelio'—of the, known, conventional 'Fidelio' — I would put some portions of that original version into it which I think are superior. I would mix the two versions and by so doing would probably invite an anathema over my head. But my head stands up quite well under it.

(In next week's article Mr. Leinsdorf offers comments on Webern, Toscanini, and the responsibility of the listener.)

REGISTER (e)
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
CIRC. 104,800

AUG 4 1968

New England Newsclip

Conductor: Democrat Or Tyrant?

(EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the final installment in a series of articles concerning musical interpretation and the relationship between composer and performer.)

By GORDON EMERSON
Register Music Reviewer

A few years ago a well-known painter-lithographer convinced me by his comments that some fellow artists—to say nothing of the lay public—do not understand what it is that the musical performer really does.

This particular painter was complaining about public apathy and lack of understanding concerning modern art works in general and painting in particular. I mentioned that the problem of communication is less complicated in the visual arts than in music since there is no middleman who must interpret the creator's message before it reaches his audience. The artist replied that the painter's hand does not always do what he wants it to either (implying that a performer is an extension of the composer's ("hand"), and therein lies part of the misunderstanding that surrounds the function of the performer and conductor.

Should the performer merely be an extension of the composer's visions and insights (as Stravinsky has intimated), or should he bring ideas and sensitivities of his own to a musical score that may even significantly alter it before it reaches the ears of the listener?

Obviously the answer will vary, at least in some details, from performer to performer, but in general they are deeply concerned with artistic honesty and have no desire to radically change a composer's message. Certainly not if they have faith in his work. Due to the nature of the musical language, however, performers must interpret a score as they understand it, that is, they can only reconstruct the part of a composer's intent that is implied as they feel he might have wanted it. This partially explains why two performances of a Bach "Brandenburg Concerto" for example, may be quite different in concept, but no less valid artistically.

In last week's article famed Maestro Erich Leinsdorf offered several insights into the stuff of which musical interpretation is made, and he alluded to interpretive latitude when he stated that in his opinion "the fewer specific directives the composer gives, and the more that he relies on the actual notes only, the longer are the chances of his music surviving." The following comments by Maestro Leinsdorf are taken from the same exclusive interview, and they serve to conclude the current series of articles on musical interpretation.

Erich Leinsdorf

Obviously a conductor and a solo performer must approach the interpretation of a musical work in a different manner. Would you say that the conductor should desire some feedback from his players, and is the orchestra in any way a democratic situation or or is it totally an autocratic one?

If we speak of a fine professional orchestra, then the players are artists in their own right, and any conductor who tries to shackle them with the minutiae of his own ideas is going to shortchange himself and the music rather than to help along these things. So without going into the political elements of democracy or dictatorship I would rather put it this way: that the entire position of a conductor changes radically depending on the type of orchestra with which he is working.

If, for instance, he is working with an orchestra (and let me not offend the orchestra) in Lima, Peru, the situation would be quite different from conducting a polished orchestra comprised of solid professionals. I speak of Lima, Peru, because I remember years ago I had lunch in Europe with the late Erich Kleiber, who spent several years working with South American orchestras. He loved to go to inferior orchestras and teach them. He preferred this to conducting a top orchestra and he enjoyed working with them on the basis of, say, almost musical equality.

I do not have this particular penchant. I like to work fast—which means working with accomplished people—and I love to get the ideas of a good musician who, for instance, wants to play a solo differently from the way I might play it if I were the horn or the oboe or the clarinet player.

I might add that I have here a very great precedent, which is none other than Toscanini. He once said to me, 'When I come to an orchestra which I don't know, and I rehearse a symphony — say the First Brahms—if one of the first chair players renders a solo passage in a somewhat different manner from the way in which I would conceive it, I think for a moment: Well, it can go this way also. I let the fellow alone, I don't make any corrections, and in the end I get a better part of him than if I tried to change him—which means change his personality—which I can't do anyhow. I can make him play it the way I want, but he won't do it with that full conviction which he has in his own way. Of course, if his own way goes too far astray from mine, then I've got to come to terms with him.

See CONDUCTOR Page 6

► Conductor: Must He Be A Tyrant Or A Democrat?

(Continued from Page 1)

Liberal Fellow

And, my goodness, I must tell you, that in working with the old man for many years I saw that he did not only claim this, he was also practicing it. He was a very, very liberal fellow and always let good artists have their way. He was very flexible, he was not arbitrary, and these are facets of his personality which I think the world does not know. He was made out—perhaps for reasons of public imagery, because it's so much more talked about and so much more of a conversation piece—to be a martinet and a dictator who knew everything better than anyone else. But the opposite is really the truth.

You really suggested the key to the whole thing when you asked if the orchestra is the instrument of the conductor. As I stated before, this is true, but there is one great difference between ivory keys, metal strings, the wood in a violin, and the players: Players are human beings.

In a large group there may be two or three, or 20 or 30, who are just routine fellows. They play their instrument well enough to be there, and they go with the choir in which they play. But, on the other hand, there are perhaps 30 or 40 who have studied very seriously beyond just their instrument. These people have developed their own musical personalities and they have ideas about interpretation. Now to shackle them would be a fatal error.

You know, one of the ingredients which a conductor must have is a certain kind of applied psychology which the pianist, the violinist or the singer does not need. The singer deals with his own larynx, and the player deals with an inanimate instrument which he can treat any way he likes. For instance, I can practice the piano for seven hours, and, if I can stand it, the piano can stand it. You cannot rehearse an orchestra for seven hours in one day, however, and still have the orchestra be able to perform. The musicians will either revolt or be dead. So there are vast differences between a conductor and soloist.

The pianist begins the practice of a piece when he doesn't know a single note, for example. But if the conductor ever starts a rehearsal not knowing a single note he will be out by the exit door before the first hour of the rehearsal is over. As a conductor you have to be fully prepared: you have to know how every bar should sound, you have to know what the overall line is. In other words, the conductor must know the piece intimately from beginning to end before he ever meets with the orchestra.

Also, the conductor, unlike the pianist or violinist, has absolutely no instrument to practice on. Before he approaches the orchestra he can only study the work by looking at it, reading it, and hearing it in his inner-ear. This leads me to a little side remark too: When a conductor sets out to study a score he had better stay away from the phonograph record. Any conductor who studies his score from a phonograph record is never going to form his own ideas about a piece because he is already hearing the work through somebody else's interpretation.

You mentioned earlier that, in a broad sense, you feel a composer's work will survive to the extent that he relies on the notes themselves and not on other directives to the performers.

Yes. These are shackles rather than helpful hints, and in the overall picture of music history I would say so unqualifiedly.

Do you feel that Webern falls into this category?

Probably. At this moment he is riding the crest of the wave. Webern has his fashion now, and therefore everything he says is the Bible. Musicians watch his every little marking with the most minute interest. But if music is in any way going to be the same kind of art which it has been for the past centuries he is going to have a shorter life span than if he relied entirely on the music which he wrote.

To begin with, Webern is the first composer with whom the sound and the design are one. If one compares it to painting, it would be where the color and the drawing—the drawing and the painting—are synonymous. Consider, for example, Michelangelo. If you look at a black and white print of the ceiling of the Sistine, you are not going to get the full value of the work, but you will get an idea of the grandeur of the design, of the concept, of the figures. You are going to get a great deal of the emotion just as you would if you participated in a four-handed piano arrangement of a Beethoven symphony. We know, of course, that it isn't the orchestra, but if two amateurs play it they will be thrilled by it. If you make a transcription today for piano two hands, four hands, six hands, eight hands or what have you of any Webern piece, however, you get nothing. This is partly because of the way in which he utilized the orchestral instruments out of their traditional ranges: The tuba very high, the flute very low, the viola very high and so on. This is to say that the Klangfarben melody—the sonorities, the sounds, the combinations of the instruments, the way the instruments are used—cannot be duplicated except in the original garb and vestment which Webern devised for it.

Now this already limits the distribution of a piece because it means that nobody can obtain any Webern to play at home. If you don't have the right instruments you just can't perform it. So if you play a Webern piece on the piano you get nothing, since the pitches which you can reproduce on the piano are meaningless without the color with which he invests them. At this moment color and design have become one, and any transcription becomes impossible. In his own time of reign, then, this limits people's acquaintance with his works.

In the 19th Century amateurs got acquainted with the great symphonic and operatic works by reproducing them at home under vastly reduced musical circumstances. Did you know that Beethoven transcribed his "Second Symphony' for piano, violin and cello? He himself made the transcription. Now why did he do this? He did it for the sale of sheet music to amateurs who wanted to play the piece. We all grew up madly playing symphonies at the piano four hands, and I learned the symphonic repertory when I was in my teens by playing such transcriptions.

Playing symphonic reduction is, to say the least great fun.

I should say so, and it also teaches you a great deal.

If a composer has been exceedingly explicit with interpretive indications—such as Webern, as opposed to one who has not been very explicit—such as Bach, do you feel that it lessens or heightens the importance of the interpreter?

The interpreter is far more important in Bach than he is in Webern, and people today perform Webern with great distinction who probably would fall flat on their faces if they were to tackle a major work by Bach.

What would you cite as some of the important differences between rehearsing a piece from, let's say, the 18th Century and one that was written by a living composer who is there in the hall when you are rehearsing?

In an 18th Century piece it of course depends on how familiar your group is with the overall approach. One changes entire string playing from the 18th to the 19th Centuries, and also for the 20th Century. Now you have to establish such things with an orchestra, and when you work a long time with the same group you establish and reestablish them. So the point is this: If you are working with music the language of which is familiar to you, you will begin by going after a larger concept. You will, in a sense, do less immediate picking on details than a new piece which is not familiar. Now if the composer sits in the hall you constantly consult with him, and you let him, rather than yourself, be the one to brief the orchestra.

I always like to compare the rehearsal of a new work with the first reading of a new play. Here, the director assembles the actors around him and they read through the text to get familiar with it. The author sits by and at the end of the reading he will say a few words to the players. It may very well be that the composer will say a few words to the players after the first reading of a new work. He might say, 'Now gentlemen, you may find that this is going to be very difficult, but what I meant to do is such and such,' and with this kind of communication he will try to indoctrinate or familiarize the orchestra with his overall concept.

For instance, if I may make up a story: If Stravinsky were a new composer and he should come before the orchestra with one of his cool, neo-classical pieces he might say, 'Well, now gentlemen, you may think that every piece has to express a great deal. In my book my pieces express nothing.' He has written this, of course. So he would continue: 'Just play the notes. Play the right pitch in the right time—play together—and you will have rendered the most beautiful service to the music which I have written. Don't think of Heaven or Hell or the Angels or the Devil because I wish to express nothing in my music.' This is an example of what a composer's message to an orchestra would be like after a first reading.

You have spoken about the responsibilities and background that are involved in musical interpretation, and touched upon some of the responsibilities of a composer. Would you say a word about the responsibility of the listener.

The listener has no responsibility. I feel that the relationship between composer and performer on the one hand, and the listener on the other is the same as between parents and children. I consider that the parents have all the responsibility and the children none.

I think that what the children produce, and what they make of their lives, is actually the responsibility and the doing of the parents. I certainly feel this way about my five children, and I do not hold them responsible for anything versus me whatsoever. Their responsibility is to their own lives, and if parents have contributed their proper share the children will be all right. So—to continue with this analogy, I think that if the composer and the performer meet their responsibilities, the public will respond in kind. But the public, per se, has no responsibility.

I would also like to add that the public, as such, is a figment of the imagination. There is absolutely no such thing as the public. The public is comprised of individual people who have different views, different opinions and different motivations. But when we speak of the public, or the audience, we are really dealing with a completely theoretical concoction of our own brain, and we are attaching a label to something that does not really exist.

When one refers to the public it is in terms of number—primarily for the business-side of the show world—of theatre, concert, television and so on. Therefore you find that all the people who are crassly and frankly commercial—such as the advertising world—are only interested in counting heads. They never weigh them, they only count them. When we speak of the public—you and I—we are interested in weighing the head and the grey matter and the emotional approach of people.

Now, it is obvious that you can only do this if you start by questioning the person who sits next to you at intermission. You poke him in the ribs, and say 'Now, bud, what do you think of this piece by this here composer? What do you make out of this serial stuff?' Then you will have the opinion of a man or woman who sat next to you, but nothing more. You will not know more about the public except that you can say there was no applause, or there was a very, very weak hand, or there was great enthusiasm, or people walked out, or people coughed unmercifully. But this really doesn't mean anything, if after all, anybody can draw a lot of conclusions which may have practical value, but to us—philosophically and emotionally—will not mean a thing.

108

Leinsdorf & Boston Symphony Make First Beach Appearance

By PEG SAVAGE

The world-renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra and its esteemed music director, Erich Leinsdorf, came and conquered Miami Beach in their first appearance in Florida.

The occasion was Saturday night's concert on the Community Concert series - a private subscription group.

During a pre - concert press conference, Leinsdorf was asked by Concert series president Ernest Silverman about the seating for those people who traditionally arrive late, and don't want to miss the first movement.

The two finally resolved to start the concert 10 minutes late, to allow for late-goers who want to be seated.

But the maestro was nonplussed about the whole thing.

"Let them come in," he said. "I am perfectly satisfied. I have been in the Kabouki Theater in Tokyo, where people come in and out, with kids and shopping bags.

"They Know every note anywa. They're just coming to see how it's done.

"I have always been against the stuffy attitude in music."

And stuffy, the maestro isn't, either.

He has as many anecdotes up his sleeve as musical notes, and, accordingly is writing -- more accurately, typing -- his own book.

The first draft is scheduled by the end of June, and focus of the book will be on how music appears today, where it comes from and where it's going.

"The symphony orchestra is under great challenge today," he said, "but the orchestra will no more disappear than the opera will disappear.

"The symphony as a form is finished. . .the variation form takes over. The symphony orchestra playing the great works of masters is in great trouble economically, but is by no means finished."

ERICH LEINSDORF, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came with the world-famous, 88-year old orchestra to Florida to perform for the first time.
--Photo by Steve Siebert.

Leinsdorf plans to leave Boston soon. "It's too much to do 100 concerts a year with the same orchestra in the same place," he said.

"I am going to travel as much as possible, even more than I had bargained for."

He will be with the great Dutch Orchestra in Amsterdam, and the Royal Philharmonic and BBC in London; he will do musical film symphonies in Vienna, and perform in Buenos Aires, Argentina; he will be in Paris for TV, then back to London, and then, in the spring of 1971, be on the continent of Europe.

Meanwhile, he will continue to do recording for RCA. "But that depends more on repertory than the company," he said.

He thinks recordings are to lovers of music what personal music lessons once were to the music-loving public.

"Around World War I," he said, "fewer people stu-

He even charmed his audience with a story on himself. He said that, contrary to American Federation of Musician rulings, he and other members of the orchestra sang Happy Birthday to a 68-year-old man on the way down from Boston on the airplane.

"I have my own law," he quipped, "their rights only go up to 20,000 feet."

Leinsdorf became music director of the 88-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, bringing with him a brilliant record in the opera during previous years.

He was music consultant and conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, and established an eminent reputation as a conductor of German opera.

In addition, in the period of nine years prior to returning to the Metropolitan Opera in 1957, Leinsdorf brought the Rochester Philharmonic into prominence among the country's orchestras.

Before coming to the U.S., the Vienna-trained conductor studied with two of the world's outstanding conductors, Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini.

It was Toscanini, in fact, who suggested Leinsdorf to the Metropolitan where he served as assistant conductor until 1939 when he was appointed chief conductor of German operas.

An appointment as music director and conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra in 1943 was interrupted by service in the U.S. Army following which he accepted appointment as conductor in Rochester.

In 1956, Leinsdorf returned to New York as director of the New York City Opera before resuming his career with the Metropolitan.

died music. With that, there came a lowering of sophistication of listening.

"At the same time, music became complex and it took repeated listening to the phonograph until it was known. Now the phonograph has taken the place of amateur home music making."

The maestro looked relaxed and casual in grey trousers, a black check jacket and a wine-colored turtle neck shirt.

In today's modern music world, he said he is skeptical about the high prices being asked of concert and opera goers. "Fifteen dollars a seat is too high for an opera," he said.

He commended the city of Raleigh, N.C., where he recently appeared and played to houses of 10,000 for two concerts.

"Seats were $1 each on a subscription series," he said, "and I didn't think Raleigh had as many people as came to the concert."

On the question of music education in the school system, Leinsdorf noted, "When it comes to nonpragmatic activities, the responsibility lies with the parents, not the schools."

MIAMI BEACH, FLA.
REPORTER
TW. 45,000

MAR 16 1969

Leinsdorf: the complete professional

BY EDWARD GREENFIELD

THE reference books tell you that Erich Leinsdorf was born and trained in Vienna, but it would be hard to find a musician less typically Viennese. It is strange to find that it was Bruno Walter—most "Viennese" of conductors—who discovered him and took him as assistant to Salzburg in his early twenties. But once there it was the relentless Toscanini who acted as mentor, moulding his formidable musical character.

Even in an age of high professionalism, of anti-dilettantism on the rostrum, Leinsdorf stands out as a complete professional. Would Beecham and Leinsdorf, one wonders, have had anything whatever to talk about or if they had, would either have listened? As conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1962, Leinsdorf has vied with George Szell at Cleveland in the rôle of orchestra-trainer, and when very soon he moves on, his successor will be hard pressed to keep standards at the same superhuman level of precision.

YET LONDON, with its orchestral resources spread comparatively thinly —too thinly George Szell says—is the place where Leinsdorf likes most to do his recording, with halls, engineers as well as the musicians playing their part in his preference. The point came home to him last February, when in Boston he was asked to prepare a radio programme of his own recordings. With the list drawn up, he realised that every one had been made in London. Recently he has been at work again, doing a complete opera for RCA, Strauss's "Salome," daily facing eighty minutes of traffic jams, there and back between the Carlton Tower and Walthamstow Assembly Rooms.

"Salome" is Leinsdorf's seventeenth complete opera recording. He insisted on counting the previous sets one by one with me, and questioned the working of his subconscious, when I caught him forgetting "Die Walküre," a favourite London-made recording. His first opera-set, also made in London, Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad," was directed by Walter Legge for EMI, and Leinsdorf at once praised a man who, he admitted, could be difficult in the recording studio. "Any man with standards is a difficult person," he said, relishing the memory. Did that apply to Leinsdorf as to Legge? I asked. Surprisingly he did not give a direct yes, but talked about the conductor's rôle during extended recording sessions as an arbitrator in the inevitable disputes between performers.

His Salome for the latest sessions has been Montserrat Caballé, the Spanish soprano, and one gathered that an allergy she picks up in London had not always made things very easy for the others. It was Mme Caballé who insisted on starting the sessions with the most taxing passage of all, the final scene where Salome takes John the Baptist's head and—keeping her sinister promise—kisses the lips.

"It was a mistake," Leinsdorf admitted. "You don't start the meal with the main course." In fact, the passage had to be done again later in the sessions when everyone was really warmed up, and the recording balance and acoustic had been perfectly adjusted. On that Leinsdorf mentioned a minor frustration of working in London—or for that matter in any centre except Rome—that in halls used for other purposes than recording, the equipment has regularly to be taken apart and put together again. "It is like taking your car apart between drives," he complained.

LIKE OTHER high professionals among conductors Leinsdorf takes a keen interest in the technique of recording, and similarly in the "science" of modern hall acoustics. "Modern halls don't prove anything," he explained, "except that compromises are always demanded." Even if you model your new building on a successful old hall, you will find that by some regulation the aisles have to be wider or that modern materials will radically affect the sound.

He may talk of acoustics in a very scientific way, quoting decibel levels and cubic capacity, but at the end he is just as suspicious of the qualified acoustician as any other musician. He likes to feel that it was thanks to his insistence on no compromise on basic points in the early discussions for the new Met in New York, that the finished opera-house has turned out so well.

He talked of London's orchestras. Last year he recorded Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" with the New Philharmonia, while this year's "Salome" is with the London Symphony Orchestra. The lightness of the New Philharmonia was right for Mozart, he feels, while the guts in the LSO's brass playing and their general brilliance were right for Strauss. "Superb readers" he commented, having taken the orchestra through the whole score at the first preparatory session.

He admitted to a slight retouching in the scoring—"even with Strauss." Not, it seems, in the notes or actual instrumentation but in the grading of dynamic. Even Strauss did not seem to realise, Leinsdorf said, that a held chord will blot out a fast-moving line set against it. The answer, he pointed out, was to start the chord with a sforzando and quickly bring it down in diminuendo. "If the leading voice cannot be heard, it has to be helped."

On points like this the clear-headedness of Leinsdorf's music-making reminds one very much of Solti, a conductor very close to him in age and another protégé of Toscanini at the prewar Salzburg Festivals. Leinsdorf may lack Solti's Hungarian wit, and in the past he has sometimes seemed to epitomise the ruthless school of modern conductor, but for "Salome" at least the LSO responded to his professionalism not just with brilliance but warmth too. Maybe that is another thing he likes about London music-making. When his Boston stint is over, we should be able to hear him more in the concert-hall as well as on record.

A Conductor Speaks His Mind

By JANE DUDERSTADT
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) — Are a conductor's feelings hurt when his audience doesn't give him more than one curtain call?

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra says no.

"I'm not a frequent returner for curtain calls. I don't milk the audience like some of the opera singers—who carry watches," says the small, vigorous Austrian who has entertained Boston audiences for six years. He has announced his resignation, effective in August, 1969.

The 54-year-old Leinsdorf almost has the matter of audience response down to a science. His three variables are the age and type of audience, the auditorium's atmosphere and the geographic location of the performance.

The basic difference between audiences is whether they are a subscription crowd of buy tickets one at a time, Liensdorf said in an interview.

"The subscription audience is committed to go and therefore by and large is less vitally interested in the specific program," he said. "Consequently, they often don't pay as much attention to the performance."

Analyzing the effect of an audience's age, Leinsdorf said applause has "a kind of vigor involved," so that students often are "unbelievably demonstrative," while the older persons at Friday matinees are more reserved, yet just as receptive.

ERICH LEINSDORF

The auditorium's atmosphere is important, Leinsdorf said, because it is difficult for the audience and performer to become involved in a cold, impersonal auditorium such as the one at Lincoln Center in New York City.

"In fact, the cough is the best sound in the house at Lincoln Center—the applause sounds very dim," Leinsdorf said.

The impact of geography is shown by the observation that "the moment you go south, you get more enthusiasm—but it doesn't always have relevance to the performance," Leinsdorf said.

"Amsterdam is one of the best audiences in the world—not as loud and exuberant as Milan, but they know their music and listen seriously."

Yet even with these multiple factors, Leinsdorf said, the artist himself partially creates the response.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, June 24, 1968

108.

Leinsdorf & Boston Symphony Make First Beach Appearance

By PEG SAVAGE

The world-renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra and its esteemed music director, Erich Leinsdorf, came and conquered Miami Beach in their first appearance in Florida.

The occasion was Saturday night's concert on the Community Concert series - a private subscription group.

During a pre - concert press conference, Leinsdorf was asked by Concert series president Ernest Silverman about the seating for those people who traditionally arrive late, and don't want to miss the first movement.

The two finally resolved to start the concert 10 minutes late, to allow for late-goers who want to be seated.

But the maestro was nonplussed about the whole thing.

"Let them come in," he said. "I am perfectly satisfied. I have been in the Kabouki Theater in Tokyo, where people come in and out, with kids and shopping bags.

"They Know every note anywa. They're just coming to see how it's done.

"I have always been against the stuffy attitude in music."

And stuffy, the maestro isn't, either.

He has as many anecdotes up his sleeve as musical notes, and, accordingly is writing -- more accurately, typing -- his own book.

The first draft is scheduled by the end of June, and focus of the book will be on how music appears today, where it comes from and where it's going.

"The symphony orchestra is under great challenge today," he said, "but the orchestra will no more disappear than the opera will disappear.

"The symphony as a form is finished. . .the variation takes over. The symphony orchestra playing the great works of masters is in great trouble economically, but is by no means finished."

ERICH LEINSDORF, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came with the world-famous, 88-year old orchestra to Florida to perform for the first time.
--Photo by Steve Siebert.

Leinsdorf plans to leave Boston soon. "It's too much to do 100 concerts a year with the same orchestra in the same place," he said.

"I am going to travel as much as possible, even more than I had bargained for."

He will be with the great Dutch Orchestra in Amsterdam, and the Royal Philharmonic and BBC in London; he will do musical film symphonies in Vienna, and perform in Buenos Aires, Argentina; he will be in Paris for TV, then back to London, and then, in the spring of 1971, be on the continent of Europe.

Meanwhile, he will continue to do recording for RCA. "But that depends more on repertory than the company," he said.

He thinks recordings are to lovers of music what personal music lessons once were to the music-loving public.

"Around World War I," he said, "fewer people studied music. With that, there came a lowering of sophistication of listening.

"At the same time, music became complex and it took repeated listening to the phonograph until it was known. Now the phonograph has taken the place of amateur home music making."

The maestro looked relaxed and casual in grey trousers, a black check jacket and a wine-colored turtle neck shirt.

In today's modern music world, he said he is skeptical about the high prices being asked of concert and opera goers. "Fifteen dollars a seat is too high for an opera," he said.

He commended the city of Raleigh, N.C., where he recently appeared and played to houses of 10,000 for two concerts.

"Seats were $1 each on a subscription series," he said, "and I didn't think Raleigh had as many people as came to the concert."

On the question of music education in the school system. Leinsdorf noted, "When it comes to non-pragmatic activities, the responsibility lies with the parents, not the schools."

He even charmed his audience with a story on himself. He said that, contrary to American Federation of Musician rulings, he and other members of the orchestra sang Happy Birthday to a 68-year-old man on the way down from Boston on the airplane.

"I have my own law," he quipped, "their rights only go up to 20,000 feet."

Leinsdorf became music director of the 88-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, bringing with him a brilliant record in the opera during previous years.

He was music consultant and conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, and established an eminent reputation as a conductor of German opera.

In addition, in the period of nine years prior to returning to the Metropolitan Opera in 1957, Leinsdorf brought the Rochester Philharmonic into prominence among the country's orchestras.

Before coming to the U.S., the Vienna-trained conductor studied with two of the world's outstanding conductors, Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini.

It was Toscanini, in fact, who suggested Leinsdorf to the Metropolitan where he served as assistant conductor until 1939 when he was appointed chief conductor of German operas.

An appointment as music director and conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra in 1943 was interrupted by service in the U.S. Army following which he accepted appointment as conductor in Rochester.

In 1956, Leinsdorf returned to New York as director of the New York City Opera before resuming his career with the Metropolitan.

MIAMI BEACH, FLA.
REPORTER
TW. 45,000

MAR 16 1969

Leinsdorf: the complete professional

BY EDWARD GREENFIELD

THE reference books tell you that Erich Leinsdorf was born and trained in Vienna, but it would be hard to find a musician less typically Viennese. It is strange to find that it was Bruno Walter—most "Viennese" of conductors—who discovered him and took him as assistant to Salzburg in his early twenties. But once there it was the relentless Toscanini who acted as mentor, moulding his formidable musical character.

Even in an age of high professionalism, of anti-dilettantism on the rostrum, Leinsdorf stands out as a complete professional. Would Beecham and Leinsdorf, one wonders, have had anything whatever to talk about or if they had, would either have listened? As conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1962, Leinsdorf has vied with George Szell at Cleveland in the rôle of orchestra-trainer, and when very soon he moves on, his successor will be hard pressed to keep standards at the same superhuman level of precision.

YET LONDON, with its orchestral resources spread comparatively thinly—too thinly George Szell says—is the place where Leinsdorf likes most to do his recording, with halls, engineers as well as the musicians playing their part in his preference. The point came home to him last February, when in Boston he was asked to prepare a radio programme of his own recordings. With the list drawn up, he realised that every one had been made in London. Recently he has been at work again, doing a complete opera for RCA, Strauss's "Salome," daily facing eighty minutes of traffic jams, there and back between the Carlton Tower and Walthamstow Assembly Rooms.

"Salome" is Leinsdorf's seventeenth complete opera recording. He insisted on counting the previous sets one by one with me, and questioned the working of his subconscious, when I caught him forgetting "Die Walküre," a favourite London-made recording. His first opera-set, also made in London, Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad," was directed by Walter Legge for EMI, and Leinsdorf at once praised a man who, he admitted, could be difficult in the recording studio. "Any man with standards is a difficult person," he said, relishing the memory. Did that apply to Leinsdorf as to Legge? I asked. Surprisingly he did not give a direct yes, but talked about the conductor's rôle during extended recording sessions as an arbitrator in the inevitable disputes between performers.

His Salome for the latest sessions has been Montserrat Caballé, the Spanish soprano, and one gathered that an allergy she picks up in London had not always made things very easy for the others. It was Mme Caballé who insisted on starting the sessions with the most taxing passage of all, the final scene where Salome takes John the Baptist's head and—keeping her sinister promise—kisses the lips.

"It was a mistake," Leinsdorf admitted. "You don't start the meal with the main course." In fact, the passage had to be done again later in the sessions when everyone was really warmed up, and the recording balance and acoustic had been perfectly adjusted. On that Leinsdorf mentioned, a minor frustration of working in London—or for that matter in any centre except Rome—that in halls used for other purposes than recording, the equipment has regularly to be taken apart and put together again. "It is like taking your car apart between drives," he complained.

LIKE OTHER high professionals among conductors Leinsdorf takes a keen interest in the technique of recording, and similarly in the "science" of modern hall acoustics. "Modern halls don't prove anything," he explained, "except that compromises are always demanded." Even if you model your new building on a successful old hall, you will find that by some regulation the aisles have to be wider or that modern materials will radically affect the sound.

He may talk of acoustics in a very scientific way, quoting decibel levels and cubic capacity, but at the end he is just as suspicious of the qualified acoustician as any other musician. He likes to feel that it was thanks to his insistence on no compromise on basic points in the early discussions for the new Met in New York, that the finished opera-house has turned out so well.

He talked of London's orchestras. Last year he recorded Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" with the New Philharmonia, while this year's "Salome" is with the London Symphony Orchestra. The lightness of the New Philharmonia was right for Mozart, he feels, while the guts in the LSO's brass playing and their general brilliance were right for Strauss. "Superb readers" he commented, having taken the orchestra through the whole score at the first preparatory session.

He admitted to a slight retouching in the scoring—"even with Strauss." Not, it seems, in the notes or actual instrumentation but in the grading of dynamic. Even Strauss did not seem to realise, Leinsdorf said, that a held chord will blot out a fast-moving line set against it. The answer, he pointed out, was to start the chord with a sforzando and quickly bring it down in diminuendo. "If the leading voice cannot be heard, it has to be helped."

On points like this the clear-headedness of Leinsdorf's music-making reminds one very much of Solti, a conductor very close to him in age and another protégé of Toscanini at the prewar Salzburg Festivals. Leinsdorf may lack Solti's Hungarian wit, and in the past he has sometimes seemed to epitomise the ruthless school of modern conductor, but for "Salome" at least the LSO responded to his professionalism not just with brilliance but warmth too. Maybe that is another thing he likes about London music-making. When his Boston stint is over, we should be able to hear him more in the concert-hall as well as on record.

A Conductor Speaks His Mind

By JANE DUDERSTADT
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) — Are a conductor's feelings hurt when his audience doesn't give him more than one curtain call?

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra says no.

"I'm not a frequent returner for curtain calls. I don't milk the audience like some of the opera singers—who carry watches," says the small, vigorous Austrian who has entertained Boston audiences for six years. He has announced his resignation, effective in August, 1969.

The 54-year-old Leinsdorf almost has the matter of audience response down to a science. His three variables are the age and type of audience, the auditorium's atmosphere and the geographic location of the performance.

The basic difference between audiences is whether they are a subscription crowd of buy tickets one at a time, Liensdorf said in an interview.

"The subscription audience is committed to go and therefore by and large is less vitally interested in the specific program," he said. "Consequently, they often don't pay as much attention to the performance."

Analyzing the effect of an audience's age, Leinsdorf said applause has "a kind of vigor involved," so that students often are "unbelievably demonstrative," while the older persons at Friday matinees are more reserved, yet just as receptive.

ERICH LEINSDORF

The auditorium's atmosphere is important, Leinsdorf said, because it is difficult for the audience and performer to become involved in a cold, impersonal auditorium such as the one at Lincoln Center in New York City.

"In fact, the cough is the best sound in the house at Lincoln Center—the applause sounds very dim," Leinsdorf said.

The impact of geography is shown by the observation that "the moment you go south, you get more enthusiasm—but it doesn't always have relevance to the performance," Leinsdorf said.

"Amsterdam is one of the best audiences in the world—not as loud and exuberant as Milan, but they know their music and listen seriously."

Yet even with these multiple factors, Leinsdorf said, the artist himself partially creates the response.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, June 24, 1968

A Conversation With . . . Erich Leinsdorf

Austrian born Erich Leinsdorf, 57, made his way into the musical world when he was 22. At that time he went from his home in Vienna to the Salzburg Festival where Bruno Walter was conducting. During a break in a rehearsal he went to the piano uninvited and played the piano score of the opera being rehearsed. Since then, Leinsdorf has been an assistant director at the Metropolitan Opera, has conducted the Rochester Philharmonic and conducted extensively in America and abroad. He became the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, and has since brought a vitality and a freshness to conservative Boston. He was interviewed at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony, by Thomas L. Dotton of The Gazette staff.

Q. It has often been said that during the last century a conductor was almost forced to cater to the tastes of a particular audience. But some music critics now maintain that a conductor is freer and because of his mobility has become a much more creative guiding force. Do you think either of the statements is valid?

A. I do not think that the premise is accurate, because during that century practically everything that was written was performed. But of course, a lot of music is discarded very quickly when it is the music which only has meaning for that day. Perhaps, the question is a 19th Century question. One must remember that during the 19th Century people believed that the value of music, along with the value of any of the other arts, was synonymous with immortality. I think that this is a totally 19th century concept. The 18th century did not have this ideal and the artistic community of our century certainly does not have it; the ideal has been rejected in the last 30 to 40 years.

So I must first answer by saying that I think during the 19th century that everything was more or less performed. However, at the same time, everything is more or less performed today. Certainly, I know that in some communities the people who guide the music are naturally bound to be on the side of conservative box office policy. But I also know that there are organizations in towns where there is more or less complete freedom. (Well, perhaps, complete freedom is odd terminology, since there are always policy clashes between various factions and wings of any musical organization.) But I think these things vary and anyone who tries to make an across the board statement is just frying his own fish and not really giving an accurate report. I must say to the question that these things vary widely.

Q. You are the individual responsible for the American premiere of several works, most notably the first of the two editions of Beethoven's "Fidelio" which was performed at Tanglewood last summer. Do you think that American audiences are behind their European counterparts? And would you say that American concert audiences are perhaps less sophisticated than those of Europe?

A. I do not think so at all. If anything, the regular subscription cycles in America, and I would like to emphasize subscription cycles in this country, might even cover a wider ground than the same cycles in Europe. Europe is, however, ahead in their broadcasting compared to American stations, since broadcasting advertising is a government monopoly, licensed and authoritative.

What I do mean is that in this country, radio, and by implication television, is subject to private advertising agencies, and these are naturally much more conservative than the European parallels. But in the subscription series the United States is definitely ahead of Europe.

Q. Do you find it safer that this monopoly power be limited to private subscription or do you think that a harmony between private and public patronage can be reached in this country?

A. I am not sure. But I do feel that if we project ourselves several years into the future that music organization is going to change. I cannot tell you exactly how it is going to change, but I think it must change. I think today's music is purely on institutional levels. By that I mean that if you go to a string quartet evening you are going to hear nothing but string quartets and if you go to recitals you are going to hear nothing but recitals. I think this is what is left of a 19th Century battle. This type of music making is more or less going to be outdated. I also think it is going to be very difficult to change this because the more complex musical programming for a community is going to impose gigantic technical difficulties. However, I think this must be done. So I am not particularly concerned with the continuation of the present system since I do not think it has any inherent possibilities.

Q. Was your desire to leave the Metropolitan Opera a statement of preference or do you plan to return to the form?

A. I would like to do operas on a once and a while basis. I could not take it on a steady basis, because opera, as is the nature of the beast, has to be a repertory, and it is bound to have variables in the levels of its performance. There are many technical reasons, which even though compelling reasons, force me to find opera on a regular basis unsatisfactory.

Q. But there is now a movement to update stage works. For instance, people like Gian Carlo Menotti with his new production of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" are trying to add "new dynamics" to the form. And although Menotti's production of "Tristan" at his Spoleto Festival has come under severe criticism, do you think that innovations like his could make opera technically palatable to the conductor?

A. First, I do not know if the process is really updating at all. Much of this new movement is not really updating, but rather an attempt to cover up some poverty of singing or other musical material. I cannot vouch for this production, as I have only barely heard about it and have read even less about it. And of course, like you, have not seen it, so I cannot make any critical comments about it. However, as to this type of updating, I am not sure what "updating" actually means. If updating means trying to replace the lack of modern works which the public demands, then this is a poor substitute. But on the other hand, if the present day creativity does not please the public and therefore gets lost in sort of a half-vacuum and one is forced to go and do stuff to Wagner and Mozart, then it is a sad commentary on our own poverty. But if it is genuine that you can do something with a work even on an experimental basis, something to give it another dimension, then I am all for it. But I am not conservative to be conservative.

I think to do something for the shock value alone doesn't interest me very much. Now I know that there once was a very famous conductor. But he is no longer among the living. This is not, however, the reward for his misdeeds that he died. I mean everybody must die sooner or later. But he died at a very high, ripe old age and was a very much esteemed man. And when he recorded, and he did record very much in his later years, he studied every preceding version and edition of what he was going to record. He then did just enough differently so there would be commentary on his rendition. To me this is the speculative approach which is very dishonest and suspect. So by the same token I would say beware of the updating of any stage works.

Q. Concerning talent, do you think the new talent demanded by music is being trained in America?

A. Yes, I do think much is being done about talent, but like most things it is being done in a haphazard way.

Q. Is America going to continue to be dominated by Europe or is the new talent adequately trained?

A. I think in many ways it is actually better than that of Europe. But these things vary and I am not one for generalizations.

Q. You have said that you think little of any person who has become public through a specialty and becomes involved in political activity. As a father of two draft-age sons how can you reconcile your statement that celebrities should not speak out about issues like the Vietnam War?

A. I have a very high regard for judgement of individual choice. But let us take the most notorious offenders — our prominent film actors. When a prominent film actor who is known all over the world endorses a political candidate or a policy, he throws himself into a field in which he may or may not know anything. I must ask myself why should I have my vote influenced by Miss Elizabeth Taylor, who is a beautiful woman, a very ambitious actress and certainly a wonderful personality? Why should I have my judgement influenced by Miss Anne Bancroft whom I admire? I admire her very much as an actress but I couldn't care less about who she supports as a candidate for public office. I do have my own judgement. I think it is bad that many of these artists, as a matter of their own personal publicity, become involved in politics. I think that everyone has both a duty and a right to behave like a citizen, but this should be done on the private level. Just as my private life is my own, so is my political.

Q. There is a continual question about soul and intellect in music. Which of the two do you consider more important? Or do you think that it is possible to combine the two?

A. I think it can only be reached by saying that this person has a harmony and this other person does not. I have no recipe for it, except that a person's whole inner life is reflected in his artistic endeavor. If a person's inner life is rich then his artistic personality will also be abundant.

Q. You have said in the past that usage of the limbs is not important to a conductor. To many that may sound like an odd statement from a celebrated conductor. Would you explain?

A. Mainly because you do not really conduct with the limbs. You really do not conduct with the hands. One could have the most marvelous control of hands and arms, but if the total spirit and mind are not there, then the hands are useless. If the mental and emotional equipment are not there, the hands will not be able to do very much by themselves. I say this always, especially to conductors, the overemphasis of the mechanical is always very dangerous. However, like all statements this can be very easily misunderstood. You do need something to conduct with whether it be a baton or a stick or the hand. But the hands do not make the conductor. A friend and I have just discussed the strange parting between the excellent musicianship and the complete awareness of a musical culture that separates the musician from the conductor. Everyone who is a good musician would think that he can conduct. The truth is that there are many mysteries about conducting.

Q. Do you have in your background an interesting story about a junior congressman from Texas?

A. It was very simple. I was in great difficulty with my visa. I was at that time on a temporary visa and my application for a new visa was still lying in the Department of State, and was about to be refused. Then a friend of mine introduced me to a junior congressman from Texas who helped to save me by sending me to Cuba with the proper documents, where I applied and changed from temporary to permanent visa and eventually took out my first citizenship papers. That gentleman has remained a very close friend of mine and he is at the present moment the President of the United States.

Q. After years of professional experience, have any of your musical tastes greatly changed? Have you been involved in a gradual re-evaluation?

A. Yes, definitely. For one, I am forced to believe that today I no longer believe in the narrow specialization of a musical interpreter. I don't think that one can just do everything. At one time I thought that the 360 degree orbit could be embraced by one man; but it can not be reached by any one man no matter how wide his sympathies or no matter how catholic his tastes. And there are always going to be things in which one is more comfortable, and other things which when one can conquer and bring off with musicianship and dignity. But there are things which are going to be a little more alien. I think this is very similar to our alignments in life. I would like to be a completely encylopedic person in music. There is no question about it. But I would like to have the same freedom and closeness to all music. I would have to be telling an untruth if I said that there is music which is not closer to me.

Q. Do you have an opinion about the new or so called electronic music?

A. Well, there is so much new that here we are really speaking of a matter of fashion. If we get into this we have a very large chapter to cover. I would rather not get into that because it is too big and I would rather not speak in generalities.

We would have to pinpoint composers and go right down the alley, talking about this composer and that composer. It is the only way we can avoid a large margin of error. Take a man like Witold Lutoslawski, a man who has changed his approach greatly over the years. But it is difficult. You would like to go into a book length answer.

110.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 429,830
AUG 31 1969

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, August 30, 1969

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Sunday, August 31, 1969

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349
AUG 31 1969
New England Newsclip

The Bad and the Beautiful

By BOBBIE BENSON

Roddy McDowall from Lee Gross

BAD! The news that Elizabeth Taylor, just yesterday the star of National Velvet, feels she is ready for retirement: "I'm not a 19-year-old, unfortunately — or fortunately. I may never work again unless something comes along that absolutely captivates me. I think the life of pleasure — if you can call being married to Richard Burton and mother of four children that — is the life for me."

BEAUTIFUL! Booing. The Boston Symphony, adding a selection of experimental earsplitters this past year, found usually dignified audiences giving out with the Bronx cheers. Bad? No, good, says conductor Erich Leinsdorf: "I genuinely welcome the booing. I am as grateful for it as I am for applause. Anything but indifference."

BEAUTIFUL! The numerals ("s perb, gothic, moderne") on the u forms worn by the Chicago Bears.
reason we know this: art critic J
Plagens, writing in Studio Interna magazine, has just completed v surely the definitive critical s football uniforms.

Sample: "The visible c structure of a professional thus: helmet, jersey, pants ings, short socks, and sh two, being relatively u cotton and black leath tribute significantly
The jersey is the character mo uniform; th
larizes par

Leinsdorf to Retire With Grand Splash

LENOX, Mass. (UPI) — Erich Leinsdorf intends to go out with a splash, but it will be a very grand and dignified splash. The conductor of the Boston Symphony ochestra ends the 1968 season today with a final Tanglewood concert, but he has already planned his last concert for 1969. That will be his seventh and final year with the BSO.

Waiting for the Berkshire Chorus to gather for rehearsal at the Tanglewood grounds near Lenox, Leinsdorf at 57 seems to relish the prosepct of retirement.

"I've already forgotten this past year. I'm looking forward to the next. The work is too concentrated, you know; the season is 40 weeks and about two weeks too long. I don't find any great glamor in overworking. I want to clear out before it begins to affect the quality of the performance."

With a grin he described the final program. "It will be Schoenberg's 'A Survivor from Warsaw,' a document to human savagery, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, a document to human decency. That is good, isn't it?"

Leinsdorf's plans after retirement are a secret, but he says he will return to guest-conduct the BSO in the fall of 1970. His career with Boston has been tumultuous, but he says he leaves behind only good wishes to his successor, Pittsburgh Symphony conductor William Steinberg.

"Advice to him?" says Leinsdorf. "He's had 13 years more experience. He should be giving me advice."

Presides Over Revolutions

A couple roars up to the rehearsal barn on a motorcycle; Leinsdorf grins from his chair under the trees. He has been conducting since 1933 in Vienna, where he was born, and has presided over one musical revolution after another.

"Music is changing, you know. We're getting back to the idea that music is a performer's art and not totally the composer's. I'm not saying I like it, now; I'm rather perturbed by some of it. When I read of Hamlet with balloons, for instance, I know that this freedom of the director has gone too far. But music now ranges from the complete rigidity of the 12-tone compositions — you must do just what is written — to complete freedom."

He waves his hands. "That is, when the composer says improvise for 40 seconds on the G string, what else can you do?"

Tangelwood's Berkshire Music Festival this summer included three Contemporary Trends concerts which brought rock, folk, jazz and Indian raga to the rolling hills of Tanglewood for the first time.

"This is good," says Leinsdorf, "very good. A fad can begin a perfectly sound trend in music. After all, Indian music has been unintelligible to Western ears before this. It also brings in more material to work with.

"You know we have several separate cultures in Western music today. The public by and large is very conservative—they turn out 10,000 strong for Beethoven and only 2,000 for Schoenberg. How can we progress if there is no interest in the newer music?"

Public Ineducable

Leinsdorf exploded at the idea of educating the public taste. "You cannot EVER educate the public. That word is very loosely used in this country, education. It is used to raise money, to fund this project and that for educational purposes. Nonsense. People will go to hear what they want, to enjoy the emotions of the music and that's all." He laughed, and added, "People always have to have excuses to do things that they enjoy. It must be your puritan background."

Smoothing down his thin dark hair, Leinsdorf grew serious on the subject of money. "Musical success these days must be measured in terms of box office recepits in a place like this, for a concert orchestra. Now when we play things for other musicians and students, that is different. Then if the music delights the performer and brings something new to the listener, becomes part of another musician, thtn it has been a great success, even for only a dozen listeners."

He frowned and looked toward where the chorus was waiting to begin rehearsal. "I do not believe in government subsidies to orchestras, not in this country. There is not the 'no-strings- attached' tradition of Europe for the government. But there is definitely the money, all in private hands just waiting to be tapped."

A thought struck him. "I think entertainers should be allowed tax depreciation on themselves. There's certainly more decay in a dancer in 30 years than in a machine, and he has only that way to earn his living. Yes, it should apply to artists, singers, conductors, dancers—it would be much better than pussyfooting with endowments."

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 143,350
AUG 25 1968
New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf not waiting on the verge, as they say

A CORRESPONDENT friend who collects road sign directions sent the following one from Scotland last summer: "No waiting on the verge," a kind of match to one seen commonly in this country: "In case of emergency, drive off bridge."

Erich Leinsdorf, who is concluding his final season after seven as incumbent presiding officer of the Boston Symphony this year is not one to wait on the verge. From the time he came to wide public notice at 25, first as assistant, then successor to Artur Bodanzky, chief of the Metropolitan Opera's German wing (Wagner and Flagstad and, only to a slightly lesser degree, Melchior, were what blew your mind in the late 30s), he has never given the impression of outlasting his welcome. There was always one more Rubicon.

So now he is quitting as the BSO's music director—at the end of Tanglewood next summer, actually—and he says, "I feel very cheerful about developments." When announcement came initially reasons seemed rather vague for his departure. They are less so today, mainly because Maestro Leinsdorf appears freer to express them.

A contingency on his continuance with the BSO was more national and international touring. Under Charles Munch the orchestra had two European tours and one Far Eastern-Australian tour. It has not been abroad since 1960. A transcontinental tour took place under Leinsdorf, but that was five years ago. There had been an invitation from Japan for next year and the conductor had organized his season with a view toward that trip—but the orchestra's board turned it down. And there it was, not merely because Mr. Leinsdorf felt overworked. Quite the opposite.

"If you want to stay in the major leagues"—he is quite aware we are talking during the World Series,—"you cannot stay in the same ball parks." Referring to the BSO's regularly traveled route as "The Northeast corridor," he says. "There are so many concerts for the same people," and "it is too much work for that limited an audience," and "I want to get around the world more."

And, "There are two types of major orchestras—those where the music director determines major policy, and those where the music director resigns." Period.

Still, Mr. Leinsdorf can say, "I feel very cheerful about developments." His relationship with the orchestra board remains friendly, he assures you, and he will be around for considerable guest conducting assignments at Symphony Hall after William Steinberg assumes the podium. In fact some, he believes, might question his not standing up—"reproach me because I have not fought"—for his way. But that is not his way, preferring agreement to disagree over bad blood. Besides, "Gypsy travel appeals to me. During 1969-70 I know I will be conducting on three different continents, maybe four."

Whether he will come back to Providence on one of his guest stints, of course, is not known presently. Next week's Halloween concert will be Erich Leinsdorf's next to last appearance here as the BSO's regular conductor, in a program that includes one of today's most popular rare composers, Leos Janacek, and one of his most popular rare compositions, the Sinfonietta. The Czech Janacek (1854-1928) is yet another from the recent past being rediscovered for merits generally overlooked internationally in the past.

"A few years ago it was (Denmark's Carl) Nielson, and now it's Janacek. Every once in a while we have to find a composer who hasn't been played much and who fits comfortably into the public's listening acquaintance. We are running short of music—(without repetitions of the same Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky). I find the problem of programming absolutely baffling."

Just as baffling to the BSO and several of our major orchestras is locating permanent conductors. William Steinberg replaces Mr. Leinsdorf, but will be shared by Pittsburgh. The New York Philharmonic will have George Szell filling in for its conductor emeritus, Leonard Bernstein, but he still has commitments to the Cleveland Orchestra. On a somewhat different level one such as Andre Previn commutes between the Houston and London Symphonies, nor is he singular. The Mehtas, Ozawas, and up and coming Barenboims are ubiquitous.

Meanwhile, however, there is Erich Leinsdorf in Symphony Hall's greenroom on a rainy afternoon, not waiting on the verge, and cheerful about developments.

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800
OCT 20 1968
New England Newsclip

* * *

VERY INTERESTING: Nobody seems willing to explain in depth the following coincidence. The BSO gives Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos (original version) Jan. 3, 4, and 7 with Beverly Sills, Claire Watson, and Robert Nagy in concert form at Symphony Hall. On Jan. 8, 12, 19, 27 and Feb. 2 Sarah Caldwell's Opera Company of Boston has scheduled Ariadne (first version) fully staged, Bourgeois Gentilhomme and all, at the Shubert, no cast announced. Well? Other operas on OCB's season: Verdi's Macbeth Jan. 22, 24, 29, 31 and Feb. 2 (mat.); Bartok's Wooden Prince, Bluebeard's Castle, and Miraculous Mandarin March 31, April 2, 4, 6 and 11; Mozart's Marriage of Figaro April 9, 13, 16, 18 and 20—these performances at the Shubert—and Roger Sessions' Montezuma May 18 and 25 at Boston Arena.

110.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 429,830

AUG 31 1969

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, August 30, 1969

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Sunday, August 31, 1969

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

AUG 31 1969

New England Newsclip

The Bad and the Beautiful

By BOBBIE BENSON

Roddy McDowall from Lee Gross

BAD! The news that Elizabeth Taylor, just yesterday the star of National Velvet, feels she is ready for retirement: "I'm not a 19-year-old, unfortunately — or fortunately. I may never work again unless something comes along that absolutely captivates me. I think the life of pleasure — if you can call being married to Richard Burton and mother of four children that — is the life for me."

BEAUTIFUL! Booing. The Boston Symphony, adding a selection of experimental earsplitters this past year, found usually dignified audiences giving out with the Bronx cheers. Bad? No, good, says conductor Erich Leinsdorf: "I genuinely welcome the booing. I am as grateful for it as I am for applause. Anything but indifference."

BEAUTIFUL! The numerals ("s perb, gothic, moderne") on the v forms worn by the Chicago Bears. reason we know this: art critic J Plagens, writing in Studio Interna magazine, has just completed v surely the definitive critical s football uniforms.

Sample: "The visible cr structure of a professional thus: helmet, jersey, pants ings, short socks, and sh two, being relatively v cotton and black leath tribute significantly The jersey is the character mor uniform; th larizes pa

Leinsdorf to Retire With Grand Splash

LENOX, Mass. (UPI) — Erich Leinsdorf intends to go out with a splash, but it will be a very grand and dignified splash. The conductor of the Boston Symphony ochestra ends the 1968 season today with a final Tanglewood concert, but he has already planned his last concert for 1969. That will be his seventh and final year with the BSO.

Waiting for the Berkshire Chorus to gather for rehearsal at the Tanglewood grounds near Lenox, Leinsdorf at 57 seems to relish the prosepct of retirement.

"I've already forgotten this past year. I'm looking forward to the next. The work is too concentrated, you know; the season is 40 weeks and about two weeks too long. I don't find any great glamor in overworking. I want to clear out before it begins to affect the quality of the performance."

With a grin he described the final program. "It will be Schoenberg's 'A Survivor from Warsaw,' a document to human savagery, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, a document to human decency. That is good, isn't it?"

Leinsdorf's plans after retirement are a secret, but he says he will return to guest-conduct the BSO in the fall of 1970. His career with Boston has been tumultuous, but he says he leaves behind only good wishes to his successor, Pittsburgh Symphony conductor William Steinberg.

"Advice to him?" says Leinsdorf. "He's had 13 years more experience. He should be giving me advice."

Presides Over Revolutions

A couple roars up to the rehearsal barn on a motorcycle; Leinsdorf grins from his chair under the trees. He has been conducting since 1933 in Vienna, where he was born, and has presided over one musical revolution after another.

"Music is changing, you know. We're getting back to the idea that music is a performer's art and not totally the composer's. I'm not saying I like it, now; I'm rather perturbed by some of it. When I read of Hamlet with balloons, for instance, I know that this freedom of the director has gone too far. But music now ranges from the complete rigidity of the 12-tone compositions — you must do just what is written — to complete freedom."

He waves his hands. "That is, when the composer says improvise for 40 seconds on the G string, what else can you do?"

Tangelwood's Berkshire Music Festival this summer included three Contemporary Trends concerts which brought rock, folk, jazz and Indian raga to the rolling hills of Tanglewood for the first time.

"This is good," says Leinsdorf, "very good. A fad can begin a perfectly sound trend in music. After all, Indian music has been unintelligible to Western ears before this. It also brings in more material to work with.

"You know we have several separate cultures in Western music today. The public by and large is very conservative—they turn out 10,000 strong for Beethoven and only 2,000 for Schoenberg. How can we progress if there is no interest in the newer music?"

Public Ineducable

Leinsdorf exploded at the idea of educating the public taste. "You cannot EVER educate the public. That word is very loosely used in this country, education. It is used to raise money, to fund this project and that for educational purposes. Nonsense. People will go to hear what they want, to enjoy the emotions of the music and that's all." He laughed, and added, "People always have to have excuses to do things that they enjoy. It must be your puritan background."

Smoothing down his thin dark hair, Leinsdorf grew serious on the subject of money. "Musical success these days must be measured in terms of box office recepits in a place like this, for a concert orchestra. Now when we play things for other musicians and students, that is different. Then if the music delights the performer and brings something new to the listener, becomes part of another musician, thtn it has been a great success, even for only a dozen listeners."

He frowned and looked toward where the chorus was waiting to begin rehearsal. "I do not believe in government subsidies to orchestras, not in this country. There is not the 'no-strings-attached' tradition of Europe for the government. But there is definitely the money, all in private hands just waiting to be tapped."

A thought struck him. "I think entertainers should be allowed tax depreciation on themselves. There's certainly more decay in a dancer in 30 years than in a machine, and he has only that way to earn his living. Yes, it should apply to artists, singers, conductors, dancers—it would be much better than pussyfooting with endowments."

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 143,350

AUG 25 1968

New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf not waiting on the verge, as they say

A CORRESPONDENT friend who collects road sign directions sent the following one from Scotland last summer: "No waiting on the verge," a kind of match to one seen commonly in this country: "In case of emergency, drive off bridge."

Erich Leinsdorf, who is concluding his final season after seven as incumbent presiding officer of the Boston Symphony this year is not one to wait on the verge. From the time he came to wide public notice at 25, first as assistant, then successor to Artur Bodanzky, chief of the Metropolitan Opera's German wing (Wagner and Flagstad and, only to a slightly lesser degree, Melchior, were what blew your mind in the late 30s), he has never given the impression of outlasting his welcome. There was always one more Rubicon.

So now he is quitting as the BSO's music director—at the end of Tanglewood next summer, actually—and he says, "I feel very cheerful about developments." When announcement came initially reasons seemed rather vague for his departure. They are less so today, mainly because Maestro Leinsdorf appears freer to express them.

A contingency on his continuance with the BSO was more national and international touring. Under Charles Munch the orchestra had two European tours and one Far Eastern-Australian tour. It has not been abroad since 1960. A transcontinental tour took place under Leinsdorf, but that was five years ago. There had been an invitation from Japan for next year and the conductor had organized his season with a view toward that trip—but the orchestra's board turned it down. And there it was, not merely because Mr. Leinsdorf felt overworked. Quite the opposite.

"If you want to stay in the major leagues"—he is quite aware we are talking during the World Series,—"you cannot stay in the same ball parks." Referring to the BSO's regularly traveled route as "The Northeast corridor," he says. "There are so many concerts for the same people," and "it is too much work for that limited an audience," and "I want to get around the world more."

And, "There are two types of major orchestras—those where the music director determines major policy, and those where the music director resigns." Period.

Still, Mr. Leinsdorf can say, "I feel very cheerful about developments." His relationship with the orchestra board remains friendly, he assures you, and he will be around for considerable guest conducting assignments at Symphony Hall after William Steinberg assumes the podium. In fact some, he believes, might question his not standing up—"reproach me because I have not fought"—for his way. But that is not his way, preferring agreement to disagree over bad blood. Besides, "Gypsy travel appeals to me. During 1969-70 I know I will be conducting on three different continents, maybe four."

Whether he will come back to Providence on one of his guest stints, of course, is not known presently. Next week's Halloween concert will be Erich Leinsdorf's next to last appearance here as the BSO's regular conductor, in a program that includes one of today's most popular rare composers, Leos Janacek, and one of his most popular rare compositions, the Sinfonietta. The Czech Janacek (1854-1928) is yet another from the recent past being rediscovered for merits generally overlooked internationally in the past.

"A few years ago it was (Denmark's Carl) Nielson, and now it's Janacek. Every once in a while we have to find a composer who hasn't been played much and who fits comfortably into the public's listening acquaintance. We are running short of music—(without repetitions of the same Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky). I find the problem of programming absolutely baffling."

Just as baffling to the BSO and several of our major orchestras is locating permanent conductors. William Steinberg replaces Mr. Leinsdorf, but will be shared by Pittsburgh. The New York Philharmonic will have George Szell filling in for its conductor emeritus, Leonard Bernstein, but he still has commitments to the Cleveland Orchestra. On a somewhat different level one such as Andre Previn commutes between the Houston and London Symphonies, nor is he singular. The Mehtas, Ozawas, and up and coming Barenboims are ubiquitous.

Meanwhile, however, there is Erich Leinsdorf in Symphony Hall's greenroom on a rainy afternoon, not waiting on the verge, and cheerful about developments.

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIR. 204,800

OCT 20 1968

New England Newsclip

* * *

VERY INTERESTING: Nobody seems willing to explain in depth the following coincidence. The BSO gives Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos (original version) Jan. 3, 4, and 7 with Beverly Sills, Claire Watson, and Robert Nagy in concert form at Symphony Hall. On Jan. 8, 12, 19, 27 and Feb. 2 Sarah Caldwell's Opera Company of Boston has scheduled Ariadne (first version) fully staged, Bourgeois Gentilhomme and all, at the Shubert, no cast announced. Well? Other operas on OCB's season: Verdi's Macbeth Jan. 22, 24, 29, 31 and Feb. 2 (mat.); Bartok's Wooden Prince, Bluebeard's Castle, and Miraculous Mandarin March 31, April 2, 4, 6 and 11; Mozart's Marriage of Figaro April 9, 13, 16, 18 and 20—these performances at the Shubert—and Roger Sessions' Montezuma May 18 and 25 at Boston Arena.

Swan Song For Leinsdoff

NEW YORK (UPI)—When Erich Leinsdorf demoted the mighty Boston Symphony to an opera orchestra accompanying singers he revealed his heart is warming to an old love and may never again attune itself to Boston.

He did it last week, and in Boston, too. One of the world's most renowned symphonic instruments was required to devote two concerts to providing background for 10 singers in a run-through of Richard Strauss' first version of his opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos."

It was Leinsdorf's prerogative. He is music director of the Boston Symphony and will be until next summer's end when his resignation becomes effective. And it could have been answer enough for those supporters of the orchestra who had been hoping he would reconsider and also an answer to the question concerning his conductorial future.

Resigned From Met

When Leinsdorf took over the Boston in 1962 he had even more reputation as an opera conductor than as a symphony conductor. Indeed, he resigned a top artistic post at the Metropolitan Opera to take the Boston job, and no one will doubt the Met or any other opera house would be happy to have him.

But symphony conductors with established international reputations are scarce these days, as the trustees of the New York Philharmonic will tell you. They're still struggling with choosing a successor to their departing music director, Leonard Bernstein.

For that reason if none other some supporters of the Boston Symphony had been hoping Leinsdorf could be persuaded to stay on. He resigned because he considered the work-load too heavy and the hope was the that the work-load could be negotiated.

These supporters had been made unhappy by the trustees' decision to replace him with William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony. Not because Steinberg lacks international reputation but because he wouldn't give up his Pittsburgh post and intends to be music director of two symphony orchestras simultaneously.

Pride Hurt

Boston still has its pride. To old-line traditional Bostoians it is humiliating to share a music drector with any orchestra, particularly one which was nonexistent when the Boston Symphony was already famous.

Whatever the meaning, eyebrows shot up all over operatic and symphonic circles when Leinsdorf hired 10 opera singers and used the Boston Symphony to make an operatic point of little interest to symphonic audiences.

The point is that Strauss abandoned a felicitous scoring when he expanded his first version of "Adriadne auf Naxos" into the opera which remains viable in the opera house to this very day. The frst version was not viable. It was originally conceived and performed as a stunt and probably hadn't been performed anywhere for some 50 years until Leinsdorf dusted it off.

Meanwhile, Bernstein, the other "big name" symphony conductor who will be at liberty at the end of this music season, remains an enigma.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

APR 20 1969 New England Newsclip

MILFORD CITIZEN
MILFORD, CONN.
DAILY - 1R. 7400

JAN 5 1969 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Gives His Final Performance

Eric Leinsdorf gave his final performance last night as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leinsdorf put Beethoven on his farewell program and at the end of the evening was greeted with sustained applause and standing ovations.

The Symphony director, who came here in 1962, will end his duties at the conclusion of the coming season at Tanglewood.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAY 8 1969 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

RETROSPECT ON ERICH LEINSDORF

I do not know the contents of the story behind Erich Leinsdorf's leaving, or even whether there is a story. I do know that, as these things go, his departure was rather abrupt, the exchange of amenities with the trustees less effusive than the occasion called for, and the stated reasons about an unendurable work load inconsistent with what a person as experienced and as well organized as Mr. Leinsdorf must surely have anticipated when he took on the job.

I also know that at the time of his appointment the orchestra as an instrument was beginning to fall apart at the seams on account of years of deprivation of truly professional direction; that Mr. Leinsdorf very swiftly stopped the deterioration and soon succeeded in rebuilding its quality as an instrument; and that although all of this was generally conceded, something went sour with his stewardship and never thereafter got righted. As early as by the end of his first season he was tolerated rather than cherished, and it seemed foreordained by the end of the second that he would never become a long-range fixture on the Boston scene.

The most reiterated ground for disaffection was the detached character, even down right coldness of his interpretations. There is solid basis for this judgment. High intelligence, impeccable technique, artistic integrity, diligent application — almost invariable ingredients in a Leinsdorf performance — do not suffice to make a work jell absent the catalyst of fervor, the capacity as it were to get inside. All too often the lack of an igniting spark adduced to finely chiselled but devitalized readings. At such times one could cry for the instinctual guttiness of Charles Munch's approach.

Yet this was by no means invariably the case. There were times when his performances simply blazed. Consider the Beethoven Ninth last week and Strauss' "Ariadne" the last season, or the Mahler First, Third and Sixth, Bruckner's Eighth, Haydn's Creation or Britten's "War Requiem" of earlier days. How often can a listener expect a reading to catch fire with any permanent conductor? Two or three times a season if lucky, and Mr. Leinsdorf seems at least to have filled his quota.

On the other hand, Mr. Leinsdorf often came through with very strong renditions even when they did not shower sparks. In previous reviews I mentioned a number of cases in point this season. Then on the question of strong performances, don't overlook the consistently skilled and secure accompanying. And unlike plenty of other conductors, he never gave a truly disastrous reading. I am not sure that there are too many resident conductors whose performances so often at least reveal superior strength even when not inspired.

What happened, I submit, is that the business of Mr. Leinsdorf's coldness grew to be a litany among certain critics here and in New York City. Once that got firmly embedded in the critical folkways the man could do no right. Sometimes it was difficult to believe that the concert I had attended and the review I was reading about it dealt with the same event. The cumulative effect of this sort of thing over the years can be very harsh indeed, and in this instance must have substantially speeded his departure.

The other large public cavil with Mr. Leinsdorf was his programming. The great composers of the Austro-Hungarian Empire are his beat, with a rather large addendum of Stravinsky and, unaccountably, Prokofiev. He doesn't really dig the French and English tradition and he certainly at best is merely dutiful to contemporary composers. But programming is an issue on which no permanent conductor can possibly come out on top. For all his spirited championship of certain contemporary composers, Koussevitsky had a dreadfully constricted musical intellect. Munch's, while far broader, was essentially French parochial, without the stamina in his later years to do more than repeat his specialties over and over again. A conductor like Boulez has quintessential technical equipment and temperament, but were he left to his prepossessions with modern music, even without the problems posed by the record companies and the union, it is difficult to believe that he could survive here beyond a season.

Mr. Leinsdorf's programming was hailed or reviled, as may be, pretty much in accordance with predictable predilections of his listeners over the long haul. What he did do, within his chosen area, was to turn up rare works of the established masters: earlier Haydn and Mozart symphonies, Schumann's Faust, a good many Dvoraks, Bruckner's and Mahler's Sixth symphonies, for example, all of which were enormously rewarding.

A word about the recording companies and their union aforementioned. There is no intention here to knock either. They simply exist as a large and not easily superable condition of a permanent conductor's existence. Recording royalties constitute a large fraction of the orchestra's budget and the entrepreneurial decision, including what to record, lies with the company (here, RCA) and not the conductor. These performances must be meticulously prepared, but the recording budget does not embrace special rehearsal time. Hence the disc gets pressed after the piece in qustion has been prepared and played for the subscription audiences, frequently resulting in exasperating and even outrageous impositions on what are essentially captive listeners.

As for the unions, they are properly concerned with wages, hours and working conditions. If you apply this solicitude in terms of overtime to the concert rendition of a dense new modern score, the budget will permit at best a few hours of rehearsal, where whole days would not even begin to do justice to the task at hand. The wonder is that new modern works are performed as well as they are. Even so, the subscription audience hears only a small fraction of what the composer intended.

In light of the union's solicitude for job security, the firing of personnel whom the conductor feels are incompetent is no longer his plain prerogative. Just how much this, together with other factors that have nothing to do with local labor-management exigencies, account for the consistently audible deadwood in exposed positions in the Boston Symphony Orchestra is speculative. It is safe to say, though, that Mr. Leinsdorf's control over his orchestra was comparatively minimal, and that it would have required years to bring in his own section principals of the quality of Messrs. Fine, Eskin and Schmitz. Therefore, all the clarity and balance in the world would not screen out the poor intonation and raucous tone from certain tenured personnel in exposed chairs.

Finally, Mr. Leinsdorf was innovative, and many things he introduced into the routine of the orchestra were progressive and of a high order. He often allowed the lower echelons to fill in at the first chairs. He used the soloists from the orchestra's ranks with fair frequency. The Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players within a few years have become a substantial adjunct to the cultural forces of this community. The notion of repeating difficult contemporary works within a single concert was commenced. This year the programs were promulgated in advance of the season. The laudable idea of assembling a training orchestra never seemed to bear fruit, however — a threat to some perhaps?

As you can see, this corner which has tended toward the bullish view of Mr. Leinsdorf's capacities, remains so to the end. Some of his most caustic appraisers may yet some day have good cause to look back on his brief span here as a modest Periclean spell.

111.

Leinsdorf bade adieu

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

There wasn't a dry eye in the house, and people stood in Symphony Hall and clapped and wept for 15 minutes. That was when Serge Koussevitzky faced his final Friday afternoon audience.

Yesterday a polite spate of applause brought slight, balding conductor Erich Leinsforf on stage to face his constituents for the last time, and when the long Beethoven Ninth chorused away into silence there was a lively tribute to the performers, but people were already moving out into the humid end-of-day snarl of traffic.

The BSO trustees mostly lingered for a hand-pressing session upstairs, and there were Symphony old-timers like ex-president Henry Cabot, Edward Taft and quite a few, like Harold Hodgkinson and Ralph Lowell, who had loyally come on from the fascinating World Affairs Council luncheon for King Hussein to wind up the 88th season of Boston's proudest pursuit.

Affable mustached King Hussein was both intelligent and friendly, captivated staunch New Englanders like Ralph Lowell, Charles Francis Adams, George Seybolt, the Kevin Whites (the mayor had to divide his lunch time with 14 visiting congressmen), Mrs. Samuel Huntington and Bishop and Mrs. Peabody. The Victor Sachez-Mesas (he's Spain's top man here, and she is a delight) shared with King Hussein a happy reminiscence of time spent in both their country and his with his grandfather, the late King Abdullah, before Symphonying with French Consul General Jaques Massenet and his decorative wife. The Massenets with beautiful island tans, intermissioned with the Edward Tafts at Symphony, and planned a Tanglewood safari before they're off to Paris on home leave.

Bursting with cinerarias superthoughts for next season, the Council of Friends Symphony luncheon at Horticultural Hall was the coziest part of the day.

These sold-out-at-sight before symphony parties are not just money makers, though they're that too. There's a special communication that relates one table to another in the big room where young birch trees rimmed buffets of gourmet platters (Silent Chef gets full marks for this modestly priced deftly done series of melt-in-your-mouths).

Slim and beauteous Betsy (Mrs. Albert) Goodhue, a diamond pin matching her Dalmatian print, costarred with Mrs. John Grandin Jr. on the series, which is already on the list for Friends of Symphony next season. A council founder and top production idea girl along with Mary Lou (Mrs. Louis) Cabot and attractive Mrs. Norman Cahners, they're already jotting down brand-news for Fall 1969, along with the BSO's only woman trustee, able Mrs. James Perkins.

They're terrific and creative and like Elaine (Mrs. Jerome) Rosenfield, think nothing of sandwiching in a fly-over-and-back week-end in London, where Elaine found English Spring at the poet's best.

"The other pretty Cabot," British-born Mrs. Lewis Cabot, had a hat that was Spring itself, confetti-brimmed, with her sleek pale grey, and Mrs. Lewis Clark, Mrs. David Bird, Mrs. Barton Loomis, Mrs. George Parson, Mrs. Frank Allen, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock and Mrs. George Bates were still others of the many.

OLD FRIENDS' FAREWELL—The Boston Symphony's Erich Leinsdorf, left, after his final Friday concert, with longtime B.S.O. trustee Henry Cabot. (Joyce Dopkeen Photo)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

APR 19 1969 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf

Re "Leinsdorf bade adieu" by Marjorie Sherman, Apr. 19, 1969, Boston Globe.

This article was unbecoming a newspaper of the Globe's calibre.

Firstly, it was in poor taste to cover an event such as this by comparing Mr. Leinsdorf unfavorably with one of his predecessors. Why should a news event be described by, in the first paragraph, recounting a similar event of over 15 years ago?

I believe that a man of Mr. Leinsdorf's stature and contributions to the cultural life of Boston deserves better treatment than he received . . .

Incidentally, when he took his final bows before the Saturday night audience, no one rushed to leave the packed hall; and Mr. Leinsdorf was called back again and again before a standing ovation lasting 12 minutes.

MRS. M. B. POLAYES
Needham

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

APR 29 1969 New England Newsclip

Swan Song For Leinsdoff

NEW YORK (UPI)—When Erich Leinsdorf demoted the mighty Boston Symphony to an opera orchestra accompanying singers he revealed his heart is warming to an old love and may never again attune itself to Boston.

He did it last week, and in Boston, too. One of the world's most renowned symphonic instruments was required to devote two concerts to providing background for 10 singers in a run-through of Richard Strauss' first version of his opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos."

It was Leinsdorf's prerogative. He is music director of the Boston Symphony and will be until next summer's end when his resignation becomes effective. And it could have been answer enough for those supporters of the orchestra who had been hoping he would reconsider and also an answer to the question concerning his conductorial future.

Resigned From Met

When Leinsdorf took over the Boston in 1962 he had even more reputation as an opera conductor than as a symphony conductor. Indeed, he resigned a top artistic post at the Metropolitan Opera to take the Boston job, and no one will doubt the Met or any other opera house would be happy to have him.

But symphony conductors with established international reputations are scarce these days, as the trustees of the New York Philharmonic will tell you. They're still struggling with choosing a successor to their departing music director, Leonard Bernstein.

For that reason if none other some supporters of the Boston Symphony had been hoping Leinsdorf could be persuaded to stay on. He resigned because he considered the work-load too heavy and the hope was the that the work-load could be negotiated.

These supporters had been made unhappy by the trustees' decision to replace him with William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony. Not because Steinberg lacks international reputation but because he wouldn't give up his Pittsburgh post and intends to be music director of two symphony orchestras simultaneously.

Pride Hurt

Boston still has its pride. To old-line traditional Bostoians it is humiliating to share a music director with any orchestra, particularly one which was nonexistent when the Boston Symphony was already famous.

Whatever the meaning, eyebrows shot up all over operatic and symphonic circles when Leinsdorf hired 10 opera singers and used the Boston Symphony to make an operatic point of little interest to symphonic audiences.

The point is that Strauss abandoned a felicitous scoring when he expanded his first version of "Adriadne auf Naxos" into the opera which remains viable in the opera house to this very day. The frst version was not viable. It was originally conceived and performed as a stunt and probably hadn't been performed anywhere for some 50 years until Leinsdorf dusted it off.

Meanwhile, Bernstein, the other "big name" symphony conductor who will be at liberty at the end of this music season, remains an enigma.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

APR 20 1969

New England Newsclip

MILFORD CITIZEN
MILFORD, CONN.
DAILY - CIR. 7400

JAN 5 1969

New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Gives His Final Performance

Eric Leinsdorf gave his final performance last night as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leinsdorf put Beethoven on his farewell program and at the end of the evening was greeted with sustained applause and standing ovations.

The Symphony director, who came here in 1962, will end his duties at the conclusion of the coming season at Tanglewood.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAY 8 1969

New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

RETROSPECT ON ERICH LEINSDORF

I do not know the contents of the story behind Erich Leinsdorf's leaving, or even whether there is a story. I do know that, as these things go, his departure was rather abrupt, the exchange of amenities with the trustees less effusive than the occasion called for, and the stated reasons about an unendurable work load inconsistent with what a person as experienced and as well organized as Mr. Leinsdorf must surely have anticipated when he took on the job.

I also know that at the time of his appointment the orchestra as an instrument was beginning to fall apart at the seams on account of years of deprivation of truly professional direction; that Mr. Leinsdorf very swiftly stopped the deterioration and soon succeeded in rebuilding its quality as an instrument; and that although all of this was generally conceded, something went sour with his stewardship and never thereafter got righted. As early as by the end of his first season he was tolerated rather than cherished, and it seemed foreordained by the end of the second that he would never become a long-range fixture on the Boston scene.

The most reiterated ground for disaffection was the detached character, even down right coldness of his interpretations. There is solid basis for this judgment. High intelligence, impeccable technique, artistic integrity, diligent application — almost invariable ingredients in a Leinsdorf performance — do not suffice to make a work jell absent the catalyst of fervor, the capacity as it were to get inside. All too often the lack of an igniting spark adduced to finely chiselled but devitalized readings. At such times one could cry for the instinctual guttiness of Charles Munch's approach.

Yet this was by no means invariably the case. There were times when his performances simply blazed. Consider the Beethoven Ninth last week and Strauss' "Ariadne" the last season, or the Mahler First, Third and Sixth, Bruckner's Eighth, Haydn's Creation or Britten's "War Requiem" of earlier days. How often can a listener expect a reading to catch fire with any permanent conductor? Two or three times a season if lucky, and Mr. Leinsdorf seems at least to have filled his quota.

On the other hand, Mr. Leinsdorf often came through with very strong renditions even when they did not shower sparks. In previous reviews I mentioned a number of cases in point this season. Then on the question of strong performances, don't overlook the consistently skilled and secure accompanying. And unlike plenty of other conductors, he never gave a truly disastrous reading. I am not sure that there are too many resident conductors whose performances so often at least reveal superior strength even when not inspired.

What happened, I submit, is that the business of Mr. Leinsdorf's coldness grew to be a litany among certain critics here and in New York City. Once that got firmly embedded in the critical folkways the man could do no right. Sometimes it was difficult to believe that the concert I had attended and the review I was reading about it dealt with the same event. The cumulative effect of this sort of thing over the years can be very harsh indeed, and in this instance must have substantially speeded his departure.

The other large public cavil with Mr. Leinsdorf was his programming. The great composers of the Austro-Hungarian Empire are his beat, with a rather large addendum of Stravinsky and, unaccountably, Prokofiev. He doesn't really dig the French and English tradition and he certainly at best is merely dutiful to contemporary composers. But programming is an issue on which no permanent conductor can possibly come out on top. For all his spirited championship of certain contemporary composers, Koussevitsky had a dreadfully constricted musical intellect. Munch's, while far broader, was essentially French parochial, without the stamina in his later years to do more than repeat his specialties over and over again. A conductor like Boulez has quintessential technical equipment and temperament, but were he left to his prepossessions with modern music, even without the problems posed by the record companies and the union, it is difficult to believe that he could survive here beyond a season.

Mr. Leinsdorf's programming was hailed or reviled, as may be, pretty much in accordance with predictable predilections of his listeners over the long haul. What he did do, within his chosen area, was to turn up rare works of the established masters: earlier Haydn and Mozart symphonies, Schumann's Faust, a good many Dvoraks, Bruckner's and Mahler's Sixth symphonies, for example, all of which were enormously rewarding.

A word about the recording companies and their union aforementioned. There is no intention here to knock either. They simply exist as a large and not easily superable condition of a permanent conductor's existence. Recording royalties constitute a large fraction of the orchestra's budget and the entrepreneurial decision, including what to record, lies with the company (here, RCA) and not the conductor. These performances must be meticulously prepared, but the recording budget does not embrace special rehearsal time. Hence the disc gets pressed after the piece in qustion has been prepared and played for the subscription audiences, frequently resulting in exasperating and even outrageous impositions on what are essentially captive listeners.

As for the unions, they are properly concerned with wages, hours and working conditions. If you apply this solicitude in terms of overtime to the concert rendition of a dense new modern score, the budget will permit at best a few hours of rehearsal, where whole days would not even begin to do justice to the task at hand. The wonder is that new modern works are performed as well as they are. Even so, the subscription audience hears only a small fraction of what the composer intended.

In light of the union's solicitude for job security, the firing of personnel whom the conductor feels are incompetent is no longer his plain prerogative. Just how much this, together with other factors that have nothing to do with local labor-management exigencies, account for the consistently audible deadwood in exposed positions in the Boston Symphony Orchestra is speculative. It is safe to say, though, that Mr. Leinsdorf's control over his orchestra was comparatively minimal, and that it would have required years to bring in his own section principals of the quality of Messrs. Fine, Eskin and Schmitz. Therefore, all the clarity and balance in the world would not screen out the poor intonation and raucous tone from certain tenured personnel in exposed chairs.

Finally, Mr. Leinsdorf was innovative, and many things he introduced into the routine of the orchestra were progressive and of a high order. He often allowed the lower echelons to fill in at the first chairs. He used the soloists from the orchestra's ranks with fair frequency. The Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players within a few years have become a substantial adjunct to the cultural forces of this community. The notion of repeating difficult contemporary works within a single concert was commenced. This year the programs were promulgated in advance of the season. The laudable idea of assembling a training orchestra never seemed to bear fruit, however — a threat to some perhaps?

As you can see, this corner which has tended toward the bullish view of Mr. Leinsdorf's capacities, remains so to the end. Some of his most caustic appraisers may yet some day have good cause to look back on his brief span here as a modest Periclean spell.

///.

Leinsdorf bade adieu

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

There wasn't a dry eye in the house, and people stood in Symphony Hall and clapped and wept for 15 minutes. That was when Serge Koussevitzky faced his final Friday afternoon audience.

Yesterday a polite spate of applause brought slight, balding conductor Erich Leinsforf on stage to face his constituents for the last time, and when the long Beethoven Ninth chorused away into silence there was a lively tribute to the performers, but people were already moving out into the humid end-of-day snarl of traffic.

The BSO trustees mostly lingered for a hand-pressing session upstairs, and there were Symphony old-timers like ex-president Henry Cabot, Edward Taft and quite a few, like Harold Hodgkinson and Ralph Lowell, who had loyally come on from the fascinating World Affairs Council luncheon for King Hussein to wind up the 88th season of Boston's proudest pursuit.

Affable mustached King Hussein was both intelligent and friendly, captivated staunch New Englanders like Ralph Lowell, Charles Francis Adams, George Seybolt, the Kevin Whites (the mayor had to divide his lunch time with 14 visiting congressmen), Mrs. Samuel Huntington and Bishop and Mrs. Peabody. The Victor Sachez-Mesas (he's Spain's top man here, and she is a delight) shared with King Hussein a happy reminiscence of time spent in both their country and his with his grandfather, the late King Abdullah, before Symphonying with French Consul General Jaques Massenet and his decorative wife. The Massenets with beautiful island tans, intermissioned with the Edward Tafts at Symphony, and planned a Tanglewood safari before they're off to Paris on home leave.

Bursting with cinerarias superthoughts for next season, the Council of Friends Symphony luncheon at Horticultural Hall was the coziest part of the day.

These sold-out-at-sight before symphony parties are not just money makers, though they're that too. There's a special communication that relates one table to another in the big room where young birch trees rimmed buffets of gourmet platters (Silent Chef gets full marks for this modestly priced deftly done series of melt-in-your-mouths).

Slim and beauteous Betsy (Mrs. Albert) Goodhue, a diamond pin matching her Palmatian print, costarred with Mrs. John Grandin Jr. on the series, which is already on the list for Friends of Symphony next season. A council founder and top production idea girl along with Mary Lou (Mrs. Louis) Cabot and attractive Mrs. Norman Cahners, they're already jotting down brand-news for Fall 1969, along with the BSO's only woman trustee, able Mrs. James Perkins.

They're terrific and creative and like Elaine (Mrs. Jerome) Rosenfield, think nothing of sandwiching in a fly-over-and-back week-end in London, where Elaine found English Spring at the poet's best.

"The other pretty Cabot," British-born Mrs. Lewis Cabot, had a hat that was Spring itself, confetti-brimmed, with her sleek pale grey, and Mrs. Lewis Clark, Mrs. David Bird, Mrs. Barton Loomis, Mrs. George Parson, Mrs. Frank Allen, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock and Mrs. George Bates were still others of the many.

OLD FRIENDS' FAREWELL—The Boston Symphony's Erich Leinsdorf, left, after his final Friday concert, with longtime B.S.O. trustee Henry Cabot. (Joyce Dopkeen Photo)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

APR 19 1969

New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf

re "Leinsdorf bade adieu" by Marjorie Sherman, Apr. 19, 1969, Boston Globe.

This article was unbecoming a newspaper of the Globe's calibre.

Firstly, it was in poor taste to cover an event such as this by comparing Mr. Leinsdorf unfavorably with one of his predecessors. Why should a news event be described by, in the first paragraph, recounting a similar event of over 15 years ago?

I believe that a man of Mr. Leinsdorf's stature and contributions to the cultural life of Boston deserves better treatment than he received . . .

Incidentally, when he took his final bows before the Saturday night audience, no one rushed to leave the packed hall; and Mr. Leinsdorf was called back again and again before a standing ovation lasting 12 minutes.

MRS. M. B. POLAYES
Needham

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

APR 29 1969

New England Newsclip

112.

Providence Sunday Journal

September 30, 1962

Meet New Boston Conductor

By RUTH TRIPP
Journal-Bulletin Music Critic

ERICH LEINSDORF reported for work at a new location on the morning of September 21. Outside the stage entrance of Symphony Hall he paused to wave gaily to some of his colleagues of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were also arriving for the first rehearsal of the season.

Later that same afternoon, he sat down to face a press conference in one of the reception rooms of Symphony Hall. There was no suggestion of the double rehearsal which had just closed. Leinsdorf was as fresh and meticulously groomed as if this were his first appearance of the day.

The last strains of the Strauss score had scarcely died away when we found ourselves being introduced around the room. He sat at the far side of the big round table, put his hands on the edge of it, leaned forward and asked, "What can I do for you?"

The questions began. What about plans for the orchestra, program patterns, new works and soloists?

The new Music Director is a master at the art of conversation. Yes, the first six programs are planned. They are identical and Providence is equal to Boston and Cambridge in importance. The Friday-Saturday series in Boston begins its eighty-second season, while Cambridge opens its eighty-first. Tuesday night's concert at Veterans Memorial Auditorium in Providence begins our eightieth season.

Equal in importance? You could hear the question travel with a smile along the row of Boston Symphony Orchestra officials seated at the side of the room. Leinsdorf then said, "Boston is important more often."

Leinsdorf said there will be, over a period of three or four years, "a well balanced view of orchestral literature, classical, romantic and modern." Consideration for his audience is one of the impressive points we gained from the afternoon. "If someone says, I haven't heard this or that, it doesn't mean that it will be neglected."

It was hard to believe that the new conductor is not an American businessman. His appearance gave evidence of fine taste in the choice of material for his suits and tie. Conservative elegance would best describe his appearance. He is short. His dark hair has receded considerably from what was apparently a high forehead. His eyes have a direct, penetrating gaze and his smile is a very friendly one.

Vienna-born in 1912, he was educated at Vienna University and at the State Academy of Music there. In his undergraduate days, he conducted Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and the Thomas opera, Mignon in the same year. Throughout his illustrious career, he has been able to turn with equal success from symphony to opera. At a press conference in Boston this spring he said, "At this moment, my nostalgia for opera is well controlled."

Ready in a moment

Leinsdorf was only twenty when he was appointed assistant to Bruno Walter at the summer Salzburg Festival. He continued in this capacity for four years, working also under Toscanini. From this experience came a recommendation to the Metropolitan Opera and Leinsdorf was engaged to assist Artur Bodansky in the field of German opera. His New York debut was made in January of 1938 when he conducted a performance of Wagner's Die Walkure. He was twenty-six years old two weeks later.

Being ready at a moment's notice proved to be an asset. When Bodansky became ill, Leinsdorf conducted Parsifal with only twelve hours notice. At Bodansky's death, Leinsdorf assumed direction of the German operas at the Metropolitan and stayed there until 1943.

He was the youngest conductor of a major orchestra in this country when he took the Cleveland Orchestra, in 1943. The United States Army called him to service soon after this. (He had become naturalized in 1942.) After nine months of service he was honorably discharged and went back for another season at the Metropolitan, on to nine years with the Rochester Philharmonic, one season with the New York City Opera and back once more to the Metropolitan where he stayed until last spring.

The Leinsdorf family is now living in Brookline, near the family of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops. The one requirement the conductor made of his wife, the former Anne Frohnecht of New York, was that the house she found must not be more than ten minutes away from Symphony Hall.

The Leinsdorfs were married in 1939 and have five children: David, 20, Gregor, 18, Joshua, 17, Deborah Hester, 14 and Jennifer, 10.

He has already accepted membership in a few civic committees and is on the Advisory Committee of the Arts for the National Cultural Center in Washington, D.C. He spoke of having attended the unveiling of the plans for the buildings recently, at a meeting in Newport. His comment was: "They want a cultural center in Washington but they have no money."

About the day's work, he said, "We have had two happy rehearsals. The players were very comfortable. I have had a most delightful day with the orchestra. New members were introduced. (There are four replacements this year, one violin, one cello and two double-basses.) Then the orchestra stood in silent tribute to the memory of Samuel Liebovici, a member of the orchestra for many years. He passed away recently.

"We worked on the Prokofiev score, then on the Piston, and on Eulenspiegel. Then we went to lunch. At two, we went to work again and played the second and third movements of the Eroica. Then Piston again and just now, the Eulenspiegel."

Perhaps the Strauss score had contributed to the occasional twinkle in the conductor's eye. At one point, in discussing the concerts he mentioned the B-2 program. "That's not vitamins, you understand, it's the second pair of concerts in Boston."

During the first six concerts the balance between composers will be neatly managed. The list includes three major contemporary American works: Walter Piston's Seventh Symphony; Samuel Barber's Piano Concerto, which will have its world premiere in Boston with pianist John Browning as soloist; and Charles Ives' Second Symphony.

There will be three non-American contemporary works: Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra; Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms and the Twelfth Symphony by Shostakovich. Also included are Beethoven's Third and Schubert's Fourth Symphonies; the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Debussy's Introduction to Pelleas; Mahler's First Symphony and the Strauss Till Eulenspiegel.

Dearth of strings

Questions were asked about the placement of players for recording sessions. Trial tapes, not intended for issue, have already been made "for RCA's information and ours." Mr. Leinsdorf likes to have his players seated for recording sessions as nearly as possible in the way they play at concerts. He wants his musicians happy. He made the assertion that "Symphony Hall does not need any help" in the matter of acoustics.

Asked about the possibility of presenting opera in concert form, he said, "No, not for this year. I do not see why not, later, if hearing a certain score is inaccessible any other way." He admitted that it would be a difficult demand for the singers, with rehearsals and two concerts in direct succession.

Erich Leinsdorf is sincerely appreciative of the assistance of associate conductor Richard Burgin. He feels that in the area of the Berkshire Center, his aid will be invaluable.

Interesting plans for next summer are in the making, especially for composers of chamber ensemble music. He feels that the Berkshire Music Center is in a "unique position" in this field.

The International String Congress, sponsored by the American Federation of Musicians, met in Lansing, Mich., last summer and Mr. Leinsdorf went out to see its progress. He is very much disturbed by the "dearth of string players in this country. This string problem is a national one. It worries everybody."

The mention of a new concertmaster for the orchestra brought a note of pride to the conductor's voice. He said that Joseph Silverstein who has taken the post of concertmaster, joined the orchestra in 1955 as Number 34 in the violin section. He is now Number One. His career should be an inspiration to young players.

The new Piston score is "as close to me as a work can be. The same with the Barber score which has just been finished. I have played the full score with Mr. Browning at two pianos from a sketch of the score. We had no difficulty with it." Asked about atonal compositions, Leinsdorf said, "Manner and style of writing are only a means to an end. There are plenty of bad works in C major."

Then again we heard, "I always let a work have my best effort. The more difficult a work, the better performance it needs. When you hear a bad performance of Brahms, it is not the fault of Brahms."

And later, "If you don't believe in a work, you don't take the trouble to work out the fine points with the composer. You don't take the trouble to suggest. I always like, if possible, to have the composer present at all rehearsals."

The new conductor likes to start his concerts promptly and when he was a guest conductor in Boston, two years ago, latecomers had to wait in the corridors of Symphony Hall because Leinsdorf felt that the Mozart Symphony was too short to permit a break between movements. It would have destroyed the continuity. Providence concert-goers take warning! Boston Symphony programs at the Veterans Auditorium will begin promptly at 8:15.

The program for Tuesday's concert:

Prokofiev ..... Overture to "War and Peace" (Opera after Leo Tolstoi), Op. 91
(First concert performance in Providence)
Piston ..... Symphony No. 7
I. Con moto
II. Adagio pastorale
III. Allegro festevole
Strauss .. Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form, Op. 28

INTERMISSION

Beethoven ..... Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55
I. Allegro con brio
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace
IV. Finale: Allegro molto

I asked about audience reaction to a concert. Leinsdorf said, "To a conductor, indifference is the worst crime. They may throw baseballs or even cucumbers. I would not like it. Booing?"

Here there was a true continental shrug of the shoulders which spoke volumes. "Booing only means that they are taking a stand in the matter."

WITH ERICH LEINSDORF are Jennifer, Deborah Hester, his wife Anne, and David. Missing from the picture are Gregor and Joshua.

Erich Leinsdorf and the Beginning of the End

By McLAREN HARRIS

Erich Leinsdorf has conducted his last Symphony Hall concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He still has ahead of him recording sessions (this week the BSO records Beethoven's Ninth for RCA), the Biafran benefit concert on April 28 and well over a dozen programs at Tanglewood this summer, but signs of relief and anticipation are already creeping over his face and into his behavior.

Venturing into fearsome Fenway Park-bound traffic on the Red Sox' opening date, we slid into the only parking space within miles, I'm sure, of the Somerset Hotel. "One can accomplish many more important things and take it all in stride," he said, "but discovering this—it's a triumph!"

In December 1967 Leinsdorf announced his decision to resign from the orchestra, chiefly for reasons of overwork. How many Symphony concerts has he conducted since his arrival in 1962?

"RIGHT NOW it is breathing hard on 700," he said. "Somewhere between 640 and 670, but that doesn't include recording sessions, any of the Tanglewood galas, Berkshire Music Center concerts—just Boston Symphony concerts alone."

He shook his head. "After every concert there should be two days of rest. This business of four in a week is too much. Neither music nor musicians will stand up under it. The inspiration, the endeavor, the extremes of effort all go out the window."

But aren't frequent concerts economically beneficial to the orchestra men?

"Economics is a problem, and it becomes worse as our social situation becomes more complex—costs of taxation, health insurance, services. A small example: I found that one of my string players had a tennis elbow. I asked him how he got it. Shoveling snow, he said. He couldn't find anyone else to do it.

ERICH LEINSDORF
. . . turtlenecks and freedom

"Shoveling snow! A man whose occupation depends upon the health of his arms and hands shouldn't have to shovel snow. No, the number of concerts and economics is another problem, but the point of diminishing returns is a question I think must be explored."

WOULD YOU SEEK another resident position?

Leinsdorf was emphatic. "All other things being equal—that is, if conditions remain the same—no. The problem I just told you about? A permanent conductor faces twelve like this every day. There are vetos built into everything he tries to do—costs, no time, bad schedules. I don't blame anyone, but I don't have to put up with it. I believe one is able to make a greater contribution if one is free, not half chained to a stone. Also, remaining in one geographical area for a long time is not my cup of tea."

After all these concerts are there still works left you would like to conduct?

"A long list of them," he said. "Stravinsky's 'Oedipus Rex,' the St. Matthew Passion, Mahler's Ninth Symphony, Schoenberg's 'Gurrelieder,' all of Schoenberg's instrumental works, the first three Tchaikovsky symphonies . . .

"You'll notice some vocal works among them. That's because I believe voice is a neglected art. The entire genre of choral music has been badly misrepresented. I would gladly have done more, but we did not have access to our own choral group. We choose from the (New England) Conservatory, the Chorus pro Musica, Harvard-Radcliffe—but if we try to do too much with area choruses it interferes with their own schedules."

Leinsdorf will return to the Symphony on Nov. 24 for two weeks as guest conductor. His programs, still not firm, will include Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, perhaps Mozart's Symphony No. 29 (A major) or more likely (and more significantly) Schoenberg's "Ode to Napoleon."

In the declining days of his Symphony directorship Leinsdorf finds himself leaning away from the establishmentarians toward the goals of youth. His views on the Vietnam War are unequivocal. "An illegal, undeclared war," he says. He is sympathetic toward student protests. And there are orchestral traditions he would see changed, especially the musicians' attire. "I think the day will come, I don't know how soon, when someone will do away with the ridiculous outfit we are wearing. What we have is half 19th-century formal, half something else—like so many rituals which have lost their meaning." He himself prefers turtlenecks.

WITHHOLDING APPLAUSE between movements is another. "I think concert behavior all comes from unwritten laws dating from someplace like the Gewandhaus in the last century, and it's still required now. Classical composers didn't think of their symphonies as great, holy works which couldn't be interrupted. And you stifle audience participation by shutting off applause."

But he came to the defense of the Friday afternoon Symphony audience, often maligned for supposedly conservative tastes. "It is a superlative audience, in my opinion even more receptive than Saturday night's. The Thursday open rehearsal audience and the Friday are the two most advanced, open-eared audiences we have."

And finally, does he read newspaper criticism?

"No," said Leinsdorf flatly. "Most performers have an entirely wrong view of a critic's function. They think that the relationship between the critic and performer is most important. A critic, however, writes first for those who have not been at the concert and second for those who have. I never heard of an artist who thought that an uncomplimentary review was anything other than undeserved and idiotic. I do not wish to adopt the same unreasonable attitude, and the only way to be sure of it is to ignore criticism completely."

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
23 TI. A YEAR 73,000

JAN 18 1969

Erich Leinsdorf, immediately upon relinquishing his duties as music director of the Boston Symphony—following next summer's Tanglewood Festival—goes to Buenos Aires for fifteen performances at the Teatro Colón. There he will lead new productions of Der Rosenkavalier, Wozzeck and Parsifal.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

APR 20 1969 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

SEP 4 1969 New England Newsclip

KALEIDOSCOPE

By R. E. KRIEGER

Now that the summer season has ended, audience facts and figures are beginning to filter in.

Over at the Tanglewood Festival, attendance for the eight weekends (24 concerts plus eight open rehearsals) was 175,468.

The total attendance including the above and the Gala, The Aug. 5 Pops Concert, and the five contemporary trends concerts totalled 236,937.

Krieger

In 1968 the attendance at all events was 222,293.

The season's close also marked the end of Erich Leinsdorf tenure of seven years with the Boston Symphony. During that time he conducted 709 concerts which included 429 works by 96 composers.

Over at the Williamstown Theater, Nikos Psacharopoulos says that their box office this year was 14 per cent higher than their 1967 season (the previous high) and 11 per cent higher than last year.

Despite the figures, Psacharopoulos says that he expects to lose money this year due to higher production costs. This included the use of 26 professional actors and actresses as opposed to 15 last year.

Things didn't go so well for Ted Shawn and John Christin up at the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival in Lee. They are noting a drop of 10 per cent in attendance over last year. They had eight world premieres of new ballets — plus a two-hour TV show now being screened on National Educational Television.

There'll be new faces plus some ... tr'Actors Guild opens its ... Theater, Hol...

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

DEC 23 1968 New England

Leinsdorf's plans

Erich Leinsdorf will return to opera conducting in the fall of 1969 when his resignation from the position of music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra becomes effective. At the Teatre Colon in Buenos Aires he will conduct five performances of each of three operas: "Der Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck," and "Parsifal."

He returns to Boston as guest conductor on Nov. 24, 1969, for 14 concerts. Guest appearances with several European orchestras are on his agenda for the following months. Other plans have not as yet been settled.

Boston symphony director plays own tune these days

NEW YORK (UPI) — When Erich Leinsdorf demoted the mighty Boston Symphony to an opera orchestra accompanying singers he revealed his heart is warming to an old love and may never again attune itself to Boston.

He did it last week, and in Boston, too. One of the world's most renowned symphonic instruments was required to devote two concerts to providing background for 10 singers in a run-through of Richard Strauss' first version of his opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos."

It was Leinsdorf's prerogative. He is music director of the Boston Symphony and will be until next summer's end when his resignation becomes effective. It could have been answer enough for those supporters of the orchestra who had been hoping he would reconsider and also an answer to the question concerning his conductorial future.

WHEN LEINSDORF took over the Boston in 1962 he had even more reputation as an opera conductor than as a symphony conductor. Indeed, he resigned a top artistic post at the Metropolitan Opera to take the Boston job and no one will doubt the Met or any other opera house would be happy to have him.

But symphony conductors with established international reputations are scarce these days, as the trustees of the New York Philharmonic will tell you. They're still struggling with choosing a successor to their departing music director, Leonard Bernstein.

For that reason if none other some supporters of the Boston Symphony had been hoping Leinsdorf could be persuaded to stay on. He resigned because he considered the work-load too heavy and the hope was that the work-load could be negotiated.

These supporters had been made unhappy by the trustees' decision to replace him with William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony. Not because Steinberg lacks international reputation but because he wouldn't give up his Pittsburgh post and intends to be music director of two symphony orchestras simultaneously.

BOSTON STILL has its pride. To old-line traditional Bostonians it is humiliating to share a music director with any orchestra, particularly one which was non-existent when the Boston Symphony was already famous.

Whatever the meaning, eyebrows shot up all over operatic and symphonic circles when Leinsdorf hired 10 opera singers and used the Boston Symphony to make an operatic point of little interest to symphonic audiences.

The point is that Strauss abandoned a felicitous scoring when he expanded his first version of "Adriadne auf Naxos" into the opera which remains viable in the opera house to this very day. The first version was not viable. It was originally conceived and performed as a stunt and probably hadn't been performed anywhere for some 50 years until Leinsdorf dusted it off.

MEANWHILE, Bernstein, the other "big name" symphony conductor who will be at liberty at the end of this music season, remains an enigma. He is sharing the New York Philharmonic's podium during his last season as music director with six other conductors.

TIMES-TELEGRAM
ELYRIA, O.
D.M. - CIRC. 29,055

JAN-5-69

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Friday, January 10, 1969

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

DEC 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf plans return to opera conducting

The ARTS

Boston Symphony music director Erich Leinsdorf will return to opera conducting when he leaves his orchestra post at the end of the season.

Immediately after the eight-week Tanglewood season, Leinsdorf will go to Buenos Aires to conduct 15 performances at the Teatro Colon, five each of "Der Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck" and "Parsifal." These new productions will be presented between Sept. 19 and Nov. 6, 1969.

Since he became the Boston Symphony conductor in 1962, Leinsdorf has done no live opera, with the exception of three performances of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," a production the Metropolitan Opera took to Paris in the summer of 1966. Leinsdorf has conducted several opera recordings aborad for RCA Victor.

Guest concerts with the Boston Symphony are to follow in November and December. Beginning Nov. 24, Leinsdorf will do 14 concerts, including those on the orchestra's monthly visit to New York. He is to return to Boston also for the next four winter seasons, but contemplated summer commitments abroad may not make it possible to accept the orchestra's invitation to conduct thereafter at Tanglewood.

In January and February 1970, Leinsdorf will conuct the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam. After side trips to Warsaw and Milan he plans to spend March with the Royal Philharmonic in London. Programs in Amsterdam and London are to include the local premieres of the Elliott Carter Piano Concerto. Leinsdorf led the concerto's world premiere in Boston in 1967, when Jacob Lateiner was soloist. The soloist for the European premieres has not yet been announced.

ERICH LEINSDORF

Leinsdorf's pre-Boston career included conducting at the Metropolitan Opera and acting as a music consultant there. After he resigned his Boston post in December 1967, Leinsdorf was invited by the Met's Rudolf Bing "to conduct there as soon as possible," but, says Leinsdorf: "Unfortunately, we have not been able to see eye to eye so far on a new production of a 20th century opera I wanted to do at the Met during the 1970-71 season. I'm confident that we will discuss matters further."

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAY 21 1969

Set Nilsson For Met's New 'Tristan' for '71-'72

A new production at the Metropolitan Opera House, N.Y., of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" will be part of the 1971-72 season and Birgit Nilsson will appear in it. This is the work wherein she made her Met debut in 1959.

Rudolf Bing has also contracted with the Swedish soprano to be heard in the coming season as "Tosca" plus "Die Walkeure" and "Siegfried," the latter part of the Herbert von Karajan "Ring" cycle.

For The "Tristan" the Met is bringing in conductor Erich Leinsdorf, last heard there in 1961-62 when he conducted three complete cycles of the then in repertory productions comprising the "Ring."

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

JAN 10 1969

Music Notes...

Erich Leinsdorf, whose resignation as music director of the Boston Symphony is effective at the end of the season, will return to opera conducting in the fall. He will lead 15 performances at the Teatro Colon in Buenos Aires . . . Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra; British tenor Richard Lewis and the Gnarneri String Quartet have joined the staff of the Curtis Institute of Music of which pianist Rudolf Serkin is director.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 835,505 SUN. 1,445,507

MAY 9 1969

Leinsdorf Baton To Lead the Met In Wagner Opera

By ALLEN HUGHES

Erich Leinsdorf will return to the Metropolitan Opera in the 1971-72 season to conduct the new production of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" with Birgit Nilsson. Mr. Leinsdorf, who has resigned as music director of the Boston Symphony after seven years, last appeared at the Met as conductor of three complete cycles of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen" during the 1961-62 season.

The Metropolitan and the Wagner operas have figured importantly in the career of the 57-year-old Vienna-born conductor ever since he made his American debut with the opera company conducting Wagner's "Die Walküre" in 1938. The following year he was made chief of the Met's German wing.

In 1943, Mr. Leinsdorf resigned from the Met but came back for a season a few years later. In 1957, he began his last engagement which last for five years. Today, he is recognized internationally as a major Wagner interpreter.

*

Erich Leinsdorf and the Beginning of the End

By McLAREN HARRIS

Erich Leinsdorf has conducted his last Symphony Hall concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He still has ahead of him recording sessions (this week the BSO records Beethoven's Ninth for RCA), the Biafran benefit concert on April 28 and well over a dozen programs at Tanglewood this summer, but signs of relief and anticipation are already creeping over his face and into his behavior.

Venturing into fearsome Fenway Park-bound traffic on the Red Sox' opening date, we slid into the only parking space within miles, I'm sure, of the Somerset Hotel. "One can accomplish many more important things and take it all in stride," he said, "but discovering this—it's a triumph!"

In December 1967 Leinsdorf announced his decision to resign from the orchestra, chiefly for reasons of overwork. How many Symphony concerts has he conducted since his arrival in 1962?

"RIGHT NOW it is breathing hard on 700," he said. "Somewhere between 640 and 670, but that doesn't include recording sessions, any of the Tanglewood galas, Berkshire Music Center concerts—just Boston Symphony concerts alone."

He shook his head. "After every concert there should be two days of rest. This business of four in a week is too much. Neither music nor musicians will stand up under it. The inspiration, the endeavor, the extremes of effort all go out the window."

But aren't frequent concerts economically beneficial to the orchestra men?

"Economics is a problem, and it becomes worse as our social situation becomes more complex—costs of taxation, health insurance, services. A small example: I found that one of my string players had a tennis elbow. I asked him how he got it. Shoveling snow, he said. He couldn't find anyone else to do it.

ERICH LEINSDORF
. . . turtlenecks and freedom

"Shoveling snow! A man whose occupation depends upon the health of his arms and hands shouldn't have to shovel snow. No, the number of concerts and economics is another problem, but the point of diminishing returns is a question I think must be explored."

WOULD YOU SEEK another resident position?

Leinsdorf was emphatic. "All other things being equal—that is, if conditions remain the same—no. The problem I just told you about? A permanent conductor faces twelve like this every day. There are vetos built into everything he tries to do—costs, no time, bad schedules. I don't blame anyone, but I don't have to put up with it. I believe one is able to make a greater contribution if one is free, not half chained to a stone. Also, remaining in one geographical area for a long time is not my cup of tea."

After all these concerts are there still works left you would like to conduct?

"A long list of them," he said. "Stravinsky's 'Oedipus Rex,' the St. Matthew Passion, Mahler's Ninth Symphony, Schoenberg's 'Gurrelieder,' all of Schoenberg's instrumental works, the first three Tchaikovsky symphonies . . .

"You'll notice some vocal works among them. That's because I believe voice is a neglected art. The entire genre of choral music has been badly misrepresented. I would gladly have done more, but we did not have access to our own choral group. We choose from the (New England) Conservatory, the Chorus pro Musica, Harvard-Radcliffe—but if we try to do too much with area choruses it interferes with their own schedules."

Leinsdorf will return to the Symphony on Nov. 24 for two weeks as guest conductor. His programs, still not firm, will include Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, perhaps Mozart's Symphony No. 29 (A major) or more likely (and more significantly) Schoenberg's "Ode to Napoleon."

In the declining days of his Symphony directorship Leinsdorf finds himself leaning away from the establishmentarians toward the goals of youth. His views on the Vietnam War are unequivocal. "An illegal, undeclared war," he says. He is sympathetic toward student protests. And there are orchestral traditions he would see changed, especially the musicians' attire. "I think the day will come, I don't know how soon, when someone will do away with the ridiculous outfit we are wearing. What we have is half 19th-century formal, half something else—like so many rituals which have lost their meaning." He himself prefers turtlenecks.

WITHHOLDING APPLAUSE between movements is another. "I think concert behavior all comes from unwritten laws dating from someplace like the Gewandhaus in the last century, and it's still required now. Classical composers didn't think of their symphonies as great, holy works which couldn't be interrupted. And you stifle audience participation by shutting off applause."

But he came to the defense of the Friday afternoon Symphony audience, often maligned for supposedly conservative tastes. "It is a superlative audience, in my opinion even more receptive than Saturday night's. The Thursday open rehearsal audience and the Friday are the two most advanced, open-eared audiences we have."

And finally, does he read newspaper criticism?

"No," said Leinsdorf flatly. "Most performers have an entirely wrong view of a critic's function. They think that the relationship between the critic and performer is most important. A critic, however, writes first for those who have not been at the concert and second for those who have. I never heard of an artist who thought that an uncomplimentary review was anything other than undeserved and idiotic. I do not wish to adopt the same unreasonable attitude, and the only way to be sure of it is to ignore criticism completely."

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
33 TH. A YEAR 73,000

JAN 18 1969

Erich Leinsdorf, immediately upon relinquishing his duties as music director of the Boston Symphony—following next summer's Tanglewood Festival—goes to Buenos Aires for fifteen performances at the Teatro Colón. There he will lead new productions of Der Rosenkavalier, Wozzeck and Parsifal.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

APR 20 1969 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

SEP 4 1969 New England Newsclip

KALEIDOSCOPE

By R. E. KRIEGER

Now that the summer season has ended, audience facts and figures are beginning to filter in.

Over at the Tanglewood Festival, attendance for the eight weekends (24 concerts plus eight open rehearsals) was 175,468.

The total attendance including the above and the Gala, The Aug. 5 Pops Concert, and the five contemporary trends concerts totalled 236,937.

In 1968 the attendance at all events was 222,293.

Krieger

The season's close also marked the end of Erich Leinsdorf tenure of seven years with the Boston Symphony. During that time he conducted 709 concerts which included 429 works by 96 composers.

Over at the Williamstown Theater, Nikos Psacharopoulos says that their box office this year was 14 per cent higher than their 1967 season (the previous high) and 11 per cent higher than last year.

Despite the figures, Psacharopoulos says that he expects to lose money this year due to higher production costs. This included the use of 26 professional actors and actresses as opposed to 15 last year.

Things didn't go so well for Ted Shawn and John Christin up at the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival in Lee. They are noting a drop of 10 per cent in attendance over last year. They had eight world premieres of new ballets — plus a two-hour TV show now being screened on National Educational Television.

There'll be new faces plus some [illegible] tr'Actors Guild opens its [illegible] Theater, Hol[illegible]

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

DEC 23 1968 New England

Leinsdorf's plans

Erich Leinsdorf will return to opera conducting in the fall of 1969 when his resignation from the position of music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra becomes effective. At the Teatre Colon in Buenos Aires he will conduct five performances of each of three operas: "Der Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck," and "Parsifal."

He returns to Boston as guest conductor on Nov. 24, 1969, for 14 concerts. Guest appearances with several European orchestras are on his agenda for the following months. Other plans have not as yet been settled.

Boston symphony director plays own tune these days

NEW YORK (UPI) — When Erich Leinsdorf demoted the mighty Boston Symphony to an opera orchestra accompanying singers he revealed his heart is warming to an old love and may never again attune itself to Boston.

He did it last week, and in Boston, too. One of the world's most renowned symphonic instruments was required to devote two concerts to providing background for 10 singers in a run-through of Richard Strauss' first version of his opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos."

It was Leinsdorf's prerogative. He is music director of the Boston Symphony and will be until next summer's end when his resignation becomes effective. It could have been answer enough for those supporters of the orchestra who had been hoping he would reconsider and also an answer to the question concerning his conductorial future.

WHEN LEINSDORF took over the Boston in 1962 he had even more reputation as an opera conductor than as a symphony conductor. Indeed, he resigned a top artistic post at the Metropolitan Opera to take the Boston job and no one will doubt the Met or any other opera house would be happy to have him.

But symphony conductors with established international reputations are scarce these days, as the trustees of the New York Philharmonic will tell you. They're still struggling with choosing a successor to their departing music director, Leonard Bernstein.

For that reason if none other some supporters of the Boston Symphony had been hoping Leinsdorf could be persuaded to stay on. He resigned because he considered the work-load too heavy and the hope was that the work-load could be negotiated.

These supporters had been made unhappy by the trustees' decision to replace him with William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony. Not because Steinberg lacks international reputation but because he wouldn't give up his Pittsburgh post and intends to be music director of two symphony orchestras simultaneously.

BOSTON STILL has its pride. To old-line traditional Bostonians it is humiliating to share a music director with any orchestra, particularly one which was non-existent when the Boston Symphony was already famous.

Whatever the meaning, eyebrows shot up all over operatic and symphonic circles when Leinsdorf hired 10 opera singers and used the Boston Symphony to make an operatic point of little interest to symphonic audiences.

The point is that Strauss abandoned a felicitous scoring when he expanded his first version of "Adriadne auf Naxos" into the opera which remains viable in the opera house to this very day. The first version was not viable. It was originally conceived and performed as a stunt and probably hadn't been performed anywhere for some 50 years until Leinsdorf dusted it off.

MEANWHILE, Bernstein, the other "big name" symphony conductor who will be at liberty at the end of this music season, remains an enigma. He is sharing the New York Philharmonic's podium during his last season as music director with six other conductors.

JAN-5--69
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Friday, January 10, 1969

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

DEC 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf plans return to opera conducting

The ARTS

Boston Symphony music director Erich Leinsdorf will return to opera conducting when he leaves his orchestra post at the end of the season.

Immediately after the eight-week Tanglewood season, Leinsdorf will go to Buenos Aires to conduct 15 performances at the Teatro Colon, five each of "Der Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck" and "Parsifal." These new productions will be presented between Sept. 19 and Nov. 6, 1969.

Since he became the Boston Symphony conductor in 1962, Leinsdorf has done no live opera, with the exception of three performances of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," a production the Metropolitan Opera took to Paris in the summer of 1966. Leinsdorf has conducted several opera recordings aborad for RCA Victor.

Guest concerts with the Boston Symphony are to follow in November and December. Beginning Nov. 24, Leinsdorf will do 14 concerts, including those on the orchestra's monthly visit to New York. He is to return to Boston also for the next four winter seasons, but contemplated summer commitments abroad may not make it possible to accept the orchestra's invitation to conduct thereafter at Tanglewood.

In January and February 1970, Leinsdorf will conuct the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam. After side trips to Warsaw and Milan he plans to spend March with the Royal Philharmonic in London. Programs in Amsterdam and London are to include the local premieres of the Elliott Carter Piano Concerto. Leinsdorf led the concerto's world premiere in Boston in 1967, when Jacob Lateiner was soloist. The soloist for the European premieres has not yet been announced.

ERICH LEINSDORF

Leinsdorf's pre-Boston career included conducting at the Metropolitan Opera and acting as a music consultant there. After he resigned his Boston post in December 1967, Leinsdorf was invited by the Met's Rudolf Bing "to conduct there as soon as possible," but, says Leinsdorf: "Unfortunately, we have not been able to see eye to eye so far on a new production of a 20th century opera I wanted to do at the Met during the 1970-71 season. I'm confident that we will discuss matters further."

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAY 21 1969

Set Nilsson For Met's New 'Tristan' for '71-'72

A new production at the Metropolitan Opera House, N.Y., of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" will be part of the 1971-72 season and Birgit Nilsson will appear in it. This is the work wherein she made her Met debut in 1959.

Rudolf Bing has also contracted with the Swedish soprano to be heard in the coming season as "Tosca" plus "Die Walkeure" and "Siegfried," the latter part of the Herbert von Karajan "Ring" cycle.

For The "Tristan" the Met is bringing in conductor Erich Leinsdorf, last heard there in 1961-62 when he conducted three complete cycles of the then in repertory productions comprising the "Ring."

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 925,507 SUN. 1,415,507

MAY 9 1969

Leinsdorf Baton To Lead the Met In Wagner Opera

By ALLEN HUGHES

Erich Leinsdorf will return to the Metropolitan Opera in the 1971-72 season to conduct the new production of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" with Birgit Nilsson. Mr. Leinsdorf, who has resigned as music director of the Boston Symphony after seven years, last appeared at the Met as conductor of three complete cycles of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen" during the 1961-62 season.

The Metropolitan and the Wagner operas have figured importantly in the career of the 57-year-old Vienna-born conductor ever since he made his American debut with the opera company conducting Wagner's "Die Walküre" in 1938. The following year he was made chief of the Met's German wing.

In 1943, Mr. Leinsdorf resigned from the Met but came back for a season a few years later. In 1957, he began his last engagement which last for five years. Today, he is recognized internationally as a major Wagner interpreter.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,197

JAN 10 1969

Music Notes...

Erich Leinsdorf, whose resignation as music director of the Boston Symphony is effective at the end of the season, will return to opera conducting in the fall. He will lead 15 performances at the Teatro Colon in Buenos Aires . . . Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra; British tenor Richard Lewis and the Guarneri String Quartet have joined the staff of the Curtis Institute of Music of which pianist Rudolf Serkin is director.

114.

Where Does He Go From Here?

By DONAL HENAHAN

EVERY primitive society has its unifying structure, its one overriding idea or activity that binds all members of the tribe in one holy communion of mutual understanding. In Lapland it is the endless, life-consuming tending of the reindeer; in Manhattan it is the ritualistic hunt for The Apartment. Erich Leinsdorf, whose resignation as musical director of the Boston Symphony takes effect next summer, was in town the other day, ostensibly to conduct some concerts and make a recording. It was obvious, however, that he was already phasing himself back into the mores of the island culture that he left seven years ago when he took the Boston post. Almost his first words were those of a native: "How do you go about looking for an apartment nowadays in Manhattan? It's impossible. I only want a pied à terre, because for a while it will be a matter of spending only a few days or weeks in town." He was seated at the time in a suite at the Carlyle, looking relaxed and natty in a houndstooth sport jacket, a loud purple-striped tie and furry sideburns that neatly counterbalanced an unfurry, in fact quite sleekly bald, head.

*

This is a season of change and upheaval for Leinsdorf, but he seemed to be not so much accepting as embracing it. He laughed often and easily, and the Old Maestro affectations that make conversation with many conductors a chore were missing. But a man in transition does have his problems. "Since my divorce last winter, my entire library has been in storage — a warehouse somewhere in the Bronx." (The Bronx, he indicated with a wave, was "north of here, perhaps slightly east.") "Every time I want to look at some music I have to borrow it from someone. My books and music could be in Timbuktu, it would make no difference."

The second Mrs. Leinsdorf, an attractive 33-year-old from Buenos Aires named Vera Graf, whom the conductor married last August, has a New York apartment, but Leinsdorf threw up his hands over it: "I couldn't begin to unpack even a couple of the dozens of crates I have stored out there in the Bronx." Leinsdorf got all his belongings out of Austria when he left as a refugee in 1937 to join the Metropolitan Opera at the recommendation of Toscanini; he has been packratting ever since. "I have never thrown anything away. My mother saved wrapping paper. Did you know, for example, that there are now two editions of the complete works of Schubert?" He has both, of course, and triplicates and quadruplicates of many other scores.

*

The new Mrs. Leinsdorf, while evidently less of a collector, is also a musician who has played the violin in the New York City Opera Orchestra and the American Symphony. She has never played in an orchestra conducted by her husband. "But we play sonatas together," Leinsdorf noted. Leinsdorf, who was 57 this month, was married to his first wife for 29 years and they have five children (three boys and a girl in their 20's and a 16-year-old girl). So when he leaves Boston after the final Tanglewood concert next August, he will be launching out on several new lives at once. "I want to get out of routine conducting. I want to do less work and better work" (a motto any New Yorker can sympathize with). "That was the crux of the Boston situation. I didn't want to go on conducting 100 concerts a year, and they thought it had to be that way. But, really, the job of musical director is every day more and more an absurdity, and not only in Boston."

While not wishing to sound as if he should be awarded the Purple Heart ("No, the Purple Behind is what the musical director gets"), he nonetheless ticked off frustrations by the dozen that faced him. Take the Elliott Carter Piano Concerto, which the Ford Foundation commissioned in 1959, and which finally was given its world premiere in Boston in January, 1967, seven years later. It has had very few hearings —in Minneapolis, Chicago, Buffalo and Berlin—since then.

"Inevitably it turned out in each case that enough rehearsal time was not available — which brings to mind Brecht's dictum on the theater in 1932, when he said that the play had to fit the apparat because the apparat was paramount, omnipotent." There is no musical decision today, Leinsdorf finds, that does not have "a built-in veto" from extra-musical sources. This winter he planned to take Varèse's "Déserts," a work for tape and large percussion forces, along on the orchestra's East Coast tour. "It was discovered, unfortunately, that an extra truck would be needed for the percussion, so 'Déserts' will be done only in New York and Washington. Before a composer writes anything nowadays, he would be wise to communicate with Jimmy Hoffa as musical consultant."

*

Leinsdorf will conduct the Carter concerto next season as a guest with the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam, and with the BBC Symphony "because they promised me seven rehearsals — 21 hours." But at Boston he found in his seven years "a steady erosion of rehearsal time in contractual negotiations with the orchestra committee."

While he admires the Carter score immensely, Leinsdorf believes many composers throw up impossible barriers in front of the symphony orchestra. The Carter work, for instance, has pages with 71 separate staves — 71 separate instrumental parts — as contrasted to about a dozen or less in Beethoven's early symphonies. Perhaps because of its difficulty, the concerto took Carter seven years to compose. "At that rate, Mozart would have taken 189 years to compose his 27 piano concertos." Today's composers, Leinsdorf points out, do not feel under any pressure to produce. "There is no overwhelming demand for the Carter concerto, obviously." But for Mozart and Haydn, "composing was a profession not unlike journalism."

Leinsdorf freely admits he does not have the answer to the alienation between public and composer. "But for some years I believe the split will become gradually wider and when the change comes — whether in five, 10, 20 or 30 years—it will be a change in the nature of a revolution." In the meantime, however, what is to be done? "Well, our entire programing method is mad. How can I expect that Mr. X, a Boston Symphony trustee who tells me he wants to hear no music after Liszt, will swallow the Carter concerto?"

At the opera, "how can you expect someone who enjoys 'La Gioconda' to sit through 'Wozzeck'? Today, I myself wouldn't take out a subscription to any musical organization. The idea of subscribing to one group that tries to please all tastes is foolish. There are people who want to hear only 18th-century music. That's a mental condition, and I can understand it. The peaceful prattle of the baroque. It's an emotional reaction."

To accommodate such in-

Continued on Page 31

Bob Greene

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf

"How can I expect Mr. X to swallow the Carter concerto?"

Where Does He Go?

Continued from Page 17

creasingly specialized taste buds, "the symphony orchestra must be reorganized. It was made to satisfy the 19th century, and it must be reorganized for the 20th. We need three groups: a basic symphony of 75 to 80 players for the 19th-century repertory (50 good strings in a good hall can play most of the repertory, up to and including Bruckner); a smaller group for the baroque, and a specially trained ensemble for new music. If you do this, the musically right thing, it is not necessary to reduce the total orchestra force. The diagnosis is not difficult. But overcoming the vested interests is difficult — not merely crusty old administrations, which can be done, but vested emotional interests, those are harder to combat."

The symphony orchestra's crisis has not been solved by the Ford Foundation's $80-million, matching-grant program, Leinsdorf feels. "The Ford program satisfied the orchestra men's legitimate demand for better pay but the error in the whole structure was this: the money should not have been translated into more public concerts." The longer seasons exhaust the musicians, wear out the masterpieces, and, when the concert halls are not filled, give an unnecessarily dark picture of the orchestra's health. "I tried putting Bach organ music on my Boston Symphony programs, but most administrators don't want that sort of thing. They are afraid the musicians will taste the blood of shorter hours." The businessman's approach to musical problems was epitomized for Leinsdorf when a fellowship program for resident composers was dropped by the Boston Symphony. "One of our bankers said, 'I don't believe in fellowships. People should work.'"

*

Would Leinsdorf consider any new permanent post? "Not in the next 24 hours. I see nothing at the moment that attracts me." He will go as a guest conductor to Cologne only because they offered him a new production of "Wozzeck." "I might swallow the 100-concerts-a-year routine if as musical director I could do interesting works, too. I speak now not of ordinary premieres—they are a dime a dozen—but of important works. But the teeth-pulling before you can do even one a year!"

Leinsdorf, in his seven Boston years, suffered "no vetoes in matters of musical taste" by any administrator there. "But I understand now that guest conductors are being asked to include one standard symphony on each program."

When he decided to leave Boston, Leinsdorf called Rudolf Bing to let him know in advance. "When something is going to be in the newspapers, old friends and acquaintances should know. He asked me, 'Will you come back to the Met?' But I said the right work must come along. I would not come back to do the standard repertory. After all, I spent 13 years at the Met in all." For now, Leinsdorf has other paths that he wants to prowl. While in New York he went back to an old love, the piano, and recorded the Brahms "Four Serious Songs" as accompanist to the Metropolitan baritone Sherrill Milnes (the songs will fill out Side 4 of an RCA release of the Brahms Requiem).

Leinsdorf also is keeping occupied as a board member of the Kennedy Center in Washington and as a board member of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, to which he was named by President Johnson in 1968. The aim of the agency "is to stimulate noncommercial stations and programing, and perhaps we will even convince Congress that the Public Broadcast Laboratory shouldn't be so prominent."

Lyndon Johnson and Leinsdorf have been "friends for 31 years. I met him in Washington in 1938 when he was a freshman Congressman and I an assistant Met conductor. He helped me straighten out my papers to prolong my stay in this country."

Right now, Leinsdorf is not so concerned with public activities. "I want to get back to living the life of a musician. And I want to continue to grow."

Enter, at interview's end, a trim and vivacious young woman who did not seem to find the famous maestro and confidant of Presidents a very fearsome figure. In fact, she went right up to him and squeezed his elbow. Vera Leinsdorf's presence reminded him of yet another new direction possible in his career. "I may write a book. I already have the opening sentence, which is my wife's description of a conductor: 'A conductor is a man who stands in front of an orchestra slicing up air.'"

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

FEB 16 1969

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

LEINSDORF TO LEAD BUENOS AIRES OPERA

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct 15 opera performances at the Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires in the fall of 1969. With the exception of three performances of Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" for the Metropolitan Opera during its visit to Paris in 1966, these will be Mr. Leinsdorf's first operatic appearances since he became music director of the Boston Symphony in 1962.

At the Colón he will conduct five performances each of Richard Strauss's "Der Rosenkavalier," Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," and Wagner's "Parsifal." All three will be presented in new productions between Sept. 19 and Nov. 6.

Mr. Leinsdorf will return to the Boston Symphony as guest conductor on Nov. 24, 1969 for 14 concerts, including appearances in New York.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

DEC 6 1968

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

MAY 9 1969

Leinsdorf Returning to Met

Erich Leinsdorf will return to the Metropolitan Opera next season to conduct the new production of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." He last appeared at the Met during the 1961-62 season when he conducted three complete cycles of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen."

Leinsdorf Plans Return To Conducting of Operas

BOSTON — Boston Symphony music director Erich Leinsdorf will return to opera conducting when he leaves his orchestra post at the end of the season.

Immediately after the eight-week Tanglewood season, Leinsdorf will go to Buenos Aires to conduct 15 performances at the Teatro Colon, five each of "Der Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck" and "Parsifal." These new productions will be presented between Sept. 19 and Nov. 6, 1969.

Little Live

Since he became the Boston Symphony conductor in 1962, Leinsdorf has done no live opera, with the exception of three performances of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," a production the Metropolitan Opera took to Paris in the summer of 1966. Leinsdorf has conducted several opera recordings abroad for RCA Victor.

Guest concerts with the Boston Symphony are to follow in November and December. Beginning Nov. 24, Leinsdorf will do 14 concerts, including those on the orchestra's monthly visit to New York. He is to return to Boston also for the next four winter seasons, but contemplated summer commitments abroad may not make it possible to accept the orchestra's invitation to conduct thereafter at Tanglewood.

European Tour

In January and February 1970, Leinsdorf will conduct the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam. After side trips to Warsaw and Milan he plans to spend March with the Royal Philharmonic in London. Programs in Amsterdam and London are to include the local premieres of the Elliott Carter Piano Concerto. Leinsdorf led the concerto's world premiere in Boston in 1967, when Jacob Lateiner was soloist. The soloist for the European premieres has not yet been announced.

Leinsdorf's pre-Boston career included conducting at the Metropolitan Opera and acting as a music consultant there. After he resigned his Boston post in December 1967, Leinsdorf was invited by the Met's Rudolf Bing "to conduct there as soon as possible," but, says Leinsdorf: "Unfortunately, we have not been able to see eye to eye so far on a new production of a 20th century opera I wanted to do at the Met during the 1970-71 season. I'm confident that we will discuss matters further."

BULLETIN (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 147,900

DEC 11 1968

New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

DEC 7 1968

New England Newsclip

Maestro Leinsdorf Has Busy Retirement Plans

ERICH LEINSDORF, retiring as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the Tanglewood season next summer, has announced his schedule for the 1969-1970 season. Immediately following departure from the Berkshire Music Center at Lenox, Mass., he will go to Buenos Aires, Argentina, to conduct five performances each of three operas at the Teatro Colon.

Except for performances with the Metropolitan Opera in Paris in the summer of 1966, this will mark his first appearance in an opera pit since assuming directorship of the BSO. Operas he will conduct at the Colon are Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," Berg's "Wozzeck" and Wagner's "Parsifal," each to be presented in new productions between Sept. 19 and Nov. 6.

Asked why his return to opera will not be at the Met where he conducted for many years and held the title of music consultant, Mr. Leinsdorf said, "The day after I resigned from the Boston Symphony Rudolf Bing called to invite me to conduct at the Metropolitan as soon as possible. Unfortunately, we have not been able to see eye-to-eye so far on a new production of a 20th century opera I wanted to do during the 1970-71 season. But I'm confident we will discuss matters further."

As guest conductor Mr. Leinsdorf will lead the BSO again in a series beginning next Nov. 24. The New Year, 1970, will find him conducting the Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam, as well as Warsaw and Milan. The following March he will be a guest on the Royal Philharmonic's podium in London, including on the programs Elliott Carter's piano concerto he, the BSO, and Jacob Lateiner premiered last January. Mr. Leinsdorf is contracted to guest conduct the BSO for the next five years.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,006 SUN. 3,221,810

MAY 9 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

MAY 14 1969

New England Newsclip

... (not just to criticize for low achievement)." Sounds reasonable . . . Just learned that Erich Leinsdorf, retiring as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the Tanglewood season this summer, will return to the Metropolitan Opera to conduct the new production of "Tristan and Isolde" for the 1971-72 season. He last appeared at the Met in 1961-62 to conduct three complete cycles of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen." . . . See where Mrs. Bernice ... formerly of Pittsfield ... in Groton ... ters

... will ... be at the ... cured are baritone ... the orchestra's jazz ... and the 100-voice Miami University chorus. It is Brubeck's first large-scale sacred work for symphony orchestra, chorus and jazz soloists. . . . The new production of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" announced for the 1971-72 season at the Met will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, who last appeared there in the 1961-62 season.

No Rest for Erich Leinsdorf

By JOHN F. KYES
Of The Gazette Staff

BOSTON — Erich Leinsdorf, his duties with the Boston Symphony ended, hasn't many days of rest before rehearsals in Buenos Aires on Sept. 3 for 15 performances in the Teatro Colon Opera House, of "Der Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck" and "Parsifal." Commenting that "musicians must be very wicked, since they say there's no rest for the wicked," Leinsdorf recalled that in late June he spent two weeks in England, leading the London Sympnony in its 65th anniversary concert at Festival Hall, then since July 1 he conducted the Boston Symphony in 15 concerts and 16 rehearsals at Tanglewood, as well as conducting "Wozzeck" twice (with 13 rehearsals) for the Berkshire Music Center.

Leinsdorf's finale with the Boston Symphony arrived on Aug. 24, completing the terms of the resignation first announced in December, 1967.

Leinsdorf, his orchestra, soloists and chorus combined to utter a splendid swan-song.

Few Tears

The occasion was deservedly rich in typical Tanglewood expressions of appreciation, but the April parting at Boston had evoked few tears. Boston had disappointed Leinsdorf, and he had disappointed Boston. Each had expected too much of the other.

Boston officials found in Leinsdorf a conscientious worker, and wanted results 12 months a year. Boston needed badly to "sell" a lot of records and increase the orchestra players' income. Leinsdorf's ingenious special projects were sometimes costly and did not sell too well. On the whole, Boston's royalties have not prospered as officials hoped.

This is in spite of the fact that Leinsdorf made 65 recordings with the Boston Symphony for RCA victor, and has received seven "Grammy" awards. Boston has now switched to Deutsche Grammophon.

At Tanglewood, Leinsdorf took the Berkshire Music Center very seriously. He tried to tighten it up, make it a proving ground for young artists. Before him, the late Charles Munch had viewed the "school" with tolerant, somewhat grandfatherly goodwill, and had left the work to others.

Operas in Concert

Leinsdorf's performances of operas in concert form were not his only good innovations in Tanglewood weekends. The Friday night late (9 o'clock) concerts drew music-lovers from a distance, and local people enjoyed the 7 o'clock

Preludes of chamber music.

Leinsdorf throughout his seven years at Boston claimed he was overworked. A glance at the present situation tends to confirm this.

Tanglewood's public concerts next year will have Seiji Ozawa, young and dynamic, as principal conductor and artistic director. Gunther Schuller, a vital force at the Berkshire Music Center in recent years, becomes its head. Ozawa and Schuller both will have Leonard Bernstein as adviser. What a team! All three are alumni of the Music Center.

At Boston, work decentralization is less evident. William Steinberg, B.S.O. conductor for the next three seasons, will conduct more than half of the Boston concerts, still leading the symphony orchestra at Pittsburgh.

Guest Conductors

Guest conductors will fill out the Boston season, but they can be a headache, too.

Steinberg's heavy schedule at Boston will include plenty of recording sessions. And he is in his late sixties, more than 10 years older than Leinsdorf.

Boston's assistant conductorship has changed hands. Charles Wilson, a capable pianist, choral conductor and all-round musician, has returned to his old love, as principal conductor for the New York City Opera.

His successor, mid-twentyish Michael Tilson Thomas, an excellent pianist, and already snapped up by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, is a conductor of discernment, and can tackle new music with youthful enthusiasm.

Here may be some slight relief for Steinberg, as Thomas conducts an occasional concert.

All of this does not define B.S.O.'s standing as an orchestra, in 1962, now, or in the future.

Leinsdorf had high ideals. He inherited mean jobs. Munch's favoritisms had to be straightened out, and systematic rehearsals replace Munch's alternate brilliant winsomeness and moments of sloppiness.

No Divine Spark

But though Leinsdorf improved all-round performance standards, he did not strike a divine spark. Too often he created indifference or enmity. Within the orchestra, erstwhile idols grumbled Other players vented their spleen by finding ways to sabotage and waste rehearsal time.

Many dowagers and wealthy oldsters in the Symphony Hall audiences did not really like Leinsdorf. He upset their favorite players. He did not bring the exictement or charm of a Munch, or the authority (overbearing but cherished by Boston) of a Koussevitzky.

So Erich Leinsdorf has departed, leaving a formidable record of work done in seven years (conducted 709 concerts, presenting 429 works by 96 composers.)

Along the road, he has shown his humanity by musical tributes to such great departed personages as John F. Kennedy, Munch and Eisenhower, and on the other hand has demonstrated a keen interest in youth and young music.

He presented 13 world premieres and five U.S. premieres.

He enjoyed meeting the press, and was eager to discuss plans and programs. Somehow, he never could quite figure out why reporters were less excited than he was.

Now he is free to do more of that guest conducting which (he stated two years ago) the heavy administratrative schedule at Boston had held to a minimum.

Erich Leinsdorf as drawn by Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
AUG 27 1969
New England Newsclip

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000
MAR 8 1969

CHATTING IN CONCERT are Erich Leinsdorf (center), chief conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Bernard T. Ness (l.), managing director of RCA's record division; and Herbert T. Brunn, vice president of the international division of RCA. The occasion was an RCA press reception in honor of the maestro, who is in England to conduct three concerts with the London Symphony Orchestra. Also honored at the gathering was pianist John Browming, who is performing in Britain, too.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 387,180 SUN. 610,016
AUG 31 1969

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JUN 4 1969

business on his own. He plays the eatery for the last time on June 21, after which Ian Stewart and his group and the Stuart Gordon orch will be featured.

Erich Leinsdorf interrupting a vacation to conduct the London Symphony's 65th anni concert at the Royal Festival Hall June 26, replacing Sir Adrian Boult who has had to cancel all his June engagements in order to have an operation.

In and out: Steve McQueen, Jim Backus, Louis Jourdan, Charles Bronson, Bruce Cohn Curtis, Mary Tyler Moore, Rossano Brazzi, Ed- Everett Horton, Rod Steiger, Alan King, Carl John

casional are... and shells. Musicians batteries in the summertime, ences would relax with summertime trifles. This summer the concert season was extended full blast, with changes only from indoor to outdoor halls, to keep up the box office to meet symphony payrolls and hold the orchestras intact. Conductors and superstar soloists shuttled from festival to festival, from continent to continent to satisfy the new demand for big, innovative programs.

Erich Leinsdorf, who has just concluded the Tanglewood Music Festival's season, summed up his season for the New York Times:

"SINCE JULY 1 I conducted 15 different programs and 16 rehearsals with the Boston, as well as two performances of 'Wozzeck' with 13 rehearsals by the Berkshire Music Center. The two last weeks of June I was in England to lead the London Symphony Orchestra in its sixty-fifth concert at Festival Hall. They say there's no rest for the wicked, and musicians must be very wicked." He was about to depart for Buenos Aires to begin rehearsals for three operas.

And the audiences? They keep coming and buying tickets and listening and looking. Is there an audience saturation point? It has been assumed that there is one in the visual arts, which usually take a breathing spell between main events from early summer to around late September. Yet there was last year's "Unknown India" show at the City Art Museum, a top-flight exhibition that ran from mid-July until late August with consistently good attendance.

In Chicago right now is the show, "50 Years Bauhaus," at the Illinois Institute ...nology — a survey of projects by ...ents of that influential

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 423,157
MAR 16 1969

Barr Lecture At Princeton

PRINCETON—Alfred H. Barr Jr., the first director of New York's Museum of Modern Art, will present an illustrated lecture on "Picasso: Pillar of Tradition" Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. at Princeton University.

Before he was named director of the Museum of Modern Art in 1929, Barr taught the first college course devoted to 20th century art at Wellesley College.

Barr will be the second of three speakers in this year's Spencer Trask lecture series at Princeton. Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, delivered the first lecture, and author Robert Penn Warren will give the final address on April 8.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704
MAR 29 1969

Hurok Concerts Booking Major Artists for Season

Hurok Concerts has signed the single largest group of artists it has ever added at one time. Now being booked for engagements next season are Teresa Berganza, mezzo soprano; Nicolai Gedda, tenor; Carol Neblett and Karen Lorenzen, sopranos, and two singers from the Royal Swedish Opera in Stockholm, Berit Lindholm, soprano, and Helga Brilioth, tenor.

Also signed are the Israeli duo-pianists, Bracha Eden and Alexander Tamir; Nelson Freire, pianist from Brazil; and Edward Auer and James Dick, both American pianists. The list is completed by Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony, and Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, who is leaving his Boston post at the conclusion of this summer's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

115

Music

The Symph

By Robert C. Marsh

This weekend, after several delays, we finally have the programs and a complete list of conductors for the 79th season of the Chicago Symphony, opening Sept. 25 at Orchestra Hall.

This will be the first year of joint direction by Georg Solti as music director and Carlo Maria Giulini as principal guest conductor. It also will be the fifth and final year of the present contract between the Orchestral Assn. and the Chicago Federation of Musicians.

For the subscriber, prices will be up and the ... programs will be revised. Th... Thursday ...

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 546,570 SUN. 712,125
JUL 13 1969

Continued from Page 1, this section

then returning Jan. 29 for a second four-week visit through Feb. 21.

Taken as a whole, Giulini's programs reflect the same cultural parochialism of Toscanini's repertory with the New York Philharmonic 35 years ago. He is happy to repeat works he has offered here before, even trashy things like the suite from Casella's "La Giara," and apparently he feels no responsibility for the native-born American composer who must turn to the orchestras of his own country (and the men who conduct them) for an opportunity to be heard.

THE REMAINING 12 weeks of the schedule goes to guests with more limited invitations. Irwin Hoffman has three weeks. Georg Semkow and Bruno Maderna, both newcomers to local audiences, have a fortnight each. One-week visits are set for Eliahu Inbal and Charles Mackerras, both of them newcomers. Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos, Aaron Copland and Erich Leinsdorf, already known to the Chicago audience, complete the schedule.

Although the planners may have tried to make all series equally appealing, it seems to me that the B concerts in the Thursday and Friday patterns offer the highest concentration of interesting events, with Solti's concert production of Beethoven's "Fidelio," one of the chief attractions.

Let's look at some program details.

Giulini's opening-night concert is a sort of preview of recording sessions, with excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." He follows with Isaac Stern playing the Beethoven violin concerto in a second-week program that also contains Hindemith's Concert Music. Byron Janis appears the next Thursday to play the Third Beethoven piano concerto, and Giulini's programs end with Franco Gulli joining him for the Second violin concerto of Paganini.

Kay's "Of New Horizons" is on Hoffman's fifth-week program. Inbal will make his debut with a Mozart-Sibelius evening. Leinsdorf will join Bruno Gelber in the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto. Semkow has a genuine novelty, the Scriabian Second symphony, for his first week, a Stravinsky-Tchaikovsky program for the second.

Week No. 10 brings Solti with Ives "Three Places in New England" replacing the longer, and more important Second Symphony announced earlier, and Jacqueline du Pre as soloist in the Dvorak cello concerto. The Carter Variations for Orchestra and Bartok Dance Suite make up most of Solti's second program. Haydn's "The Creation" is heard twice, Dec. 11 and 12, and Yehudi Menuhin joins Solti for the Bartok violin concerto in the pre-Christmas Week.

JANUARY BEGINS WITH THE 14TH program of the series. Solti's performance of the Mahler Fifth ... over for two weeks ...

No Rest for Erich Leinsdorf

By JOHN F. KYES

Of The Gazette Staff

BOSTON — Erich Leinsdorf, his duties with the Boston Symphony ended, hasn't many days of rest before rehearsals in Buenos Aires on Sept. 3 for 15 performances in the Teatro Colon Opera House, of "Der Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck" and "Parsifal." Commenting that "musicians must be very wicked, since they say there's no rest for the wicked," Leinsdorf recalled that in late June he spent two weeks in England, leading the London Sympnony in its 65th anniversary concert at Festival Hall, then since July 1 he conducted the Boston Symphony in 15 concerts and 16 rehearsals at Tanglewood, as well as conducting "Wozzeck" twice (with 13 rehearsals) for the Berkshire Music Center.

Leinsdorf's finale with the Boston Symphony arrived on Aug. 24, completing the terms of the resignation first announced in December, 1967.

Leinsdorf, his orchestra, soloists and chorus combined to utter a splendid swan-song.

Few Tears

The occasion was deservedly rich in typical Tanglewood expressions of appreciation, but the April parting at Boston had evoked few tears. Boston had disappointed Leinsdorf, and he had disappointed Boston. Each had expected too much of the other.

Boston officials found in Leinsdorf a conscientious worker, and wanted results 12 months a year. Boston needed badly to "sell" a lot of records and increase the orchestra players' income. Leinsdorf's ingenious special projects were sometimes costly and did not sell too well. On the whole, Boston's royalties have not prospered as officials hoped.

This is in spite of the fact that Leinsdorf made 65 recordings with the Boston Symphony for RCA victor, and has received seven "Grammy" awards. Boston has now switched to Deutsche Grammophon.

At Tanglewood, Leinsdorf took the Berkshire Music Center very seriously. He tried to tighten it up, make it a proving ground for young artists. Before him, the late Charles Munch had viewed the "school" with tolerant, somewhat grandfatherly goodwill, and had left the work to others.

Operas in Concert

Leinsdorf's performances of operas in concert form were not his only good innovations in Tanglewood weekends. The Friday night late (9 o'clock) concerts drew music-lovers from a distance, and local people enjoyed the 7 o'clock Preludes of chamber music.

Leinsdorf throughout his seven years at Boston claimed he was overworked. A glance at the present situation tends to confirm this.

Tanglewood's public concerts next year will have Seiji Ozawa, young and dynamic, as principal conductor and artistic director. Gunther Schuller, a vital force at the Berkshire Music Center in recent years, becomes its head. Ozawa and Schuller both will have Leonard Bernstein as adviser. What a team! All three are alumni of the Music Center.

At Boston, work decentralization is less evident. William Steinberg, B.S.O. conductor for the next three seasons, will conduct more than half of the Boston concerts, still leading the symphony orchestra at Pittsburgh.

Guest Conductors

Guest conductors will fill out the Boston season, but they can be a headache, too.

Steinberg's heavy schedule at Boston will include plenty of recording sessions. And he is in his late sixties, more than 10 years older than Leinsdorf.

Boston's assistant conductorship has changed hands. Charles Wilson, a capable pianist, choral conductor and all-round musician, has returned to his old love, as principal conductor for the New York City Opera.

His successor, mid-twenty-ish Michael Tilson Thomas, an excellent pianist, and already snapped up by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, is a conductor of discernment, and can tackle new music with youthful enthusiasm.

Here may be some slight relief for Steinberg, as Thomas conducts an occasional concert.

All of this does not define B.S.O.'s standing as an orchestra, in 1962, now, or in the future.

Leinsdorf had high ideals. He inherited mean jobs. Munch's favoritisms had to be straightened out, and systematic rehearsals replace Munch's alternate brilliant winsomeness and moments of sloppiness.

No Divine Spark

But though Leinsdorf improved all-round performance standards, he did not strike a divine spark. Too often he created indifference or enmity. Within the orchestra, erstwhile idols grumbled Other players vented their spleen by finding ways to sabotage and waste rehearsal time.

Many dowagers and wealthy oldsters in the Symphony Hall audiences did not really like Leinsdorf. He upset their favorite players. He did not bring the exictement or charm of a Munch, or the authority (overbearing but cherished by Boston) of a Koussevitzky.

So Erich Leinsdorf has departed, leaving a formidable record of work done in seven years (conducted 709 concerts, presenting 429 works by 96 composers.)

Along the road, he has shown his humanity by musical tributes to such great departed personages as John F. Kennedy, Munch and Eisenhower, and on the other hand has demonstrated a keen interest in youth and young music.

He presented 13 world premieres and five U.S. premieres.

He enjoyed meeting the press, and was eager to discuss plans and programs. Somehow, he never could quite figure out why reporters were less excited than he was.

Now he is free to do more of that guest conducting which (he stated two years ago) the heavy administratrative schedule at Boston had held to a minimum.

Erich Leinsdorf as drawn by Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
AUG 27 1969
New England Newsclip

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 423,157
MAR 16 1969

Barr Lecture At Princeton

PRINCETON—Alfred H. Barr Jr., the first director of New York's Museum of Modern Art, will present an illustrated lecture on "Picasso: Pillar of Tradition" Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. at Princeton University.

Before he was named director of the Museum of Modern Art in 1929, Barr taught the first college course devoted to 20th century art at Wellesley College.

Barr will be the second of three speakers in this year's Spencer Trask lecture series at Princeton. Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, delivered the first lecture, and author Robert Penn Warren will give the final address on April 8.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 910,495 SUN. 1,494,704
MAR 29 1969

115

Hurok Concerts Booking Major Artists for Season

Hurok Concerts has signed the single largest group of artists it has ever added at one time. Now being booked for engagements next season are Teresa Berganza, mezzo soprano; Nicolai Gedda, tenor; Carol Neblett and Karen Lorenzen, sopranos, and two singers from the Royal Swedish Opera in Stockholm, Berit Lindholm, soprano, and Helga Brilioth, tenor.

Also signed are the Israeli duo-pianists, Bracha Eden and Alexander Tamir; Nelson Freire, pianist from Brazil; and Edward Auer and James Dick, both American pianists. The list is completed by Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony, and Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, who is leaving his Boston post at the conclusion of this summer's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000
MAR 8 1969

CHATTING IN CONCERT are Erich Leinsdorf (center), chief conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Bernard T. Ness (l.), managing director of RCA's record division; and Herbert T. Brunn, vice president of the international division of RCA. The occasion was an RCA press reception in honor of the maestro, who is in England to conduct three concerts with the London Symphony Orchestra. Also honored at the gathering was pianist John Browming, who is performing in Britain, too.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 387,180 SUN. 610,016
AUG 31 1969

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JUN 4 1969

restaurant after 18 years
business on his own. He plays the eatery for the last time on June 21, after which Ian Stewart and his group and the Stuart Gordon orch will be featured.

Erich Leinsdorf interrupting a vacation to conduct the London Symphony's 65th anni concert at the Royal Festival Hall June 26, replacing Sir Adrian Boult who has had to cancel all his June engagements in order to have an operation.

In and out: Steve McQueen, Jim Backus, Louis Jourdan, Charles Bronson, Bruce Cohn Curtis, Mary Tyler Moore, Rossano Brazzi, Ed- Everett Horton, Rod Steiger, Alan King, Carl John

and casional arc... and shells. Musicians ...
batteries in the summertime, ...
ences would relax with summertime trifles. This summer the concert season was extended full blast, with changes only from indoor to outdoor halls, to keep up the box office to meet symphony payrolls and hold the orchestras intact. Conductors and superstar soloists shuttled from festival to festival, from continent to continent to satisfy the new demand for big, innovative programs.

Erich Leinsdorf, who has just concluded the Tanglewood Music Festival's season, summed up his season for the New York Times:

"SINCE JULY 1 I conducted 15 different programs and 16 rehearsals with the Boston, as well as two performances of 'Wozzeck' with 13 rehearsals by the Berkshire Music Center. The two last weeks of June I was in England to lead the London Symphony Orchestra in its sixty-fifth concert at Festival Hall. They say there's no rest for the wicked, and musicians must be very wicked." He was about to depart for Buenos Aires to begin rehearsals for three operas.

And the audiences? They keep coming and buying tickets and listening and looking. Is there an audience saturation point? It has been assumed that there is one in the visual arts, which usually take a breathing spell between main events from early summer to around late September. Yet there was last year's "Unknown India" show at the City Art Museum, a top-flight exhibition that ran from mid-July until late August with consistently good attendance.

In Chicago right now is the show, "50 Years Bauhaus," at the Illinois Institute ...chnology — a survey of projects by ...dents of that influential

Music The Symph

By Robert C. Marsh

This weekend, after several delays, we finally have the programs and a complete list of conductors for the 79th season of the Chicago Symphony, opening Sept. 25 at Orchestra Hall.

This will be the first year of joint direction by Georg Solti as music director and Carlo Maria Giulini as principal guest conductor. It also will be the fifth and final year of the present contract between the Orchestral Assn. and the Chicago Federation of Musicians.

For the subscriber, prices will be up and the arrangements programs will be revised. The ... Thursday ...

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 546,570 SUN. 712,125
JUL 13 1969

Continued from Page 1, this section

then returning Jan. 29 for a second four-week visit through Feb. 21.

Taken as a whole, Giulini's programs reflect the same cultural parochialism of Toscanini's repertory with the New York Philharmonic 35 years ago. He is happy to repeat works he has offered here before, even trashy things like the suite from Casella's "La Giara," and apparently he feels no responsibility for the native-born American composer who must turn to the orchestras of his own country (and the men who conduct them) for an opportunity to be heard.

THE REMAINING 12 weeks of the schedule goes to guests with more limited invitations. Irwin Hoffman has three weeks. Georg Semkow and Bruno Maderna, both newcomers to local audiences, have a fortnight each. One-week visits are set for Eliahu Inbal and Charles Mackerras, both of them newcomers. Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos, Aaron Copland and Erich Leinsdorf, already known to the Chicago audience, complete the schedule.

Although the planners may have tried to make all series equally appealing, it seems to me that the B concerts in the Thursday and Friday patterns offer the highest concentration of interesting events, with Solti's concert production of Beethoven's "Fidelio," one of the chief attractions.

Let's look at some program details.

Giulini's opening-night concert is a sort of preview of recording sessions, with excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." He follows with Isaac Stern playing the Beethoven violin concerto in a second-week program that also contains Hindemith's Concert Music. Byron Janis appears the next Thursday to play the Third Beethoven piano concerto, and Giulini's programs end with Franco Gulli joining him for the Second violin concerto of Paganini.

Kay's "Of New Horizons" is on Hoffman's fifth-week program. Inbal will make his debut with a Mozart-Sibelius evening. Leinsdorf will join Bruno Gelber in the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto. Semkow has a genuine novelty, the Scriabian Second symphony, for his first week, a Stravinsky-Tchaikovsky program for the second.

Week No. 10 brings Solti with Ives "Three Places in New England" replacing the longer, and more important Second Symphony announced earlier, and Jacqueline du Pre as soloist in the Dvorak cello concerto. The Carter Variations for Orchestra and Bartok Dance Suite make up most of Solti's second program. Haydn's "The Creation" is heard twice, Dec. 11 and 12, and Yehudi Menuhin joins Solti for the Bartok violin concerto in the pre-Christmas Week.

JANUARY BEGINS WITH THE 14TH program of the series. Solti's performance of the Mahler Fifth ... over for two weeks ...

116

Maestro Wants More Serious Involvement

By DONAL HENAHAN
© 1969, N. Y. Times News Service

NEW YORK — Erich Leinsdorf, whose resignation as musical director of the Boston Symphony takes effect next summer, was in town the other day to conduct some concerts and make a recording.

This is a season of change and upheaval for Leinsdorf, but he seemed to be not so much accepting as embracing them.

Leinsdorf, who was 57 this month, will be launching out on several new lives at once when he leaves Boston after the final Tanglewood concert next August.

"I want to get out of routine conducting. I want to do less work and better work. That was the crux of the Boston situation. I didn't want to go on conducting 100 concerts a year, and they thought it had to be that way. But, really, the job of musical director is every day more and more an absurdity, and not only in Boston."

He ticked off some frustrations that faced him. Take the Elliott Carter Piano Concerto, which the Ford Foundation commissioned in 1959, and which finally was given its world premiere in Boston in January 1967, seven years later. It has had only two hearings in Minneapolis and Berlin. Since then, despite Leinsdorf's efforts to promote it.

"Inevitably it turned out in each case that enough rehearsal time was not available," he said.

There is no musical decision today, Leunsdorf finds, that does not have "a built-in veto" from extra-musical sources. Here he mentioned that costs of transporting instruments can restrict concert plans.

Leinsdorf will conduct the Carter Concerto next season as a guest with the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam, and with the BBC Symphony "because they promised me seven rehearsals — 21 hours." But at Boston he found in his seven years "a steady erosion of rehearsal time in contractual negotiations with the orchestra committee."

ERICH LEINSDORF

While he admires the Carter score immensely, Leinsdorf believes many composers throw up impossible barriers in front of the symphony orchestra. The Carter work, for instance, has pages with 71 separate staves — 71 separate instrumental parts — as contrasted to about a dozen or less in Beezhoven's early symphonies. Carter spent seven years in composing the concerto.

The symphony orchestra crisis has not been solved by the Ford Foundation's $80-million, matching-grant program, Leinsdorf feels. "The Ford program satisfied the orchestra men's legitimate demand for better pay but the error in the whole structure was this: The money should not have been translated into more public concerts."

"I tried putting Bach organ music on my Boston Symphony programs, but most administrators don't want that sort of thing. They are afraid the musicians will taste the blood of shorter hours."

Would Leinsdorf consider any new permanent post? "Not in the next 24 hours. I see nothing at the moment that attracts me."

"I might swallow the 100-concerts-a-year routine if as musical director I could do interesting works, too. I speak now not of ordinary premieres — they are a dime a dozen — but of important works. But the teeth-pulling before you can do even one a year. . . ."

Leinsdorf, in his seven Boston years, suffered "no vetoes in matters of musical taste" by an administrator there. "But I understand now that guest conductors are being asked to include some standard symphony on each program."

Right now, Leinsdorf is not so concerned with public activities. "I want to get back to living the life of a musician. And I want to continue to grow."

DAY (e)
NEW LONDON, CONN.
CIRC. 35,100
FEB 18 1969
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750
SEP 15 1968
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Head Cites Policy on Soloists

Erich Leinsdorf established an eminent reputation as a conductor of German Opera as he was a music consultant and conductor of the Metropolitan Opera before taking over the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Guest Conductor

The Vienna - trained conductor studied with two of the world's outstanding conductors — Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini. He had been a guest conductor of the major orchestras of the world before becoming maestro of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Under his direction the Boston Symphony has retained its long reputation as the orchestra richest in virtuosos.

Upon assuming his new duties as the orchestra's music director, Leinsdorf made this statement: "Whatever came up, the musical necessity had its way. From having seen musical organizations abroad and in this country, this is rare.

Not Unique

"As I don't know all musical organizations I cannot in fairness say it is unique, but I have a suspicion it is unique. I am going to do my very best to keep it this way."

On the subject of soloists in Boston, Leinsdorf commented, "I salute the Boston organization because the system here has been, and I shall continue it, to engage soloists for works rather than select the works after the soloists have been engaged. The work is the determining factor.

ERICH LEINSDORF

"The orchestra's policy on soloists is helped greatly by the enthusiasm and loyalty of the Boston audiences. They enable the orchestra to maintain the musical policy and I suppose these musical policies in turn produce the loyalty of the audiences."

The gifted and celebrated Mr. Leinsdorf will retire at the end of this season.

Local Ceremony Kept Hush

Boston's Conductor Wed

Boston Symphony Orchestra director Erich Leinsdorf and violinist Vera Graf were quietly married in Albany civil ceremony, Aug. 5 — so quietly in fact that the word didn't leak until Monday night.

Leinsdorf, 56, and Miss Graf, 33, were married before Judge Harold Segal here. Segal said Monday night that he "had no idea why they chose me."

But, Judge Segal said, the couple had sought and were granted a waiver of the 24-hour waiting period by the Albany office of the State Supreme Court. "He said he had a perfromance that night," the judge explained "that's why they were in a hurry."

Both, Leinsdorf and Miss Graf had been married before. Leinsdorf's marriage to Anne Frohnknecht ended last April. They had five children.

Had His Critics

Never known for being impulsive, Leinsdorf was often termed "rigid" by his critics. He was also called overly intellectual in his approach to music.

ERICH LEINSDORF

However, Judge Segal disclosed that he and Miss Graf showed up at the judge's office with only one witness (two are necessary for a marriage ceremony), and the judge's secretary, Mrs. Nona Ring, had to be pressed into service.

The couple left for an undisclosed location following the last of the orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival season performances at Tanglewood, Sunday afternoon. Leinsdorf will retire after next year's summer season. He has not disclosed his future plans.

Leinsdorf succeeded Charles Munch as the orchestra's conductor in Sept. 1962.

Restored Wagner

He is perhaps best known for bringing Wagner to the Boston orchestra — an orchestra which played less Wagner probably than any symphony orchestra in the country. He had said when he took charge in 1962 that he did not want a "Boston sound," but rather looked forward to numerous Boston sounds.

His success has been apparent as his work had brought bravos from critics and audiences.

Judge Segal said that he didn't have the slightest idea who he was about to marry Aug. 5.

"I recognized him from televi- shows," the judge said.

Leinsdorf's bride played violin for the American Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Opera Orchestra and has appeared as solo violinist with other groups. She has not, however, worked with the Boston Symphony.

Miss Graf had no children by her first marriage.

Leinsdorf, a native of Vienna, Austria, announced in December, he will resign in August 1969, from the Boston Symphony because of a "heavy workload."

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Tuesday, August 27, 1968

Leinsdorf Weds Ex-Pupil

Erich Leinsdorf, 56 music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, married one of his former music students at Tanglewood, Vera Graf, 30, three weeks ago in a civil ceremony in Albany, N.Y.

Both had been divorced, Leinsdorf in Mexico on May 1 after 28 years of marriage to Anne Frohnknecht, by whom he has three sons and two daughters.

He and his new wife, a violinist, will live at the Ritz Carlton Hotel while he finishes out his last year with the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf, who became BSO conductor in September, 1962, announced last December he would leave the post after completion of the Tanglewood Summer season of 1969.

The ceremony was performed by Judge Harold Segal. However, no specific date was revealed.

The bride has played for the American Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Opera Orchestra and has appeared as violin soloist with other groups, but not with the BSO.

News of the marriage was released in a telegram to news media here from a New York public relations firm.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
AUG 27 1968
New England Newsclip

Symphony Director Weds Violin Soloist

BOSTON (AP)—Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has married Vera Graf, a violin soloist, it was announced Monday.

Erich Leinsdorf

Leinsdorf is 55 and his bride 33. His 28-year marriage to his first wife was ended by divorce in Juarez, Mexico, April 30. They have five children.

Miss Graf, also divorced, has no children.

The announcement said they were married before Judge Harold Segal in Albany, N.Y., earlier this month.

Leinsdorf, born in Vienna, has announced he will resign from the Boston Symphony next August.

Leinsdorf and his wife left for an undisclosed destination after completing the orchestra's summer concerts at Tanglewood in Lenox, a spokesman said.

* * * *

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000
SEP 6 1968

Married. Erich Leinsdorf, 56, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1962; and Vera Graff, 33, Brazilian-born violinist; both for the second time (he divorced his wife of 28 years last May); in Albany, N.Y.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 309,245 SUN. 358,733
AUG 27 1968

Hub Symphony Ass't Rejoining N.Y. Opera

Charles Wilson, Boston Symphony assistant conductor for three seasons, will rejoin the New York City Opera this Fall.

One of his major conducting assignments next season will be Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor," with soprano Beverly Sills in the title role.

Before coming to Boston, Wilson was at the New York City Opera for six years as conductor and member of the musical staff. Last season he guest conducted the company's "Marriage of Figaro" and "Madama Butterfly." His duties for the Boston Symphony have included preparation of choruses for concerts here and at Tanglewood.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923
APR 14 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
SEP 20 1968
New England Newsclip

HAROLD BANKS

At Kindergarten, They're Still Boss

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra, which opens its 88th season later this month, won't exactly beat the drums for the assessment of its excellence by the Harvard Crimson's latest Collegiate Guide to Greater Boston, and Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf may go into a tizzy. The guide says, "Although the B. S. O. is no longer what Koussevitzky made of it and is not in a class with the Cleveland, Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras, it is still undenably a great one." That's what is known as damning with faint praise. The guide also offers such diverse information as where to engage belly dancers and chimney sweeps. One may be engaging—but not the other . . . Is that what it cost Thomas Boylston Adams to lose the nomination for Congress—$80,000, as his campaign manager is reported to have said? Lessee—that means each vote he got, a total of 4711, cost him approximately $17 . . . Why is Boston Licensing chief Dick Sinnott being so modest about the "Golden Arm" award he won for racking up the most victories, 10 wins against 2 losses, in the Capeway Softball League? Maybe he doesn't want his boss to know he can really get in there and pitch . . . Is the Cafe Marliave really the oldest Italian restaurant in town?

THE BATBOY FOR THE Baltimore Orioles is Jay [illegible] as if he's using his hands just like [illegible] Actually, he lost both [illegible] burns—

artscene

Joseph Silverstein

"I didn't become interested in playing the violin, I was born interested. A small violin was placed in my hands by my violin-playing father. . . ." Thus began the career of Joseph Silverstein, a man best-known as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And what, exactly, is the function of a concertmaster, many wonder, aside from being a phenomenally good fiddle player?

It is not enough to say that the job is time-consuming and pressurized. During an actual performance, Mr. Silverstein must keep all the principals in the string section in perfect co-ordination and harmony for cohesion of style. Very few conductors are string players, thus the concertmaster must interpret the score into string language — "up bows, down bows, sweeps" — by marking the music with symbols before the first rehearsal. "Everyone must play with the same intent in mind" and Concertmaster Silverstein is the one who must find out what the conductor is aiming for in a piece of music. He then tries to coordinate his section to fit these aims.

In explaining the other even more difficult task of the first violinist, Mr. Silverstein explained that most conductors are pianists — some are good, but very few reach the level of magnificence. There are so many pianists in the U.S. that unless one gets the right breaks, he rarely becomes famous like Van Cliburn. Wanting to utilize their musical abilities on a grand musical level, some become conductors; Erich Leinsdorf began his career as a pianist. "Because most conductors have never played in an orchestra, they cannot always feel or pinpoint the particular problem an individual player might be having at a particular moment in the musical work." As concertmaster, Mr. Silverstein must tactfully tell the conductor that Mr. X playing instrument Y needs a little more guidance to get the proper effect of the moment.

The non-performing conductor did not exist until the 19th century; until then, the first violinist was traditionally the conductor. Even in the fourteen years that Joseph Silverstein has been affiliated with the B.S.O., "the ole of the conductor vis-a-vis the orchestra as conspicuously changed. Orchestra players are more sophisticated; a conductor can no longer rule with complete autocracy."

Conductors must keep everyone together, but "placing a note at just the right moment is a magical phenomenon. If you are sure at exactly what moment you are going to play a particular note, all goes well; musical conviction is crucial, especially in chamber music." He implied that precision timing is something that gets developed. "When a musician plays with the same people they learn to interpret your reactions almost automatically. They have a sixth sense about your exact musical response." He compared the feeling to the ESP a basketball player must have when he throws a blind pass and just knows that his teammate will be there to shoot for a basket.

Joseph Silverstein does conduct, but is "awfully fond of playing the violin. I don't envy the role of the conductor — there is always constant decision-making and administrative work." This should not even hint that Concertmaster Silverstein has a light load to bear. His load is perhaps the heaviest of all concertmasters in the United States. When European conductors come to perform as guests, they always ask, "Are you the only concertmaster for the entire orchestra?"

Mr. Silverstein answers, "Yes."

"Are you playing in tonight's concert?"

"Yes."

"Did you play last night?"

"Yes."

"Are you playing the entire concert?"

"Yes."

They are always amazed; the Berlin Philharmonic, for example, has four concertmasters . . . no wonder they are shocked.

Aside from his job as concertmaster of the B.S.O., a position he has held since 1962, Joseph Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and first violinist of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Last year he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany, and England and earlier this year to the Virgin Islands and Florida. During past seasons, in conjunction with the orchestra, he has performed concertos by Bartok and Stravinsky (which he has recorded for R.C.A. Victor) and by Bach, Brahms, Schoenberg, and Sibelius. Violinist Silverstein received his solo training at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, an institution that has had an all-scholarship enrollment since its beginning some fifty years ago. He studied there from his twelfth to his seventeenth birthdays and then went out to work. But he started at the top right away and played with the Houston, Denver, and Philadelphia Orchestras before joining the B.S.O. at age twenty-three. Mr. Silverstein has fond memories of the Curtis Institute which trains individuals to play by themselves, but he also feels that now it is important to learn about orchestration at the same time. "In an orchestra, you must play just as beautifully as you would if you were soloing, but you must subordinate some of your individual techniques in order to blend your style with that of other members of the orchestra. If you hear yourself in the midst of all the playing, you are probably playing too loudly." He feels that players develop an ability to listen to each other while they are performing. And he often sees proof of his hypothesis when he works with quartets, especially those composed of students who are having trouble getting together. He tells them, "Nobody lead, just listen to each other." Miraculously it works.

Mr. Silverstein shares his great musical talents with the younger generation. He is chairman of the String Department at the New England Conservatory, where he gives private lessons in violin. "You must mount many foothills in becoming an effective violin player — beginning results are not always agreeable — you are exposed with the first stroke of the bow." Even on an instrument like the piano, the initial attempt is not as frustrating — anyone can plunk on a key and get a pleasing sound. In giving lessons to first year students, Mr. Silverstein tries to equalize their strong and weak areas so advancement will be possible. He approaches violin playing in a mechanical way, yet he is not dogmatic about the exact position in which a student holds the instrument and bow. A strong proponent of "muscle memory," he wants his students to feel the physical sensation of correct playing and to remember how it feels when they are

cont'd. on other side

have bef hard to f
and usue skills did tions.

Especi
admirabl
audition behind a screen so that no bias or prejudice is involved in the selection process. All that is considered is the sound of the music. The final auditions are held in front of the conductor to see how well the musician responds to the conductor's directions. This is how Joseph Silverstein began, too.

With all this, the Concertmaster has only one regret — the days are not long enough for him to practice enough — an expert must practice to remain on top. — B.E.B.

Boston Arts
Boston, Mass.
Monthly
New England Newsclip
JUN 1969

Bach Festival This Weekend

The R I Civic Chorale and Orchestra, Louis Pichierri, music director, presents Bach Festival VII May 8, 10, 11. The festival will be dedicated to Madame Avis Bliven Charbonnel, a well-known Providence musician and teacher who died last month at the age of ninety.

Festival soloists include, Joseph Silverstein, violin-concertmaster of the Boston Symphony; Helen Boatwright, soprano; Corinne Curry, contralto; Henry Nason, tenor; Chester Watson, bass, William Dinneen, harpsichord, organ; Natalie Lawton, organ; Barbara Barstow, violin; Barbara Poularikas, violin; Loretta Badessa, violin; Shirley Adams, violoncello; Betty Adae, flute; John Mahan and Mary Ellen Dunn, oboe, english horn; John Pellegrino, trumpet. Miss Curry is a former Barrington resident, Mrs Adae lives at 32 North Lake Drive.

Single and series tickets available at Avery's, Axelrod's, and Ladd's. Special group rates, student tickets call R I Civic Chorale and Orchestra, 93 Eddy St, Providence, 521-5670.

TIMES-GAZETTE
WARREN, R. I.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,250
MAY 8 1969 New England

TIMES
BARRINGTON, R. I.
WEEKLY 3,150
MAY 8 1969 New England

SARASOTA, FLA.
JOURNAL
D. 11,500
JAN 23 1969

Musically speaking, the appearance of Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein with the Florida West Coast Chamber Orchestra Saturday night at Symphony Hall in Sarasota will be an occasion equal to the New York scene.

Socially, too, this will be an event carefully planned and organized as a genuine gala. Object of the evening, of course, is to raise funds to provide scholarships for students at the annual New College Summer Music Festival.

Mrs. Harry L. Mundy, as general chairman of the concert committee, has helped to make the concert a special event on the year's musical and social calendars.

Mrs. Mundy said many persons have helped to make the event a success and to insure that scholarships will be available for qualified students when the festival is held in June.

Among those involved in the scholarship concert are:

Scholarship guarantors: Mr. and Mrs. A. Werk C
Joel E. Har
Carl

Music In Review

Civic Chorale, Orchestra Give Excellent Concert

The R.I. Civic Chorale and Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Louis Pichierri, reached the highest plateau of excellence, just short of the peak of perfection, in its opening program of the Bach Festival VII Thursday evening in Alumnae Hall, Pembroke College.

It is emphatically evident in Maestro Pichierri's dynamic, and sometimes passionate, directing that he loves the music of Bach, and he transmits this fervor to his chorale and orchestra, and they convey it to their listeners with almost the same adulation.

Their balance of force and sonority has a delicacy and refinement that comes only from a sincere love of tonal beauty and shading, and devoted study and practice to improve. And they were almost sublime in this concert.

And besides the glory of their singing, the concert was made more brilliant by the marvelous performance of Bach's "Concerto in E-Major for Violin and Orchestra" by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, guest soloist. This work with its animated, bold and exciting allegro opening, its solemn, almost plaintive adagio movement, and concluding with a jolly, exultant allegro assai, was a masterpiece of musical composition and performance.

Mr. Silverstein was joined by Barbara Barstow in a duet, "Concerto in D-Minor for Two Violins and Orchestra," another superb and thrilling performance by botth.

In the vocal works, the great "Cantata No. 147, 'Herz und Mund und Tat and Leben' " was scheduled for the opener but was rescheduled for the finale because Helen Boatwright, soprano soloist, was delayed by transportation. This was fortunate in that it climaxed a grand concert that left its audience to retain on its homeward journey the magnificence of the work that might have been dimmed had it been sung for the opening number.

This grandeur was heightened by the superior solos of Miss Boatwright, Corinne Curry, contralto; Henry Nason, tenor, and Chester Watson, bass, and the instrumental solos by William Dinneen, harpsichordist, John Pellegrino, trumpet, Shirley Adams, continuo cello, Mary Ellen Dunn and John Mahan, oboe and alto oboe, and Vitautus Rastonis, bassoon.

The "Cantata No. 150 'Nach dir, Herr, verlanget mich' " was the opening work and the soprano solo was sung by the tenor, but, as one in the audience remarked, "it was too brief for the listener to become involved." That is why we said it was fortunate.

Year after year, Maestro Pichierri is proving that Bach was a genius among composers and that the R.I. Civic Chorale is a musical constellation of the first magnitude.

C.H.L.

TIMES (E)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800
MAY 9 1969 New England

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
MAR 19 1969 New England

Conservatory concert

047

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will appear as soloist with the New England Conservatory Orchestra in Dvorak's Violin Concerto in A minor Thursday, Mar. 27, at 8:30 p.m. in Jordan Hall.

Soprano Janice Harsanyi will be heard in the first Boston performance of Sessions' "Idyll of Theocritus."

The program will also include Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante in E-flat, K. 297b. Frederik Prausnitz will conduct.

artscene

Joseph Silverstein

"I didn't become interested in playing the violin, I was born interested. A small violin was placed in my hands by my violin-playing father. . . ." Thus began the career of Joseph Silverstein, a man best-known as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And what, exactly, is the function of a concertmaster, many wonder, aside from being a phenomenally good fiddle player?

It is not enough to say that the job is time-consuming and pressurized. During an actual performance, Mr. Silverstein must keep all the principals in the string section in perfect co-ordination and harmony for cohesion of style. Very few conductors are string players, thus the concertmaster must interpret the score into string language — "up bows, down bows, sweeps" — by marking the music with symbols before the first rehearsal. "Everyone must play with the same intent in mind" and Concertmaster Silverstein is the one who must find out what the conductor is aiming for in a piece of music. He then tries to coordinate his section to fit these aims.

In explaining the other even more difficult task of the first violinist, Mr. Silverstein explained that most conductors are pianists — some are good, but very few reach the level of magnificence. There are so many pianists in the U.S. that unless one gets the right breaks, he rarely becomes famous like Van Cliburn. Wanting to utilize their musical abilities on a grand musical level, some become conductors; Erich Leinsdorf began his career as a pianist. "Because most conductors have never played in an orchestra, they cannot always feel or pinpoint the particular problem an individual player might be having at a particular moment in the musical work." As concertmaster, Mr. Silverstein must tactfully tell the conductor that Mr. X playing instrument Y needs a little more guidance to get the proper effect of the moment.

The non-performing conductor did not exist until the 19th century; until then, the first violinist was traditionally the conductor. Even in the fourteen years that Joseph Silverstein has been affiliated with the B.S.O., "the

Boston Arts
Boston, Mass.
Monthly

New England Newsclip

JUN 1969

playing correctly. The right fee..ng is similar to that of knowing whethe[illegible] good or bad the moment the [illegible] akes co[illegible]ct with the racket. In order to develop mechanical proficiency in the novice stages, he exposes his students to little repertoire material; they play mostly etudes and exercises. "At the point when a student is ready to play a concerto he should not be involved with problems of technique, but rather interpretation," according to the maestro. When presented with the objection of boring students with too much exercise playing, Mr. Silverstein is quick to rally to the anticipated question. "if I can convince them that by doing what I want they will become violinists, then they put up with it. There is a need to be highly motivated and serious about playing — you cannot play just for enjoyment; you must be serious, too. You can't enjoy it if you're not serious." No one really enjoys an activity that requires a specific skill unless he has mastered that skill, and one must be serious about working hard to acquire that skill if he is to succeed.

The highly dedicated Mr. Silverstein is a strict teacher who demands discipline in practice. He shows his students their errors and tries to illustrate what these weaknesses can do to their playing. "I am definitely sympathetic with the kids I work with even though I yell at them," he admitted. "I've never had a student with no slumps; student life is different from when I was a student. Life is more complex, and students are more affluent." In comparing the activities of his students to his own activities in Philadelphia, Mr. Silverstein said he and his friends never missed a concert; now it is the rare student who attends a majority of the available concert performances. When a new record came out, students used to run to the music store listening booth to hear it, since they had no money to purchase recording equipment or record players. For beginning students, Joseph Silverstein tries to simplify their existence by creating a sense of fear in them, a sphere of reverence that emotionally frees them to cope. "Practice or go into the army!" At the later stages in their development, he feels the students are able to put their activities in some workable perspective, and can handle their affairs by themselves. His feelings toward female musicians have changed somewhat since he began his professional career. With the availability of more and more good positions, he would not favor a man over a woman if they both had the same qualifications. He admits that he might have before, since good positions used to be hard to find; a man had to support his family, and usually a woman with the education and skills did not have the same financial obligations.

Especially now, he supports the B.S.O.'s admirable traditional policy of holding the first audition behind a screen so that no bias or prejudice is involved in the selection process. All that is considered is the sound of the music. The final auditions are held in front of the conductor to see how well the musician responds to the conductor's directions. This is how Joseph Silverstein began, too.

With all this, the Concertmaster has only one regret — the days are not long enough for him to practice enough — an expert must practice to remain on top. — B.E.B.

Bach Festival This Weekend

The R I Civic Chorale and Orchestra, Louis Pichierri, music director, presents Bach Festival VII May 8, 10, 11. The festival will be dedicated to Madame Avis Bliven Charbonnel, a well-known Providence musician and teacher who died last month at the age of ninety.

Festival soloists include, Joseph Silverstein, violin-concertmaster of the Boston Symphony; Helen Boatwright, soprano; Corinne Curry, contralto; Henry Nason, tenor; Chester Watson, bass; William Dinneen, harpsichord, organ; Natalie Lawton, organ; Barbara Barstow, violin; Barbara Poularikas, violin; Loretta Badessa, violin; Shirley Adams, violoncello; Betty Adae, flute; John Mahan and Mary Ellen Dunn, oboe, english horn; John Pellegrino, trumpet. Miss Curry is a former Barrington resident, Mrs Adae lives at 32 North Lake Drive.

Single and series tickets available at Avery's, Axelrod's, and Ladd's. Special group rates, student tickets call R I Civic Chorale and Orchestra, 93 Eddy St, Providence, 521-5670.

TIMES-GAZETTE
WARREN, R. I.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,250

MAY 8 1969 New England

TIMES
BARRINGTON, R. I.
WEEKLY 3,150

MAY 8 1969 New England

SARASOTA, FLA.
JOURNAL
D. 11,500

JAN 23 1969

Musically speaking, the appearance of Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein with the Florida West Coast Chamber Orchestra Saturday night at Symphony Hall in Sarasota will be an occasion equal to the New York scene.

Socially, too, this will be an event carefully planned and organized as a genuine gala. Object of the evening, of course, is to raise funds to provide scholarships for students at the annual New College Summer Music Festival.

Mrs. Harry L. Mundy, as general chairman of the concert committee, has helped to make the concert a special event on the year's musical and social calendars.

Mrs. Mundy said many persons have helped to make the event a success and to insure that scholarships will be available for qualified students when the festival is held in June.

Among those involved in the scholarship concert are:

Scholarship guarantors: M[illegible] and Mrs. A. Werk C[illegible] Joel E. Har[illegible] Carl[illegible]

Music In Review

Civic Chorale, Orchestra Give Excellent Concert

The R.I. Civic Chorale and Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Louis Pichierri, reached the highest plateau of excellence, just short of the peak of perfection, in its opening program of the Bach Festival VII Thursday evening in Alumnae Hall, Pembroke College.

It is emphatically evident in Maestro Pichierri's dynamic, and sometimes passionate, directing that he loves the music of Bach, and he transmits this fervor to his chorale and orchestra, and they convey it to their listeners with almost the same adulation.

Their balance of force and sonority has a delicacy and refinement that comes only from a sincere love of tonal beauty and shading, and devoted study and practice to improve. And they were almost sublime in this concert.

And besides the glory of their singing, the concert was made more brilliant by the marvelous performance of Bach's "Concerto in E-Major for Violin and Orchestra" by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, guest soloist. This work with its animated, bold and exciting allegro opening, its solemn, almost plaintive adagio movement, and concluding with a jolly, exultant allegro assai, was a masterpiece of musical composition and performance.

Mr. Silverstein was joined by Barbara Barstow in a duet, "Concerto in D-Minor for Two Violins and Orchestra," another superb and thrilling performance by both.

In the vocal works, the great "Cantata No. 147, 'Herz und Mund und Tat and Leben' " was scheduled for the opener but was rescheduled for the finale because Helen Boatwright, soprano soloist, was delayed by transportation. This was fortunate in that it climaxed a grand concert that left its audience to retain on its homeward journey the magnificence of the work that might have been dimmed had it been sung for the opening number.

This grandeur was heightened by the superior solos of Miss Boatwright, Corinne Curry, contralto; Henry Nason, tenor, and Chester Watson, bass, and the instrumental solos by William Dinneen, harpsichordist, John Pellegrino, trumpet, Shirley Adams, continuo cello, Mary Ellen Dunn and John Mahan, oboe and alto oboe, and Vitautus Rastonis, bassoon.

The "Cantata No. 150 'Nach dir, Herr, verlanget mich' " was the opening work and the soprano solo was sung by the tenor, but, as one in the audience remarked, "it was too brief for the listener to become involved." That is why we said it was fortunate.

Year after year, Maestro Pichierri is proving that Bach was a genius among composers and that the R.I. Civic Chorale is a musical constellation of the first magnitude.

C.H.L.

TIMES (E)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800

MAY 9 1969 New England

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAR 19 1969 New England

Conservatory concert

047

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will appear as soloist with the New England Conservatory Orchestra in Dvorak's Violin Concerto in A minor Thursday, Mar. 27, at 8:30 p.m. in Jordan Hall.

Soprano Janice Harsanyi will be heard in the first Boston performance of Sessions' "Idyll of Theocritus."

The program will also include Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante in E-flat, K. 297b. Frederik Prausnitz will conduct.

117

artscene

Joseph Silverstein

"I didn't become interested in playing the violin, I was born interested. A small violin was placed in my hands by my violin-playing father. . . ." Thus began the career of Joseph Silverstein, a man best-known as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And what, exactly, is the function of a concertmaster, many wonder, aside from being a phenomenally good fiddle player?

It is not enough to say that the job is time-consuming and pressurized. During an actual performance, Mr. Silverstein must keep all the principals in the string section in perfect co-ordination and harmony for cohesion of style. Very few conductors are string players, thus the concertmaster must interpret the score into string language — "up bows, down bows, sweeps" — by marking the music with symbols before the first rehearsal. "Everyone must play with the same intent in mind" and Concertmaster Silverstein is the one who must find out what the conductor is aiming for in a piece of music. He then tries to coordinate his section to fit these aims.

In explaining the other even more difficult task of the first violinist, Mr. Silverstein explained that most conductors are pianists — some are good, but very few reach the level of magnificence. There are so many pianists in the U.S. that unless one gets the right breaks, he rarely becomes famous like Van Cliburn. Wanting to utilize their musical abilities on a grand musical level, some become conductors; Erich Leinsdorf began his career as a pianist. "Because most conductors have never played in an orchestra, they cannot always feel or pinpoint the particular problem an individual player might be having at a particular moment in the musical work." As concertmaster, Mr. Silverstein must tactfully tell the conductor that Mr. X playing instrument Y needs a little more guidance to get the proper effect of the moment.

The non-performing conductor did not exist until the 19th century; until then, the first violinist was traditionally the conductor. Even in the fourteen years that Joseph Silverstein has been affiliated with the B.S.O., "the role of the conductor vis-a-vis the orchestra has conspicuously changed. Orchestra players are more sophisticated; a conductor can no longer rule with complete autocracy."

Conductors must keep everyone together, but "placing a note at just the right moment is a magical phenomenon. If you are sure at exactly what moment you are going to play a particular note, all goes well; musical conviction is crucial, especially in chamber music." He implied that precision timing is something that gets developed. "When a musician plays with the same people they learn to interpret your reactions almost automatically. They have a sixth sense about your exact musical response." He compared the feeling to the ESP a basketball player must have when he throws a blind pass and just knows that his teammate will be there to shoot for a basket.

Joseph Silverstein does conduct, but is "awfully fond of playing the violin. I don't envy the role of the conductor — there is always constant decision-making and administrative work." This should not even hint that Concertmaster Silverstein has a light load to bear. His load is perhaps the heaviest of all concertmasters in the United States. When European conductors come to perform as guests, they always ask, "Are you the only concertmaster for the entire orchestra?"

Mr. Silverstein answers, "Yes."

"Are you playing in tonight's concert?"

"Yes."

"Did you play last night?"

"Yes."

"Are you playing the entire concert?"

"Yes."

They are always amazed; the Berlin Philharmonic, for example, has four concertmasters . . . no wonder they are shocked.

Aside from his job as concertmaster of the B.S.O., a position he has held since 1962, Joseph Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and first violinist of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Last year he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany, and England and earlier this year to the Virgin Islands and Florida. During past seasons, in conjunction with the orchestra, he has performed concertos by Bartok and Stravinsky (which he has recorded for R.C.A. Victor) and by Bach, Brahms, Schoenberg, and Sibelius. Violinist Silverstein received his solo training at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, an institution that has had an all-scholarship enrollment since its beginning some fifty years ago. He studied there from his twelfth to his seventeenth birthdays and then went out to work. But he started at the top right away and played with the Houston, Denver, and Philadelphia Orchestras before joining the B.S.O. at age twenty-three. Mr. Silverstein has fond memories of the Curtis Institute which trains individuals to play by themselves, but he also feels that now it is important to learn about orchestration at the same time. "In an orchestra, you must play just as beautifully as you would if you were soloing, but you must subordinate some of your individual techniques in order to blend your style with that of other members of the orchestra. If you hear yourself in the midst of all the playing, you are probably playing too loudly." He feels that players develop an ability to listen to each other while they are performing. And he often sees proof of his hypothesis when he works with quartets, especially those composed of students who are having trouble getting together. He tells them, "Nobody lead, just listen to each other." Miraculously it works.

Mr. Silverstein shares his great musical talents with the younger generation. He is chairman of the String Department at the New England Conservatory, where he gives private lessons in violin. "You must mount many foothills in becoming an effective violin player — beginning results are not always agreeable — you are exposed with the first stroke of the bow." Even on an instrument like the piano, the initial attempt is not as frustrating — anyone can plunk on a key and get a pleasing sound. In giving lessons to first year students, Mr. Silverstein tries to equalize their strong and weak areas so advancement will be possible. He approaches violin playing in a mechanical way, yet he is not dogmatic about the exact position in which a student holds the instrument and bow. A strong proponent of "muscle memory," he wants his students to feel the physical sensation of correct playing and to remember how it feels when they are

have bef
hard to f
and usua skills did tions.

Especi
admirabl
audition behind a screen so that no bias or prejudice is involved in the selection process. All that is considered is the sound of the music. The final auditions are held in front of the conductor to see how well the musician responds to the conductor's directions. This is how Joseph Silverstein began, too.

With all this, the Concertmaster has only one regret — the days are not long enough for him to practice enough — an expert must practice to remain on top. — B.E.B.

Boston Arts
Boston, Mass.
Monthly

New England Newsclip

JUN 1969

Bach Festival This Weekend

The R I Civic Chorale and Orchestra, Louis Pichierri, music director, presents Bach Festival VII May 8, 10, 11. The festival will be dedicated to Madame Avis Bliven Charbonnel, a well-known Providence musician and teacher who died last month at the age of ninety.

Festival soloists include, Joseph Silverstein, violin-concertmaster of the Boston Symphony; Helen Boatwright, soprano; Corinne Curry, contralto; Henry Nason, tenor; Chester Watson, bass, William Dinneen, harpsichord, organ; Natalie Lawton, organ; Barbara Barstow, violin; Barbara Poularikas, violin; Loretta Badessa, violin; Shirley Adams, violoncello; Betty Adae, flute; John Mahan and Mary Ellen Dunn, oboe, english horn; John Pellegrino, trumpet. Miss Curry is a former Barrington resident, Mrs Adae lives at 32 North Lake Drive.

Single and series tickets available at Avery's, Axelrod's, and Ladd's. Special group rates, student tickets call R I Civic Chorale and Orchestra, 93 Eddy St, Providence, 521-5670.

TIMES-GAZETTE
WARREN, R. I.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,250

MAY 8 1969 New England

TIMES
BARRINGTON, R. I.
WEEKLY 3,150

MAY 8 1969 New England

SARASOTA, FLA.
JOURNAL
D. 11,500

JAN 23 1969

Musically speaking, the appearance of Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein with the Florida West Coast Chamber Orchestra Saturday night at Symphony Hall in Sarasota will be an occasion equal to the New York scene.

Socially, too, this will be an event carefully planned and organized as a genuine gala. Object of the evening, of course, is to raise funds to provide scholarships for students at the annual New College Summer Music Festival.

Mrs. Harry L. Mundy, as general chairman of the concert committee, has helped to make the concert a special event on the year's musical and social calendars.

Mrs. Mundy said many persons have helped to make the event a success and to insure that scholarships will be available for qualified students when the festival is held in June.

Among those involved in the scholarship concert are:

Scholarship guarantors: M and Mrs. A. Werk
Joel E. Har
Carl

Music In Review

Civic Chorale, Orchestra Give Excellent Concert

The R.I. Civic Chorale and Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Louis Pichierri, reached the highest plateau of excellence, just short of the peak of perfection, in its opening program of the Bach Festival VII Thursday evening in Alumnae Hall, Pembroke College.

It is emphatically evident in Maestro Pichierri's dynamic, and sometimes passionate, directing that he loves the music of Bach, and he transmits this fervor to his chorale and orchestra, and they convey it to their listeners with almost the same adulation.

Their balance of force and sonority has a delicacy and refinement that comes only from a sincere love of tonal beauty and shading, and devoted study and practice to improve. And they were almost sublime in this concert.

And besides the glory of their singing, the concert was made more brilliant by the marvelous performance of Bach's "Concerto in E-Major for Violin and Orchestra" by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, guest soloist. This work with its animated, bold and exciting allegro opening, its solemn, almost plaintive adagio movement, and concluding with a jolly, exultant allegro assai, was a masterpiece of musical composition and performance.

Mr. Silverstein was joined by Barbara Barstow in a duet, "Concerto in D-Minor for Two Violins and Orchestra," another superb and thrilling performance by botth.

In the vocal works, the great "Cantata No. 147, 'Herz und Mund und Tat and Leben' " was scheduled for the opener but was rescheduled for the finale because Helen Boatwright, soprano soloist, was delayed by transportation. This was fortunate in that it climaxed a grand concert that left its audience to retain on its homeward journey the magnificence of the work that might have been dimmed had it been sung for the opening number.

This grandeur was heightened by the superior solos of Miss Boatwright, Corinne Curry, contralto; Henry Nason, tenor, and Chester Watson, bass, and the instrumental solos by William Dinneen, harpsichordist, John Pellegrino, trumpet, Shirley Adams, continuo cello, Mary Ellen Dunn and John Mahan, oboe and alto oboe, and Vitautus Rastonis, bassoon.

The "Cantata No. 150 'Nach dir, Herr, verlanget mich' " was the opening work and the soprano solo was sung by the tenor, but, as one in the audience remarked, "it was too brief for the listener to become involved." That is why we said it was fortunate.

Year after year, Maestro Pichierri is proving that Bach was a genius among composers and that the R.I. Civic Chorale is a musical constellation of the first magnitude.

C.H.L.

TIMES (E)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800

MAY 9 1969 New England

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAR 19 1969 New England

Conservatory concert

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will appear as soloist with the New England Conservatory Orchestra in Dvorak's Violin Concerto in A minor Thursday, Mar. 27, at 8:30 p.m. in Jordan Hall.

Soprano Janice Harsanyi will be heard in the first Boston performance of Sessions' "Idyll of Theocritus."

The program will also include Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante in E-flat, K. 297b. Frederik Prausnitz will conduct.

118.

Union College Arts Festival

Dr. George Heard Hamilton, artist and director of the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute at Williamstown, Mass., will inaugurate the Jaffe Arts Lecture Series at Union College at 7:30 p.m. Friday in the first event of the college's second annual Arts Festival.

THE FESTIVAL will also feature a concert by the Union College Glee Club, with a guest appearance by Theodor Uppman of the Metropolitan Opera Company; an afternoon workshop and evening recital by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, solo flute with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; a panel discussion led by Dr. John McHale, director of the Center for Integrative Studies at the State University at Binghamton; and a concert by the Northeastern New York Student Orchestra.

Dr. Hamilton's lecture, made possible by a gift from William B. Jaffe, a trustee of the college, will be in the auditorium of the Social Sciences building.

At 8:30 p.m. Friday, the Mountebanks, Union's student theatre group, will present two short plays, in Nott Memorial theatre, "Hughie," by Eugene O'Neill and "Cecile or the School for Fathers," by Anouilh. The same plays will be performed at 8:30 p.m. Saturday and Sunday. A film, "The Devil's Eye," will be shown at 9 p.m. in the Social Sciences auditorium.

ON SATURDAY the Northeastern New York Student Orchestra will perform at 8:30 p.m. in Memorial Chapel. A film, "The 6th Street Theatre;" will be presented at 9 p.m. at Old Chapel.

Sunday's fare, in addition to the Mountebanks productions, will be a film, "The End of August at the Hotel Ozoney" at 7 p.m. and 9 p.m. in the Social Sciences auditorium. The film will also be shown May 5 and 6 at the same times.

The Glee Club Gala, under the direction of Prof. Hugh Allen Wilson and featuring Theodor Uppman, is scheduled for 8:30 p.m .May 6 at Memorial Chapel.

"An Evening of Experimental Films" is scheduled for 7 p.m. and 9 p.m. May 7 in the Social Sciences auditorium. A student folk concert will be held at 8 p.m. May 8 in Memorial Chapel.

DR. MCHALE will lead the panel discussion on "Arts and Human Development" at 8 p.m. May 9 in Memorial Chapel. An artist and designer, he has published widely on the impact of technology on culture, mass communications, and the future.

Also scheduled for May 9 are a film, "All These Women," at 8 p.m. in the Social Sciences auditorium; and a concert by the New Lost City Ramblers, featuring John Cohen, at 10 p.m. in Old Chapel.

Miss Dwyer will conduct a workshop on the flute, open to the public, at 3 p.m. May 10 in Memorial Chapel. She will deal with the differences in preparing for a concert in contemporary and traditional music. She will present a recital at 8:30 p.m. in Memorial Chapel.

Peter Kane Dufault, the subject of a CBS-TV documentary who has published numerous books of poetry, will present a poetry-reading at 7 p m. May 10 in the Social Sciences auditorium.

THE BRASS CHOIRS of Union and Williams Colleges will present a concert at 4 p.m. Sunday May 4 at Memorial Chapel. A film, "Cartouche," is scheduled for 7 p.m. and 9 p.m. in the Social Sciences auditorium.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, April 28, 1969

AT UNION—Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first chair flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present an afternoon workshop and evening recital Saturday at Union College's Memorial Chapel in Schenectady. The workshop will be at 3 p.m. and the recital at 8:30 p.m. in this appearance, a part of the Boston Symphony since 1952 and is the first woman to be appointed a principal player with orchestra. Tickets available at the door.

Boston Trumpeter Guest For Framingham Concert

FRAMINGHAM — Roger Voisin, principal trumpeter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as guest soloist with the Framingham Symphony Orchestra at 3 p.m. Sunday at South High School auditorium.

The program will include Concerto for Trumpet by Haydn, "Capriccio Espagnole" by Rimsky-Korsakov, and the Finale of Symphony No. 2 by Sibelius. Alfred Schneider will be conductor.

Paris-born and Boston-bred, Voisin was appointed a member of the Boston Symphony at the age of 17 on the recommendation of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra. He is the son of the famed Symphony trumpeter, Rene Voisin.

Voisin is chairman of the trumpet department of the New England Conservatory of Music and a faculty member at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. He has made many recordings.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,682
APR 23 1969 New England

Noted Organist Slates Concert Here Friday

Berj Zamkochian, organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in the first concert on the newly renovated Kotzschmar Memorial Organ in City Hall Auditorium, at 8:15 p.m. Friday.

A naeive of Boston, Zamkochian is a graduate of the New England Conservatory where he was an organ student of George Faxon.

In 1957, he was appointed to the position of organist with the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops Orchestras. He has appeared as soloist with both orchestras on numerous occasions. He has won special acclaim for his recordings with the Boston Symphony, notably his recording of the Organ Symphony by Saint-Saens and the Concerto by Poulenc, both of which have won for him international acclaim.

Zamkochian has been seen and heard frequently on national television and radio. Most recently he has been viewed as soloist Orchestra in a performance of the Organ Symphony by Aaron Copland. The Voice of America has carried his playing to Europe and the Near East.

In 1965, Berj Zamkochian became the first organist from North America to play in the Soviet Union. He has just recently returned from a third tour of that country. His Portland concert, sponsored jointly by the Municipal Organ Department and the Portland Chapter of the American Guild of Organists, is open to the public without admission charge.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 103,100
MAR 9 1969 New England

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
SEP 20 1968

BSO-Tokyo Swap

Japanese violinist Eiichi Tanaka and his wife and two daughters have arrived in Boston as part of an annual symphony orchestra exchange.

Tanaka will be a second violinist with the Boston Symphony during this season. The other half of the exchange, violinist Sheldon Rotenburg, and his wife and two children are now in Tokyo where he will spend the season with the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

This is the third year of the program, which is supported by the orchestras with State Department aid.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Friday, May 9, 1969

Albany Knickerbocker News
Friday, May 2, 1969

Japanese Violinist In Boston Symphony

A Japanese violinist, accompanied by his wife and two daughters, arrived in Boston last night to live and play with the Boston Symphony orchestra in an exchange with an American musician.

Each year the Boston Symphony and the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of Tokyo exchange musicians who work and live according to the customs of their host country for the entire musical season.

The Japanese visitors this year are second violinist Eiichi Tanaka, his wife and daughters, Chieh, 8, and Miwa, 11. They will live with a Boston player until they find an apartment of their own.

The Boston member of the cultural exchange is violinist Sheldon Rotenburg, his wife, their daughter Steffie, 13, and son David, 16. The Rotenburgs arrived in Tokyo Aug. 31 while last year's exchange musician, Violinist Ronald Knudsen and his Japanese wife still were there.

The Knudens were part of last night's welcoming party for the Tanakas.

This is the third year of the exchange program which is supported by the two orchestras with some help from the State Department.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
SEP 19 1968 New England

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
SEP 21 1968 New England Newsclip

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
SEP 23 1968 New England

Japanese Joins BSO For One Season

BOSTON (AP) — Japanese violinist Eiichi Tanaka and his wife and two daughters have arrived here as part of an annual symphony orchestra exchange.

Tanaka will be a second violinist with the Boston Symphony during this season. The other half of the exchange, violinist Sheldon Rotenburg, and his wife and two children arrived in Tokyo Aug. 31 where he will spend the season with the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Among those welcoming the Tanaka family Thursday were Boston Symphony violinist Ronald Knudsen and his Japanese wife. Knudsen was the exchange musician to Japan last year.

This is the third year of the program, which is supported by the orchestra with State Department aid.

MIAMI, FLA.
VILLAGE POST
W.-CIRC.N.AVAIL.
MAR 1969 Buffalo

Music

By JULIAN H. KREEGER

March brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Miami for an appearance on the Community Concert series. The orchestra's first oboist is Ralph Gomberg, whose brother Harold is principal oboist for the New York Philharmonic. Gomberg is most articulate and enthusiastic about his work, which helps explain his excellent reputation.

Gomberg's theory on conductors is that the great conductor must have two qualities — emotional involvement and the ability to project this involvement. Koussevitsky had these qualities. He had tremendous projection and overwhelming enthusiasm. "When he said hello it was the greatest day." Great intellectual capacity, Gomberg feels, is "gravy. Then you have a Bernstein!"

The late Charles Munch, Gomberg feels, generated a lot of excitement but was emotionally unstable. Munch once remarked, Anyone who knows what tempo he is going to take before he gets on the podium is a fool." Sometimes Munch would conduct Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique "so fast that the players could barely get through — a lot of notes were dropped, but the audience went wild." (Angel, incidentally, has just released a Munch recording of the Symphonie Fantastique with the newly formed Orchestre de Paris. The results are exciting.)

The problem with playing the oboe, according to Gomberg, is that it has the smallest opening — "one drop of saliva and you're a bum!" One would be hard put to realize what a difficult instrument the oboe is when listening to Gomberg play. His recent RCA recordings of the Mozart Oboe Quartet and Poulenc Trio with the Boston Symphony Chamber players are simply elegant.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650
SEP 19 1968 New England

Jap Violinist To Join Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — Violinist Eiichi Tanaka arrived Wednesday to begin a concert season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a continuing cultural exchange program with the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of Tokyo.

Tanaka was accompanied by his wife and daughters Chie, 8, and Miwa, 11.

Boston Symphony violinist Sheldon Roterburg is in Tokyo for that orchestra's 1968-69 season.

This is the third season of the Boston and Tokyo musical exchange project.

118.

Union College Arts Festival

Dr. George Heard Hamilton, artist and director of the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute at Williamstown, Mass., will inaugurate the Jaffe Arts Lecture Series at Union College at 7:30 p.m. Friday in the first event of the college's second annual Arts Festival.

THE FESTIVAL will also feature a concert by the Union College Glee Club, with a guest appearance by Theodor Uppman of the Metropolitan Opera Company; an afternoon workshop and evening recital by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, solo flute with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; a panel discussion led by Dr. John McHale, director of the Center for Integrative Studies at the State University at Binghamton; and a concert by the Northeastern New York Student Orchestra.

Dr. Hamilton's lecture, made possible by a gift from William B. Jaffe, a trustee of the college, will be in the auditorium of the Social Sciences building.

At 8:30 p.m. Friday, the Mountebanks, Union's student theatre group, will present two short plays, in Nott Memorial theatre, "Hughie," by Eugene O'Neill and "Cecile or the School for Fathers," by Anouilh. The same plays will be performed at 8:30 p.m. Saturday and Sunday. A film, "The Devil's Eye," will be shown at 9 p.m. in the Social Sciences auditorium.

ON SATURDAY the Northeastern New York Student Orchestra will perform at 8:30 p.m. in Memorial Chapel. A film, "The 6th Street Theatre;" will be presented at 9 p.m. at Old Chapel.

Sunday's fare, in addition to the Mountebanks productions, will be a film, "The End of August at the Hotel Ozone;" at 7 p.m. and 9 p.m. in the Social Sciences auditorium. The film will also be shown May 5 and 6 at the same times.

The Glee Club Gala, under the direction of Prof. Hugh Allen Wilson and featuring Theodor Uppman, is scheduled for 8:30 p.m .May 6 at Memorial Chapel.

"An Evening of Experimental Films" is scheduled for 7 p.m. and 9 p.m. May 7 in the Social Sciences auditorium. A student folk concert will be held at 8 p.m. May 8 in Memorial Chapel.

DR. MCHALE will lead the panel discussion on "Arts and Human Development" at 8 p.m. May 9 in Memorial Chapel. An artist and designer, he has published widely on the impact of technology on culture, mass communications, and the future.

Also scheduled for May 9 are a film, "All These Women," at 8 p.m. in the Social Sciences auditorium; and a concert by the New Lost City Ramblers, featuring John Cohen, at 10 p.m. in Old Chapel.

Miss Dwyer will conduct a workshop on the flute, open to the public, at 3 p.m. May 10 in Memorial Chapel. She will deal with the differences in preparing for a concert in contemporary and traditional music. She will present a recital at 8:30 p.m. in Memorial Chapel.

Peter Kane Dufault, the subject of a CBS-TV documentary who has published numerous books of poetry, will present a poetry-reading at 7 p m. May 10 in the Social Sciences auditorium.

THE BRASS CHOIRS of Union and Williams Colleges will present a concert at 4 p.m. Sunday May 4 at Memorial Chapel. A film, "Cartouche," is scheduled for 7 p.m. and 9 p.m. in the Social Sciences auditorium.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, April 28, 1969

AT UNION—Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first chair flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present an afternoon workshop and evening recital Saturday at Union College's Memorial Chapel in Schenectady. The workshop will be at 3 p.m. and the recital at 8:30 p.m. in this appearance, a part of the Boston Symphony since 1952 and is the first woman to be appointed a principal player with orchestra. Tickets available at the door.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Friday, May 9, 1969

Albany Knickerbocker News
Friday, May 2, 1969

Boston Trumpeter Guest For Framingham Concert

FRAMINGHAM — Roger Voisin, principal trumpeter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as guest soloist with the Framingham Symphony Orchestra at 3 p.m. Sunday at South High School auditorium.

The program will include Concerto for Trumpet by Haydn, "Capriccio Espagnole" by Rimsky-Korsakov, and the Finale of Symphony No. 2 by Sibelius. Alfred Schneider will be conductor.

Paris-born and Boston-bred, Voisin was appointed a member of the Boston Symphony at the age of 17 on the recommendation of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra. He is the son of the famed Symphony trumpeter, Rene Voisin.

Voisin is chairman of the trumpet department of the New England Conservatory of Music and a faculty member at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. He has made many recordings.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,682
APR 23 1969 New England

Noted Organist Slates Concert Here Friday

Berj Zamkochian, organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in the first concert on the newly renovated Kotzschmar Memorial Organ in City Hall Auditorium, at 8:15 p.m. Friday.

A naeive of Boston, Zamkochian is a graduate of the New England Conservatory where he was an organ student of George Faxon.

In 1957, he was appointed to the position of organist with the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops Orchestras. He has appeared as soloist with both orchestras on numerous occasions. He has won special acclaim for his recordings with the Boston Symphony, notably his recording of the Organ Symphony by Saint-Saens and the Concerto by Poulenc, both of which have won for him international acclaim.

Zamkochian has been seen and heard frequently on national television and radio. Most recently he has been viewed as soloist Orchestra in a performance of the Organ Symphony by Aaron Copland. The Voice of America has carried his playing to Europe and the Near East.

In 1965, Berj Zamkochian became the first organist from North America to play in the Soviet Union. He has just recently returned from a third tour of that country. His Portland concert, sponsored jointly by the Municipal Organ Department and the Portland Chapter of the American Guild of Organists, is open to the public without admission charge.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 102,100
MAR 9 1969 New England

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
SEP 20 1968

BSO-Tokyo Swap

Japanese violinist Eiichi Tanaka and his wife and two daughters have arrived in Boston as part of an annual symphony orchestra exchange.

Tanaka will be a second violinist with the Boston Symphony during this season. The other half of the exchange, violinist Sheldon Rotenburg, and his wife and two children are now in Tokyo where he will spend the season with the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

This is the third year of the program, which is supported by the orchestras with State Department aid.

Japanese Violinist In Boston Symphony

A Japanese violinist, accompanied by his wife and two daughters, arrived in Boston last night to live and play with the Boston Symphony orchestra in an exchange with an American musician.

Each year the Boston Symphony and the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of Tokyo exchange musicians who work and live according to the customs of their host country for the entire musical season.

The Japanese visitors this year are second violinist Eiichi Tanaka, his wife and daughters, Chieh, 8, and Miwa, 11. They will live with a Boston player until they find an apartment of their own.

The Boston member of the cultural exchange is violinist Sheldon Rotenburg, his wife, their daughter Steffie, 13, and son David, 16. The Rotenburgs arrived in Tokyo Aug. 31 while last year's exchange musician, Violinist Ronald Knudsen and his Japanese wife still were there.

The Knudens were part of last night's welcoming party for the Tanakas.

This is the third year of the exchange program which is supported by the two orchestras with some help from the State Department.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
SEP 19 1968 New England

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
SEP 21 1968 New England Newsclip

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
SEP 23 1968 New England

Japanese Joins BSO For One Season

BOSTON (AP) — Japanese violinist Eiichi Tanaka and his wife and two daughters have arrived here as part of an annual symphony orchestra exchange.

Tanaka will be a second violinist with the Boston Symphony during this season. The other half of the exchange, violinist Sheldon Rotenburg, and his wife and two children arrived in Tokyo Aug. 31 where he will spend the season with the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Among those welcoming the Tanaka family Thursday were Boston Symphony violinist Ronald Knudsen and his Japanese wife. Knudsen was the exchange musician to Japan last year.

This is the third year of the program, which is supported by the orchestra with State Department aid.

MIAMI, FLA.
VILLAGE POST
W.-CIRC.N.AVAIL.
MAR 1969 Buffalo

Music

By JULIAN H. KREEGER

March brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Miami for an appearance on the Community Concert series. The orchestra's first oboist is Ralph Gomberg, whose brother Harold is principal oboist for the New York Philharmonic. Gomberg is most articulate and enthusiastic about his work, which helps explain his excellent reputation.

Gomberg's theory on conductors is that the great conductor must have two qualities – emotional involvement and the ability to project this involvement. Koussevitsky had these qualities. He had tremendous projection and overwhelming enthusiasm. "When he said hello it was the greatest day." Great intellectual capacity, Gomberg feels, is "gravy. Then you have a Bernstein!"

The late Charles Munch, Gomberg feels, generated a lot of excitement but was emotionally unstable. Munch once remarked, Anyone who knows what tempo he is going to take before he gets on the podium is a fool." Sometimes Munch would conduct Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique "so fast that the players could barely get through – a lot of notes were dropped, but the audience went wild." (Angel, incidentally, has just released a Munch recording of the Symphonie Fantastique with the newly formed Orchestre de Paris. The results are exciting.)

The problem with playing the oboe, according to Gomberg, is that it has the smallest opening – "one drop of saliva and you're a bum!" One would be hard put to realize what a difficult instrument the oboe is when listening to Gomberg play. His recent RCA recordings of the Mozart Oboe Quartet and Poulenc Trio with the Boston Symphony Chamber players are simply elegant.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650
SEP 19 1968 New England

Jap Violinist To Join Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — Violinist Eiichi Tanaka arrived Wednesday to begin a concert season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a continuing cultural exchange program with the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of Tokyo.

Tanaka was accompanied by his wife and daughters Chie, 8, and Miwa, 11.

Boston Symphony violinist Sheldon Roterburg is in Tokyo for that orchestra's 1968-69 season.

This is the third season of the Boston and Tokyo musical exchange project.

Boston, Tokyo Have 'Mini-Exchange' of Musicians

119

By JOHN HAHN

BOSTON (UPI) — American pop singers fly "Down Under" to win acclaim in Australia. The Bolshoi Ballet plays to rave notices in the capitals of Europe. Such examples of the "cultural exchange" are spectacular, well advertised and usually short lived.

A "mini-exchange" between Boston and Tokyo continues nine months a year, year after year. These swaps involve concert musicians and their families.

The exchange of players between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra developed after the Bostonians had made their first tour of the Orient in 1960, four years after the first visit of an American symphony to the Soviet Union.

The exchange basically was the brainchild of violinist George Zazofsky, chairman of the orchestra personnel committee.

Zazofsky had the idea of arranging musical exchanges with several nations. The Japanese-American swap was the first which came to fruition. Future exchanges are possible with other orchestras.

The project calls for one or more Boston players to travel to Tokyo, with their families, to spend a season of concerts with the Japanese Philharmonic Symphony. Matching Japanese players come to Boston.

GEORGE ZAZOFSKY
As He Appeared in 1960 New Bedford Concert

In the first exchange three years ago, the Japanese players came to the United States ahead of time to take part in the Berkshire Music Festival summer concerts. This gave the Far East visitors a dry run for the arduous Boston symphony season which begins in late September or early October and runs through April, followed by the Boston Pops concerts which continue until July.

The Japanese players in the current exchange started the Boston fall-winter season without a Tanglewood "try-out."

Two Japanese string players are performing with the Boston Symphony this season, but only one on a strict exchange basis. He is violinist Eiichi Tanaka, who arrived last September with his wife, Tomoko, and their daughters, Chie, 7, and Miwa, 11. His American counterpart, violinist Sheldon Rotenberg, is in Tokyo with his wife and their three children.

It's a second season for cellist Soichi Katsua, a bachelor who played in the Boston string section three years ago and now is taking advance studies at the New England Conservatory.

Though music is an international language, there are occasions when an interpreter is needed. That chore falls to Boston Symphony violinist Ronald Knudsen, who is married to a Japanese girl. They met while both were studying music at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore. The Knudsens and their children, Sato, 12, and Mayumi, 10, were exchange visitors in Tokyo last season.

The exchanges have State Department encouragement but government aid is limited to transportation expenses for the Americans. Boston Symphony musicians chipped in to decorate and furnish an apartment for the Tanakas.

The Japanese players have extended their American appearances from Boston Symphony concerts to chamber music. They teamed with violinist Knudsen and violist George Humphrey to form the Japan America Quartet.

The string quartet's first concert was before a private audience of the Harvard Musical Association. Later, the quartet played a public concert at Harvard's Paine Hall. The unusual program included a standard Schubert piece; but also works by J. A. Arriaga, of Spain; Akio Yashiro of Japan; and Randall Thompson of the United States.

While Japanese music still is a rarity with concert goers in Boston, Japanese performers are coming more frequently.

Several times, the Boston Symphony has been guest-conducted by Seiji Ozawa, 33, son of a Buddhist dentist, who now heads the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and next year will become musical director of the San Francisco Symphony.

There are some observers who predict Ozawa someday may become the maestro in Boston.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

MAR 5 1969

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 6,100

MAR 6 1969 New England

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450

MAR 11 1969 New England

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

FEB 13 1969 New England

BULLETIN
EASTON, MASS.
WEEK[illegible] 1,950

FEB 6 1969 New England

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUN 26 1969 New England

A[illegible]
[illegible]ug. 1[illegible] Krieger
[illegible]rforming [illegible] the Collegium season is [illegible]
Musicum [illegible]

Violinist Michale Sassoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been named music director of the Civic Symphony Orchestra of Boston. He succeeds Kalman Novak. Sassoon plans to rebuild the string section, introduce "prelude concerts", hold a Satie revival and will invite Boston Symphony musicians to read concertos with the Civic Symphony. Sassoon has conducted the Brockton Symphony and founded the Newton Symphony two years ago.

THE NEW COMEDY "Angela," by Sumner Arthur Lor[illegible] ("Never Too Late"), will test in Boston Oct. 13-25 [illegible] Theater. It will star Geraldine Page and [illegible] Broadway in "The Man i[illegible]

PUBLIC DEBUT of the Japan-American String Quartet will be Sunday at 8 p.m. in Paine Hall of the Harvard University music building. Members, all involved in the exchange of players between the Boston Symphony and the Japan Philharmonic, are, from left, violinists Ronald Knudsen and Eiichi Tanaka, cellist Soichi Katsuta and violist George Humphrey.

Review

by Sarah Sullivan

BURGIN CONDUCTS PHILHARMONIA IN SPARKLING MUSICAL EVENING

047

The Boston Philharmonia concert of February second again offered an enthusiastic audience at Jordan Hall a varied and entertaining evening of good music well performed. The program was a refreshing assemblage of works which contrasted both in styles of composition and in instrumental groupings used.

Guest conductor for the concert was Richard Burgin, a violinist, conductor and teacher of international renown and certainly a familiar musical figure in Boston. For 42 seasons he was Concertmaster as well as a frequent conductor with the Boston Symphony, and he lent his talents extensively to musical activities throughout this area.

The program opened with a well-articulated playing of the Haydn Symphony No. 82 in C, "The Bear". This symphony is perhaps one of Haydn's less innovative compositions, written predominately in accordance with standard classical formulas, as was often the custom of the day. But it is good Haydn and certainly merits hearing, especially the intriguing fourth movement.

Mr. Burgin was obviously in his element during the second work of the evening, the Diamond "Rounds" for string orchestra. The composition is intricate in its weaving of contrapuntal lines and in its harmonic structure, and it is also wonderfully rhythmic. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra presented it with the clarity, precision and rhythmic flow which it required.

The Symphonie Concertante by Karl Hartmann is a fascinating composition which was brilliantly executed by members of the Philharmonia. It is a piece which seems to include elements of Hindemith's and Stravinsky's musical styles, though it is probably unfair to Hartmann to say so. Its construction relies heavily on solo textures and conversation between both individuals and instrumental groupings. The transparent quality of the music thus achieved along with the absence of high strings in the scoring gives the piece a delightul, nee-Baroque flavor.

The last work on the program was Poulenc's "Le Bal Masque" for instrumental octet and baritone, sung by Leslie Guinn. This is a burlesque character-suite using poems by Max Jacob. The players and Mr. Guinn performed extremely well and obviously were having fun with an elaborately constructed musical joke. Poulenc's fragmental compositional style seemed especially suited to setting these nonsensical, but often startling, bits of text. Performers and audience alike thoroughly enjoyed this presentation.

The next concert of the Philharmonia is to be held on Sunday, February 16, at Sanders Theater in Cambridge. Leon Kirchner will be conducting. Why not plan to attend and treat yourself to a first-rate concert of music played by extremely gifted musicians who have welded themselves into a liguid and sensitive musical unit.

Philharmonia Concert Sunday

MAESTRO BURGIN ON THE PODIUM

Richard Burgin, former concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Philharmonia, Boston's new chamber orchestra, in its fourth program of the season, Sunday, Feb. 2 at 8:30 in Jordan Hall.

Program includes "Rounds," by Diamond, "Symphonie Concertante," by K. A. Hartmann; Haydn's rarely heard Symphony No. 82 in C, "The Bear" and Poulenc's mad-cap piece for eight instruments and baritone, Le Bal masque, featuring Leslie Guinn, baritone.

Mr. Burgin retired from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, and Professor of Music at the University of Florida.

Tickets are on sale at the Jordan Hall box office, and further information is available by calling the Boston Philharmonia at 536-6311.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JAN 30 1969 New England

Burgin Paces Best Of Philharmonia

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

During his 19-year tenure as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin took a progressive and enlightened view, and played 38 premieres with the orchestra (either world, American, or local), an amazing record. The 76-year-old Burgin, who left the Symphony in '62, was back in town Sunday night guest conducting the Boston Philharmonia at Jordan Hall, and though there were no premieres, his program was the most sophisticated we've seen this season.

I found something very touching in Burgin's reading of "Rounds" by David Diamond. Here was this ex-violin virtuoso (for Burgin was BSO concertmaster for 42 years), a student of the legendary Joachim and, with Heifetz, disciple of Leopold Auer, immersing himself in musical Americana, for the "Rounds," written in 1944 for Dimitri Mitropolous and his Minneapolis orchestra, are rural and folksy and winning; their language is that of Copland, who brought this dialect to the cities, refining and strengthening it on the way (In fact, you can hear Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" in the final movement). But the "Rounds" are lively and sincere and, in a more noble way, as American as Bonnie and Clyde. It's music that most conductors shun, not being very fashionable anymore, but it's a very good piece, as Burgin's fine performance showed.

In his "Symphonie Concertante" Karl Amadeus Hartmann found himself in other men's music. He turned to Mahler, for example, in his first movement, and blended the dance ambience of the Fifth Symphony Scherzo with a tough winds and brass-dominated, very Kurt Weill-like scoring. The second movement is unshamefacedly based on the opening figure from Stravinsky's "Sacre," and in both cases the important thing is not that Hartmann is indebted to others —for his music doesn't in any way try to cover this—but that in spite of this debt, he is his own man. His music is personal and strong and, similarities and all, sounds like nobody other than K. A. Hartmann.

Burgin also played Poulenc's "Bal Masque," the Gallic answer to the Walton-Sitwell "Facade." The poems here are by Max Jacob, their mode of thought is Dada, their humor is black. The musical settings can be quite good, as was "Malvina," but for the most part, they are not as distinguished as Poulenc's best songs. Leslie Guinn was the baritone, and did a good job, though I would have preferred a singer with more color and substance to his voice, someone like the Bernac-trained Belgian, Bernard Kruysen. Burgin's work was precise and affable.

Haydn's 82nd Symphony, the evening's opener, was a bit disappointing. It had spirit and youth, as did all Burgin's conducting, but seemed unthought-out in certain ways; for instance, the opening arpeggiation shouldn't have had its last note accented, but, failing on the downbeat, the next-to-last. Not that this and similar details made a bad performance, just a conventional one.

It's a shame, though, that Burgin won't be heard with the BSO this season; his work was very impressive, authoritative but far from dull, and under him, the Philharmonia gave its best performance of the season.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

FEB 4 1969 New

Burgin leads Philharmonia

047

Light was the color and lively the atmosphere of the Boston Philharmonia's latest concert, given Sunday evening in Jordan Hall. The guest conductor was Richard Burgin, no newcomer to the Boston scene, his many local posts include having been concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony.

The proceedings opened with Haydn's Symphony No. 82 in C major, "The Bear." Marred only by an occasional weak phrase, the performance was solid, straightforward, and unexceptional until the strong, vigorous conclusion. But a conductorial flaw appeared here, in Mr. Burgin's lack of care with regard to dynamics. Fortes were laid on rather heavily, nuance was too often abandoned, and most of the program just rolled along at an eventually annoying mezzoforte.

The next piece, David Diamond's "Rounds," established itself right away as a rather flashy, but sometimes compelling, bit of conservative experimentation. Its modal-harmonic qualities are handled with deliberate ambiguity, so that one can't be certain what key the work is in until a resolution at the very end. But its immediate effect is actually quite simple.

The first movement (allegro molto vivace) is strongly melodic and vigorous, with a kind of show-tune atmosphere permeating both themes and harmonics. Livening things up are lots of syncopation and driving repetitions. For contrast there then comes a lyrical but loose adagio, with a pleasingly big, full-bodied sound maintained fairly well by the Philharmonia. Then, with the third section (allegro vigoroso), it's back to the county fair, with the recurrence of that vaguely surrealistic, almost indefinable, Broadway feeling. The finale generates some real excitement, however, with its strong tutti syncopation, nervous rhythms, and frenetic pace.

Music of the absurd

Karl A. Hartmann's Symphonie Concertante followed, a weirdly orchestrated piece for winds and lower strings. Brash and literally brassy, it tries too hard for its effects, though Mr. Burgin helped compensate by taking more than usual care with dynamics and expression. The latter sections were the best, especially when a delicate melodic phrase was carried across the orchestra from unaccompanied instrument to unaccompanied instrument; or during a strange and wild outburst of almost atonal-sounding sprightliness, seeming at first shock much more unconventional than it really was.

The concert closed with Leslie Guinn singing Poulenc's "Le Bal Masqué," for octet orchestra and baritone. Mr. Guinn has the proper lightness of tone needed for this music of the absurd, as well as a well-developed dramatic sense. So more's the pity that he was frequently overpowered by his accompanists, uncareful again in their volume control. But the overall result was still witty and incongruous, performed with appropriate degrees of giddiness, mock-sentimentality, exaggerated ominousness, and unmitigated silliness. The Finale, closing on a raucous falsetto phrase and a sharp drum roll, had the audience laughing and cheering at once.

D. S.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 4 1969 New England

Boston, Tokyo Have 'Mini-Exchange' of Musicians

119

By JOHN HAHN

BOSTON (UPI) — American pop singers fly "Down Under" to win acclaim in Australia. The Bolshoi Ballet plays to rave notices in the capitals of Europe. Such examples of the "cultural exchange" are spectacular, well advertised and usually short lived.

A "mini-exchange" between Boston and Tokyo continues nine months a year, year after year. These swaps involve concert musicians and their families.

The exchange of players between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra developed after the Bostonians had made their first tour of the Orient in 1960, four years after the first visit of an American symphony to the Soviet Union.

The exchange basically was the brainchild of violinist George Zazofsky, chairman of the orchestra personnel committee.

Zazofsky had the idea of arranging musical exchanges with several nations. The Japanese-American swap was the first which came to fruition. Future exchanges are possible with other orchestras.

The project calls for one or more Boston players to travel to Tokyo, with their families, to spend a season of concerts with the Japanese Philharmonic Symphony. Matching Japanese players come to Boston.

GEORGE ZAZOFSKY
As He Appeared in 1960 New Bedford Concert

In the first exchange three years ago, the Japanese players came to the United States ahead of time to take part in the Berkshire Music Festival summer concerts. This gave the Far East visitors a dry run for the arduous Boston symphony season which begins in late September or early October and runs through April, followed by the Boston Pops concerts which continue until July.

The Japanese players in the current exchange started the Boston fall-winter season without a Tanglewood "try-out."

Two Japanese string players are performing with the Boston Symphony this season, but only one on a strict exchange basis. He is violinist Eiichi Tanaka, who arrived last September with his wife, Tomoko, and their daughters, Chie, 7, and Miwa, 11. His American counterpart, violinist Sheldon Rotenberg, is in Tokyo with his wife and their three children.

It's a second season for cellist Soichi Katsua, a bachelor who played in the Boston string section three years ago and now is taking advance studies at the New England Conservatory.

Though music is an international language, there are occasions when an interpreter is needed. That chore falls to Boston Symphony violinist Ronald Knudsen, who is married to a Japanese girl. They met while both were studying music at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore. The Knudsens and their children, Sato, 12, and Mayumi, 10, were exchange visitors in Tokyo last season.

The exchanges have State Department encouragement but government aid is limited to transportation expenses for the Americans. Boston Symphony musicians chipped in to decorate and furnish an apartment for the Tanakas.

The Japanese players have extended their American appearances from Boston Symphony concerts to chamber music. They teamed with violinist Knudsen and violist George Humphrey to form the Japan America Quartet.

The string quartet's first concert was before a private audience of the Harvard Musical Association. Later, the quartet played a public concert at Harvard's Paine Hall. The unusual program included a standard Schubert piece; but also works by J. A. Arriaga, of Spain; Akio Yashiro of Japan; and Randall Thompson of the United States.

While Japanese music still is a rarity with concert goers in Boston, Japanese performers are coming more frequently.

Several times, the Boston Symphony has been guest-conducted by Seiji Ozawa, 33, son of a Buddhist dentist, who now heads the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and next year will become musical director of the San Francisco Symphony.

There are some observers who predict Ozawa someday may become the maestro in Boston.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

MAR 5 1969

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 6,100

MAR 6 1969 New England

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450

MAR 11 1969 New England

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

FEB 13 1969 New England

BULLETIN
EASTON, MASS.
WEEK. 9,900

FEB 6 1969 New England

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUN 26 1969 New England

A ug. 1
rforming season is c
Musicum c

Krieger
the Collegium

Violinist Michale Sassoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been named music director of the Civic Symphony Orchestra of Boston. He succeeds Kalman Novak. Sassoon plans to rebuild the string section, introduce "prelude concerts", hold a Satie revival and will invite Boston Symphony musicians to read concertos with the Civic Symphony. Sassoon has conducted the Brockton Symphony and founded the Newton Symphony two years ago.

THE NEW COMEDY "Angela," by Sumner Arthur Lor ("Never Too Late"), will test in Boston Oct. 13-25 Theater. It will star Geraldine Page and Broadway in "The Man i

PUBLIC DEBUT of the Japan-American String Quartet will be Sunday at 8 p.m. in Paine Hall of the Harvard University music building. Members, all involved in the exchange of players between the Boston Symphony and the Japan Philharmonic, are, from left, violinists Ronald Knudsen and Eiichi Tanaka, cellist Soichi Katsuta and violist George Humphrey.

Review

by Sarah Sullivan

BURGIN CONDUCTS PHILHARMONIA IN SPARKLING MUSICAL EVENING

The Boston Philharmonia concert of February second again offered an enthusiastic audience at Jordan Hall a varied and entertaining evening of good music well performed. The program was a refreshing assemblage of works which contrasted both in styles of composition and in instrumental groupings used.

Guest conductor for the concert was Richard Burgin, a violinist, conductor and teacher of international renown and certainly a familiar musical figure in Boston. For 42 seasons he was Concertmaster as well as a frequent conductor with the Boston Symphony, and he lent his talents extensively to musical activities throughout this area.

The program opened with a well-articulated playing of the Haydn Symphony No. 82 in C, "The Bear". This symphony is perhaps one of Haydn's less innovative compositions, written predominately in accordance with standard classical formulas, as was often the custom of the day. But it is good Haydn and certainly merits hearing, especially the intriguing fourth movement.

Mr. Burgin was obviously in his element during the second work of the evening, the Diamond "Rounds" for string orchestra. The composition is intricate in its weaving of contrapuntal lines and in its harmonic structure, and it is also wonderfully rhythmic. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra presented it with the clarity, precision and rhythmic flow which it required.

The Symphonie Concertante by Karl Hartmann is a fascinating composition which was brilliantly executed by members of the Philharmonia. It is a piece which seems to include elements of Hindemith's and Stravinsky's musical styles, though it is probably unfair to Hartmann to say so. Its construction relies heavily on solo textures and conversation between both individuals and instrumental grouings. The transparent quality of the music thus achieved along with the absence of high strings in the scoring gives the piece a delightul, nee-Baroque flavor.

The last work on the program was Poulenc's "Le Bal Masque" for instrumental octet and baritone, sung by Leslie Guinn. This is a burlesque character-suite using poems by Max Jacob. The players and Mr. Guinn performed extremely well and obviously were having fun with an elaborately constructed musical joke. Poulenc's fragmental compositional style seemed especially suited to setting these nonsensical, but often startling, bits of text. Performers and audience alike thoroughly enjoyed this presentation.

The next concert of the Philharmonia is to be held on Sunday, February 16, at Sanders Theater in Cambridge. Leon Kirchner will be conducting. Why not plan to attend and treat yourself to a first-rate concert of music played by extremely gifted musicians who have welded themselves into a liguid and sensitive musical unit.

Philharmonia Concert Sunday

MAESTRO BURGIN ON THE PODIUM

Richard Burgin, former concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Philharmonia, Boston's new chamber orchestra, in its fourth program of the season, Sunday, Feb. 2 at 8:30 in Jordan Hall.

Program includes "Rounds," by Diamond, "Symphonie Concertante," by K. A. Hartmann; Haydn's rarely heard Symphony No. 82 in C, "The Bear" and Poulenc's mad-cap piece for eight instruments and baritone, Le Bal masque, featuring Leslie Guinn, baritone.

Mr. Burgin retired from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, and Professor of Music at the University of Florida.

Tickets are on sale at the Jordan Hall box office, and further information is available by calling the Boston Philharmonia at 536-6311.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JAN 30 1969 New England

Burgin Paces Best Of Philharmonia

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

During his 19-year tenure as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin took a progressive and enlightened view, and played 38 premieres with the orchestra (either world, American, or local), an amazing record. The 76-year-old Burgin, who left the Symphony in '62, was back in town Sunday night guest conducting the Boston Philharmonia at Jordan Hall, and though there were no premieres, his program was the most sophisticated we've seen this season.

I found something very touching in Burgin's reading of "Rounds" by David Diamond. Here was this ex-violin virtuoso (for Burgin was BSO concertmaster for 42 years), a student of the legendary Joachim and, with Heifetz, disciple of Leopold Auer, immersing himself in musical Americana, for the "Rounds," written in 1944 for Dimitri Mitropolous and his Minneapolis orchestra, are rural and folksy and winning; their language is that of Copland, who brought this dialect to the cities, refining and strengthening it on the way (In fact, you can hear Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" in the final movement). But the "Rounds" are lively and sincere and, in a more noble way, as American as Bonnie and Clyde. It's music that most conductors shun, not being very fashionable anymore, but it's a very good piece, as Burgin's fine performance showed.

In his "Symphonie Concertante" Karl Amadeus Hartmann found himself in other men's music. He turned to Mahler, for example, in his first movement, and blended the dance ambience of the Fifth Symphony Scherzo with a tough winds and brass-dominated, very Kurt Weill-like scoring. The second movement is unshamefacedly based on the opening figure from Stravinsky's "Sacre," and in both cases the important thing is not that Hartmann is indebted to others—for his music doesn't in any way try to cover this—but that in spite of this debt, he is his own man. His music is personal and strong and, similarities and all, sounds like nobody other than K. A. Hartmann.

Burgin also played Poulenc's "Bal Masque," the Gallic answer to the Walton-Sitwell "Facade." The poems here are by Max Jacob, their mode of thought is Dada, their humor is black. The musical settings can be quite good, as was "Malvina," but for the most part, they are not as distinguished as Poulenc's best songs. Leslie Guinn was the baritone, and did a good job, though I would have preferred a singer with more color and substance to his voice, someone like the Bernac-trained Belgian, Bernard Kruysen. Burgin's work was precise and affable.

Haydn's 82nd Symphony, the evening's opener, was a bit disappointing. It had spirit and youth, as did all Burgin's conducting, but seemed unthought-out in certain ways; for instance, the opening arpeggiation shouldn't have had its last note accented, but, failing on the downbeat, the next-to-last. Not that this and similar details made a bad performance, just a conventional one.

It's a shame, though, that Burgin won't be heard with the BSO this season; his work was very impressive, authoritative but far from dull, and under him, the Philharmonia gave its best performance of the season.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (s)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

FEB 4 1969 New

Burgin leads Philharmonia

Light was the color and lively the atmosphere of the Boston Philharmonia's latest concert, given Sunday evening in Jordan Hall. The guest conductor was Richard Burgin, no newcomer to the Boston scene; his many local posts include having been concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony.

The proceedings opened with Haydn's Symphony No. 82 in C major, "The Bear." Marred only by an occasional weak phrase, the performance was solid, straightforward, and unexceptional until the strong, vigorous conclusion. But a conductorial flaw appeared here, in Mr. Burgin's lack of care with regard to dynamics. Fortes were laid on rather heavily, nuance was too often abandoned, and most of the program just rolled along at an eventually annoying mezzoforte.

The next piece, David Diamond's "Rounds," established itself right away as a rather flashy, but sometimes compelling, bit of conservative experimentation. Its modal-harmonic qualities are handled with deliberate ambiguity, so that one can't be certain what key the work is in until a resolution at the very end. But its immediate effect is actually quite simple.

The first movement (allegro molto vivace) is strongly melodic and vigorous, with a kind of show-tune atmosphere permeating both themes and harmonics. Livening things up are lots of syncopation and driving repetitions. For contrast there then comes a lyrical but loose adagio, with a pleasingly big, full-bodied sound maintained fairly well by the Philharmonia. Then, with the third section (allegro vigoroso), it's back to the county fair, with the recurrence of that vaguely surrealistic, almost indefinable, Broadway feeling. The finale generates some real excitement, however, with its strong tutti syncopation, nervous rhythms, and frenetic pace.

Music of the absurd

Karl A. Hartmann's Symphonie Concertante followed, a weirdly orchestrated piece for winds and lower strings. Brash and literally brassy, it tries too hard for its effects, though Mr. Burgin helped compensate by taking more than usual care with dynamics and expression. The latter sections were the best, especially when a delicate melodic phrase was carried across the orchestra from unaccompanied instrument to unaccompanied instrument; or during a strange and wild outburst of almost atonal-sounding sprightliness, seeming at first shock much more unconventional than it really was.

The concert closed with Leslie Guinn singing Poulenc's "Le Bal Masqué," for octet orchestra and baritone. Mr. Guinn has the proper lightness of tone needed for this music of the absurd, as well as a well-developed dramatic sense. So more's the pity that he was frequently overpowered by his accompanists, uncareful again in their volume control. But the overall result was still witty and incongruous, performed with appropriate degrees of giddiness, mock-sentimentality, exaggerated ominousness, and unmitigated silliness. The Finale, closing on a raucous falsetto phrase and a sharp drum roll, had the audience laughing and cheering at once.

D. S.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 103,156

FEB 4 1969 New England

120.

Carol Procter, cello

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute

Gowns among the white ties: the ladies of the symphony

By Nora E. Taylor
Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor
Boston

There is no doubt that changes have been marching onward in the world of the orchestra, at least as far as women are concerned. Time was when the entire platform was a symphony of white shirt fronts and black jackets. But a sprinkling of gowns has slipped out through the wings, and is increasing steadily, if not swiftly.

Boston Symphony Orchestra now has four distaff players in its lineup. Other major orchestras have opened their ranks, too, while some of the lesser symphonies are now composed of a 50-50 division between men and women.

The four in the Boston Symphony are Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute—and the first woman to take a principal role with the orchestra; Carol Procter, cellist; Olivia Luetcke, harpist; and Lois Schaefer, piccolo player and flutist.

In a symphony today, each of them agreed, there are no bigger difficulties to hurdle than in any other competitive profession. And even though women came late to the ranks of symphony players, those who achieve it are treated in comradely fashion by their men colleagues.

* * *

Miss Procter is young, modern if not "mod" and has been with the orchestra only three years. While not actively seeking change, like all young people she is quite certain changes will come for her.

Mrs. Dwyer joined the BSO in the fall of 1952, after an audition at which retiring flutist Georges Laurent and then-conductor Charles Munch both declared she was the best player of the whole group trying out.

At that time the idea of a woman principal player was received with disbelief, if not horror, by both press and public. But Mrs. Dwyer, at that time Miss Anthony, swiftly proved her ability. Objections were promptly abandoned, and her appointment became one more piece in the mosaic of feminine progress.

Lois Schaefer, piccolo

Olivia Luetcke, harp

Mrs. Dwyer's mother was also a flutist, and she has, therefore, a family association with the instrument. Having been with the orchestra for 16 years, she now has some carefully considered thoughts about the right approach a girl should adopt if she intends to play in an orchestra. "Do not," she says, "have expectations of being treated differently. Don't give up femininity of course, but don't expect things because of it," or, for that matter, she added, because of inexperience. There was some further advice too, and its usefulness is not limited to the girls.

* * *

A first-class teacher is essential, for instance, she explained. Then, it is necessary to work very hard indeed. After that get experience in an orchestra. Any experience is better than no experience. Just keep on getting experience.

"It is not particularly difficult," she said, "to play with a male orchestra. There are just as many women opera singers as men and they have no special problems. That certainly is a comparable field."

Speaking of women's symphonies, which spring up from time to time, she remarked, "You can't expect a women's symphony to be on the level of a man's symphony. They don't have the experience or tradition."

And again, commenting on holding the right musical balance within the orchestra, she said: "Strength has nothing to do with loudness. It's intensity . . . cooperation . . . intensity."

* * *

One more thought about women's symphonies had to do with the fact that women constitute a minority. You cannot, she said, "expect minority groups to step in and do as well. Certain women have made it . . . certain individuals break through. Others have to be accepted for what they are. I believe in integration of the sexes. The field is opening up a little bit."

Mrs. Luetcke has been with the orchestra even longer than Mrs. Dwyer. She joined it in 1951, and has made a career out of the 47 strings which are forever getting out of tune. When the orchestra plays summer engagements it is often easier. "In the open air the harp usually stays tuned. In Symphony Hall there's a constant current of cold air and that affects it. When the doors open, the tension changes on the harp strings. Fans make a draft, and a difference. When the temperature outside and inside the hall equalizes, the problem disappears. I wait for the second month of the Pops so that I can be in tune!" she said. All the rest of the time she chooses her moments during the work on stage to retune when necessary, and often slips out on stage during intermission to attend to those recalcitrant strings.

She will not be doing it much longer, however, as she has recently bought 180 acres in Arkansas, and will leave the orchestra to raise beef cattle, pigs, and chinchillas. The country girl in her is a natural affinity. She was born and brought up in New York City, not exactly a farming community. For some time, however, she has owned and ridden two horses, which are stabled near Boston.

* * *

During her years with the orchestra she has had opportunity to travel abroad with it, visiting Japan, Europe including Germany, the U.S.S.R., Formosa. If she has had any difficulties working with the orchestra she doesn't talk about them. She does speak in general terms of peripheral problems, sometimes trying, sometimes funny.

Lois Schaefer, who also went to the U.S.S.R., picked up the conversational ball and tossed in a specific instance. In the Soviet Union, she recalled, trunks and instruments vanished because of some red-tape misunderstandings. Concerts had to be given in street clothes, and instruments picked up locally until it could all be unraveled.

Miss Schaefer comes from a family of musicians. Her mother, grandmother, and an aunt taught music in the school system in Washington and Iowa. She chose the flute as her instrument in the fifth grade —at that time children were given a semester of lessons and an instrument for $60! —and her first professional job came with the Chicago Symphony when she became assistant first flute. However, when the BSO had an opening it was for a piccolo player. She "practiced about eight hours a day for a week" she said, before auditioning. Her hard work won her the job. When she went to the U.S.S.R. it was with the Boston Chamber Players, which is composed of a few members of the Boston Symphony.

The world of the major orchestra, she pointed out, "is a very competitive field. You have to have the necessary talent and equipment to play an instrument really well. After that it's a life of hard work. That applies to everybody, not just women. There used to be a lot of feeling against women. But it's gradually breaking down. We are still in the minority, but they are just as apt to give a girl player a job. . . ." And she added, "the orchestras of Kansas City and St. Louis, say, are practically 50-50."

Then she added an all-important piece of information. Girls who want to play with an orchestra should always remember that "despite the increase in numbers of orchestras that are springing up around the country, there still are many more musicians than there are jobs. Therefore, prepare with the greatest care, talent, and perseverance for this career."

Even though it does take such devotion, however, Miss Procter remarked, "there's plenty of time to keep up with a busy social or home life."

With all four of the BSO players, there was a certain element of surprise that anyone should think playing in an orchestra posed more problems and day-to-day nuisances than working in any other milieu. Which just proves how far acceptance of women in orchestras has come in a generation.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 200,150
JUL 12 1968
New England

MANAGEMENT & ASSOCIATES

121

Symphony President Retires

PAGE ONE

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 88th season began Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall with a departure and will end with a departure.

It was announced that Henry B. Cabot has retired after 23 years as president of the orchestra's board of trustees. Cabot, 74, has served as a trustee for 36 years. He will continue as executive committee chairman.

He is succeeded by Talcott M. Banks, 63, a Boston attorney, who was elected Wednesday. Banks has been a trustee since 1954 and vice president since 1960.

21

CABOT

BSO: 88th season, new president

By Craig Stinson

The new musical year got under way Friday afternoon with the 88th opening concert of the Boston Symphony. The symphony's board of trustees chose the opening afternoon to announce publicly the retirement of Henry B. Cabot, its president since 1945. At a special meeting of the board on Wednesday, Sept. 25, Talcott Banks was chosen to succeed Mr. Cabot, but the announcement was postponed until Friday afternoon so that the members of the orchestra could be personally informed of the change. Mr. Cabot and Mr. Banks addressed them briefly before the beginning of the concert.

Mr. Banks, who was born in New Jersey in 1905, was elected to the Boston Symphony's board of trustees in 1954 and has served as vice-president since 1960. He is also president of the Boston Opera Association and the Fessenden School, as well as a trustee of the New England Conservatory.

The concert, which was also the opening event in Erich Leinsdorf's final year with the BSO, was dominated by the guest appearance of Marilyn Horne and the music of Wagner. The entire second half of the program was given over to a suite of excerpts from "Die Götterdämmerung," in a performance that was equal to Mr. Leinsdorf's and the BSO's usual standard of Wagner-playing—that is to say extremely good, with only a few occasional bobbles. Mr. Leinsdorf's approach to the music, as always, was sensuous and dramatic, without sacrifice to detail.

Talcott M. Banks

. . . is the newly elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He replaces Henry B. Cabot, who was president of the trustees for 23 years.

Miss Horne, who most often appears in mezzo-soprano roles, did an admirable job with the high and demanding part of Brünnhilde in the immolation scene. Her performance demonstrated that she might, if she chooses, take a prominent place among contemporary Wagnerian sopranos.

She was less successful, however, with Beethoven's scena and aria, "Ah perfido." That part ranges consistently above the staff, and while Miss Horne was always there with plenty of power, the music requires more in the way of lyricism than she was able to supply.

The concert opened with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, in a performance that was generally tasteful in matters of phrasing and tempo, but which sounded a bit ponderous nevertheless. That description too seems to have become a BSO standard. A major problem with much of the orchestra's Mozart-playing is its string-heaviness; a smaller string section in this performance would certainly have produced a more buoyant kind of sonority, and—what is more important—it would have made for greater structural clarity by allowing the woodwinds to be heard.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 20,150

SEP 30 1968 New England

Banks Succeeds Cabot As BSO's President

Whitestone
Henry B. Cabot
The old president . . .

Librizzi
Talcott M. Banks
. . . and the new

BOSTON — Talcott M. Banks, Williams College graduate and trustee, has been elected the new president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, replacing Henry B. Cabot, who has resigned.

Cabot, who has been a trustee of the orchestra for 36 years and president for 23, will become chairman of the executive committee.

Banks, 63, graduated from Williams in the class of 1928. He is a well-known Boston lawyer for the firm of Palmer, Dodge, Gardner and Bradford.

He was instrumental in planning the new social system that evolved at Williams after fraternities were abolished in 1962. He has been a trustee of the orchestra since 1960 and was serving as vice president when elevated to the new post.

Cabot, 83, is a Harvard graduate who became active in the orchestra's activities in 1932. He is a gentleman farmer and a lover of Mozart.

He was awarded a doctor of humane letters degree by Tufts University and wrote "Judges and Law Reform" with S.B. Warner in 1937. He was a practicing lawyer in Boston from 1922 to 1930 and has been a trustee of the Harvard Law School since 1938.

Banks serves as trustee of the Boston Opera Association and the New England Conservatory of Music, along with his role with the BSO.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

SEP 23 1968 E

BSO launches 88th season

★ CABOT

Continued from Page 1

21

The performance also marked the beginning of Erich Leinsdorf's seventh and last season as music director.

The program began with Mozart's E flat Symphony, No. 39. It was typical Leinsdorf Mozart — elegant, inclined to be placid and tensionless, perhaps a bit small in scale altogether. The Andante had, in addition, a nice grace and flexibility. The orchestral playing was beautifully finished.

After Mozart came something like pseudo-Mozart, the concert aria, "Ah! perfido," written by the 25-year-old Beethoven for an eminent friend and interpreter of Mozart's, Josefa Dusek, and worked out more or less in imitation of the Morzartean manner. An impassioned and expertly laid out recitative leads into a fine Adagio, "Per pieta, non dirmi addio;" most of what follows, however, is impersonal and lamely repetitious. By no means a strong piece, "Ah! perfido" has nonetheless been a popular vehicle for displaying the flair taste, and vocal power, of dramatic sopranos, and Marilyn Horne, save for an uncomfortable moment of flatness at the end of the Adagio, sang it admirably. Leinsdorf paced and accompanied excellently.

The ARTS

Then, after intermission, we had about three-quarter of an hours' worth of climaxes from "Die Goetterdaemmerung," specifically Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, the Interlude before the arrival of Waltraute in Act One, the Prelude to Act Two, the music that accompanies bearing away of the dead Siegfried (but on no account Siegfried's Death, as listed in the program), and Bruennhilde's Immolation accompanied in the traditional manner by the Exit of the Subscribers.

The arguments for and against Wagner concert excerpts of that sort have all been heard. If conductors — and I admit that Leinsdorf is less culpable than many of his colleagues — did a better job of not neglecting important parts of the legitimate orchestral repertory, I would be more readily convined by the claim that it is right to play this music because we otherwise hear it so rarely in live performance. I find, though, that something like Leinsdorf's "Goetterdaemmerung" sequence cruelly misrepresents Wagner, blotting out most of what makes him a great composer, coarsening the rhetorical effect, commiting, with all those non-beginnings, non-endings, and weird sutures, hair-raising rhythmic and harmonic improprieties, in short, leaving little beside nerve stimulus and sensuous indulgence.

Given Humphrey, Nixon and Wallace, it is hard enough to sleep nights: must we, as well, have added to our burden of unhappiness the link with which Mr. Leinsdorf gets out of Siegfried's funeral music and into the Immolation scene? Still worse, though, were the unaccountable cuts of, respectively, one, one, and two measures, with which Leinsdorf devastated rhythm and harmony in the first act interlude, and odd, in the light of that, his willingness to leave the offending measures in which the same music recurs in the second act prelude.

The orchestral playing was much less good in the Wagner than earlier, mainly because of unblended brass and bleating trumpets especially. Much of Leinsdorf's conducting was slack and as directionless as his composing with Wagner's materials. Marilyn Horne returned for the Immolation music, and while I could tell that her singing was intense, intelligent, musical, and handsome in sound, I could not genuinely experience any of that, simply because I could not hear her all that well. It is not that her voice isn't splendid or that she doesn't know how to use it, nor is it that Leinsdorf failed to control the orchestral context: it is, however, what is apt to happen when orchestration designed for a pit is translated to the concert platform. I would suppose, however, that had Miss Horne been placed on a platform behind the orchestra like the "Walkuere" singers at last season's opening, our chances of relishing the physical impact of her singing would have been much greater.

HENRY B. CABOT
. . . retiring president

A letter from Robert H. Plourde, Boston, published in Friday's Globe, expresses the wish, in view of the rape of Czechoslovakia in August, for a concert of Czech music. The Boston Symphony programs for Friday and Saturday, Oct. 4 and 5, Leinsdorf conducting, will include Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests," the Janacek Sinfonietta, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G major.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Erich Leinsdorf conducting Mozart: Symphony No. 39 in E flat. K.543; Beethoven: Scena and aria, "Ah! perfido," Op.65; and Wagner: excerpts from "Die Goetterdaemmerung." Soloist: Marilyn Horne. Opening concert of the orchestra's 88th season, Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

SEP 28 1968 New

Cabot Retires From Board Of Hub Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — Henry B. Cabot has retired as president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to become chairman of the orchestra's Executive Committee, it was announced Friday.

Talcott M. Banks, vice president of the trustees, was elected president.

Officials said Banks was elected at a special meeting of the trustees on Wednesday but public announcement was delayed so Cabot could make the announcement to the Orchestra members personally Friday afternoon.

Cabot said he believed for three reasons the time was right for him to leave the presidency, noting the orchestra's fund - raising campaign had achieved its first major goal, matching the Ford Foundation's $2 million challenge grant by raising over $4 million, a new music director has been named and that the recent trade agreement negotiations had been successfully concluded in August.

Cabot had been a trustee for 36 years, 23 of them as president.

Banks was elected to the board of trustees in 1954, becoming vice president in 1960.

It was also announced that Phillip K. Allen and Robert H. Gardiner were elected vice presidents.

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 56,000

SEP 28 1968 New

Banks President Of Boston Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — Talcott M. Banks has been elected president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Banks, who was board vice president, will succeed Henry B. Cabot who resigned to become chairman of the Orchestra's Executive Committee, according to an announcement Friday.

Officials said Banks was elected at a special meeting of the trustees on Wednesday but public announcement was delayed so Cabot could make the announcement to the Orchestra members personally Friday afternoon.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

SEP 23 1968 New England

Talcott Banks Heads Symphony Trustees

WILLIAMSTOWN — Talcott M. Banks, a former resident here and president of the Francine Clark Art Institute, has been elected new president of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Banks, a resident of Lincoln, is a graduate and trustee of Williams College. He also is president of the Fessenden School at West Newton and president of the Boston Opera Association.

A graduate of Harvard Law School, he has been associated with a Boston law firm.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

SEP 30 1968 New

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

SEP 28 1968

Hub Orchestra Trustees Head Takes New Post

BOSTON (P) — Henry B. Cabot has resigned as president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to become chairman of the executive committee, it was announced Friday.

Cabot, of Dover, had been a trustee for 36 years, serving as president for 23 of them.

Talcott M. Banks, a Boston attorney who lives in Lincoln, has been elected the new president. He has been trustee vice-president since 1960.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 47,948

SEP 28 1968

TELEGRAPH (E)
NASHUA, N. H.
CIRC. 16,000

SEP 28 1968

KENNEBEC JOURNAL (m)
AUGUSTA, ME.
CIRC. 15,150

SEP 23 1968

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 36,931

SEP 28 1968

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850

SEP 28 1968

New England

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050

SEP 28 1968

HERALD NEWS (e)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 41,700

SEP 30 1968

New England

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 60,150

SEP 29 1968

New England

MANAGEMENT & ASSOCIATES

121

Symphony President Retires

PAGE ONE

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 88th season began Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall with a departure and will end with a departure.

It was announced that Henry B. Cabot has retired after 23 years as president of the orchestra's board of trustees. Cabot, 74, has served as a trustee for 36 years. He will continue as executive committee chairman.

He is succeeded by Talcott M. Banks, 63, a Boston attorney, who was elected Wednesday. Banks has been a trustee since 1954 and vice president since 1960.

21

CABOT

BSO: 88th season, new president

By Craig Stinson

The new musical year got under way Friday afternoon with the 88th opening concert of the Boston Symphony. The symphony's board of trustees chose the opening afternoon to announce publicly the retirement of Henry B. Cabot, its president since 1945. At a special meeting of the board on Wednesday, Sept. 25, Talcott Banks was chosen to succeed Mr. Cabot, but the announcement was postponed until Friday afternoon so that the members of the orchestra could be personally informed of the change. Mr. Cabot and Mr. Banks addressed them briefly before the beginning of the concert.

Mr. Banks, who was born in New Jersey in 1905, was elected to the Boston Symphony's board of trustees in 1954 and has served as vice-president since 1960. He is also president of the Boston Opera Association and the Fessenden School, as well as a trustee of the New England Conservatory.

The concert, which was also the opening event in Erich Leinsdorf's final year with the BSO, was dominated by the guest appearance of Marilyn Horne and the music of Wagner. The entire second half of the program was given over to a suite of excerpts from "Die Götterdämmerung," in a performance that was equal to Mr. Leinsdorf's and the BSO's usual standard of Wagner-playing—that is to say extremely good, with only a few occasional bobbles. Mr. Leinsdorf's approach to the music, as always, was sensuous and dramatic, without sacrifice of detail.

Talcott M. Banks

. . . is the newly elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He replaces Henry B. Cabot, who was president of the trustees for 23 years.

Miss Horne, who most often appears in mezzo-soprano roles, did an admirable job with the high and demanding part of Brünnhilde in the immolation scene. Her performance demonstrated that she might, if she chooses, take a prominent place among contemporary Wagnerian sopranos.

She was less successful, however, with Beethoven's scena and aria, "Ah perfido." That part ranges consistently above the staff, and while Miss Horne was always there with plenty of power, the music requires more in the way of lyricism than she was able to supply.

The concert opened with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, in a performance that was generally tasteful in matters of phrasing and tempo, but which sounded a bit ponderous nevertheless. That description too seems to have become a BSO standard. A major problem with much of the orchestra's Mozart-playing is its string-heaviness; a smaller string section in this performance would certainly have produced a more buoyant kind of sonority, and—what is more important—it would have made for greater structural clarity by allowing the woodwinds to be heard.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 30,250

SEP 30 1968 New England

Banks Succeeds Cabot As BSO's President

Whitestone

Henry B. Cabot
The old president . . .

Librizzi

Talcott M. Banks
. . . and the new

BOSTON — Talcott M. Banks, Williams College graduate and trustee, has been elected the new president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, replacing Henry B. Cabot, who has resigned.

Cabot, who has been a trustee of the orchestra for 36 years and president for 23, will become chairman of the executive committee.

Banks, 63, graduated from Williams in the class of 1928. He is a well-known Boston lawyer for the firm of Palmer, Dodge, Gardner and Bradford.

He was instrumental in planning the new social system that evolved at Williams after fraternities were abolished in 1962. He has been a trustee of the orchestra since 1960 and was serving as vice president when elevated to the new post.

Cabot, 83, is a Harvard graduate who became active in the orchestra's activities in 1932. He is a gentleman farmer and a lover of Mozart.

He was awarded a doctor of humane letters degree by Tufts University and wrote "Judges and Law Reform" with S.B. Warner in 1937. He was a practicing lawyer in Boston from 1922 to 1930 and has been a trustee of the Harvard Law School since 1938.

Banks serves as trustee of the Boston Opera Association and the New England Conservatory of Music, along with his role with the BSO.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

SEP 23 1968 E.

BSO launches 88th season

★ CABOT
Continued from Page 1

21

The performance also marked the beginning of Erich Leinsdorf's seventh and last season as music director.

The program began with Mozart's E flat Symphony, No. 39. It was typical Leinsdorf Mozart — elegant, inclined to be placid and tensionless, perhaps a bit small in scale altogether. The Andante had, in addition, a nice grace and flexibility. The orchestral playing was beautifully finished.

After Mozart came something like pseudo-Mozart, the concert aria, "Ah! perfido," written by the 25-year-old Beethoven for an eminent friend and interpreter of Mozart's, Josefa Dusek, and worked out more or less in imitation of the Morzartean manner. An impassioned and expertly laid out recitative leads into a fine Adagio, "Per pieta, non dirmi addio;" most of what follows, however, is impersonal and lamely repetitious. By no means a strong piece, "Ah! perfido" has nonetheless been a popular vehicle for displaying the flair taste, and vocal power, of dramatic sopranos, and Marilyn Horne, save for an uncomfortable moment of flatness at the end of the Adagio, sang it admirably. Leinsdorf paced and accompanied excellently.

The ARTS

Then, after intermission, we had about three-quarter of an hours' worth of climaxes from "Die Goetterdaemmerung," specifically Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, the Interlude before the arrival of Waltraute in Act One, the Prelude to Act Two, the music that accompanies bearing away of the dead Siegfried (but on no account Siegfried's Death, as listed in the program), and Bruennhilde's Immolation accompanied in the traditional manner by the Exit of the Subscribers.

The arguments for and against Wagner concert excerpts of that sort have all been heard. If conductors — and I admit that Leinsdorf is less culpable than many of his colleagues — did a better job of not neglecting important parts of the legitimate orchestral repertory, I would be more readily convined by the claim that it is right to play this music because we otherwise hear it so rarely in live performance. I find, though, that something like Leinsdorf's "Goetterdaemmerung" sequence cruelly misrepresents Wagner, blotting out most of what makes him a great composer, coarsening the rhetorical effect, commiting, with all those non-beginnings, non-endings, and weird sutures, hair-raising rhythmic and harmonic improprieties, in short, leaving little beside nerve stimulus and sensuous indulgence.

Given Humphrey, Nixon and Wallace, it is hard enough to sleep nights: must we, as well, have added to our burden of unhappiness the link with which Mr. Leinsdorf gets out of Siegfried's funeral music and into the Immolation scene? Still worse, though, were the unaccountable cuts of, respectively, one, one, and two measures, with which Leinsdorf devastated rhythm and harmony in the first act interlude, and odd, in the light of that, his willingness to leave the offending measures in which the same music recurs in the second act prelude.

The orchestral playing was much less good in the Wagner than earlier, mainly because of unblended brass and bleating trumpets especially. Much of Leinsdorf's conducting was slack and as directionless as his composing with Wagner's materials. Marilyn Horne returned for the Immolation music, and while I could tell that her singing was intense, intelligent, musical, and handsome in sound, I could not genuinely experience any of that, simply because I could not hear her all that well. It is not that her voice isn't splendid or that she doesn't know how to use it, nor is it that Leinsdorf failed to control the orchestral context: it is, however, what is apt to happen when orchestration designed for a pit is translated to the concert platform. I would suppose, however, that had Miss Horne been placed on a platform behind the orchestra like the "Walkuere" singers at last season's opening, our chances of relishing the physical impact of her singing would have been much greater.

HENRY B. CABOT
. . . retiring president

A letter from Robert H. Plourde, Boston, published in Friday's Globe, expresses the wish, in view of the rape of Czechoslovakia in August, for a concert of Czech music. The Boston Symphony programs for Friday and Saturday, Oct. 4 and 5, Leinsdorf conducting, will include Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests," the Janacek Sinfonietta, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G major.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Erich Leinsdorf conducting Mozart: Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K.543; Beethoven: Scena and aria, "Ah! perfido," Op.65; and Wagner: excerpts from "Die Goetterdaemmerung." Soloist: Marilyn Horne. Opening concert of the orchestra's 88th season, Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,79[illegible]

SEP 28 1968 New

Cabot Retires From Board Of Hub Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — Henry B. Cabot has retired as president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to become chairman of the orchestra's Executive Committee, it was announced Friday.

Talcott M. Banks, vice president of the trustees, was elected president.

Officials said Banks was elected at a special meeting of the trustees on Wednesday but public announcement was delayed so Cabot could make the announcement to the Orchestra members personally Friday afternoon.

Cabot said he believed for three reasons the time was right for him to leave the presidency, noting the orchestra's fund - raising campaign had achieved its first major goal, matching the Ford Foundation's $2 million challenge grant by raising over $4 million, a new music director has been named and that the recent trade agreement negotiations had been successfully concluded in August.

Cabot had been a trustee for 36 years, 23 of them as president.

Banks was elected to the board of trustees in 1954, becoming vice president in 1960.

It was also announced that Phillip K. Allen and Robert H. Gardiner were elected vice presidents.

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 76,000

SEP 28 1968 New

Banks President Of Boston Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — Talcott M. Banks has been elected president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Banks, who was board vice president, will succeed Henry B. Cabot who resigned to become chairman of the Orchestra's Executive Committee, according to an announcement Friday.

Officials said Banks was elected at a special meeting of the trustees on Wednesday but public announcement was delayed so Cabot could make the announcement to the Orchestra members personally Friday afternoon.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

SEP 23 1968 New England

Talcott Banks Heads Symphony Trustees

WILLIAMSTOWN — Talcott M. Banks, a former resident here and president of the Francine Clark Art Institute, has been elected new president of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Banks, a resident of Lincoln, is a graduate and trustee of Williams College. He also is president of the Fessenden School at West Newton and president of the Boston Opera Association.

A graduate of Harvard Law School, he has been associated with a Boston law firm.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,421

SEP 30 1968 New

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,4[illegible]

SEP 28 1968

Hub Orchestra Trustees Head Takes New Post

BOSTON (P) — Henry B. Cabot has resigned as president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to become chairman of the executive committee, it was announced Friday.

Cabot, of Dover, had been a trustee for 36 years, serving as president for 23 of them.

Talcott M. Banks, a Boston attorney who lives in Lincoln, has been elected the new president. He has been trustee vice-president since 1960.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 47,038

SEP 28 1968

TELEGRAPH (E)
NASHUA, N. H.
CIRC. 16,000

SEP 28 1968

KENNEBEC JOURNAL (m)
AUGUSTA, ME.
CIRC. 15,150

SEP 23 1968

SEP 28 1968

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850

SEP 28 1968 New England

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050

SEP 23 1968

HERALD NEWS (e)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 41,700

SEP 30 1968 New England

JOURNAL STANDARD
TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 60,150

SEP 29 1968 New England

122

BSO 'seamless web,' says new president

By ROBERT J. ANGLIN
Staff Reporter

Music, art and his alma mater make Talcott M. Banks a busy man.

The new president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occasionally gets time for a stretch of ocean sailing aboard his 30-foot cutter, Sparhawk, but not as often as he'd like.

As president of one of the world's most prestigious orchestras, those opportunities are certain to become rarer for Banks.

The B.S.O. has been one of his principal interests for years. Since 1960, he has been a trustee and vice president. He foresees no break with the policies of his predecessor, Henry B. Cabot.

"I think an orchestra is a seamless web. A change in officers means no change in policies.

"The traditions of the orchestra are strong and sound. We have a superb musical instrument — one of the great orchestras of the world and an enormous cultural asset to Boston.

"I and all the board will to the utmost to maintain that position of musical leadership," he said.

Meanwhile, he was preparing to leave for Williamstown, where he will attend a trustees' meeting today of the Clark Art Institute, of which he is president.

Quickly shifting interests, he spoke of a new building under construction by the Institute and of its plans to purchase additions to its collection of old masters.

His third love, Banks said, is Williams College, of which he has been a trustee since 1961. "That also takes a lot of time," he said, "but I think the Symphony will take more."

Banks is a successful Boston attorney, a partner in the firm of Palmer, Dodge, Gardner and Bradford. He is a director of the Boston Legal Aid Society and a member of the American Law Instiute, the American Bar Assn., and a number of professional organizations.

He and his second wife, the former Mrs. Anna L. Monks, live on Bedford rd. in Lincoln. His first wife, the former Kathleen Macy Hall, died in 1966 of injuries received in an automobile accident.

He has three children. One, Ridgway, a harpsichordist, is a drama and music teacher at Brown & Nichols School; the second, Oliver, is studying for his Ph.D. degree in art history at Princeton. A daughter, Helen, is a special student at Brandeis University.

Banks is a sometime tennis player. He captained the team at Williams and was chairman of the National Intercollegiate Lawn Tennis Team.

Sixty-three years old, he was born in Englewood, N.J., and moved while an infant to Williamstown. He attended Hotchkiss School in Lakeville, Ct., and graduated magna cum laude and Phi Beta Kappa from Williams in 1928. He was graduated from Harvard Law School in 1931.

A Unitarian, he is a member of King's Chapel in Boston.

He sometimes relaxes at the piano but disavows any skill. "I wouldn't say I play too well. I hope you never hear me," he said.

TALCOTT M. BANKS
. . . new president

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

SEP 28 1968 New England

BANKS NEW HEAD OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BOSTON — Talcott M. Banks, Williams College graduate and trustee, has been elected the new president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, replacing Henry B. Cabot, who has resigned.

Cabot, who has been a trustee of the orchestra for 36 years and president for 23, will become chairman of the executive committee.

Banks, 63, graduated from Williams in the class of 1928. He is a well-known Boston lawyer for the firm of Palmer, Dodge, Gardner and Bradford.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

SEP 30 1968 New England

DEMOCRAT
HOLYOKE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,000

OCT 5 1968 New England

Talcott M. Banks, a former resident of Williamstown and president of the Francine Clark Art Institute there, has been elected president of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is also a graduate and trustee of Williams College.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

OCT 2 1968 New England

Talcott M. Banks New Symphony Trustees Head

Henry B. Cabot, a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 36 years and president of the trustees for 23 years, has retired as president. He now becomes chairman of the executive committee, in which position he will continue to be active with the orchestra.

Talcott M. Banks, vice president of the trustees until Cabot's retirement, was elected president at a special meeting of the trustees last Wednesday. Two new vice presidents, Philip K. Allen and Robert H. Gardiner, also were elected at the meeting.

In explaining his choice of his time for assuming different duties with the orchestra, Cabot said that he thought that for three principal reasons this was a particularly propitious time to leave the presidency. He noted that the orchestra's fund-raising campaign had achieved its first major goal, matching the Ford Foundation's $2 million challenge grant by raising over $4 million, that a new music director had been named, and that the recent trade agreement negotiations had been successfully concluded in August.

TALCOTT M. BANKS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

SEP 28 1968 New England

Concerts

SYMPHONY HALL — Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Mozart, Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K. 543; Beethoven, "Ah, perfido," with Marilyn Horne, soprano; Wagner, Immolation Scene from "Die Goetterdaemmerung," with Miss Horne, soloist. 8:30 p.m.

Lincoln Resident Is Named President Of Symphony Trustees

LINCOLN — Talcott M. Banks, of Bedford rd., was elected president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra board of trustees, on September 25. An attorney, and partner in the Boston firm of Palmer, Dodge, Gardner and Bradford, Mr. Banks will succeed Henry B. Cabot. Mr. Cabot, a BSO trustee for 36 years, will continue as executive committee chairman.

Mr. Banks has been a trustee since 1954, and vice president since 1960. He is also a trustee of the Clark Art Institute, Williamstown; Massachusetts; Williams College, also in Williamstown; a director of the Boston Legal Aid Society, and a member of the American Law Institute and the American Bar Association.

He attended Hotchkiss School, Lakeville, Connecticut; graduated from Williams College in 1928, magna cum laude and Phi Beta Kappa; and graduated from Harvard Law School in 1931.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500

OCT 3 1968 New England

3 Area People Members of New Overseas Board

The creation of a new advisory group, the Board of Overseers, was announced Friday by Talcott M. Banks, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among the 28 members of the board are Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr. of 169 Chestnut Hill Rd., Chestnut Hill; Carlton P. Fuller of 12 Fletcher Rd., Belmont, and the Very Rev. W. Seavey Joyce, president of Boston College.

Board To Aid Symphony

BOSTON (AP) - An advisory group has been created to assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in developing policies, the BSO trustees announced Friday. It will be called the Board of Overseers.

NEWS (e)
GARDNER, MASS.
CIRC. 7,893

OCT 5 1968 New England

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

OCT 9 1968 New England

BSO trustees name overseers

The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced the creation of a new advisory group called the Board of Overseers. Chaired by Trustee Abram T. Collier, the board will assist in developing and attaining the Orchestra's policies and goals.

The board's 28 charter members are: Mrs. Frank Allen, Boston; Oliver F. Ames, Boston; Allen G. Barry, president, New England Telephone and Telegraph Co.; Dr. Leo I. Beranek, president, Bolt, Beranek and Newman; Gardner L. Brown, president, First Agricultural National Bank; Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, Wenham; Mrs. Norman Cahners, Brookline; Erwin D. Canham, editor, Christian Science Monitor; Richard P. Chapman, chairman, New England Merchants National Bank; John L. Cooper, president, Mass. Investors Growth Stock Fund; Gen. Robert Cutler; Byron K. Elliot, chairman, John Hancock Mutual Life Ins. Co.; Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Concord; Carlton P. Fuller, Belmont; Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Marblehead; Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., Chestnut Hill; Stephen W. Grant, president, Houghton-Mufflin; Francis Hatch Jr., state representative; Mrs. C. D. Jackson, New York; Howard Johnson, president, M.I.T.; the Very Rev. W. Seavey Joyce, president, Boston College; Leonard Kaplan of Nutter, McClennan and Fish; Lawrence K. Miller of the Berkshire Eagle; Louville Niles, president, Niles and Co.; Herbert W. Pratt, vice president, Davenport Peters Co.; Nathan M. Pusey, president, Harvard University; the Hon. Paul Reardon, Supreme Judicial Court; John Hoyt Stookey of New York.

Board of Overseers Is Formed by BSO

BOSTON (UPI)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra today announced formation of a new advisory group called the Board of Overseers.

The new group, which will be headed by Abram T. Collier, president of New England Mutual Life Insurance Co., will advise and assist the orchestra in developing policies, reaching objectives and serving other interests and needs.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

OCT 4 1968 New

ENTERPRISE & TIMES (e)
BROCKTON, MASS.
CIRC. 52,417

OCT 4 1968 New England

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 13,050

OCT 5 1968 New

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850

OCT 5 1968 New

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

OCT 9 1968 New England

[illegible] for BSO

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the members of its new board of overseers, a group set up by the orchestra's trustees to provide counsel and assistance in matters of policy and development. The 28 charter members are:

Mrs. Frank Allen, Boston; Oliver F. Ames, Boston; Allen G. Barry, president, New England Telephone and Telegraph Co.; Dr. Leo I. Beranek, president, Bolt, Beranek and Newman; Gardner L. Brown, president, First Agricultural National Bank; Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, Wenham; Mrs. Norman Cahners, Brookline; Erwin D. Canham, editor in chief, The Christian Science Monitor; Richard P. Chapman, chairman, New England Merchants National Bank; John L. Cooper, president, Mass. Investors Growth Stock Fund; Gen. Robert Cutler; Byron K. Elliot, chairman, John Hancock Mutual Life Ins. Co.; Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Concord; Carlton P. Fuller, Belmont; Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Marblehead; Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., Chestnut Hill; Stephen W. Grant, president, Houghton-Mifflin; Francis Hatch Jr., state representative; Mrs. C. D. Jackson, New York; Howard Johnson, president, M.I.T.; the Very Rev. W. Seavey Joyce, president, Boston College; Leonard Kaplan of Nutter, McClennan and Fish; Lawrence K. Miller of the Berkshire Eagle; Louville Niles, president, Niles and Co.; Herbert W. Pratt, vice-president, Davenport Peters Co.; Nathan M. Pusey, president, Harvard University; the Hon. Paul Reardon, Supreme Judicial Court; John Hoyt Stookey of New York.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

OCT 12 1968 New England

NEWS-TRIBUNE (e)
WALTHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 16,400

OCT 4 1968 New England

SYMPHONY ADDS BOARD

BOSTON (AP) — An advisory group has been created to assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in developing policies, the BSO trustees announced Friday. It will be called the Board of Overseers.

ENTERPRISE & TIMES (e)
BROCKTON, MASS.
CIRC. 52,417

OCT 5 1968 New England

NEWS (e)
NEWPORT, R. I.
CIRC. 13,900

OCT 5 1968 New England

MICHAEL STEINBERG

New Boston Symphony president delights in challenge of job

If descretion is a virtue in a president of a board of trustees, Talcott M. Banks, the Boston Symphony's new boss, will do splendidly. The 63-year-old lawyer, who was elected at a Trustees' meeting a week ago to succeed Henry B. Cabot, is awesomely expert at the art of not saying a thing he doesn't mean to say.

Of course, Banks has other qualities to offer the Boston Symphony. He is well versed in its affairs, having been a trustee since 1954, and vice president since 1960. He is also president of the Boston Opera Assn. and serves on the Board of Trustees of the New England Conservatory. His extra-musical obligations include being a trustee of Williams College, where he was graduated magna cum laude and Phi Beta Kappa in 1928, and the presidency of the board of the Clark Art Institute at Williamstown. And that doesn't begin to count his professional affiliations.

About music, Banks says: "I couldn't live without it. It's a physical necessity for me." He says of his musical education :"It's of course not what I would wish it to be," and he was modestly but firmly evasive when asked if he ranked himself as being at the bright end of the musical sophistication spectrum among the Symphony Trustees. He plays the piano and admits with regret that ever since college, because of increasing demands on his time from other directions, he plays "less and less and worse and worse."

Banks is frankly delighted with his new appointment. He emphasizes, moreover, that he is particularly happy to be the Symphony's president just now, "at such an exciting time," so rich in challenges — headaches, too, of course. He is also happy because of the rapid changes in the institutional structure of orchestras; the changes in music itself, which, be realizes, will certainly affect the orchestras; and the remarkable and probably unprecedented perfection of the orchestra as a musical instrument.

"It's going to be much more fun," Banks summed up, "to be involved with the Boston Symphony now than, say, 30 years ago when everything was essentially stable and predictable."

Many of the headaches will come from the orchestra's financial situation. The spiral of growing expenses seems to be infinitely extendable, though, says Banks; a cut-off point is going to have to be found somewhere; the income spiral, on the other hand, is all too finite. It is impossible to add concerts to an already crowded schedule, and Banks feels that the orchestra would act irresponsibly by raising the ticket tariff to a point of pricing itself out of reach of many people.

What of the Boston Symphony's artistic future? Is William Steinberg's appointment as music director, which begins in 1969, essentially an interim arrangement as many orchestra members deduced from President Cabot's remarks at the time, or is Steinberg pointing out that three years was the normal length of an initial contract really the relevant factor?

Steinberg, says Banks, was quite right to make the point he did; because, however, he is relatively advanced in years, the Trustees would naturally not expect him to look ahead terms as long as his predecessors'. Steinberg will be 70 when he takes over. Koussevitzky was 50 and stayed 25 years, Munch 58 and stayed 13, Leinsdorf was 50 and will leave at the end of his seventh season.

Like Cabot, his predecessor, Banks believes in the value of having a music director who is on hand and who assumes the responsibility for the bulk of a season. One of the differences between Leinsdorf and the Trustees, leading to Leinsdorf's resignation in November 1967, concerned the amount of time he was to give to the Boston Symphony and his freedom to accept guest engagements elsewhere.

Steinberg expects to continue as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, where he has been since 1952, and where he now has a contract of indefinite duration. Was there not a contradiction here? "No contradiction at all," says Banks firmly. The Trustees understand Steinberg's attachment to the Pittsburgh orchesra, for whose present prestige he is entirely responsible, and did not wish to put him into the position of even having to consider a break there.

For three years then, or more, the Boston Symphony will enter into a sharing arrangement with Pittsburgh whose details are yet to be worked out, because "Steinberg is the man we want, and to get exactly the man we want we will take him on the conditions under which he is available."

The more distant future? What about the prediction by Leinsdorf and others that the music director in the sense of a conductor who leads the largest number of a season's concerts, is a disappearing institution, that younger conductors will not take positions that tie them down so. Banks is cautious about prophesying, but he admits that the determining factor will be the conductors and the direction their profession takes. "If most of the younger generation of conductors is going to consist of itinerant conductors, then the orchestras will just have to learn to go along with that."

Banks took the opportunity to ask his interviewer a question: Was there enough contemporary music performance in Boston? Being told "by no means," he replied: "I don't think so either." He was astonished, though, to have it pointed out that the Boston Symphony's 1968-69 programs include only seven pieces by living composers, all but two of the works being virtually standard repertory fare by Stravinsky, Britten, and Piston.

Banks laughed aloud at the thought of counting "The Rite of Spring" in contemporary music statistics. "I'm very glad we did that Carter Piano Concerto," he reminisced. "I sensed a lot of musical richness in that."

One gets the impression Banks would like to see the Symphony more involved in new music, but he is unlikely to take an activist approach to the problem. During the conversation he had emphasized repeatedly the Trustees' non-intervention in artistic decisions, and he now implied that he would not care to go so far even as to suggest to a music director that he, or the Trustees, would not mind more contemporary music. "That wall between his function and ours is one of our most important principles."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
OCT 2 1968 New England

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923
OCT 2 1968 New England

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
MAY 11 1969 New England

ANDREW HEISKELL

Time, Inc., Boss to Speak Here

Urban Coalition Sets 1st Meet

Andrew Heiskell, chairman of the board of directors of Time, Inc. and co-chairman of the national Urban Coalition, will be the guest speaker at a luncheon Thursday at noon in the Zem Zem Mosque.

He will address the nearly 150 members of the board of incorporators of the local Urban Coalition Unit. This will be the initial meeting of the Erie unit.

On the agenda for Thursday's meeting are the approval of the board of directors and officers of the local unit followed by a discussion of the history, organization and purposes of the Urban Coalition, Heiskell's address and the naming of the paid executive Executive Director.

Heiskell has been associated with Time, Inc., since 1937, when he joined Life Magazine. In 1949 he became vice president of the magazine, in 1959 was elected to the board of directors and in 1960 he became chairman of the board.

He is currently chairman of the board of trustees of Urban America, Inc., co-chairman of the Urban Coalition, and serves on the boards of directors of the Council for Latin America, the Atlantic Council and the Center for Inter-American Relations.

He is chairman of the Visiting Committee of the Joint Center for Urban Studies of M.I.T. and Harvard University, and a member of the boards of trustees of the University of Chicago, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Bennington College.

The Urban Coalition is an alliance of individuals and organizations drawn together to assess community problems, establish goals and priorities and coordinate programed efforts.

Coalitions are broadly representative of the leadership and life of the community. Representatives have been selected from business, labor, local government, religion and civ rights organizations.

Erie Morning News
ERIE, PA.
NOV 5 1968

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
JAN 8 1969 New England

Crockett New Opera Head

David C. Crockett of Ipswich was elected President of the Boston Opera Ass'n yesterday to succeed Talcott M. Banks. Banks submitted his resignation in view of his new responsibilities as president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Crockett has been a member of the Association since 1947 and a director since 1959.

Crockett is deputy director of the Mass. General Hospital; trustee of the Walter E. Fernald State School, Waltham; vice-chairman of the Board of Trustees of the New England Conservatory; director of Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Co.; and director of the Boston Co.

John G. Cushman, Treasurer of the Opera Ass'n also submitted his resignation at this time. John C. Hall, a vice-president of the Old Colony Trust Co. succeeds him. Edward Dane, Jr., was elected Assist. Treasurer.

Elected to the Board of Directors were Nelson W. Aldrich who was voted a vice president; Lawrence T. Perera, voted as secretary; and Robert P. Moncreiff. It was announced that the Metropolitan Opera will open at the War Memorial April 21.

VanDerBeek at B.C. for seminars on arts

Stanley VanDer Beek, experimental filmmaker and recently named Fellow of the Center for Advanced Visual Studies at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, is one of five speakers taking part in a seminar on "The Arts and the Community" at Boston College Thursday. VanDer Beek's presentation will be part of an afternoon of three seminars concerned with the arts in education and in the community.

The 39-year-old filmmaker has been honored in Europe and the United States for his innovative films. He was featured last December in an exhibition of computer-produced films at the Museum of Modern Art in New York city. His film, "Man and His World" received second prize at Montreal's Expo '67.

VanDerBeek has served as artist-in-residence at the University of Southern California and at the University of Illinois. He is a regular contributor to film festivals and a much sought after judge for such events.

The first seminar, "The Arts and Education," will begin at 1 p.m., following a buffet luncheon. Mrs. Josephine von Henneberg, chairman of the Department of Fine Arts at Boston College will preside. The speaker will be Charles Seymour Jr., professor of the history of art and curator of Renaissance art at Yale. John R. Watts, chairman of the Massachusetts Council on the Arts, will respond.

The second seminar will be held at 2:30 on "The Creative and Performing Arts on a College Campus." Participants will be Henry Hewes, drama critic for the Saturday Review; Warner Bentley, director of the Hopkins Center at Dartmouth; James Haar, associate professor of music at the University of Pennsylvania; Helen Kritch Chinoy, chairman of the department of theater and speech at Smith College, and William C. Seitz, director of the Rose Art Museum at Brandeis University.

The third seminar will be in the tradition of Boston College seminars on Greater Boston affairs. The title is "The Arts and the Community," with Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as chairman. The speakers will be Pietro Belluschi, dean emeritus of the School of Architecture and Planning at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Richard M. Clurman, vice president of Time, Inc., and chairman of the New York City Center for Music and Drama; John O. Kiliens, novelist, writer and vice president of the Black Academy of Arts and Letters; Bernard Taper, staff writer for New Yorker Magazine who is doing a special report on the arts in Boston for the Harvard-M.I.T. Joint Center for Urban Studies, and Stanley VanDerBeek, artist-in-residence at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

TALCOTT M. BANKS will be among the participants in a special arts festival set for Thursday at Boston College.

Admission to the day-long seminar is by invitation only, but arrangements can be made for specialists and scholars by telephoning Mrs. von Henneberg at Boston College in Newton.

MICHAEL STEINBERG

New Boston Symphony president delights in challenge of job

If descretion is a virtue in a president of a board of trustees, Talcott M. Banks, the Boston Symphony's new boss, will do splendidly. The 63-year-old lawyer, who was elected at a Trustees' meeting a week ago to succeed Henry B. Cabot, is awesomely expert at the art of not saying a thing he doesn't mean to say.

Of course, Banks has other qualities to offer the Boston Symphony. He is well versed in its affairs, having been a trustee since 1954, and vice president since 1960. He is also president of the Boston Opera Assn. and serves on the Board of Trustees of the New England Conservatory. His extra-musical obligations include being a trustee of Williams College, where he was graduated magna cum laude and Phi Beta Kappa in 1928, and the presidency of the board of the Clark Art Institute at Williamstown. And that doesn't begin to count his professional affiliations.

About music, Banks says: "I couldn't live without it. It's a physical necessity for me." He says of his musical education :"It's of course not what I would wish it to be," and he was modestly but firmly evasive when asked if he ranked himself as being at the bright end of the musical sophistication spectrum among the Symphony Trustees. He plays the piano and admits with regret that ever since college, because of increasing demands on his time from other directions, he plays "less and less and worse and worse."

Banks is frankly delighted with his new appointment. He emphasizes, moreover, that he is particularly happy to be the Symphony's president just now, "at such an exciting time," so rich in challenges — headaches, too, of course. He is also happy because of the rapid changes in the institutional structure of orchestras; the changes in music itself, which, be realizes, will certainly affect the orchestras; and the remarkable and probably unprecedented perfection of the orchestra as a musical instrument.

"It's going to be much more fun," Banks summed up, "to be involved with the Boston Symphony now than, say, 30 years ago when everything was essentially stable and predictable."

Many of the headaches will come from the orchestra's financial situation. The spiral of growing expenses seems to be infinitely extendable, though, says Banks, a cut-off point is going to have to be found somewhere; the income spiral, on the other hand, is all too finite. It is impossible to add concerts to an already crowded schedule, and Banks feels that the orchestra would act irresponsibly by raising the ticket tariff to a point of pricing itself out of reach of many people.

What of the Boston Symphony's artistic future? Is William Steinberg's appointment as music director, which begins in 1969, essentially an interim arrangement as many orchestra members deduced from President Cabot's remarks at the time, or is Steinberg pointing out that three years was the normal length of an initial contract really the relevant factor?

Steinberg, says Banks, was quite right to make the point he did; because, however, he is relatively advanced in years, the Trustees would naturally not expect him to look ahead terms as long as his predecessors'. Steinberg will be 70 when he takes over. Koussevitzky was 50 and stayed 25 years, Munch 58 and stayed 13, Leinsdorf was 50 and will leave at the end of his seventh season.

Like Cabot, his predecessor, Banks believes in the value of having a music director who is on hand and who assumes the responsibility for the bulk of a season. One of the differences between Leinsdorf and the Trustees, leading to Leinsdorf's resignation in November 1967, concerned the amount of time he was to give to the Boston Symphony and his freedom to accept guest engagements elsewhere.

Steinberg expects to continue as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, where he has been since 1952, and where he now has a contract of indefinite duration. Was there not a contradiction here? "No contradiction at all," says Banks firmly. The Trustees understand Steinberg's attachment to the Pittsburgh orchesra, for whose present prestige he is entirely responsible, and did not wish to put him into the position of even having to consider a break there.

For three years then, or more, the Boston Symphony will enter into a sharing arrangement with Pittsburgh whose details are yet to be worked out, because "Steinberg is the man we want, and to get exactly the man we want we will take him on the conditions under which he is available."

The more distant future? What about the prediction by Leinsdorf and others that the music director in the sense of a conductor who leads the largest number of a season's concerts, is a disappearing institution, that younger conductors will not take positions that tie them down so. Banks is cautious about prophesying, but he admits that the determining factor will be the conductors and the direction their profession takes. "If most of the younger generation of conductors is going to consist of itinerant conductors, then the orchestras will just have to learn to go along with that."

Banks took the opportunity to ask his interviewer a question: Was there enough contemporary music performance in Boston? Being told "by no means," he replied: "I don't think so either." He was astonished, though, to have it pointed out that the Boston Symphony's 1968-69 programs include only seven pieces by living composers, all but two of the works being virtually standard repertory fare by Stravinsky, Britten, and Piston.

Banks laughed aloud at the thought of counting "The Rite of Spring" in contemporary music statistics. "I'm very glad we did that Carter Piano Concerto," he reminisced. "I sensed a lot of musical richness in that."

One gets the impression Banks would like to see the Symphony more involved in new music, but he is unlikely to take an activist approach to the problem. During the conversation he had emphasized repeatedly the Trustees' non-intervention in artistic decisions, and he now implied that he would not care to go so far even as to suggest to a music director that he, or the Trustees, would not mind more contemporary music. "That wall between his function and ours is one of our most important principles."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

OCT 2 1968 New England

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

OCT 2 1968 New England

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

MAY 11 1969 New England

ANDREW HEISKELL

Time, Inc., Boss to Speak Here

Urban Coalition Sets 1st Meet

Andrew Heiskell, chairman of the board of directors of Time, Inc. and co-chairman of the national Urban Coalition, will be the guest speaker at a luncheon Thursday at noon in the Zem Zem Mosque.

He will address the nearly 150 members of the board of incorporators of the local Urban Coalition Unit. This will be the initial meeting of the Erie unit.

On the agenda for Thursday's meeting are the approval of the board of directors and officers of the local unit followed by a discussion of the history, organization and purposes of the Urban Coalition, Heiskell's address and the naming of the paid executive Executive Director.

Heiskell has been associated with Time, Inc., since 1937, when he joined Life Magazine. In 1949 he became vice president of the magazine, in 1959 was elected to the board of directors and in 1960 he became chairman of the board.

He is currently chairman of the board of trustees of Urban America, Inc., co-chairman of the Urban Coalition, and serves on the boards of directors of the Council for Latin America, the Atlantic Council and the Center for Inter-American Relations.

He is chairman of the Visiting Committee of the Joint Center for Urban Studies of M.I.T. and Harvard University, and a member of the boards of trustees of the University of Chicago, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Bennington College.

The Urban Coalition is an alliance of individuals and organizations drawn together to assess community problems, establish goals and priorities and coordinate programed efforts.

Coalitions are broadly representative of the leadership and life of the community. Representatives have been selected from business, labor, local government, religion and civ rights organizations.

Erie Morning News
ERIE, PA.

NOV 5 1968

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

JAN 8 1969 New England

Crockett New Opera Head

David C. Crockett of Ipswich was elected President of the Boston Opera Ass'n yesterday to succeed Talcott M. Banks. Banks submitted his resignation in view of his new responsibilities as president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Crockett has been a member of the Association since 1947 and a director since 1959.

Crockett is deputy director of the Mass. General Hospital; trustee of the Walter E. Fernald State School, Waltham; vice-chairman of the Board of Trustees of the New England Conservatory; director of Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Co.; and director of the Boston Co.

John G. Cushman, Treasurer of the Opera Ass'n also submitted his resignation at this time. John C. Hall, a vice-president of the Old Colony Trust Co. succeeds him. Edward Dane, Jr., was elected Assist. Treasurer.

Elected to the Board of Directors were Nelson W. Aldrich who was voted a vice president; Lawrence T. Perera, voted as secretary; and Robert P. Moncreiff. It was announced that the Metropolitan Opera will open at the War Memorial April 21.

VanDerBeek at B.C. for seminars on arts

Stanley VanDer Beek, experimental filmmaker and recently named Fellow of the Center for Advanced Visual Studies at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, is one of five speakers taking part in a seminar on "The Arts and the Community" at Boston College Thursday. VanDer Beek's presentation will be part of an afternoon of three seminars concerned with the arts in education and in the community.

The 39-year-old filmmaker has been honored in Europe and the United States for his innovative films. He was featured last December in an exhibition of computer-produced films at the Museum of Modern Art in New York city. His film, "Man and His World" received second prize at Montreal's Expo '67.

VanDerBeek has served as artist-in-residence at the University of Southern California and at the University of Illinois. He is a regular contributor to film festivals and a much sought after judge for such events.

The first seminar, "The Arts and Education," will begin at 1 p.m., following a buffet luncheon. Mrs. Josephine von Henneberg, chairman of the Department of Fine Arts at Boston College will preside. The speaker will be Charles Seymour Jr., professor of the history of art and curator of Renaissance art at Yale. John R. Watts, chairman of the Massachusetts Council on the Arts, will respond.

The second seminar will be held at 2:30 on "The Creative and Performing Arts on a College Campus." Participants will be Henry Hewes, drama critic for the Saturday Review; Warner Bentley, director of the Hopkins Center at Dartmouth; James Haar, associate professor of music at the University of Pennsylvania; Helen Kritch Chinoy, chairman of the department of theater and speech at Smith College, and William C. Seitz, director of the Rose Art Museum at Brandeis University.

The third seminar will be in the tradition of Boston College seminars on Greater Boston affairs. The title is "The Arts and the Community," with Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as chairman. The speakers will be Pietro Belluschi, dean emeritus of the School of Architecture and Planning at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Richard M. Clurman, vice president of Time, Inc., and chairman of the New York City Center for Music and Drama; John O. Killens, novelist, writer and vice president of the Black Academy of Arts and Letters; Bernard Taper, staff writer for New Yorker Magazine who is doing a special report on the arts in Boston for the Harvard-M.I.T. Joint Center for Urban Studies, and Stanley VanDerBeek, artist-in-residence at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

TALCOTT M. BANKS will be among the participants in a special arts festival set for Thursday at Boston College.

Admission to the day-long seminar is by invitation only, but arrangements can be made for specialists and scholars by telephoning Mrs. von Henneberg at Boston College in Newton.

124.

BSO Appoints Collier To the Board

Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced the appointment of Abram T. Collier to the Board. Collier, 54, is president of New England Mutual Life Insurance Company.

"With new thoughts for the future and new programs always being considered that will enable the orchestra to serve even a wider community than it now does, we are very pleased that Mr. Collier will join us," said Mr. Cabot in announcing the appointment.

"His executive gifts and his history of service to Boston and to his profession speak for themselves. We are happy that he will now lend us his energy and talents at a particularly challenging time in the orchestra's history."

Mr. Collier was born in Billerica, and is a graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Law School. Prior to joining New England Mutual Life, he was vice chairman of the board of John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company. He is also chairman of the board of trustees of Wheaton College, vice president of the Boston Y.M.C.A., a director of New England Telephone and Telegraph Company, an advisory director of New England Merchants National Bank, secretary of the Commercial Club of Boston, and a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

HERALD TRAVELER [M]
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

AUG 7 1968 New England

TRUSTEE—Abram T. Collier, 54, president of New England Mutual Life Insurance Co., has been appointed a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is also chairman of the board of trustees of Wheaton College and vice president of the Boston Y. M. C. A.

Fabian Bachrach Photo

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 416,400

AUG 4 1968 New England

Collier Named BSO trustee

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has named Abram T. Collier to its board of trustees.

Collier, 54, is president of the New England Mutual Life Insurance Co. A native of Billerica, he is a graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Law School, chairman of the Wheaton College board of trustees, and a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

AUG 6 1968 New England

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

AUG 6 1968 New England

Billerica Native Trustee Of Boston Symphony Orchestra

BILLERICA — Abram T. Collier, a native of Billerica, has been named to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Collier, 54, is president of the New England Mutual Life Insurance Co. He is a graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Law School, chairman of the Wheaton College board of trustees and a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350

AUG 7 1968 New England

BSO appointment

Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the appointment of Abram T. Collier to the board. Mr. Collier is the president of the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

AUG 8 1968 New England

Neighborhood News

Abram T. Collier of Cartwright road has just been appointed to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to announcement by Henry B. Cabot, president of the board. Mr. Collier is president of New England Mutual Life Insurance Company.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
W CIRC. 7,850

AUG 8 1968 New England

The conductor who couldn't face the music

by FRANCIS W. Hatch

Charles Munch was a shy man. He detested receptions with their surfeit of adulation and twittering small talk — the informal yet formal gatherings at which a new conductor was supposed to rub shoulders with his audience.

During the 1948 season, shortly after the genial Frenchman had assumed his duties at Symphony Hall, I received a telephone call. George Judd, the extraordinary manager of the Boston Symphony, knowing that I was bound for New York, suggested that I might accompany Munch in his drawing room since he was making the trip on the same day. Trustees are supposed to make themselves useful. I accepted, but pointed out that there could be a language barrier. Munch I knew to be none too fluent in English, and my Harvard French was hit or miss.

Boarding the train at the Back Bay Station, I found the conductor already installed in the seat by the window. After an exchange of pleasantries, I settled down and awaited developments. We sat in silence as the train moved out through Readville and beyond marshy area below Blue Hill. A pair of mallards jumped up from a drainage ditch and wheeled off into an autumn sky. After careful deliberation I suggested that the scene had "resemblance d'une peinture de Corot." Good old Harvard French! Munch's nodding smile assured me that my thought had penetrated.

With a gesture toward the golden - brown landscape he replied, in French, lentement, for my benefit. I recognized "marais" as marsh and "herbe" as grass, and then I had it. He had said that Van Gogh would have been delighted with the yellow grass of the marsh.

With that he picked up a magazine and we resumed our silence and respected it until we were approaching Providence. It was there, during the brief pause at the station, that he told me of his greatest ambition to take his wonderful orchestra to perform in countries where it had never before been heard. The ultimate reality of this dream now stands in the record. He was to become a global conductor who would, on the magic carpet of air-borne travel, delight audiences in Ireland, Great Britain, Scandinavia, the countries of Continental Europe, Russia, Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, Australia and New Zealand. It is doubtful that any future conductor will surpass his musical Odyssey.

He Said Good-bye — To my surprise, as we approached the 125th Street Station he left his seat and took down his coat and hat. Thinking that perhaps he was unfamiliar with New York's railroad plan, I explained that Grand Central was 10 minutes distant. He smiled, thanked me, and when the train came to a halt, said good-bye.

At Grand Central a few minutes later, the mystery was solved. A welcoming committee, obviously with prior knowledge of Munch's car number, stood expectant on the platform. The porter, after explaining that he had left the train at 125th Street, turned to me for corroboration. One of the ladies exclaimed in anguish "Oh dear it is his birthday. We have a cake, testimonials and champagne all set up in a private hotel room."

Here was music that even a great conductor couldn't face! And from a reliable witness I learned that the birthday boy dined alone in a Child's restaurant, demolishing a stack of pancakes.

In June, 1952, by good fortune my wife and I were in London on the day when the B.S.O. was scheduled to perform at Royal Festival Hall. We anticipated a feeling of pride at hearing our great orchestra so far from home. To obtain tickets we reached George Judd on the telephone.

"Don't come early," he warned and told us of a minor disaster. After a concert in France the night before, the lorry which carried the orchestras' instruments had been stymied behind a French bicycle race. So dear is this sport to the French public that it is doubtful that the Pope himself could pass. Certainly not the Boston Symphony! The channel boat was missed. The musical impedimenta had to be flown in the next day.

Two Hours Late — The concert was two hours late, yet the British audience which sat through the long wait was enthusiastic. Afterward we were invited to participate in a London - to - Boston Broadcast over the B.B.C. Well after midnight we returned to the Savoy with Munch, Judd, and Todd Perry, then the assistant manager. Munch always enjoyed a sandwich and a glass of wine after a concert. Service in the cafe had shut down at midnight. Perry went scurrying out to a restaurant returning with a stack of sandwiches in a napkin.

The echo of Charles Munch's music, especially of the French master works he loved and performed with such sensitivity will long be heard when there are silences at Symphony Hall.

During the interim, Munch told of his many visits to London with French orchestras. And for the first time I heard on the difficult acoustics in Royal Albert Hall. It is an old chestnut among musicians.

"Here," said Munch, "the audience gets a bargain. They hear the concert twice; first when it is performed, and a second time from the echo."

TIMES (e) & Times,
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 9,017 Peabody - 2-28-69

MAR 1 1969 New England

Where But New England

THE SOLO THAT REVERBERATED

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
(E) 7,498

JUN 21 1969 New England

Pride in craftmanship is less conspicuous these days. The auto mechanic is apt to treat an expensive car as though it were an opponent to be battered into submission. Cuss words have taken the place of whistling on the job.

I recall Ernest Sugden. He lived in a white house by the road in the pretty little river town of Orland, Maine. He prided himself on being the oldest town clerk in the state, holding the post into his nineties. In his younger days he had been a surveyor and had used his knowledge to accompany Dr. Warren K. Moorehead of the Andover Museum on his archaeological diggings around the state. Ernest, with his transit and plumb, laid out the plan for the dig so that every inch would be covered.

Erne was a confirmed bachelor, living alone, getting his own sketchy meals, doing his own washing and hanging it out in the breeze. He was over six feet tall, a handsome Yankee with a clipped gray moustache. His voice was deep. His speech came in explosive bursts with long pauses in between.

He was married to his work shop, a room off the kitchen where his lathe, tools, filing cases and disemboweled clocks were crowded together in organized clutter. He knew just where to put his hands on file, screwdriver, oil can or magnifying glass to tuck into his eye, even though it was submerged at the bottom of a pile.

Full of Local History — I sat for hours with him, listening and watching as he worked along. His conversation was full of local history.

"See that old timber over in the corner?" he would say. "That came out of the hull of the 'Rocket,' one of the Yankee vessels scuttled down on Morse's cove when the British broke up Saltonstall's fleet in the Revolution. We got some junks of her on the low dreen tide."

In the corner there stood an old cabinet with drawers filled with stone gouges, plummets and axes which he had dug from burial mounds of the "Red Paint Men," the mysterious and primeval inhabitants of Maine. His collection, I am happy to say, is now in the State Museum of Augusta.

"Yes siree bub, she'll work now," he would say, as he assembled the works of a Terry shelf clock on the table. "I had to make a new escapement and one of the gear wheels had two teeth missing. I cut a new one."

Indeed, in his eighties he had made an entire movement for a tall clock, cutting every gear wheel by hand. "She keeps time right to the second," he'd say. I always set my watch by Erne's home-made clock, to please him.

At Boston's Symphony Hall, in Serge Koussevitzky's time, I was reprimanded by another craftsman who took fierce pride in his work. I had attended a meeting of the orchestra's trustees. When it broke up, George Judd, the orchestra's manager, asked whether anyone would care to see how repairs were coming along on the great pipe organ.

A Lost Art — We walked upstairs into the organ loft. Judd explained that it was all but impossible to find craftsmen with necessary skills to do the work these days. "It is getting to be a lost art," he said. Two old-timers had been located, one a white-haired man from Nottinghamshire, England, and the other an elderly Vermonter who had worked for the Esty Organ Company in Brattleboro.

Both men were out of sight in the interior of the organ when we arrived. There were faint, muffled tappings from the dark cavern where they were at work.

On tables in a side room dismantled organ pipes lay in neat rows, graded according to size. The smallest looked like a tiny saxophone. I picked it up and asked Mr. Judd if I might give it a toot. He nodded his head. I blew one tentative note and then another. They were sharp little squeals in the highest register.

Before I had completed the second note of my solo, a white-haired man looking like something out of "Macbeth" came storming out of the organ cavity.

"Put that down, put that down," he shouted. "Don't you know that the dampness of your breath will ruin the reed and spoil the pitch?"

In confusion and apology I replaced the instrument on the table. Here, indeed, was devotion to a craft, fidelty to trust, which had turned a docile old man into a raging watchdog.

A Trustee of the Boston Symphony had been put in his place. I am not apt to make this mistake again.

by FRANCIS W. Hatch

Bono's I-Vue

By LILLIAN BONO

"Boston Symphony's P.R. Man — Marpin Schofer"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a new dynamic P.R. man, Marvin Schofer, a native Midwestern turned Bostonian.

A free-lance writer, he has been associated with NBC Opera, the St. Louis Municipal Orchestra and our own Opera Company of Boston. Marvin has translated a volume of French Madrigals and several operas. He has written popular music and a few musicals including "A Bullet for Billy the Kid" for CBS in 1966.

He is a product of New York University, the University of Virginia and did graduate work at B.U.'s Music Theatre Dept.

During his tenure with the Opera Company of Boston, he was associated with Sarah Caldwell on major projects and seminars sponsored by the Rockefeller Foundation. He produced a series of educational programs, and the opera "Moses and Aaron". As Project Director of "Title One," he worked with school children Worcester. He was also Assistant Manager of the American National Opera Company, working hand in hand with Henry Guettel of New York.

Marvin replaced Sandy Sistare earlier this year and is now a member of the Boston Symphony's permanent staff.

POST GAZETTE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 21,500

DEC 6 1968 New England

126.

THEY CALL THEMSELVES 'THE COUSINS' AND THEY'RE A BRIGHT BUNCH

Fourth Rockefeller Generation Ready to Take Over

NX

By BERNARD GAVZER
AP Newsfeatures Writer

EDITOR'S NOTE — If there is any family dynasty in these democratic United States, it is the Rockefellers. What is it like, for the newest branches on the famous family tree, to be a Rockefeller? Heirs to name and fortune, how does the fourth generation of Rockefellers cope with the inheritance?

The dream of any dynasty is continuity.

In this, the House of Rockefeller is blessed.

Though the reigning third generation is full of vigor and in firm command, the fourth generation is already standing on the threshold, groomed and girded for stewardship of one of the world's great fortunes.

The fourth — the Today Generation — numbers 23, in a direct line from great-grandfather, John D. Rockefeller, the 19th century's principal self-made billionaire. Little known, they are emerging from protective privacy to enter the arena of public affairs. One day their decisions could possibly alter the quality of American life.

THEY ARE CALLED, and call themselves The Cousins.

Assaying them, one is prompted to ask what it means to be a Rockefeller, what are the burdens of the name — and its wealth — what are the ecstacies, when does one first become aware of being a Rockefeller?

"I think my first awareness of being a Rockefeller is associated with going to school in our Cadillac," says Dr. Lucy Rockefeller Hamlin, daughter of Laurance Rockefeller, renowed conservationist. "I used to slide down onto the floor when we got near Brearley and stay hidden until the chauffeur gave me the signal, and then I got out. I was very self-conscious about being a Rockefeller."

"I don't think there was a sudden moment of realization in which I discovered I was a Rockefeller and that that was different," says David Rockefeller, 28, eldest son of David Rockefeller, chairman of the Board of Chase Manhattan Bank, America's second largest.

"MY PARENTS told me, 'You're likely to get more attention than others, and teased, too.' I think they exaggerated the extent to which this would be a bother."

There are thase among The Cousins who came from childhood overwhelmed by their name. One heiress legally changed hers. Several turned toward a dowdiness, as though this surface appearance of ordinariness could somehow dull the luster. One sought to give away her fortune.

"I never studied American history," says Lucy, "because I didn't want to sit in a class and risk hearing my great-grandfather described as a robber baron."

ALL THE FOURTH ...

modest description can only be likened to a backyard Madison Square Garden.

It was a million-dollar recreation center — built at Pocantico by John Davison Rockefeller Jr. for his sons, John D. 3rd, Nelson, Laurance, Winthrop and David, and daughter, Abby — in which there were many delights, including a full-sized bowling alley, squash court, tennis court and swimming pool.

IN THE OTHER houses in which they also lived or visited — Fifth Ave. or Beekman Pl. in Manhattan, a ranch in Venezuela, a mansion in Hawaii — these bright, intelligent and curious people were not oblivious to the obvious: They had luxury. That was the style of a Rockefeller.

In many ways, in growing up as a Rockefeller, I lived with a tag, just as a Jew or a Negro," says Hope Aldrich Rockefeller Spencer, daughter of John 3rd. "I sensed what it was liked to be discriminated against and have people ignore or accept you as part of a class or group rather than as an individual. I'm not suggesting by any means that I was discriminated against in the same way, but I think this is why I have an empathy for certain kinds of people."

THAT THE NAME could be a burden as well as a blessing was obviously in the mind of John D. 3rd in deciding upon the name for his only son. It was settled that it would be John. Not John D. IV. Everyone calls him Jay. Now, at 31, he is secretary of state of West Virginia.

"It was left to me to determine whether I wanted to be John D. Rockefeller IV" says Jay. "When I turned 21, I decided that I did.

"I have tremendous respect for the name and what it has stood for: concern, responsibility, considered judgment. I am proud of the family. My uncle Laurance contributed in the field of conservation. My uncle David is a progressive, creative banker. My uncle Nelson is governor of New York, and my uncle Winthrop is governor of Arkansas. My father made significant contributions in the area of population control, long before others.

"I am proud of a family that takes seriously the question of the quality of American life."

THERE IS a compelling need among these cousins to be recognized and respected on merit, as individuals. Independence and individualism are hallmarks of the generation. And so they are a diversified lot.

These cousins are bound by name, cemented by money, joined in common goal. There is the familial cousin, and The Cousin, which is a separate sort of entity that metamorphizes at age 21.

At that age, a Rockefeller enters the society of cousins which meets formally to discuss mutual interests, such an philanthropies and investments, politics and philosophy, as well as part and theater and sports and child rearing. There are 16 adults cousins, plus 11 spouses.

NOT YET OF age for such meetings are Alida, youngest daughter of John D. 3rd, Nelson Jr., 4, and Mark, 2, children of Nelson and his second wife; Winthrop Paul, son of Winthrop and his first wife, Bob Sears Rockefeller; and Margaret, Richard and Eileen, the three youngest of David Rockefeller's six children.

Shake that Rockefeller Cousin tree, give it a good whack, and there's an impressive harvest. It has to be whacked because some cousins are publicity-shy, still cautious about leaving the cocoons of privacy.

There is Rodman, soon to be 37, Nelson's eldest son, an economist, Phi Beta Kappa. Hope Spencer can converse in Swahili and her brother, Jay, speaks Japanese. He can also talk with some expertise about the abilities of a Joe Namath. David Rockefeller knows his Bach and is fine enough a sailor to have crewed on the Intrepid, winner of the America Cup.

THERE IS ABBY Milton O'Neill, daughter of Abby Mauze, John D. Jr.'s only daughter, whose passion for restoration of colonial Williamsburg has made her far ing or useful service is the common duty of mankind."

JAY ROCKEFELLER is the one cousin most likely to strike a spark of recognition among the people. Six-feet-six, with moderately long sideburns and horn-rimmed glasses, he is not an easily forgettable man. A child standing close to him on a Charleston, W. Va., street, asked her mother,

DR. LUCY HAMLIN DAUGHTER OF LAURANCE

Norwegian girl, in 1959. She was in the Rockefeller home, as an au pair, working there while she learned English and American customs. This is typical of the daughters of many European middle class families. But Anne-Marie was described as a Rockefeller maid and the romance as a sign the Rockefellers were just folks, after all.

ROCKEFELLERS ARE you learn you have all this money, and you buy what you need, and then you know that you have to do something with it."

WHAT TO DO occupies a considerable amount of energy and time on the part of the cousins and a corps of outsiders who are part of the army of experts — investment counsellors, accountants, public relations staffs, etc. — available to these Rockefellers.

The Rockefellers thus extend their own substantial intelligence and expertise by having access to intelligent people who can produce relevant information.

The formal Cousins' meeting — which occurs at least twice a year and is held in New York City or at the family estate at Pocantico Hills — is the battleground upon which ideas, plans and strategies are tested.

"Disagreement among us was greatest over the Vietnam war issue," says Steven. During his father's campaign for the presidential nomination, Steven pressed to have him take a strong, outspoken stand against the war.

"NO ONE, BY AGE or volume of voice, is dominant among us," says cousin David, who is an arts adminis-

DAVID ROCKEFELLER JR. GETS $6400 A YEAR
Works with Boston Symphony Orchestra even though I've inherited wealth," says Jay. "It is nonsense to argue that because should live then there also must be a model of how a man should die.

TODAY GENERATION — At top are Mrs. William Strawbridge (Mary, younger daughter of New York's Gov. Nelson Rockefeller), who makes a specialty of primitive art; with her is her husband, president of the Urban League in Westchester. Below, left, are Ann Pierson, her elder sister, and her sister-in-law, Anne-Marie (Mrs. Steven Rockefeller).

INDIVIDUAL ROCKEFELLERS — Mrs. Hope Aldrich Rockefeller Spencer, left, always wary about the effect of the Rockefeller name, did not allow it to appear on the front of her book, "The Way to Rehema's House, an East African Diary." At right is John D. Rockefeller IV ("Jay"), Democratic secretary of state of West Virginia, with his wife Sharon, daughter of Illinois Republican Sen. Charles Percy. (AP Photos and Illustration)

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357
MAR 2 1969
Sykes
SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 51,700
MAR 2 1969
Spring Field Repub. 3-2-'69
Albany Times Union 3-2-'69

126

NX

THEY CALL THEMSELVES 'THE COUSINS' AND THEY'RE A BRIGHT BUNCH

Fourth Rockefeller Generation Ready to Take Over

By BERNARD GAVZER
AP Newsfeatures Writer

EDITOR'S NOTE — If there is any family dynasty in these democratic United States, it is the Rockefellers. What is it like, for the newest branches on the famous family tree, to be a Rockefeller? Heirs to name and fortune, how does the fourth generation of Rockefellers cope with the inheritance?

The dream of any dynasty is continuity.

In this, the House of Rockefeller is blessed.

Though the reigning third generation is full of vigor and in firm command, the fourth generation is already standing on the threshold, groomed and girded for stewardship of one of the world's great fortunes.

The fourth — the Today Generation — numbers 23, in a direct line from great-grandfather, John D. Rockefeller, the 19th century's principal self-made billionaire. Little known, they are emerging from protective privacy to enter the arena of public affairs. One day their decisions could possibly alter the quality of American life.

THEY ARE CALLED, and call themselves The Cousins.

Assaying them, one is prompted to ask what it means to be a Rockefeller, what are the burdens of the name — and its wealth — what are the ecstacies, when does one first become aware that his Rockefeller generation Rockefeller children, at some point in their lives, recognized once they got beyond the confines of the family estate at Pocantico Hills, N.Y., where nearly all spent most, or at least a part, of their childhood, that there was something different about their lives.

How many other children were there in the world, let alone among their peers, who had access on a rainy afternoon to a diversion such as the Playhouse, which by modest description can only be likened to a backyard Madison Square Garden.

It was a million-dollar recreation center — built at Pocantico by John Davison Rockefeller Jr. for his sons, John D. 3rd, Nelson, Laurance, Winthrop and David, and daughter, Abby — in which there were many delights, including a full-sized bowling alley, squash court, tennis court and swimming pool.

IN THE OTHER houses in which they also lived or visited — Fifth Ave. or Beekman Pl. in Manhattan, a ranch in Venezuela, a mansion in Hawaii — these bright, intelligent and curious people were not oblivious to the obvious: They had luxury. That was the style of a Rockefeller.

LARRY ROCKEFELLER
Harlem Vista Worker

TODAY GENERATION — At top are Mrs. William Strawbridge (Mary, younger daughter of New York's Gov. Nelson Rockefeller), who makes a specialty of primitive art; with her is her husband, president of the Urban League in Westchester. Below, left, are Ann Pierson, her elder sister, and her sister-in-law, Anne-Marie (Mrs. Steven Rockefeller).

governor of New York, and my uncle Winthrop is governor of Arkansas. My father made significant contributions in the area of population control, long before others.

"I am proud of a family that takes seriously the question of the quality of American life."

THERE IS a compelling need among these cousins to be recognized and respected on merit, as individuals. Independence and individualism are hallmarks of the generation. And so they are a diversified lot.

These cousins are bound by name, cemented by money, joined in common goal. There is the familial cousin, and The Cousin, which is a separate sort of entity that metamorphizes at more than a mere buff on that period of Americana. Her sisters, Marilyn, is married to Prof. William Simpson of Yale, an Egyptologist.

There is Sandra, another daughter of John D. 3rd, who is a gifted artist, as is her cousin, Marion Weber, a sculptor and painter, who is a daughter of Laurance. Steven, 32, a son of Nelson, graduated cum laude from Union Theological Seminary and is seeking his dectorate.

His sister, Mary Strawbridge is an expert on primitive art and is often at work at the Museum of Primitive Art in New York. Her husband, William, is president of the Urban League in Westchester.

COUSIN LAURA (Mrs. James H. Case), a daughter of Laurance, has a doctorate from Harvard in political science and is especially interested in the psychological aspects of politics. She was magna cum laude in the history of art, Bryn Mawr. Her brother, Larry, works and lives in Harlem as a Vista worker. He is also a pilot.

Two of David Rockefeller's daughters are busy in the Boston area. One is Abby, a gifted musician and an activist in the anti-draft movement, and the other is Neva Kaiser, magna cum laude at Radliffe and currently writing a preface to a book of poetry by Conrad Aiken.

Much of this individualism stems from the fourth generation's interpretation of the credo of John D. Jr. Said he:

"I believe that the rendering of useful service is the common duty of mankind."

JAY ROCKEFELLER is the one cousin most likely to strike a spark of recognition among the people. Six-feet-six, with moderately long sideburns and horn-rimmed glasses, he is not an easily forgettable man. A child standing close to him on a Charleston, W. Va., street, asked her mother,

She Serves as Intern in Harlem Hospital

"Mommy, where does he end?"

A friend of the Kennedys, especially the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, Jay campaigned for office as a Democrat. First he was elected to the West Virginia House of Delegates, and last November, he was elected secretary of state.

There are those who dearly believe he will affirmatively fulfill the headline of a Wall Street Journal story: "Will a Rockefeller be president in 1976?"

WHITE HOUSE talk irritates Jay. So does the innuendo that he went to West Virginia to launch a political career. He came to the state in 1965 as a community worker with Action for Appalachian Youth-Community Development.

"I came here because at the age of 25 I realized I had spent a great deal of time in Europe and Japan but never had a quiet, concentrated experience in America. That didn't seem normal for a guy at 25. I wanted to be involved in something meaningful, at a grass roots level.

"I thought first of working with Mexican-Americans and then learned of the plight of West Virginians. I felt this was a state that was being ignored," he says.

A second Rockefeller cousin, Steven, was headline material when he married Anne-Marie Rasmussen, a Norwegian girl, in 1959. She was in the Rockefeller home, as an au pair, working there while she learned English and American customs. This is typical of the daughters of many European middle class families. But Anne-Marie was described as a Rockefeller maid and the romance as a sign the Rockefellers were just folks, after all.

ROCKEFELLERS ARE taught things about money at an early age.

"We are given small allowances," recalls Jay. "I remember having an allowance of 15 cents a week. We had to budget it. Five cents for spending, five cents for saving and five cents for giving."

No cents for lending, according to some other cousins.

"It is not good to lend money to friends," says one. "You do, and they almost automatically think that because you are a Rockefeller there is no need to pay it back. That makes you wonder what sort of friend you have. So, our rule was don't lend it to a friend."

IF CONSUMPTION were a passion, the Rockefellers could consume to a fair thee well. But some of the Rockefeller women, who could easily afford the style output of the world's haute couture, dress as though they'd selected their entire wardrobe during a busy lunch hour in a bargain basement. Nor are the men trend-setters, either.

"Consumption no longer has any meaning," says Rodman Rockefeller, who is the principal businessman among The Cousins. He is president of the family's International Basic Economy Corp., which is no less than a private foreign aid program.

"After the first million, you learn you have all this money, and you buy what you need, and then you know that you have to do something with it."

WHAT TO DO occupies a considerable amount of energy and time on the part of the cousins and a corps of outsiders who are part of the army of experts — investment counsellors, accountants, public relations staffs, trator with the Boston Symphony. "Jay hasn't turned us into Democrats; Steven hasn't made us theologians."

MONEY EARNED on someone's payroll is held with special regard. It's not the same as money from investments and trusts.

"I find it difficult to explain the feeling or meaning," says Dr. Lucy Hamlin, who is a intern at Harlem Hospital in Manhattan, and receives the intern's typical pittance, "but this is money I work very hard for."

Inherited wealth, by some myth, supposedly taints those who have it, making them wastrels or playboys or non-men. But in some way it has driven the Rockefeller men to be different sort of models.

"I think people trust me one inherits wealth he is precluded from knowing about or understanding problems."

SAYS LUCY HAMLIN, who plans to specialize in psychotherapy:

"In our society, one of the dominant forces is the need to make money. That is absent from us. We have more money than we can ever use. Therefore, it is necessary to replace that drive by achievement in other ways, or by creativity and imagination in the way we use our money for positive social good. I think my men cousins have worked very hard to do this and have found other forces—such as serving the society."

If that has been the Rockefeller model of how a man

AND THAT summons the memory of Michael Rockefeller, son of Nelson Rockefeller, and twin of Mary Rockefeller Strawbridge.

"He really understood people," the governor told a New York Times writer one day. "He was one of those intuitive people. There are a lot of sensitive people in this world, but so many of them are overwhelmed by their own sensitivity. He was observant and selfless."

An aspiring anthropologist, Michael was on an expedition to Dutch New Guinea in 1961. He and a companion were adrift in a disabled craft, and when it was 11 miles from shore in a storm, Michael set out to swim for help.

He was never seen again.

INDIVIDUAL ROCKEFELLERS — Mrs. Hope Aldrich Rockefeller Spencer, left, always wary about the effect of the Rockefeller name, did not allow it to appear on the front of her book, "The Way to Rehema's House, an East African Diary." At right is John D. Rockefeller IV ("Jay"), Democratic secretary of state of West Virginia, with his wife Sharon, daughter of Illinois Republican Sen. Charles Percy. (AP Photos and Illustration)

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357
MAR 2 1969

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 55,700
MAR 2 1969

Springfield Repub. 3-2-'69

Albany Times Union 3-2-'69

Celebrity Cookbook

The Voice Of Ch. 2 Turns Cook

(Sunday Herald Traveler photo by Calvin Campbell)

Bill Pierce serves his delectable layered salad at home in Hingham. In the foreground is his fabulous lobster casserole with tomalley topping.

By JANET CHRISTENSEN

ENVY THE dinner guest when congenial host Bill Pierce does the cooking. And especially if his lobster casserole is on the menu.

His culinary talents are strictly top-drawer, but Bill is more widely known for his broadcasting talents. For more than 16 years, his pleasing voice has been an asset to WGBH-FM and Channel 2, where he is chief announcer. To a music lover, Bill is familiar as "the voice of the Boston Symphony."

A staff member since the early days of Boston's educational station, Bill is devoted to its cause. "It's almost more of a faith than a job," he confided. "You really have to believe in it. We bring a lot of things to people that they might not enjoy otherwise. It's also our moral duty to show all sides of subjects."

While WGBH broadcasts enrich the lives of countless adults, one of the station's raisons d'être is working with children in schools, Bill pointed out.

"Most of our income comes from public donations," said Bill, "although we do receive grants from private corporations. The Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council, which gives us both advice and some funds." The Council is made up of member colleges, universities and cultural institutions. Some 170 people, including volunteers, staff the station.

Bill first joined WGBH hoping he would announce the Symphony. "All my life I've been interested in music," he reminisced, "first as an Episcopal choir boy soprano. My first job after Bowdoin was teaching music and directing the choir at Westminster School in Connecticut."

He was program director at radio station WBET in Brockton when he started working evenings at WGBH. Then, after leaving WBET, he began teaching broadcasting mornings at Emerson College. In recent years, he has spent his mornings helping dyslexic children with their reading after training at Massachusetts General Hospital under Dr. Edwin Cole.

From time to time Bill does newscasts and promos for Channel 2. He has also narrated films on Williamsburg and Plymouth.

Bill's life away from work is centered about his charming home in Hingham, which was built about 1750. It is tastefully decorated, yet warm and cozy and he enjoys having visitors.

"I have company several times a month. It's my own fault; I invite them," he said with a laugh. "Having people in for cocktails and dinner is my form of recreation. I have as many as fourteen guests for a buffet, but for a sit-down dinner, I like to have eight.

"I make no pretensions about being a fancy cook, but I do my own cooking," said Bill, who is a bachelor. "I learned out of self defense, because I love to eat. My three sisters have helped," he added. "They're all magnificent cooks.

"I like to work with meats and wine. The first time I'll make something according to the recipe, and then I change it to fit my purposes. One of my favorite brunches is Bloody Marys, fish cakes, baked beans, bacon, and a variety of rolls and relishes.

"A good beef stew is another of my favorite meals. I cook the meat the day before, then reheat it, and cook the vegetables—carrots, potatoes, turnips and pearl onions. I like things like lobster stew, clam chowder and James Beard's clam hash. I also like Pennsylvania Dutch cooking, but it's very fattening," he added.

"One of my favorite desserts is brandied peaches with champagne. Then I make a dessert with white seedless grapes, and chopped-up preserved candied ginger folded into a little soured cream. Just chill it and serve.

"I like fruit and cheese, too, then when I go out I can appreciate fancy desserts. But once in a while, I go all out and make cheese pie, with a graham cracker crust, and glazed fruit on top."

A good New Englander, born in New Bedford, Bill often serves seafood in a fabulous casserole dish. When he uses lobster, he often tops the casserole with a delectable mixture of the lobster tomalley, crumbs, sherry and melted butter.

He also makes a dip by combining lobster tomalley with mayonnaise, salt and pepper.

Here are two Bill Pierce specialties:

LOBSTER CASSEROLE

(Also can be made with crab meat, scallops or both)

- 4 tablespoons butter
- 4 tablespoons flour
- 2 cups whole milk (with part cream or use all light cream)
- 1 teaspoon salt
- ⅛ teaspoon pepper
- ½ teaspoon celery salt
- Dash cayenne pepper
- 2 tablespoons sherry
- 1 teaspoon or more minced onion
- 1 teaspoon or more minced parsley
- 1 egg yolk
- 1 (6 oz.) can sliced mushrooms, drained
- 4 cups cooked lobster meat (or use crab meat, bay scallops sautéed in butter, or mixture)
- Bread crumbs, grated Parmesan cheese and butter; OR tomalley topping

Melt butter in saucepan or large skillet; blend in flour and cook for a minute or so over low heat. Add milk, stirring constantly, and cook until smooth and thickened. Add seasonings, sherry, onion and parsley; stir well. Remove from heat and add egg yolk, stirring briskly. Add mushrooms and lobster meat or other seafood.

Put in large buttered casserole dish. Sprinkle top with crumbs and grated cheese, dot with butter—OR top with a mixture of lobster tomalley, bread crumbs, sherry and melted butter.

Bake casserole uncovered 20 to 25 minutes at 400 degrees until it bubbles. (Less time is required for individual casseroles.) Makes 4 to 6 servings.

NOTE: Bill cooks 4 lb. lobsters for this recipe. It can be stretched with 1 cup of soft bread crumbs and a can of crab meat.

LAYERED SALAD

- Lettuce, broken in pieces
- Frozen peas, thawed and uncooked
- Shredded carrot
- Green seedless grapes, or drained pineapple chunks
- Bermuda onion rings
- Blobs of mayonnaise, sprinkled with sugar

Layer ingredients as listed in large salad bowl, then start layers all over again until desired amount of salad is made.

Before serving, top with toasted croutons and grated Parmesan cheese. Do not toss—salad is best served as is.

NOTE: The salad can be made without mayonnaise and sugar; just before topping with croutons and cheese, pour a sweet creamy dressing over it.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

SEP 8 1968 New England

128

Third in a new series of short biographical sketches of our regular staff and contributing editors, the "men behind the magazine" —who they are and how they got that way. In this issue, critic of music and Boston Red Sox fan

MARTIN BOOKSPAN

PHOTO: PYRAMID STUDIOS

"THE CONSTRUCTIVE commentator on music should constantly strive to establish a personal relationship between the listening public and the great musical literature." So Martin Bookspan said recently, and the best evidence that he means what he says is that his Basic Repertoire series, initiated with the November 1958 issue of this magazine, has now passed the one-hundred mark. Throughout the decade of its existence, this popular column has, in Bookspan's hands, awakened—or reawakened—the interest of countless readers in the staple works of the Western heritage of concert music. Now his advice is about to reach even further, for in November Doubleday will publish a book—101 Masterpieces of Music and Their Composers—based on the Basic Repertoire.

For practically all of his professional life, Bookspan has been spreading the gospel of great music. After graduating from Harvard College, he became music director for Boston's pioneer good music radio station, WBMS, and during the next decade he held executive positions at several other Boston stations. For a brief time he was also in the record business. In 1956 he began a stint of a dozen years with Radio Station WQXR in New York, first as director of recorded music, then successively as music director, program director, and program consultant. In the mid-Fifties he also became program commentator for the radio broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ("my first love"), an association that ended last year after eleven seasons. He has been a tape critic and columnist for the New York Times, and for three and a half years was a consultant to the Rockefeller Foundation's arts program. Since 1965 he has been music and dance critic for Channel 7 News, WABC-TV, in New York City, and on April 1 of this year he joined ASCAP (American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers), the country's oldest and largest performing-rights licensing agency, as Coordinator of Concert and Symphonic Activities. He is a member of the music advisory panel of the United States Information Agency, and vice-president of the National Association of American Composers and Conductors. He commutes daily from his home in Eastchester, New York, where he lives with his wife and three children.

Bookspan's musical interests became evident early. "Both of my parents are innately musical," he says, "but untrained. As I remember, there was always a lot of singing around the house. But it was I who decided that I would take violin lessons. I was at home sick one day, when I was in kindergarten or the first grade—I don't remember which. It was during the Depression, and a door-to-door salesman came to our house peddling, of all things, music lessons. I listened to his spiel and started tugging at my mother's skirt, saying, 'Yeah, yeah, I want to take music lessons.'" Later Bookspan studied at the Boston Music School. But one day, when he was about fifteen—"in the middle of playing the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto"—he realized he would never be able to play it as well as he wanted to, so he abandoned the idea of a musical career.

Reflecting on the experience of his youth, he says, "Maybe my need to communicate about music stems from the frustrated music-maker in me. And I've had some unpredictable experiences along the way. My first radio affiliation, WBMS, was modeled on WQXR, but it was fighting a losing battle against sponsor and listener apathy. Overnight it suddenly flip-flopped and became a Top-40 station, and I became a pop-music D.J. for a while. I was dismayed at first, but I made some discoveries and I passed them on to my listeners. I was impressed by the then unknown recordings of a pianist named Barbara Carroll. I played them all the time. I also developed a mad passion for certain jazz pianists—Billy Taylor and Art Tatum among them. And I have always been a hot-and-heavy Dixieland man. Often after a Koussevitzky concert at Symphony Hall in Boston, I would wind up at a small club called the Hi-Hat down the street, listening to Bob Wilbur, a marvelous Dixieland sax player. I like the Modern Jazz Quartet, and some—only some—of what I hear from Brubeck and a few others. Ornette Coleman leaves me cold. In fact, much of the jazz of 'today' is meaningless to me."

He feels the same way about a good part of the serious music of today's avant-garde. "As a consultant to the Rockefeller Foundation, I traveled around the country listening to all sorts of new music. Much of it struck me as nothing but perverse nihilism. The avant-garde of a generation ago was looking for something. The avant-garde of today is turning away from something. There's a big difference." Still, he says, he is optimistic. "I can't help feeling that somehow things will right themselves. After all the negativism, there is going to be a return to something positive. Otherwise," he concludes with a smile, "we're all lost."

WHAT recorded repertoire, I wondered, would the man who has so long been advising others on a basic repertoire find basic to his personal contentment? Bach's B Minor Mass was the first piece that sprang to his mind. "Then the Beethoven C Minor String Quartet, Op. 18, No. 4, which is a microcosm of all that is in Beethoven's writing for strings. It doesn't have the emotional content of, say, the C-sharp Minor, but it has another quality that is so much a part of Beethoven: spontaneous good humor. Next, the Oboe Quartet of Mozart, which encapsulates his genius—a perfect little piece of its kind. And the Bloch Violin Concerto. A heaven-storming work—an unjustly neglected masterpiece.

"I think I would also have to have Brahms' Horn Trio. It has very personal associations for me. I got to know it through the old Brain-Busch-Serkin recording, and it made an indelible impression. Then Schubert's C Major Quintet, which I consider one of the most sublime works ever written. Mahler's Fourth—a gentle pastoral work quite different from what one usually associates with the name Mahler. And I wouldn't want to be without Der Rosenkavalier."

Mentally surveying his choices, he added, "I don't know what my selections make me out to be. With the exception of the Bloch, they're all rather serene. I guess I just like life's gentler pleasures."

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

SEP 1968

The Humphrey Era --

By McLAREN HARRIS
HT Music Editor

One of these summer days Robert Laning Humphrey will walk out of Symphony Hall and an era in public relations will go with him.

The Humphrey Era, spanning the last 40 years since the opening of the Esplanade Concerts July 4, 1929, has been marked by a human-interest approach, an eye and ear for developing news, a feature writer's flair with the written word and the imagination to make things happen during what would otherwise be just another day, another news conference, another concert.

During his Symphony Hall years one only infrequently saw Laning Humphrey's name in print, but nearly everyone knew or knows him, and regardless what the field of concentration, virtually every Boston newsman has had occasion to appreciate his efforts and assistance.

ARTHUR FIEDLER, the Boston Pops and Humphrey (at Fiedler's request) all came to the Charles River Esplanade at the same time; five years later (1934) began Humphrey's relationship with the Pops in Symphony Hall. Since then the three have all grown together, and the two men now both qualify as septuagenarians.

Certainly the Pops owes a large share of its greatness to Fiedler's showmanship, his knack for innovation, for the unusual and appealing in entertainment and his ability to improvise; but Humphrey has contributed much to the Pops' bright public image, the smoothness of its operation and the colorful variety of its program books.

He remembered that unnerving first Esplanade concert. "The music blew off stands, some of the audience chased it around, returning sheets to various musicians—usually the wrong ones. Percussion and piccolo were the most prominent instruments and we received a devastating echo from buildings opposite the shell," he recalled. So as Fiedler's emissary, he went to MIT for acoustical assistance which resulted in a new seating arrangement for the orchestra.

"THE RESULTS of my efforts were encouraging," said Humphrey. "Fiedler said to me, 'I'm glad to hear it sounds good, but conducting this new arrangement is like writing my name in a mirror!'"

"I'm primarily not a publicity man but a newsman," says Humphrey, and he possesses good credentials. For 15 years, 1920-1935, he was a contributing feature writer for the Boston Post covering aviation, medicine, art, music and theater (he interviewed Serge Koussevitzky—in French—the morning after the latter's arrival in Boston). In 1936 he doubled (with his Pops duties) as night wire editor for the United Press and remembers receiving the story of Hitler's march into the Rhineland.

Based in a third-floor Symphony Hall office crowded with history (its surface is chaotic

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,205 (S) 298,557

JUL 6 1969

1929 to 1969

but Humphrey knows it like a well-ordered file drawer), he has helped sagging sales for a Jascha Heifetz recital by encouraging the violinist to take part in a Harvard professor's experiment in electronic analyses of old violins; written 30 years of snappy, interesting notes for Pops programs which one often hears quoted among Pops audiences; publicized the Youth Concerts and conducted children's tours of the hall's Ancient Instrument Room; developed some early photographs of the Boston Symphony in his family bathtub; and once used a little shoehorning to get the Boston Symphony Orchestra into Russia.

"AFTER THE ORCHESTRA'S 1956 European trip was announced," he recalled, "a Herald city editor pointed out there was no mention of going to Russia, and I could see he thought the orchestra was afraid to go. I told him that was all I knew, but if he wanted to tangle with president Henry B. Cabot he was welcome.

"The next day the Herald came out with a page one story quoting Cabot as saying the orchestra had no objection to going to Russia; they hadn't been invited. So I took the clipping to the Christian Science Monitor, which had a Moscow correspondent apparently in good standing and suggested he might bring it to the proper Russian authorities. Soon after that the orchestra received its invitation and eventually went to Russia."

Another time he bestowed a pictorial layout of the Boston Symphony's tour of Ireland on the last Sunday edition of the Boston Post: and in latter years for Arthur Fiedler's springtime debuts he has arranged, among other things, an antique car parade (rained out) and an unforgettable swan boat ride in the Public Garden for newsmen, with Fiedler providing the swan power.

"I'm interested in people, people, people," says Laning Humphrey, "whether they're orchestra players, conductors, newspapermen, children or anyone. Always people."

A man with more talent for serving people probably doesn't exist.

128

Third in a new series of short biographical sketches of our regular staff and contributing editors, the "men behind the magazine" —who they are and how they got that way. In this issue, critic of music and Boston Red Sox fan

MARTIN BOOKSPAN

BORIS PATKOWSKY PHOTO

"THE CONSTRUCTIVE commentator on music should constantly strive to establish a personal relationship between the listening public and the great musical literature." So Martin Bookspan said recently, and the best evidence that he means what he says is that his Basic Repertoire series, initiated with the November 1958 issue of this magazine, has now passed the one-hundred mark. Throughout the decade of its existence, this popular column has, in Bookspan's hands, awakened—or reawakened—the interest of countless readers in the staple works of the Western heritage of concert music. Now his advice is about to reach even further, for in November Doubleday will publish a book—101 Masterpieces of Music and Their Composers—based on the Basic Repertoire.

For practically all of his professional life, Bookspan has been spreading the gospel of great music. After graduating from Harvard College, he became music director for Boston's pioneer good music radio station, WBMS, and during the next decade he held executive positions at several other Boston stations. For a brief time he was also in the record business. In 1956 he began a stint of a dozen years with Radio Station WQXR in New York, first as director of recorded music, then successively as music director, program director, and program consultant. In the mid-Fifties he also became program commentator for the radio broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ("my first love"), an association that ended last year after eleven seasons. He has been a tape critic and columnist for the New York Times, and for three and a half years was a consultant to the Rockefeller Foundation's arts program. Since 1965 he has been music and dance critic for Channel 7 News, WABC-TV, in New York City, and on April 1 of this year he joined ASCAP (American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers), the country's oldest and largest performing-rights licensing agency, as Coordinator of Concert and Symphonic Activities. He is a member of the music advisory panel of the United States Information Agency, and vice-president of the National Association of American Composers and Conductors. He commutes daily from his home in Eastchester, New York, where he lives with his wife and three children.

Bookspan's musical interests became evident early. "Both of my parents are innately musical," he says, "but untrained. As I remember, there was always a lot of singing around the house. But it was I who decided that I would take violin lessons. I was at home sick one day, when I was in kindergarten or the first grade—I don't remember which. It was during the Depression, and a door-to-door salesman came to our house peddling, of all things, music lessons. I listened to his spiel and started tugging at my mother's skirt, saying, 'Yeah, yeah, I want to take music lessons.'" Later Bookspan studied at the Boston Music School. But one day, when he was about fifteen—"in the middle of playing the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto"—he realized he would never be able to play it as well as he wanted to, so he abandoned the idea of a musical career.

Reflecting on the experience of his youth, he says, "Maybe my need to communicate about music stems from the frustrated music-maker in me. And I've had some unpredictable experiences along the way. My first radio affiliation, WBMS, was modeled on WQXR, but it was fighting a losing battle against sponsor and listener apathy. Overnight it suddenly flip-flopped and became a Top-40 station, and I became a pop-music D.J. for a while. I was dismayed at first, but I made some discoveries and I passed them on to my listeners. I was impressed by the then unknown recordings of a pianist named Barbara Carroll. I played them all the time. I also developed a mad passion for certain jazz pianists—Billy Taylor and Art Tatum among them. And I have always been a hot-and-heavy Dixieland man. Often after a Koussevitzky concert at Symphony Hall in Boston, I would wind up at a small club called the Hi-Hat down the street, listening to Bob Wilbur, a marvelous Dixieland sax player. I like the Modern Jazz Quartet, and some—only some—of what I hear from Brubeck and a few others. Ornette Coleman leaves me cold. In fact, much of the jazz of 'today' is meaningless to me."

He feels the same way about a good part of the serious music of today's avant-garde. "As a consultant to the Rockefeller Foundation, I traveled around the country listening to all sorts of new music. Much of it struck me as nothing but perverse nihilism. The avant-garde of a generation ago was looking for something. The avant-garde of today is turning away from something. There's a big difference." Still, he says, he is optimistic. "I can't help feeling that somehow things will right themselves. After all the negativism, there is going to be a return to something positive. Otherwise," he concludes with a smile, "we're all lost."

WHAT recorded repertoire, I wondered, would the man who has so long been advising others on a basic repertoire find basic to his personal contentment? Bach's B Minor Mass was the first piece that sprang to his mind. "Then the Beethoven C Minor String Quartet, Op. 18, No. 4, which is a microcosm of all that is in Beethoven's writing for strings. It doesn't have the emotional content of, say, the C-sharp Minor, but it has another quality that is so much a part of Beethoven: spontaneous good humor. Next, the Oboe Quartet of Mozart, which encapsulates his genius—a perfect little piece of its kind. And the Bloch Violin Concerto. A heaven-storming work—an unjustly neglected masterpiece.

"I think I would also have to have Brahms' Horn Trio. It has very personal associations for me. I got to know it through the old Brain-Busch-Serkin recording, and it made an indelible impression. Then Schubert's C Major Quintet, which I consider one of the most sublime works ever written. Mahler's Fourth—a gentle pastoral work quite different from what one usually associates with the name Mahler. And I wouldn't want to be without Der Rosenkavalier."

Mentally surveying his choices, he added, "I don't know what my selections make me out to be. With the exception of the Bloch, they're all rather serene. I guess I just like life's gentler pleasures."

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

SEP 1968

The Humphrey Era --

By McLAREN HARRIS
HT Music Editor

One of these summer days Robert Laning Humphrey will walk out of Symphony Hall and an era in public relations will go with him.

The Humphrey Era, spanning the last 40 years since the opening of the Esplanade Concerts July 4, 1929, has been marked by a human-interest approach, an eye and ear for developing news, a feature writer's flair with the written word and the imagination to make things happen during what would otherwise be just another day, another news conference, another concert.

During his Symphony Hall years one only infrequently saw Laning Humphrey's name in print, but nearly everyone knew or knows him, and regardless what the field of concentration, virtually every Boston newsman has had occasion to appreciate his efforts and assistance.

ARTHUR FIEDLER, the Boston Pops and Humphrey (at Fiedler's request) all came to the Charles River Esplanade at the same time; five years later (1934) began Humphrey's relationship with the Pops in Symphony Hall. Since then the three have all grown together, and the two men now both qualify as septuagenarians.

Certainly the Pops owes a large share of its greatness to Fiedler's showmanship, his knack for innovation, for the unusual and appealing in entertainment and his ability to improvise; but Humphrey has contributed much to the Pops' bright public image, the smoothness of its operation and the colorful variety of its program books.

He remembered that unnerving first Esplanade concert. "The music blew off stands, some of the audience chased it around, returning sheets to various musicians—usually the wrong ones. Percussion and piccolo were the most prominent instruments and we received a devastating echo from buildings opposite the shell," he recalled. So as Fiedler's emissary, he went to MIT for acoustical assistance which resulted in a new seating arrangement for the orchestra.

"THE RESULTS of my efforts were encouraging," said Humphrey. "Fiedler said to me, 'I'm glad to hear it sounds good, but conducting this new arrangement is like writing my name in a mirror!' "

"I'm primarily not a publicity man but a newsman," says Humphrey, and he possesses good credentials. For 15 years, 1920-1935, he was a contributing feature writer for the Boston Post covering aviation, medicine, art, music and theater (he interviewed Serge Koussevitzky—in French—the morning after the latter's arrival in Boston). In 1936 he doubled (with his Pops duties) as night wire editor for the United Press and remembers receiving the story of Hitler's march into the Rhineland.

Based in a third-floor Symphony Hall office crowded with history (its surface is chaotic

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,205 (S) 298,557

JUL 6 1969

1929 to 1969

but Humphrey knows it like a well-ordered file drawer), he has helped sagging sales for a Jascha Heifetz recital by encouraging the violinist to take part in a Harvard professor's experiment in electronic analyses of old violins; written 30 years of snappy, interesting notes for Pops programs which one often hears quoted among Pops audiences; publicized the Youth Concerts and conducted children's tours of the hall's Ancient Instrument Room; developed some early photographs of the Boston Symphony in his family bathtub; and once used a little shoehorning to get the Boston Symphony Orchestra into Russia.

"AFTER THE ORCHESTRA'S 1956 European trip was announced," he recalled, "a Herald city editor pointed out there was no mention of going to Russia, and I could see he thought the orchestra was afraid to go. I told him that was all I knew, but if he wanted to tangle with president Henry B. Cabot he was welcome.

"The next day the Herald came out with a page one story quoting Cabot as saying the orchestra had no objection to going to Russia; they hadn't been invited. So I took the clipping to the Christian Science Monitor, which had a Moscow correspondent apparently in good standing and suggested he might bring it to the proper Russian authorities. Soon after that the orchestra received its invitation and eventually went to Russia."

Another time he bestowed a pictorial layout of the Boston Symphony's tour of Ireland on the last Sunday edition of the Boston Post: and in latter years for Arthur Fiedler's springtime debuts he has arranged, among other things, an antique car parade (rained out) and an unforgettable swan boat ride in the Public Garden for newsmen, with Fiedler providing the swan power.

"I'm interested in people, people, people," says Laning Humphrey, "whether they're orchestra players, conductors, newspapermen, children or anyone. Always people."

A man with more talent for serving people probably doesn't exist.

MUSIC IN ALL THAT

129

SOLTI SIGNS PACT WITH CHICAGOANS

Hungarian Named Musical Director for 1969-70

By DONAL HENAHAN

The engagement of Georg Solti as musical director of the Chicago Symphony and Carlo Maria Giulini as principal guest conductor, rumored in musical circles for several months, is definitely set, according to a spokesman for the orchestra.

Signing of Mr. Solti to a contract for the 1969-70 season, when he will conduct 12 weeks, awaits only a favorable ruling from the Internal Revenue Service on the Hungarian conductor's future tax problems as a commuter between London and Chicago.

Since 1961, Mr. Solti has been musical director of the Royal Opera House at Covent Garden in London, and he will retain that post for one or two years before taking on more intensive duties in Chicago. He wants to make sure he will not lose money by holding both jobs. "Mr. Solti is definitely coming to Chicago," Kenneth Utz, the orchestra's public relations director, said in a telephone interview. "He is already drawing up programs for his first season."

In the 1969-70 season, Mr. Utz added, Mr. Giulini will conduct eight weeks as a guest. The Chicago Symphony is currently between musical directors, Jean Martinson having resigned at the end of a five-year contract last season. The conducting duties for the 1968-69 season will be filled by guests, pending the arrival of Mr. Solti and Mr. Giulini.

The Chicago's decision leaves only the New York Philharmonic among the "big five" orchestras still searching for a musical director (Leonard Bernstein resigns at the end of the coming season). The Boston Symphony recently chose William Steinberg to replace Erich Leinsdorf, and the Philadelphia and Cleveland orchestras are apparently happy with their musical directors of long standing, Eugene Ormandy and George Szell.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704
AUG 17 1968

Symphony World Is Undergoing Changes

By IRVIN LOWENS
Music Critic of The Star

As the 1968-69 season begins, there are clear signs of ferment in the world of the symphony orchestra. Old patterns are breaking down, and new precedents are being established.

Take, for example, the three-year contract just signed by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (who belong to the American Federation of Musicians). It contains a number of provisions which, so far as I know, are embodied in no other contract.

The musicians and the management jointly are to select a five-member advisory committee which "will act in a consultative role, advising the management on musical matters and musical aspects of the orchestra's function." It is not clear whether the members of this committee must come from the orchestra or whether they can be outside friends and experts. But there seems to be an assumption that the committee will give the players a stronger voice in determining the orchestra's affairs.

Committee Decision

A new audition procedure will be used to determine the advancement of string players. "Seating at the front desks will be determined by the music director," the contract states. However, "if an opening occurs in the desks behind the front desks, voluntary auditions will be arranged at which a sizable committee of string players votes on the filling of the vacancy. The music director will continue to be responsible for the selection of new orchestra members."

At the end of the contract period, basic minimum salary will be $14,000, a considerable increase over the present $10,500 basic minimum. The new scale guarantees a minimum annual recording fee of $1,000.

In addition, BSO members will have 15 five-day weeks in each of the contract's three years. In the first year, eight of the weeks will have two consecutive days off; the number goes to 10 in the second and third years of the contract.

Another new thing on the Boston scene is America's first cooperative orchestra, the Boston Philharmonia, which is looking forward to its first full season after having completed its first series of three concerts last April and a week of concerts last summer in five Boston neighborhoods under the sponsonship of that city's "Summerthing" Festival.

Wider Audience

The 40-member orchestra draws its personnel from independent musicians in the Boston area — it was organized in order to supplement rather than to compete with other Boston and New England ensembles by reaching a wider new audience.

Successful cooperative orchestras exist in Europe as profit-making organizations in which the players own shares of stock. The Boston Philharmonia is unusual in that it is incorporated as a "non-profit, non-stock corporation."

The Philharmonia terms itself "100 percent artistically cooperative" since the musicians are permanent corporate members of the Philharmonia Society, hold three permanent memberships on its board of trustees, have exclusive decision-making power on the selection of orchestra personnel, have an equal vote with the trustees on the enaggement of conductors and orchestra management, and must be consulted on policy matters concerning the musical product.

A music advisory committee of three orchestra players, recently set up to develop guidelines for programming, is chaired by Harvard composer Leon Kirchner.

Present plans call for the orchestra to continue its guest conductor policy through the 1968-69 season.

The Philharmonia's musicians, who were paid on a per-concert basis previously, will be paid on a seasonal basis in the future, with base above the local Boston scale. At present, large local corporations are the target of a fund drive — later on, funding is expected from a variety of sources.

The conversion of the symphony orchestra from a kingdom ruled by a conductor into a republic of equals is being helped along by the International Conference of Symphony and Opera Musicians (ICSOM), which has decided to go full speed ahead with its controversial project of grading conductors by means of poll among its member musicians, according to Senza Sordino, ICSOM's official publication.

ICSOM sought legal advice after the question was raised as to whether the compilation and distribution of questionnaires might perhaps make its members answerable in a suit for libel. The attorneys held that "ICSOM might safely proceed with the evaluations provided certain safeguards and procedures were followed." The organization was told that "steps should be taken to assure that the statements be neither recklessly nor maliciously made, and evaluations should be made available only to those with a legitimate interest therein."

Doesn't Worry Leinsdorf

Understandably, conductors asked to comment on the project were not especially enthusiastic about the idea.

Erich Leinsdorf didn't see any harm in the poll itself. "Musicians have always evaluated conductors — in Europe they do it constantly," he told ICSOM. "The only question to ask is: To what purpose? It doesn't worry me, but it should certainly worry some people who administer orchestras. Such a poll may tell them some things they don't want to know."

The attitude of William Steinberg was similar. "Why not?" he said. "Why shouldn't they rate conductors? Conductors are a necessary evil — sometimes more necessary, sometimes more evil — but it is a question of deciding between what I would call the magician versus the genuine kapellmeisters. If it would change the situation, if the conductor would learn something from it—make him stick to the beat, for instance — it might be healthy. The conductor is supposed to know everything better than the musicians, but on the fingers of one hand you can count the real conductors. Before the first downbeat, the musicians know."

Changing Relationship

As George Zazofsky, chairman of ICSOM, points out, the relationship between player and conductor is changing.

"In the Boston Symphony's contract," he noted, "it is specified that the players may keep evaluation sheets on conductors and that the management is free to consult them if it so wishes. We are mainly interested in evaluating guests, because permanent conductors are chosen from guest lists. Lately, managements have been showing an interest in players' opinions. And why not? The combined musical opinion of X number of first-class symphony players should be more valuable than the opinion of one or two persons in any given community."

ICSOM's official evaluation sheet divides the questions into two broad categories — "Emotional Reaction" and "Objective Evaluation." As examples of the sort of thing found under the first heading, musicians are asked: "Do you, or would you, like to play under this man as a guest conductor? Do you, or would you, like to play under this man as a permanent conductor?" As instances of "objective evaluation" questions, they are asked: "Is his beat clear most of the time? Does his beat have clear inner rhythm? Does he show his interpretation with the baton, keeping talk in proper perspective? Does his beat communicate proper character, mood and intensity of the passage?"

The world — even the supposedly static world of the symphony orchestra — does move on.

ERICH LEINSDORF

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 358,738
SEP 22 1968

Records in Review

BARGAIN LABEL OFFERINGS

By WILLIAM A. STORRER

As originally composed, Mahler's First Symphony had a movement called "Blumine," inserted before the Scherzo. This movement was purchased by Mrs. James [illegible] Connecticut, and she gave performances with the Symphony Orchestra. Frank [illegible] performance on a some price [illegible] ments by enclosing releases in plastic-lined sleves or even plain paper ones. Any quality recording, whatever its price, deserves proper care!

A GREATER BOSTON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is having its troubles. Erich Leinsdorf will be replaced next summer by William Steinberg, the conductor who, had not RCA executives dictated otherwise (so the rumors go), might have come to Boston years ago. Leinsdorf's recordings have not sold well and we are back where we began, only many years later.

Why could Boston not get one of the younger "glamor" conductors? Is it that none of these jet-setters wants to be tied down to a single organization for fifty-two weeks a year? Can Boston only get a caretaker conductor until the BSO trustees wake up to the needs of conductors of the last third of the twentieth century?

The fifty-two week season is only part of the problem, for Boston does not welcome as it should many of these young conductors. Boston has some of the nastiest, senseless critical journalism of any major world cultural center. Many a guest conductor has been so mercilessly raked over the coals that one should wonder little why they do not want to return as permanent conductors. Even more, Boston criticism is often tasteless. Criticism is one thing, a hate-filled post-mortem another, and as long as Boston permits the latter, it will probably be without a first-rate young conductor for many years to come.

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Sunday, September 22, 1968

Stokowski, an Active 86, Plans Premieres for Sym

By DELOS SMITH

Imperturbable conductorial serenity shines from Leopold Stokowski. He is so raptly concentrated on the present that he's arranged to conduct the world premieres of four new works during the forthcoming season of his American Symphony Orchestra.

Stokowski will be 87 next April. Leonard Bernstein is 50 as he begins his last season as music director of the New York Philharmonic with fond thoughts of the unserene 19th Century Gustav Mahler. Erich Leinsdorf is 56, at the start of his last season as music director of the Boston Symphony, and he has a new wife, having been divorced from his first one.

Eugene Ormandy begins his 33rd season as music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The thought in many minds and probably in his is: How many more of the same can he have, now that he is almost 69? With Bernstein and Leinsdorf, the question is, whither? They have to go somewhere from where they are now.

* * *

A NEW SYMPHONIC year opened last week, wi Ormandy conducting the Philadelphians in their sea inaugural concert i season gets und ducting. The 3, with B

Stok

Car

F

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
SEP 26 1968
New England Newsclip

130.

Bernstein Bowing Out with Five World Premieres

By McLAREN HARRIS

Recently, just when we were feeling so elated over the prospect of novel and imaginative programming in store in this season's Boston Symphony programs, came the news from New York about what Leonard Bernstein has been cooking up for the Philharmonic.

This is Bernstein's last season with his orchestra, and he seems determined that it shall not be recorded as a time when he sat back and played only what he knew and loved.

Out of 32 programs in the regular season 22 will contain at least one work of the 20th century. There will be five world premieres among these, the first of a new work by William Schuman on the Philharmonic programs this weekend.

As a matter of fact, three of the world premieres occur in the first three weeks. Luciano Berio's Sinfonia for eight voices and orchestra will be heard on next weekend's schedule beginning this Thursday and Milton Babbitt's "Relata II' will debut the following week.

Berio's Sinfonia, states the composer, contains four sections unified by harmonic function, with the third being a sort of overview of music history in the last 200 years in the framework of the third movement (so-called "St. Anthony") from Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony. The use of references to a multitude of composers and Mahler as his inspiration has led Berio to comment that this section was "not so much composed as assembled."

CHARLES MUNCH, former music director of the Boston Symphony and currently conducting the Orchestre de Paris, will bring the French orchestra to Symphony Hall on Wednesday, Oct. 23, for a B.U. Celebrity Series concert.

And as the voices and instruments are meant to "sound together" the group chosen to sing in the performances is none other than the Swingle Singers, that ensemble of Parisians founded by American Ward Swingle which began life in the studio by recording vocal arrangements of baroque instrumental works, principally Bach, before emerging onto the concert stage in 1964.

A LECTURE SERIES entitled "The Changing Language of Music" will be inaugurated on Tuesday morning at Jordan Hall by the New England Conservatory. The ten-part series, designed by president Gunther Schuller, will attempt to bring musical laymen closer to the world and idioms of contemporary music. Six prominent composers will present the material — Schuller (four lectures); Milton Babbitt (two); Leon Kirchner, Seymour Shifrin, Earle Brown and Morton Feldman (one each). The dates, all Tuesday mornings from 10 to noon, are Oct. 15, 22, 29, Nov. 12, 26, Dec. 10, Jan. 7, 21, Feb. 4 and 18.

Subscription information (yes, there's money involved) is available from the Friends of the New England Conservatory, 290 Huntington Ave., Boston 02115, telephone 262-1120. Individual tickets will not be sold.

A NOMINATION for knighthood by the president of Italy has come to Silvio Coscia, member of the voice faculty at the conservatory and former longtime French hornist for the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. Coscia is a graduate of the Giuseppe Verdi Conservatory in Milan and studied composition with Carlo Gatti, famous Verdi biographer and historian for the Teatro alla Scala.

Last July a Dramatic Elegy by Coscia, dedicated to Gatti's memory, was performed by the Venice Municipal Symphonic Band under Maestro Legrin Caso. More of Coscia's works were performed by the New York Symphonic Band, the composer conducting, at the annual Giuseppe Creatore Memorial Concert in August.

LEST WE FORGET (and Charles Schulz' character, Schroeder, won't let us), 1970 will be the bicentennial year of Beethoven's birth, and plans for celebrations are already underway. Pianist Claudio Arrau, for example, has been engaged to play the "Emperor" Concerto at the Beethoven Festival in Bonn on May 3, 1970. He will also give a sonata recital on May 5.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
OCT 6 19
New England Newsclip

Symphony: Colin Davis in 1972?

By McLAREN HARRIS

Early this year in London an associate music critic of the Herald Traveler spoke to the manager of BBC Symphony conductor Colin Davis, and mentioned speculation over here that Davis might be lured into a position as music director of an American orchestra, perhaps even the Boston Symphony.

"Well, now, that's a lot of rubbish, isn't it?" replied Davis' manager, dismissing the speculation with a snort.

SOME MONTHS thereafter came the news of the appointment of William Steinberg to the Boston post, and that would have seemed to settle the dust for the time being.

But musicians, like politicians, must bank on the future, and one may logically reason that, in view of Steinberg's age (he will be 70 in August) and his strong ties to Pittsburgh, his appointment will not be forever. So there are people around who believe that the possibility of Davis' assumption of the helm here or elsewhere in this country is not a lot of rubbish at all. And, it would appear, some of them just happen to play in the Boston Symphony.

This last, of course, is more speculation, but I can find little else to attribute the excellent responsiveness accorded Davis by the Symphony during their performances last week. To say that the orchestra played better for him than they would for other conductors sounds, I suppose, like an impingment of the professionalism of the players, who are bound by musicianly honor to give their best efforts to any conductor, any music, any audience.

But that is theory, and all theories have their weaknesses in practice. In many cases the quality of a musician's performance is governed by a myraid of intangibles, some of them beyond the conscious control of the player himself. Where these touch upon the conductor are in areas of professional and social manner, rehearsal methods, ability to communicate impressions and desires and the players' respect for, and inspiration by, his competence.

CERTAIN ORCHESTRAS, the Boston Symphony among them, are known to exhibit short patience with conductors whose abilities or attitudes they find wanting, even to the point of slipping in intentional wrong notes here and there for retribution. At other times they may vent their displeasure by indifferent performance, and it would not be amiss to say that current music director Erich Leinsdorf has on occasion found himself confronted with such response.

Times like these, however, are rare; the overwhelming majority of performances are fully sincere in effort. Yet simple sincerity would not seem to explain the rather extraordinary level of playing which the Symphony produced for Davis, especially in Haydn's Symphony No. 99 and Brahms' Third. There was an unusual rapport between the conductor and those under his command, an anxiousness among the latter to do his bidding (which, thankfully, never became anxiety) and a seeming faith on their part that everything he was doing was absolutely right. And, as far as this critic is concerned, what all of them did in the Brahms was indeed absolutely right.

In short, the musicians played as if they would gladly follow Davis to the ends of the earth. Or to turn it around, they played as if they were wishing he might some day come to lead them.

All this, again rests in the realm of speculation. But it is not, I repeat, not a lot of rubbish.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
NOV 3 1968
New England Newsclip

Blowing Up The Opera In London

By Dan Webster

Patriot Ledger Correspondent

NEW YORK — Before the Boston Symphony Orchestra settled for an interim conductor, the trustees had asked Colin Davis, the 41-year-old Briton, to succeed Erich Leinsdorf.

That Davis refused is still on his mind, but his decision was not, he explains, between Boston and another orchestra, but more fundamental.

After he declined the Boston job, he was named to succeed Georg Solti as musical director of the Royal Opera House Covent Garden at the start of the 1971 season. He will leave his job as musical director with the BBC Orchestra to Pierre Boulez.

Leaving The Dead

"I'm leaving for opera; I had to do it. The concert world seems dead to me — I know Boulez doesn't share that belief. With opera, you're dealing with real people.

"I was very grateful for the Boston offer; it came at a time when it gave me great confidence. And there is another thing. Boston isn't quite large enough. It would have been me and Michael Steinberg, wouldn't it?

"I imagine that the music director of the Boston Symphony is the top musical figure in Boston, and I imagine everything he does is seen and analyzed. Steinberg sees himself as the curator of taste there — and his taste isn't all that good. If people read every morning that Leinsdorf is no good, pretty soon they think that must be true.

"In London, I am about two-tenths of one per cent of the musical activity, so I'm free to go about my work. Besides which, there are so many critics in London and none of them ever agree about anything. I was very flattered by the Boston offer, but I must go ahead with opera.

"I had to make this choice," he says.

"The first thing we're going to do at Covent Garden is to blow up a few people, the Kenneth Tynans, the critics who hold everything in, who can't bear to see anything new. The exercise of wit for its own sake is so . . . boring.

No Real Streets

"I'm not going to do the same old things. I can't bear to have the curtain go up on a real street anymore and I won't have it. I'm not going to do Puccini, Bellini, Donizetti, Gounod and Strauss! If they want it, they can get someone else.

"To help me run the show, I have Peter Hall and I feel enlarged by that. Good administration is no disgrace. I think one of two things have to happen in opera: either we get more government support or get more for our money. We want to do both, of course. If I can run the house more efficiently, then I can go to the government to ask for more. We ought to lower the ticket prices, for one thing. That's why there are no young audiences.

"My job is to try to change opera, to involve the audience more deeply. I've been wondering why we couldn't amplify the music so it is all around them. Think how that would sound in 'The Ring'.

"I want to take advantage of all the possibilities, lights, staging the whole idea of using films. That we've got now is just the old Verismo thing, isn't it? And it's so awful. Look at those productions designed by Franco Zeffirelli and Visconti. What has that heavy stuff to do with opera? Opera is imagination and they allow none.

Money Matters

"It will be frightfully expensive, of course, and there are not more than a dozen of so operas that can be treated in a really new way. But wouldn't it be fun to do 'The Magic Flute' in a new way?

"The ghastly monster at the first curtain. Why not suggest some frightening thing not quite clear. It could be suggested with electronic sound, or with lights or film.

"I have some ideas about designers; many of them are working in films now. Satyajit Ray is a very interesting man. Can't you picture a 'Magic Flute' with those blues and golds from Indian art, the odd trees and vast deserts? Indian painting is dead as mutton, but put two dead elements together and you blow the roof off. Well, we'll see.

There are other operas I'd like to try. I was sitting at a table with a prima donna, her agent, and a producer and she said 'I think the most boring opera I've ever heard is 'Fidelio.' Well, if it's performance without the passion Beethoven wrote into it. of course it's boring. But Beethoven felt this so deeply and you hear it in the music. Am I wrong to want passion, something heroic in music?

"These are the qualities I find in Mozart, Beethoven, Berlioz and the late Verdi. I'm especially fond of Berlioz. We do 'Les Troyens' at Covent Garden and I have kept at Rudolf Bing to at least come see it. I have him at the point where he is saying he will. The thing about Berlioz is that there is never one note too many. It's big, but it is so sensitive.

"At Covent Garden, I'm going to try to build the idea of a company again. We have the singers, why not give them the roles? Every singer now is obsessed with the idea of his career and they think of everything in terms of themselves. I'd rather work with a dedicated singer who is there to rehearse and sing than the great prima donna who flies in five days before the performance, gets her fee and leaves.

COLIN DAVIS'
. . . revolutionary

Fascinating Prospect

"It will be fascinating to see how much of this is possible, but I had to try it. The critics will rip us apart, of course, because they never recognize anything new, but we've got to make the opera important and alive.

"We've got to find new opera, too. Michael Tippett is writing some good things — not the love and death stuff that has always been opera, but very strong pieces about the way people really are," he says.

"After all, composers in contributing new works to the repertory are helping to keep alive a communal activity which poses most of the problems of the world at large. I think we need to work for something larger than ourselves, even though we fight so hard to assert our individuality," he says.

Savior

His own individuality has been constantly asserted. He came to music during a traditional public school education. He later played clarinet in Scottish orchestras before making a name as a conductor of Mozart with the Chelsea Opera Group. In 1959, he substituted for Otto Klemperer in a Festival Hall performance of "Don Giovanni" and Davis was launched as a conductor with a future.

"I came to music late, but it saved me at school. It was my secret, something the masters couldn't take away from me. I think I was lucky because I somehow associate music making with what it is to become a man," he says.

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 728,276
SEP 8 1968

The Music Beat

Big Symphony Podiums Get Revolving Door Look

By JAMES FELTON
Of The Bulletin Staff

ERICH LEINSDORF quit as conductor in Boston complaining of overwork, and the Orchestra there, while shopping around for someone else, announced last week that the players themselves will have some say as to where they will sit. I can see Toscanini's ghost trembling all over, crying "anarchy!"

Now that Leonard Bernstein is stepping down in New York the old Philharmonic will be back to the treadmill of guest conductors that typified its historic weakness before Bernstein brought a relative measure of order.

Now that Jean Martinon is leaving Chicago that orchestra will limp along next season with guest conductors. There is plenty of talk that no one man will ever again dominate an orchestra's destiny.

Eugene Ormandy continues as absolute music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Cleveland, a relative newcomer to the elite circle of the Big Five symphony orchestras in the United States, still boasts George Szell as absolute boss. Szell and Ormandy. It's down to that.

• • •

THE YOUNG conductors are reluctant to step into a grinding 52-week year. They will tell you they have committments here and there for the next 3 or 4 years that can't be broken. They say they are shopping around.

So whose market is it, the conductors' or the orchestras'? You can always try playing without a conductor. The Soviet Union had its Persymphans, a Conductorless Orchestra whose fate is obscure.

Or you can try to keep going with rotating guest conductors. When Toscanini faded from the picture the NBC Symphony, created personally for him, tried valiantly to carry on as the Symphony of the Air under guest conductors. It finally broke up.

Guest conductors invited in by a permanent director have a tough time. They want to put their own stamp on a performance but they need the cooperation of 110 men who can sit on their hands, if they want to. The guest can't hire or fire, yet if he doesn't come up with an authoritative performance he won't be noticed.

"Who is he to wave a stick under my nose and take half an hour over a couple measures of a Beethoven symphony I played forwards and backwards before he was born," one Philadelphia Orchestra member said last year about one of the guest conductors.

• • •

AND NOT without some justice. Veterans have a right to a show-me attitude. The job of the guest conductor is to convince them, and it isn't ever easy. No wonder the younger men are wary. The glories of the podium of yore are no longer all that glorious.

Message: the day of the maestro is changing. He may have to change the act from dominate to cooperate.

Chicago will experiment with twin directors in the 1969-70 season. Georg Solti and Carlo Maria Giulini will share the powers and passions of the post. The New York Philharmonic had such split directorates as Toscanini/Stokowski, but everyone breathed easier under the unifying hand of Bernstein.

But in these days the elite orchestras are playing year round and sooner or later they will either all turn to four-handed leadership, roll back their seasons, or go the way of all flesh. The dictator of the baton is a vanishing specimen.

130

Bernstein Bowing Out with Five World Premieres

By McLAREN HARRIS

Recently, just when we were feeling so elated over the prospect of novel and imaginative programming in store in this season's Boston Symphony programs, came the news from New York about what Leonard Bernstein has been cooking up for the Philharmonic.

This is Bernstein's last season with his orchestra, and he seems determined that it shall not be recorded as a time when he sat back and played only what he knew and loved.

Out of 32 programs in the regular season 22 will contain at least one work of the 20th century. There will be five world premieres among these, the first of a new work by William Schuman on the Philharmonic programs this weekend.

As a matter of fact, three of the world premieres occur in the first three weeks. Luciano Berio's Sinfonia for eight voices and orchestra will be heard on next weekend's schedule beginning this Thursday and Milton Babbitt's "Relata II' will debut the following week.

Berio's Sinfonia, states the composer, contains four sections unified by harmonic function, with the third being a sort of overview of music history in the last 200 years in the framework of the third movement (so-called "St. Anthony") from Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony. The use of references to a multitude of composers and Mahler as his inspiration has led Berio to comment that this section was "not so much composed as assembled."

CHARLES MUNCH, former music director of the Boston Symphony and currently conducting the Orchestre de Paris, will bring the French orchestra to Symphony Hall on Wednesday, Oct. 23, for a B.U. Celebrity Series concert.

And as the voices and instruments are meant to "sound together" the group chosen to sing in the performances is none other than the Swingle Singers, that ensemble of Parisians founded by American Ward Swingle which began life in the studio by recording vocal arrangements of baroque instrumental works, principally Bach, before emerging onto the concert stage in 1964.

A LECTURE SERIES entitled "The Changing Language of Music" will be inaugurated on Tuesday morning at Jordan Hall by the New England Conservatory. The ten-part series, designed by president Gunther Schuller, will attempt to bring musical laymen closer to the world and idioms of contemporary music. Six prominent composers will present the material — Schuller (four lectures); Milton Babbitt (two); Leon Kirchner, Seymour Shifrin, Earle Brown and Morton Feldman (one each). The dates, all Tuesday mornings from 10 to noon, are Oct. 15, 22, 29, Nov. 12, 26, Dec. 10, Jan. 7, 21, Feb. 4 and 18.

Subscription information (yes, there's money involved) is available from the Friends of the New England Conservatory, 290 Huntington Ave., Boston 02115, telephone 262-1120. Individual tickets will not be sold.

A NOMINATION for knighthood by the president of Italy has come to Silvio Coscia, member of the voice faculty at the conservatory and former longtime French hornist for the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. Coscia is a graduate of the Giuseppe Verdi Conservatory in Milan and studied composition with Carlo Gatti, famous Verdi biographer and historian for the Teatro alla Scala.

Last July a Dramatic Elegy by Coscia, dedicated to Gatti's memory, was performed by the Venice Municipal Symphonic Band under Maestro Legrin Caso. More of Coscia's works were performed by the New York Symphonic Band, the composer conducting, at the annual Giuseppe Creatore Memorial Concert in August.

LEST WE FORGET (and Charles Schulz' character, Schroeder, won't let us), 1970 will be the bicentennial year of Beethoven's birth, and plans for celebrations are already underway. Pianist Claudio Arrau, for example, has been engaged to play the "Emperor" Concerto at the Beethoven Festival in Bonn on May 3, 1970. He will also give a sonata recital on May 5.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
OCT 6 '8
New England Newsclip

Symphony: Colin Davis in 1972?

By McLAREN HARRIS

Early this year in London an associate music critic of the Herald Traveler spoke to the manager of BBC Symphony conductor Colin Davis, and mentioned speculation over here that Davis might be lured into a position as music director of an American orchestra, perhaps even the Boston Symphony.

"Well, now, that's a lot of rubbish, isn't it?" replied Davis' manager, dismissing the speculation with a snort.

SOME MONTHS thereafter came the news of the appointment of William Steinberg to the Boston post, and that would have seemed to settle the dust for the time being.

But musicians, like politicians, must bank on the future, and one may logically reason that, in view of Steinberg's age (he will be 70 in August) and his strong ties to Pittsburgh, his appointment will not be forever. So there are people around who believe that the possibility of Davis' assumption of the helm here or elsewhere in this country is not a lot of rubbish at all. And, it would appear, some of them just happen to play in the Boston Symphony.

This last, of course, is more speculation, but I can find little else to attribute the excellent responsiveness accorded Davis by the Symphony during their performances last week. To say that the orchestra played better for him than they would for other conductors sounds, I suppose, like an impingment of the professionalism of the players, who are bound by musicianly honor to give their best efforts to any conductor, any music, any audience.

But that is theory, and all theories have their weaknesses in practice. In many cases the quality of a musician's performance is governed by a myraid of intangibles, some of them beyond the conscious control of the player himself. Where these touch upon the conductor are in areas of professional and social manner, rehearsal methods, ability to communicate impressions and desires and the players' respect for, and inspiration by, his competence.

CERTAIN ORCHESTRAS, the Boston Symphony among them, are known to exhibit short patience with conductors whose abilities or attitudes they find wanting, even to the point of slipping in intentional wrong notes here and there for retribution. At other times they may vent their displeasure by indifferent performance, and it would not be amiss to say that current music director Erich Leinsdorf has on occasion found himself confronted with such response.

Times like these, however, are rare; the overwhelming majority of performances are fully sincere in effort. Yet simple sincerity would not seem to explain the rather extraordinary level of playing which the Symphony produced for Davis, especially in Haydn's Symphony No. 99 and Brahms' Third. There was an unusual rapport between the conductor and those under his command, an anxiousness among the latter to do his bidding (which, thankfully, never became anxiety) and a seeming faith on their part that everything he was doing was absolutely right. And, as far as this critic is concerned, what all of them did in the Brahms was indeed absolutely right.

In short, the musicians played as if they would gladly follow Davis to the ends of the earth. Or to turn it around, they played as if they were wishing he might some day come to lead them.

All this, again rests in the realm of speculation. But it is not, I repeat, not a lot of rubbish.

COLIN DAVIS
. . . revolutionary

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
NOV 3 1968
New England Newsclip

Blowing Up The Opera In London

By Dan Webster
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

NEW YORK — Before the Boston Symphony Orchestra settled for an interim conductor, the trustees had asked Colin Davis, the 41-year-old Briton, to succeed Erich Leinsdorf.

That Davis refused is still on his mind, but his decision was not, he explains, between Boston and another orchestra, but more fundamental.

After he declined the Boston job, he was named to succeed Georg Solti as musical director of the Royal Opera House Covent Garden at the start of the 1971 season. He will leave his job as musical director with the BBC Orchestra to Pierre Boulez.

Leaving The Dead

"I'm leaving for opera; I had to do it. The concert world seems dead to me — I know Boulez doesn't share that belief. With opera, you're dealing with real people.

"I was very grateful for the Boston offer; it came at a time when it gave me great confidence. And there is another thing. Boston isn't quite large enough. It would have been me and Michael Steinberg, wouldn't it?

"I imagine that the music director of the Boston Symphony is the top musical figure in Boston, and I imagine everything he does is seen and analyzed. Steinberg sees himself as the curator of taste there — and his taste isn't all that good. If people read every morning that Leinsdorf is no good, pretty soon they think that must be true.

"In London, I am about two-tenths of one per cent of the musical activify, so I'm free to go about my work. Besides which, there are so many critics in London and none of them ever agree about anything. I was very flattered by the Boston offer, but I must go ahead with opera.

"I had to make this choice," he says.

"The first thing we're going to do at Covent Garden is to blow up a few people, the Kenneth Tynans, the critics who hold everything in, who can't bear to see anything new. The exercise of wit for its own sake is so . . . boring.

No Real Streets

"I'm not going to do the same old things. I can't bear to have the curtain go up on a real street anymore and I won't have it. I'm not going to do Puccini, Bellini, Donizetti, Gounod and Strauss! If they want it, they can get someone else.

"To help me run the show, I have Peter Hall and I feel enlarged by that. Good administration is no disgrace. I think one of two things have to happen in opera: either we get more government support or get more for our money. We want to do both, of course. If I can run the house more efficiently, then I can go to the government to ask for more. We ought to lower the ticket prices, for one thing. That's why there are no young audiences.

"My job is to try to change opera, to involve the audience more deeply. I've been wondering why we couldn't amplify the music so it is all around them. Think how that would sound in 'The Ring'.

"I want to take advantage of all the possibilities, lights, staging the whole idea of using films. That we've got now is just the old Verismo thing, isn't it? And it's so awful. Look at those productions designed by Franco Zeffirelli and Visconti. What has that heavy stuff to do with opera? Opera is imagination and they allow none.

Money Matters

"It will be frightfully expensive, of course, and there are not more than a dozen of so operas that can be treated in a really new way. But wouldn't it be fun to do 'The Magic Flute' in a new way?

"The ghastly monster at the first curtain. Why not suggest some frightening thing not quite clear. It could be suggested with electronic sound, or with lights or film.

"I have some ideas about designers; many of them are working in films now. Satyajit Ray is a very interesting man. Can't you picture a 'Magic Flute' with those blues and golds from Indian art, the odd trees and vast deserts? Indian painting is dead as mutton, but put two dead elements together and you blow the roof off. Well, we'll see.

There are other operas I'd like to try. I was sitting at a table with a prima donna, her agent, and a producer and she said 'I think the most boring opera I've ever heard is 'Fidelio.' Well, if it's performance without the passion Beethoven wrote into it, of course it's boring. But Beethoven felt this so deeply and you hear it in the music. Am I wrong to want passion, something heroic in music?

"These are the qualities I find in Mozart, Beethoven, Berlioz and the late Verdi. I'm especially fond of Berlioz. We do 'Les Troyens' at Covent Garden and I have kept at Rudolf Bing to at least come see it. I have him at the point where he is saying he will. The thing about Berlioz is that there is never one note too many. It's big, but it is so sensitive.

"At Covent Garden, I'm going to try to build the idea of a company again. We have the singers, why not give them the roles? Every singer now is obsessed with the idea of his career and they think of everything in terms of themselves. I'd rather work with a dedicated singer who is there to rehearse and sing than the great prima donna who flies in five days before the performance, gets her fee and leaves.

Fascinating Prospect

"It will be fascinating to see how much of this is possible, but I had to try it. The critics will rip us apart, of course, because they never recognize anything new, but we've got to make the opera important and alive.

"We've got to find new opera, too. Michael Tippett is writing some good things — not the love and death stuff that has always been opera, but very strong pieces about the way people really are," he says.

"After all, composers in contributing new works to the repertory are helping to keep alive a communal activity which poses most of the problems of the world at large. I think we need to work for something larger than ourselves, even though we fight so hard to assert our individuality," he says.

Savior

His own individuality has been constantly asserted. He came to music during a traditional public school education. He later played clarinet in Scottish orchestras before making a name as a conductor of Mozart with the Chelsea Opera Group. In 1959, he substituted for Otto Klemperer in a Festival Hall performance of "Don Giovanni" and Davis was launched as a conductor with a future.

"I came to music late, but it saved me at school. It was my secret, something the masters couldn't take away from me. I think I was lucky because I somehow associate music making with what it is to become a man," he says.

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 728,276
SEP 8 1968

The Music Beat

Big Symphony Podiums Get Revolving Door Look

By JAMES FELTON
Of The Bulletin Staff

ERICH LEINSDORF quit as conductor in Boston complaining of overwork, and the Orchestra there, while shopping around for someone else, announced last week that the players themselves will have some say as to where they will sit. I can see Toscanini's ghost trembling all over, crying "anarchy!"

Now that Leonard Bernstein is stepping down in New York the old Philharmonic will be back to the treadmill of guest conductors that typified its historic weakness before Bernstein brought a relative measure of order.

Now that Jean Martinon is leaving Chicago that orchestra will limp along next season with guest conductors. There is plenty of talk that no one man will ever again dominate an orchestra's destiny.

Eugene Ormandy continues as absolute music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Cleveland, a relative newcomer to the elite circle of the Big Five symphony orchestras in the United States, still boasts George Szell as absolute boss. Szell and Ormandy. It's down to that.

• • •

THE YOUNG conductors are reluctant to step into a grinding 52-week year. They will tell you they have committments here and there for the next 3 or 4 years that can't be broken. They say they are shopping around.

So whose market is it, the conductors' or the orchestras'? You can always try playing without a conductor. The Soviet Union had its Persymphans, a Conductorless Orchestra whose fate is obscure.

Or you can try to keep going with rotating guest conductors. When Toscanini faded from the picture the NBC Symphony, created personally for him, tried valiantly to carry on as the Symphony of the Air under guest conductors. It finally broke up.

Guest conductors invited in by a permanent director have a tough time. They want to put their own stamp on a performance but they need the cooperation of 110 men who can sit on their hands, if they want to. The guest can't hire or fire, yet if he doesn't come up with an authoritative performance he won't be noticed.

"Who is he to wave a stick under my nose and take half an hour over a couple measures of a Beethoven symphony I played forwards and backwards before he was born," one Philadelphia Orchestra member said last year about one of the guest conductors.

• • •

AND NOT without some justice. Veterans have a right to a show-me attitude. The job of the guest conductor is to convince them, and it isn't ever easy. No wonder the younger men are wary. The glories of the podium of yore are no longer all that glorious.

Message: the day of the maestro is changing. He may have to change the act from dominate to cooperate.

Chicago will experiment with twin directors in the 1969-70 season. Georg Solti and Carlo Maria Giulini will share the powers and passions of the post. The New York Philharmonic had such split directorates as Toscanini/Stokowski, but everyone breathed easier under the unifying hand of Bernstein.

But in these days the elite orchestras are playing year round and sooner or later they will either all turn to four-handed leadership, roll back their seasons, or go the way of all flesh. The dictator of the baton is a vanishing specimen.

131.

THE LIVELY ARTS

ROY HEMMING INTERVIEWS

COLIN DAVIS

FEW conductors have been as warmly applauded in recent years—by audiences, critics, and orchestral players themselves—as has Surrey-born Colin Davis. In 1967, at age 39, he became the youngest chief conductor in the history of Britain's BBC Symphony Orchestra. He has just been named to succeed Georg Solti (new conductor of the Chicago Symphony) as musical director of London's Covent Garden Opera beginning in 1970.

While in the U. S. for a series of guest appearances with the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony, and the Metropolitan Opera, he was interviewed by Senior Scholastic Editor Roy Hemming in New York.

RH: You've been making a lot of recordings lately for Philips Records. What influence do you feel phonograph recordings have had on your own musical development?

CD: Well, I probably wouldn't be a musician at all if it weren't for the phonograph. My musical background as a child consisted entirely of listening to gramophone records. My father collected records of many kinds, and this interest went to his sons and the rest of the family. I was number 5 in the family, so there was quite a lot of activity going on by the time I was born. I heard a lot of music when I was a kid.

RH: Some critics say the phonograph can have a negative effect—in that you become accustomed to Beecham's way with Berlioz or Ormandy's way with Rachmaninoff at a very early age. Can't patterns be set which are then hard to break?

CD: Yes, but that's up to you. When you're old enough to know that patterns get set, you start to try to bust them up, don't you? If you're a lively person, you do. If you're not, well, go to hell.

RH: What do you think of contemporary pop music?

CD: You mean the Beatles and that?

RH: Yes. Do you think it has any relationship to classical music?

CD: Only that they've pinched certain procedures and exploited them in a certain way. But I don't think they have any relationship to the serious composer trying to hammer some reflection of his experience of life. It's haphazard, it's too off-the-cuff.

RH: What about the Beatles recording in which they use just a string quartet for a background? Or another they did with a sitar accompaniment—things that many people think of as classical devices? Do you think of these as just gimmicks rather than being meaningful?

CD: They're clever. They're interesting. They're like magpies.

RH: But you don't think they're going to develop any interest among people who like the Beatles now and who will go from the string quartet of a Beatles background to listening to a classical string quartet?

CD: Not likely.

RH: Years ago a lot of composers began using jazz in classical works—Gershwin's piano concerto, pieces by Milhaud and others. Yet I don't notice any serious effort by contemporary

Philips/Mercury Records

"Pop music today is a kind of drug . . ."

composers to use rock 'n' roll or any other of today's so-called pop. What's your explanation for this?

CD: I think the attempts to marry jazz and serious music just never came off at all. And the trouble with rock 'n' roll—of which I know so little—is that most of it isn't a very profound reaction to reality. It's a certain kind of, well, "don't let's worry about tomorrow, let's just enjoy ourselves today." This is a perfectly legitimate attitude to life, but it isn't very profound, is it? It's a very superficial way of going through life.

RH: Do you feel by that definition, then, that classical music is in essence a profound expression?

CD: Yes, just as I think that Shakespeare is also. I suppose I am a victim of my education here. I think what is interesting about people is the way they develop. It's the way they face their difficulties—going into something and coming out with more knowledge than they had before. I don't believe that pop music encourages this. Instead, it's a kind of drug. It's a way of stopping people from thinking, because it's so loud. It stops people having to say anything, because anything they did say we couldn't hear anyway. It's a blotting out of the necessity for making the effort to communicate with other people—which is a dreadful thing.

RH: What about electronic music?

CD: I think it's intriguing, it's ingenious, but again, none of it has struck me as telling me anything that I ought to know. It seems at the moment to be just decorative.

RH: Do you think it has any future on serious concert programs?

CD: This depends on the quality of the men using it. For the moment they're playing with it. They're aping the scientists. The scientists break matter down into smaller and smaller particles, and composers like Stockhausen break up the sound of a tamtam and make a long tape out of it. This is very entertaining for Stockhausen, but what the hell it tells the rest of us I don't know—unless we wish to become like unicellular creatures, which I think is reversing the process of evolution!

RH: Who are the most meaningful younger generation composers today?

CD: Well, here we are, and I can't tell you.

RH: How about people like Pierre Boulez* or Hans Werner Henze?

CD: Boulez is a very strange man. He's kind of talked himself out of composing altogether, practically. He's a most remarkable musician and a marvelous conductor, but I think he talks too much. I don't mind him knowing—I don't mind telling you that.

RH: Do you think government subsidization of the arts as you have in England involves any more interference from government than there is from private patrons in America?

CD: I think, if you'll excuse my saying so, that it's a fallacy to think that when you receive government money there is a loss of freedom involved. I think that we have far more freedom in England because we are state supported. Certainly this is true of radio and television. Because we don't have to suffer the idiot interference of advertisers, we have more freedom to produce serious things.

RH: What would you consider America's greatest contribution to music?

CD: I think for my generation it's been the kind of orchestras you've produced. But now it may be other sorts of things. Music today is being more accepted in your universities and in your school curriculums. This is making music available to more and more people, and this perhaps will be your greatest contribution in the coming years. □

*Boulez, coincidentally, has just been named to succeed Davis as BBC conductor in 1970. (Ed.)

Mitchell Retirement Problem for National Symphony

Another Orchestra in Conductor Search

By PAUL HUME
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Howard Mitchell's plan to retire as conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra gives the orchestra's board of directors its biggest job in 20 years.

Mitchell announced last Tuesday that he would like to leave his 45,000 dollar-a-year post as head of the orchestra at the end of the 1969-70 season. At a meeting Wednesday of the orchestra's executive committee, Mitchell said that he would remain for another season if the board asked him to do so.

Lloyd Symington, president of the Symphony Association, said he would recommend to the board that Mitchell "continue for at least five years as a guest conductor for a substantial part of each season," and that Mitchell "should serve as a member of a committee delegated to select the next conductor."

HOWARD MITCHELL

Varying Comments

This last suggestion brought varying comments, from orchestra officials here and around the country. Thomas Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Erich Leinsdorf, the conductor of that orchestra, did not serve in any such capacity when William Steinberg was chosen as his successor. "That is normally the function of the trustees," as Perry's observation.

The press director of the New York Philharmonic said Leonard Bernstein was not serving in any advisory role in helping to choose the man who will be that orchestra's next music director. He said the choice would be made by the board of directors and a music policy committee.

In Cincinnati, where Max Rudolf recently announced his retirement to be effective the same time as Mitchell's, one of the orchestra's top officials said Rudolf would not serve in any advisory capacity. He added, "It would be a disaster for any conductor to try and help choose his successor."

This was also the opinion of Peter Mennin, the president of the Juilliard School in New York, who is continually consulted about the promising conductors for the many orchestral positions that are now opening up around the country. "I have never heard of any situation where the retiring conductor helped to choose the man who replaced him," Mennin said.

Nationality Issue

The question was raised here whether the new music director of the National Symphony had to be an American. There were differing opinions, but the view was strongly advanced that the national orchestra needs and must engage the very finest, strongest conductor it can find, regardless of his nationality. "We'll make an American of him if he isn't one," said one member of the executive committee.

The field is full of conductors today, but there are few great ones. In the younger crop, all of whom are now being closely scrutinized by orchestras in Cincinnati, Boston, and now Washington, there are several who show great promise but who at the moment might be lacking in the broad repertoire and experience needed for the demands of a major orchestral season in this country, a kind of season no European conductor ever faces.

An illustration of the shortage in top conductors that now exists is seen in the fact that three American conductors are now in charge of six major orchestras. George Szell, music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, will take the same title with the New York Philharmonic next fall following Bernstein's retirement in June.

Similar Arrangement

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, has made a similar doubling arrangement with the Boston Symphony as of the same date, following Leinsdorf's resignation. Andre Previn is both music director of the Houston Symphony and principal conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. Steinberg's Boston duties, however, are reported to be of an interim nature until Boston can find the man it wants as fulltime.

Szell once said that he was happy with his great Cleveland Orchestra for the rest of his life, but the rumor is that if he is happy with Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall after next summer's expenditure of 900,000 dollars on its accoustical problems, he might make the move to New York permanent.

The National Symphony might well decide to make a similar move by engaging one of the few great American conductors, Alfred Wallenstein, as music director for a period of two to five years while carrying on the necessary vigorous search for a successor to Mitchell.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, December 16, 1968

STAR (E)
WASH. D. C.
CIRC. 256,250
047
DEC 1 1 1968

WANTS NEW LIFE

Mitchell Resigning Post With Symphony

By ROBERTA HORNIG
Star Staff Writer

Howard Mitchell has resigned as music director of the National Symphony Orchestra, effective in June 1971.

Last night, right after he finished conducting his regular Tuesday night concert, Mitchell left the Constitution Hall stage, walked into his office and explained why he wants to quit the job he has held for 19 years.

"I want to travel here and there and conduct where I'd like. What I'll do is just what I want to do. I'll guest conduct," he said.

Some time before concert time yesterday Mitchell wrote a letter to the symphony board of directors asking them to end his contract in June, 1970. The board's executive committee today agreed, but persuaded Mitchell to extend the date to will be presented to the full June 1971.

According to the agreement worked out with the directors, Mitchell will not be leaving the orchestra entirely.

In his letter Mitchell wrote that he is "delighted to accept the recommendation of the officers that I should continue to serve . . . as a guest conductor for a substantial part of each season for at least five years."

His request for a senior statesman-like role with the orchestra will be presented to the full board on Dec. 18.

Mitchell, who at 57 looks as much like a businessman as an artistic figure, explained from his executive-like green leather chair that he had concluded some time ago that the administrative duties of a music director of a major American orchestra are too much.

He complained that his nonmusical duties had increased

See MITCHELL, Page A-10

Star Photographer Walter Oates

HOWARD MITCHELL

Symphony Director Quitting Orchestra

Continued From Page A-1

greatly in recent years as orchestra's activities and the length of its season have expanded. He pointed out that he is taking the same step that conductors Leonard Bernstein and Eric Leinsdorf have already taken.

"I had this in my mind two or three years ago," the dapper maestro said. In fact, he said, he wanted to leave altogether, but was talked out of it by board members.

When he stepped up from the first cellist's chair 20 seasons ago to the podium, Mitchell said, the National Symphony was performing about 77 concerts a year. Now, he said, the concert schedule is about 250.

And this, he said, is the first year in 35 that he and his wife haven't had children in the house. With their five children grown up, Mitchell said, he and Mrs. Mitchell "have a desire to see things and have another kind of life."

Mitchell was one of the nation's youngest conductors and only the second in American symphony orchestra history to be promoted from within orchestra ranks when he began conducting the National Symphony at 37.

Up until now he has been a one-job man, with some freelancing guest conducting jobs.

He joined the symphony, as first cellist, when it was only three years old, and he was 22, in 1933. A Midwesterner, he attended Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore and the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia before coming to work for the orchestra's first conductor, Dr. Hans Kindler.

Dr. Kindler picked Mitchell as his successor, just as Mitchell will probably have a role in picking his.

Mitchell said Washington's Symphony "was considered somewhat provincial" when he took it over. He thinks it has come a long way.

"It's a first-class orchestra. It can play anything — everything. It was not always this way," he said.

THE LIVELY ARTS

ROY HEMMING INTERVIEWS

COLIN DAVIS

FEW conductors have been as warmly applauded in recent years—by audiences, critics, and orchestral players themselves—as has Surrey-born Colin Davis. In 1967, at age 39, he became the youngest chief conductor in the history of Britain's BBC Symphony Orchestra. He has just been named to succeed Georg Solti (new conductor of the Chicago Symphony) as musical director of London's Covent Garden Opera beginning in 1970.

While in the U. S. for a series of guest appearances with the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony, and the Metropolitan Opera, he was interviewed by Senior Scholastic Editor Roy Hemming in New York.

RH: You've been making a lot of recordings lately for Philips Records. What influence do you feel phonograph recordings have had on your own musical development?

CD: Well, I probably wouldn't be a musician at all if it weren't for the phonograph. My musical background as a child consisted entirely of listening to gramophone records. My father collected records of many kinds, and this interest went to his sons and the rest of the family. I was number 5 in the family, so there was quite a lot of activity going on by the time I was born. I heard a lot of music when I was a kid.

RH: Some critics say the phonograph can have a negative effect—in that you become accustomed to Beecham's way with Berlioz or Ormandy's way with Rachmaninoff at a very early age. Can't patterns be set which are then hard to break?

CD: Yes, but that's up to you. When you're old enough to know that patterns get set, you start to try to bust them up, don't you? If you're a lively person, you do. If you're not, well, go to hell.

RH: What do you think of contemporary pop music?

CD: You mean the Beatles and that?

RH: Yes. Do you think it has any relationship to classical music?

CD: Only that they've pinched certain procedures and exploited them in a certain way. But I don't think they have any relationship to the serious composer trying to hammer some reflection of his experience of life. It's haphazard, it's too off-the-cuff.

RH: What about the Beatles recording in which they use just a string quartet for a background? Or another they did with a sitar accompaniment—things that many people think of as classical devices? Do you think of these as just gimmicks rather than being meaningful?

CD: They're clever. They're interesting. They're like magpies.

RH: But you don't think they're going to develop any interest among people who like the Beatles now and who will go from the string quartet of a Beatles background to listening to a classical string quartet?

CD: Not likely.

RH: Years ago a lot of composers began using jazz in classical works—Gershwin's piano concerto, pieces by Milhaud and others. Yet I don't notice any serious effort by contemporary

Philips/Mercury Records

"Pop music today is a kind of drug . . ."

composers to use rock 'n' roll or any other of today's so-called pop. What's your explanation for this?

CD: I think the attempts to marry jazz and serious music just never came off at all. And the trouble with rock 'n' roll—of which I know so little—is that most of it isn't a very profound reaction to reality. It's a certain kind of, well, "don't let's worry about tomorrow, let's just enjoy ourselves today." This is a perfectly legitimate attitude to life, but it isn't very profound, is it? It's a very superficial way of going through life.

RH: Do you feel by that definition, then, that classical music is in essence a profound expression?

CD: Yes, just as I think that Shakespeare is also. I suppose I am a victim of my education here. I think what is interesting about people is the way they develop. It's the way they face their difficulties—going into something and coming out with more knowledge than they had before. I don't believe that pop music encourages this. Instead, it's a kind of drug. It's a way of stopping people from thinking, because it's so loud. It stops people having to say anything, because anything they did say we couldn't hear anyway. It's a blotting out of the necessity for making the effort to communicate with other people—which is a dreadful thing.

RH: What about electronic music?

CD: I think it's intriguing, it's ingenious, but again, none of it has struck me as telling me anything that I ought to know. It seems at the moment to be just decorative.

RH: Do you think it has any future on serious concert programs?

CD: This depends on the quality of the men using it. For the moment they're playing with it. They're aping the scientists. The scientists break matter down into smaller and smaller particles, and composers like Stockhausen break up the sound of a tamtam and make a long tape out of it. This is very entertaining for Stockhausen, but what the hell it tells the rest of us I don't know—unless we wish to become like unicellular creatures, which I think is reversing the process of evolution!

RH: Who are the most meaningful younger generation composers today?

CD: Well, here we are, and I can't tell you.

RH: How about people like Pierre Boulez* or Hans Werner Henze?

CD: Boulez is a very strange man. He's kind of talked himself out of composing altogether, practically. He's a most remarkable musician and a marvelous conductor, but I think he talks too much. I don't mind him knowing—I don't mind telling you that.

RH: Do you think government subsidization of the arts as you have in England involves any more interference from government than there is from private patrons in America?

CD: I think, if you'll excuse my saying so, that it's a fallacy to think that when you receive government money there is a loss of freedom involved. I think that we have far more freedom in England because we are state supported. Certainly this is true of radio and television. Because we don't have to suffer the idiot interference of advertisers, we have more freedom to produce serious things.

RH: What would you consider America's greatest contribution to music?

CD: I think for my generation it's been the kind of orchestras you've produced. But now it may be other sorts of things. Music today is being more accepted in your universities and in your school curriculums. This is making music available to more and more people, and this perhaps will be your greatest contribution in the coming years. □

*Boulez, coincidentally, has just been named to succeed Davis as BBC conductor in 1970. (Ed.)

131

Mitchell Retirement Problem for National Symphony

Another Orchestra in Conductor Search

By PAUL HUME
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Howard Mitchell's plan to retire as conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra gives the orchestra's board of directors its biggest job in 20 years.

Mitchell announced last Tuesday that he would like to leave his 45,000 dollar-a-year post as head of the orchestra at the end of the 1969-70 season. At a meeting Wednesday of the orchestra's executive committee, Mitchell said that he would remain for another season if the board asked him to do so.

Lloyd Symington, president of the Symphony Association, said he would recommend to the board that Mitchell "continue for at least five years as a guest conductor for a substantial part of each season," and that Mitchell "should serve as a member of a committee delegated to select the next conductor."

Varying Comments

This last suggestion brought varying comments, from orchestra officials here and around the country. Thomas Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Erich Leinsdorf, the conductor of that orchestra, did not serve in any such capacity when William Steinberg was chosen as his successor. "That is normally the function of the trustees," as Perry's observation.

The press director of the New York Philharmonic said Leonard Bernstein was not serving in any advisory role in helping to choose the man who will be that orchestra's next music director. He said the choice would be made by the board of directors and a music policy committee.

HOWARD MITCHELL

In Cincinnati, where Max Rudolf recently announced his retirement to be effective the same time as Mitchell's, one of the orchestra's top officials said Rudolf would not serve in any advisory capacity. He added, "It would be a disaster for any conductor to try and help choose his successor."

This was also the opinion of Peter Mennin, the president of the Juilliard School in New York, who is continually consulted about the promising conductors for the many orchestral positions that are now opening up around the country. "I have never heard of any situation where the retiring conductor helped to choose the man who replaced him," Mennin said.

Nationality Issue

The question was raised here whether the new music director of the National Symphony had to be an American. There were differing opinions, but the view was strongly advanced that the national orchestra needs and must engage the very finest, strongest conductor it can find, regardless of his nationality. "We'll make an American of him if he isn't one," said one member of the executive committee.

The field is full of conductors today, but there are few great ones. In the younger crop, all of whom are now being closely scrutinized by orchestras in Cincinnati, Boston, and now Washington, there are several who show great promise but who at the moment might be lacking in the broad repertoire and experience needed for the demands of a major orchestral season in this country, a kind of season no European conductor ever faces.

An illustration of the shortage in top conductors that now exists is seen in the fact that three American conductors are now in charge of six major orchestras. George Szell, music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, will take the same title with the New York Philharmonic next fall following Bernstein's retirement in June.

Similar Arrangement

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, has made a similar doubling arrangement with the Boston Symphony as of the same date, following Leinsdorf's resignation. Andre Previn is both music director of the Houston Symphony and principal conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. Steinberg's Boston duties, however, are reported to be of an interim nature until Boston can find the man it wants as fulltime.

Szell once said that he was happy with his great Cleveland Orchestra for the rest of his life, but the rumor is that if he is happy with Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall after next summer's expenditure of 900,000 dollars on its accoustical problems, he might make the move to New York permanent.

The National Symphony might well decide to make a similar move by engaging one of the few great American conductors, Alfred Wallenstein, as music director for a period of two to five years while carrying on the necessary vigorous search for a successor to Mitchell.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, December 16, 1968

047

WANTS NEW LIFE

Mitchell Resigning Post With Symphony

By ROBERTA HORNIG
Staff Writer

[illegible]

Symphony Director Quitting Orchestra

Continued From Page A-1

[illegible]

132

Mitchell Resignation Leaves Symphony With Major Problem

By Paul Hume

HOWARD MITCHELL'S plan to retire as conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra gives the orchestra's board of directors its biggest job in 20 years.

On Tuesday, Mitchell announced that he would like to leave his post as head of the orchestra at the end of the 1969-70 season. At a meeting yesterday of the orchestra's executive committee, Mitchell said that he would remain for another season if the board asked him to do so.

In a statement Tuesday, Lloyd Symington, president of the Symphony Association, said that he would recommend to the board that Mitchell "continue for at least five years as a guest conductor for a substantial part of each season," and that Mitchell "should serve as a member of a committee delegated to select the next conductor."

This last suggestion brought varying comments from orchestra officials here and around the country. Thomas Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that Erich Leinsdorf, the conductor of that orchestra, did not serve in any such capacity when William Steinberg was chosen as his successor.

"That is normally the function of the trustees," was Perry's observation.

The press director of the New York Philharmonic said that Leonard Bernstein was not serving in any advisory role in helping to choose the man who will be that orchestra's next music director. He said the choice would be made by the board of directors and a music policy committee.

In Cincinnati, where Max Rudolf recently announced his retirement to be effective the same time as Mitchell's, one of the orchestra's top officials said that Rudolf would be a disaster for any conductor to try and help choose his successor."

This was also the opinion of Peter Mennin, the president of the Juilliard School in New York, who is continually consulted about the promising conductors for the many orchestral positions that are now opening up around the country.

"I have never heard of any situation where the retiring conductor helped to choose the man who replaced him," Mennin said.

At yesterday's executive committee meeting, the question was raised of whether the new music director of the National Symphony had to be an American. There were differing opinions, but the view was strongly advanced that the National Symphony Orchestra needs and must engage the very finest, strongest conductor it can find, regardless of nationality.

"We'll make an American of him if he isn't one," said one member of the executive committee.

The field of symphony conductors is a large one, today, but there are few great ones. In the younger crop, all of whom are now being closely scrutinized by orchestras in Cincinnati, Boston and now Washington, there are several who show great promise but who at the moment might be lacking in the broad repertory and experienced needed for the demands of a major orchestral season in this country, a kind of season no European conductor ever faces.

An illustration of the shortage in top conductors that now exists is seen in the fact that three American conductors are now in charge of six major orchestras. George Szell, music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, will take the same title with the New York Philharmonic next fall following Bernstein's retirement in June.

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, has made a similar doubling arrangement with the Boston Symphony as of the same date, following Leinsdorf's resignation. Andre Previn is both music director of the Houston Symphony and principal conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. Steinberg's Boston duties, however, are reported to be of an interim nature until Boston can find the man it wants as full-time man.

Szell once said that he was happy with his great Cleveland Orchestra for the rest of his life, but the rumor is that if he is happy with Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall after next summer's expenditure of $900,000 on its acoustical problems, he might make the move to New York permanent.

The National Symphony might well decide to make a similar move by engaging one of the few great American conductors, Alfred Wallenstein, as music director for a period of two to five years while carrying on the necessary vigorous search for a successor to Mitchell.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357

DEC 12 1968

Symphony Changes

Bernstein Quits, Steinberg Goes To Boston To Conduct

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

NEW YORK (AP) — Music circles have been predicting that the three conductors to be found at the end of the Great Conductor Hunt will be very young men with a dramatic way with a baton and sex appeal for ladies in the audience.

Top job in three of the country's most prestigious orchestras recently became vacant. Leonard Bernstein is leaving the New York Philharmonic to write music. Erich Leinsdorf has resigned from the Boston Symphony because of overwork. Jean Martinon, under fire in Chicago, already has left the Chicago Symphony to conduct in Paris. So far the junior Bernsteins have not gotten their jobs.

Chicago is negotiating with George Solti, 56, of Covent Garden. The New York Philharmonic has hired George Szell, 71, music director of the Cleveland Symphony, as musical adviser and senior guest conductor, while it continues to look around.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

The Boston Symphony has hired William Steinberg, 69, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, as its music director — making him the first conductor ever to be music director of two major United States orchestras at the same time.

STEINBERG will conduct 15 of the Boston Symphony's 30 winter weeks, under a three-year contract to start next fall. Pittsburgh, perhaps as a show of appreciation, perhaps to keep Steinberg from moving to Boston, has given him a new contract with an unlimited duration.It calls for 16 weeks of conducting each season.

He was hired by Boston, Steinberg says frankly, partly for his opinion. All the conductors that Boston would consider hiring at the end of Steinberg's three years will be invited to be guest conductors and the board of directors wants to know what Steinberg thinks of them.

Steinberg is pleased that New York, Boston and Chicago did not rush out and hire some of the flashy young men on the international conducting scene.

"The translation of the word 'conducting' for me is 'experience.' It does not mean only learning repertoire but also maturity in order to approach the human angle from the proper side. No doubt that's the most difficult problem of our profession — how to approach an orchestra and get from the players the best they have.

"In the flamboyant approach to music, I always translate 'flamboyant' as 'wrong tempi.' These are my translations.

"It is only to be hoped that audiences find their way back to music and forget about the visual aspects. Toscanini's unbelievable simplicity led the audience to believe that he was doing a job which everybody could have done. Bruno Walter was uneventful to look at compared to today's young chaps who dance in front of the audience. I'm told I'm just as uninteresting."

BUT IF one thought that Steinberg would go farther and suggest that a listener play recordings at home, so the conductor wouldn't be visible at all, one would be wrong.

He says, "There is no substitute for any live performance. A person gets more out of a live performance, by feeling the physical proximity of the executors, by having your nervous system and theirs in the same room."

THE JOURNAL
LORAIN, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 34,477

JAN-4--69

Classical Music Sees Changes

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

NEW YORK (AP) — In classical music, 1968 was a year to cause the exclamation, "It seems like only yesterday!!!"

It seems like only yesterday that Leonard Bernstein was a boy genius, an infant terrible. In 1968, he celebrated his 50th birthday and started his last season conducting the New York Philharmonic, before retiring to compose and be silvering-haired elder statesman of music.

It seems like only yesterday that Maria Callas and Renata Tebaldi were fighting the Metropolitan Opera's most fiery feud. On Met opening night, 1968, they came face to face backstage and executed, not each other, but a genteel embrace.

And so on. Pianist Dave Brubeck led a respected jazz quartet for 16 years. In 1968, his first classical composition was given its world premiere by the Cincinnati Symphony, an oratorio, "The Light in the Wilderness." Critics applauded.

The New Jersey Symphony in Newark became the first major U.S. symphony to name a Negro as music director. Henry Lewis, 35, who also had been the first Negro to play in a major U.S. orchestra—double bass in the Los Angeles Philharmonic picked up the baton in June.

Seiji Ozawa, Japanese-born 32-year-old conductor, was hired by the San Francisco Symphony.

Vladimir Horowitz played the first uninterrupted piano recital on television.

The Santa Fe Opera built a new opera house, replacing the one that burned in 1967, and included in the "initiation" season two U.S. premieres of 12-tone operas, Arnold Schoenberg's "Jacob's Ladder" and Hans Werner Henze's "The Bassarids." The St. Louis Symphony got a new home, too, a converted movie palace, Powell Symphony Hall, replacing Kiel Auditorium, which it had shared with a sports arena.

Among the premieres of the year were "Eleventh Symphony" by Roy Harris, 70, "Sixth Symphony" by Howard Hanson, 71, "Eighth Symphony" by Roger Sessions, 71, all by the New York Philharmonic;

"Piano Concerto No. 2" by Benjamin Lees, 44, by the Boston Symphony and pianist Gary Graffman, who termed the work "major;" "Symphony No. 1" by Oliver Knussen, 15, the composer conducting the London Symphony. He was called very promising.

Germany's best-known composer, Carl Orff, 77, who wrote "Carmina Burana" in 1936, saw the premiere of his "Prometheus Bound" by the Stuttgart Opera.

France's best-known composer, Darius Milhaud, 75, delivered "Music for New Orleans," commissioned by the New Orleans Philharmonic in honor of the city's 250th anniversary. But conductor Werner Torkanowsky turned it down as unworthy and played Milhaud's 1923 "La Creation du Monde."

In the avant-garde, Stanley Silver, 30, music director of the Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, saw his pop opera "Elephant Steps," premiered at Tanglewood. It sounded like a radio with dials being twisted fast.

A Los Angeles Philharmonic tympanist, William Kraft, 44, had his "Contextures: Riots—Decade 60" played by his orchestra, with films and stills going along with the first, fourth and fifth movements.

Charles Munch, 77, who led the Boston Symphony from 1949-62, with the symphony usually underrehearsed, but sometimes inspired in performance, came out of retirement last year to lead the newly created Orchestra de Paris. He died in November, on a tour, in Richmond, Va. Howard Lebow, 32, one of the most promising of the young American pianists, died in January in an automobile accident.

Composer William Schuman announced his resignation as president of Lincoln Center, after seven years, saying it needed a money raiser.

ALLIANCE REVIEW
ALLIANCE, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 15,074

JAN-7--69

Bigamy, Digamy Stops, The Chef D'Orchestre Hops

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THERE USED to be a time when a conductor was faithful to one orchestra. Oh, once in a while he might have taken a quick trip to a nearby city or been detained late at the office of another orchestra. But it is becoming the rule now, rather than the exception, that a man serves two or more orchestral masters.

* * * *

WHEN ERICH Leinsdorf leaves the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this coming Tanglewood season, William Steinberg will go to Boston from Pittsburgh for three years but on an arrangement which will make it advisable for him to leave a pair of pajamas in western Pennsylvania.

And now this past month Chicago has announced officially what has been rumored and whispered openly for some months. Georg Solti will become the musical director of its orchestra for three years, sharing the post with Carlo Maria Giulini as principal guest conductor. Solti will retain his title and responsibilities as musical director of London's Royal Opera house and Giulini will remain on the staff of the Rome Opera.

This is now the accepted pattern of podium activities. John Barbirolli was conductor at Houston the last few seasons and also of his old Halle orchestra in Manchester, England. St. Petersburg in Florida shares André Previn with London. Conductors are the air lines' best customers. Shades of Louis XIV: What validates all this hopping around?

* * * *

THERE ARE many reasons to be sure. Near the top in importance is the glamour with which we have invested the position of conductor. We no longer go, or at least go less and more's the pity, to hear the Mahler first or the Brahms third but to Bernstein's Mahler or to Szell's Brahms. Now whether this is an intelligent or a sophisticated approach to music need not be decided here, but the fact remains that a performance of an immortal symphony, per se, does not attract an audience. Glamour on the podium is the gimmick and the "u" is advisedly inserted because it is so often the magnetic ingredient.

Are conductors in short supply? When our old summertime-neighbor Charles Munch died two months ago, a Paris report named a half-dozen possible candidates to replace him, all of international repute, but all already with permanent contractual posts. No huddle of Monday-morning quarterbacks has a busier agenda than the one which presumes to assign conductors to orchestras. But of all those mentioned by the unofficial authorities the man who assembled and trained the fine Parisian orchestra which Munch brought to this country, Serge Baudo, was not even considered. Probably because he has no international reputation as yet.

* * * *

ONE POSITIVE reason for these games of musical chairs is the wider horizon of programs this situation affords. Audiences get to know a conductor's repertory after he has filled a post year after year of 30-week seasons. Guests bring their favorites, often music outside the interest or acquaintance of the regular conductor. Last fall, Boston had a guest, new to it, who played a Scriabin symphony for the first time in that city. The symphony was written in 1901 while the young Russian composer was a protegé of Serge Koussevitzky. Koussevitzky, two years the composer's junior, was already the patron of the many composers he was to favor during his long and fruitful life.

Orchestras are notoriously polyandrous, entertaining visitors for short terms without a fillip for public opinion. While such a man as Von Karajan is unashamedly polygamous. Some short time ago he held the posts of command at Berlin, Milan, Salzburg and Vienna simultaneously and evidently to everyone's satisfaction. It would be interesting someday to learn which American orchestras have angled for him and, from the other direction, what European offers have been tendered Bernstein. Leinsdorf's engagement list following Boston reads like a catalogue of the opera houses of the Western world.

* * * *

AIR LINES now offer opera tours which will take you to and provide tickets for the world's most famous opera houses, or to the various successive music festivals of Europe. Anyone so inclined could follow Von Karajan and hear "Das Rheingold" in a half-dozen different cities, follow Casals to Prades in the Pyrennes Orientales, to Puerto Rico, Israel and Marlboro and hear him direct the exact same programs in several languages. You could follow Mehta, Ozawa, Maazel, Colin Davis and all the other supernovas and hear the same masterpieces in different halls and with different orchestras.

There appears to be nothing but advantages to this current dispensation. For until such time as we listen to music with eyes closed, as we may in front of our record-players, and no longer require that meaning and spirit and emotion be conveyed through the hands and ballet contortions of a man holding a baton, we shall probably flock to the favorites, whether they be deuterogamous or devoted solely to one orchestra.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JAN 18 1969

New England Newsclip

time to a...
Leonard Bernstein's ...
similar purposes when he takes leave of his 10-year term as music director of the New York Philharmonic in May, 1969.

It is the Third Symphony by Mahler, in which the vocal soloist will be Betty Allen. Along the way to this parting, Bernstein will direct Verdi's "Requiem" and Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

The same announcement identifies the Polish conductor George Semkov as the replacement for Zubin Mehta, whose remarks, derogatory of the Philharmonic's musicians, some months ago was said NOT to be the reason for the deferment of his previously announced engagement.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 21 1968

New England Newsclip

132

Mitchell Resignation Leaves Symphony With Major Problem

By Paul Hume

HOWARD MITCHELL'S plan to retire as conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra gives the orchestra's board of directors its biggest job in 20 years.

On Tuesday, Mitchell announced that he would like to leave his post as head of the orchestra at the end of the 1969-70 season. At a meeting yesterday of the orchestra's executive committee, Mitchell said that he would remain for another season if the board asked him to do so.

In a statement Tuesday, Lloyd Symington, president of the Symphony Association, said that he would recommend to the board that Mitchell "continue for at least five years as a guest conductor for a substantial part of each season," and that Mitchell "should serve as a member of a committee delegated to select the next conductor."

This last suggestion brought varying comments from orchestra officials here and around the country. Thomas Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that Erich Leinsdorf, the conductor of that orchestra, did not serve in any such capacity when William Steinberg was chosen as his successor.

"That is normally the function of the trustees," was Perry's observation.

The press director of the New York Philharmonic said that Leonard Bernstein was not serving in any advisory role in helping to choose the man who will be that orchestra's next music director. He said the choice would be made by the board of directors and a music policy committee.

In Cincinnati, where Max Rudolf recently announced his retirement to be effective the same time as Mitchell's, one of the orchestra's top officials said that Rudolf would be a disaster for any conductor to try and help choose his successor."

This was also the opinion of Peter Mennin, the president of the Juilliard School in New York, who is continually consulted about the promising conductors for the many orchestral positions that are now opening up around the country.

"I have never heard of any situation where the retiring conductor helped to choose the man who replaced him," Mennin said.

At yesterday's executive committee meeting, the question was raised of whether the new music director of the National Symphony had to be an American. There were differing opinions, but the view was strongly advanced that the National Symphony Orchestra needs and must engage the very finest, strongest conductor it can find, regardless of nationality.

"We'll make an American of him if he isn't one," said one member of the executive committee.

The field of symphony conductors is a large one, today, but there are few great ones. In the younger crop, all of whom are now being closely scrutinized by orchestras in Cincinnati, Boston and now Washington, there are several who show great promise but who at the moment might be lacking in the broad repertory and experienced needed for the demands of a major orchestral season in this country, a kind of season no European conductor ever faces.

An illustration of the shortage in top conductors that now exists is seen in the fact that three American conductors are now in charge of six major orchestras. George Szell, music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, will take the same title with the New York Philharmonic next fall following Bernstein's retirement in June.

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, has made a similar doubling arrangement with the Boston Symphony as of the same date, following Leinsdorf's resignation. Andre Previn is both music director of the Houston Symphony and principal conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. Steinberg's Boston duties, however, are reported to be of an interim nature until Boston can find the man it wants as full-time man.

Szell once said that he was happy with his great Cleveland Orchestra for the rest of his life, but the rumor is that if he is happy with Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall after next summer's expenditure of $900,000 on its acoustical problems, he might make the move to New York permanent.

The National Symphony might well decide to make a similar move by engaging one of the few great American conductors, Alfred Wallenstein, as music director for a period of two to five years while carrying on the necessary vigorous search for a successor to Mitchell.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357

DEC 12 1968

Symphony Changes

Bernstein Quits, Steinberg Goes To Boston To Conduct

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

NEW YORK (AP) — Music circles have been predicting that the three conductors to be found at the end of the Great Conductor Hunt will be very young men with a dramatic way with a baton and sex appeal for ladies in the audience.

Top job in three of the country's most prestigious orchestras recently became vacant. Leonard Bernstein is leaving the New York Philharmonic to write music. Erich Leinsdorf has resigned from the Boston Symphony because of overwork. Jean Martinon, under fire in Chicago, already has left the Chicago Symphony to conduct in Paris. So far the junior Bernsteins have not gotten their jobs.

Chicago is negotiating with George Solti, 56, of Covent Garden. The New York Philharmonic has hired George Szell, 71, music director of the Cleveland Symphony, as musical adviser and senior guest conductor, while it continues to look around.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

The Boston Symphony has hired William Steinberg, 69, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, as its music director — making him the first conductor ever to be music director of two major United States orchestras at the same time.

STEINBERG will conduct 15 of the Boston Symphony's 30 winter weeks, under a three-year contract to start next fall. Pittsburgh, perhaps as a show of appreciation, perhaps to keep Steinberg from moving to Boston, has given him a new contract with an unlimited duration. It calls for 16 weeks of conducting each season.

He was hired by Boston, Steinberg says frankly, partly for his opinion. All the conductors that Boston would consider hiring at the end of Steinberg's three years will be invited to be guest conductors and the board of directors wants to know what Steinberg thinks of them.

Steinberg is pleased that New York, Boston and Chicago did not rush out and hire some of the flashy young men on the international conducting scene.

"The translation of the word 'conducting' for me is 'experience.' It does not mean only learning repertoire but also maturity in order to approach the human angle from the proper side. No doubt that's the most difficult problem of our profession — how to approach an orchestra and get from the players the best they have.

"In the flamboyant approach to music, I always translate 'flamboyant' as 'wrong tempi.' These are my translations.

"It is only to be hoped that audiences find their way back to music and forget about the visual aspects. Toscanini's unbelievable simplicity led the audience to believe that he was doing a job which everybody could have done. Bruno Walter was uneventful to look at compared to today's young chaps who dance in front of the audience. I'm told I'm just as uninteresting."

BUT IF one thought that Steinberg would go farther and suggest that a listener play recordings at home, so the conductor wouldn't be visible at all, one would be wrong.

He says, "There is no substitute for any live performance. A person gets more out of a live performance, by feeling the physical proximity of the executors, by having your nervous system and theirs in the same room."

Classical Music Sees Changes

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

NEW YORK (AP) — In classical music, 1968 was a year to cause the exclamation, "It seems like only yesterday!!!"

It seems like only yesterday that Leonard Bernstein was a boy genius, an infant terrible. In 1968, he celebrated his 50th birthday and started his last season conducting the New York Philharmonic, before retiring to compose and be silvering-haired elder statesman of music.

It seems like only yesterday that Maria Callas and Renata Tebaldi were fighting the Metropolitan Opera's most fiery feud. On Met opening night, 1968, they came face to face backstage and executed, not each other, but a genteel embrace.

And so on. Pianist Dave Brubeck led a respected jazz quartet for 16 years. In 1968, his first classical composition was given its world premiere by the Cincinnati Symphony, an oratorio, "The Light in the Wilderness." Critics applauded.

The New Jersey Symphony in Newark became the first major U.S. symphony to name a Negro as music director. Henry Lewis, 35, who also had been the first Negro to play in a major U.S. orchestra—double bass in the Los Angeles Philharmonic picked up the baton in June.

Seiji Ozawa, Japanese-born 32-year-old conductor, was hired by the San Francisco Symphony.

Vladimir Horowitz played the first uninterrupted piano recital on television.

The Santa Fe Opera built a new opera house, replacing the one that burned in 1967, and included in the "initiation" season two U.S. premieres of 12-tone operas, Arnold Schoenberg's "Jacob's Ladder" and Hans Werner Henze's "The Bassarids." The St. Louis Symphony got a new home, too, a converted movie palace, Powell Symphony Hall, replacing Kiel Auditorium, which it had shared with a sports arena.

Among the premieres of the year were "Eleventh Symphony" by Roy Harris, 70, "Sixth Symphony" by Howard Hanson, 71, "Eighth Symphony" by Roger Sessions, 71, all by the New York Philharmonic;

"Piano Concerto No. 2" by Benjamin Lees, 44, by the Boston Symphony and pianist Gary Graffman, who termed the work "major;" "Symphony No. 1" by Oliver Knussen, 15, the composer conducting the London Symphony. He was called very promising.

Germany's best-known composer, Carl Orff, 77, who wrote "Carmina Burana" in 1936, saw the premiere of his "Prometheus Bound" by the Stuttgart Opera.

France's best-known composer, Darius Milhaud, 75, delivered "Music for New Orleans," commissioned by the New Orleans Philharmonic in honor of the city's 250th anniversary. But conductor Werner Torkanowsky turned it down as unworthy and played Milhaud's 1923 "La Creation du Monde."

In the avant-garde, Stanley Silver, 30, music director of the Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, saw his pop opera "Elephant Steps," premiered at Tanglewood. It sounded like a radio with dials being twisted fast.

A Los Angeles Philharmonic tympanist, William Kraft, 44, had his "Contextures: Riots—Decade 60" played by his orchestra, with films and stills going along with the first, fourth and fifth movements.

Charles Munch, 77, who led the Boston Symphony from 1949-62, with the symphony usually underrehearsed, but sometimes inspired in performance, came out of retirement last year to lead the newly created Orchestra de Paris. He died in November, on a tour, in Richmond, Va. Howard Lebow, 32, one of the most promising of the young American pianists, died in January in an automobile accident.

Composer William Schuman announced his resignation as president of Lincoln Center, after seven years, saying it needed a money raiser.

ALLIANCE REVIEW
ALLIANCE, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 15,074

JAN-7--69

time to a...
Leonard Bernstein's ...
similar purposes when he takes leave of his 10-year term as music director of the New York Philharmonic in May, 1969.

It is the Third Symphony by Mahler, in which the vocal soloist will be Betty Allen. Along the way to this parting, Bernstein will direct Verdi's "Requiem" and Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

The same announcement identifies the Polish conductor George Semkov as the replacement for Zubin Mehta, whose remarks, derogatory of the Philharmonic's musicians, some months ago was said NOT to be the reason for the deferment of his previously announced engagement.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,9..0

JUL 21 1968

New England Newsclip

Bigamy, Digamy Stops, The Chef D'Orchestre Hops

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THERE USED to be a time when a conductor was faithful to one orchestra. Oh, once in a while he might have taken a quick trip to a nearby city or been detained late at the office of another orchestra. But it is becoming the rule now, rather than the exception, that a man serves two or more orchestral masters.

* * * *

WHEN ERICH Leinsdorf leaves the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this coming Tanglewood season, William Steinberg will go to Boston from Pittsburgh for three years but on an arrangement which will make it advisable for him to leave a pair of pajamas in western Pennsylvania.

And now this past month Chicago has announced officially what has been rumored and whispered openly for some months. Georg Solti will become the musical director of its orchestra for three years, sharing the post with Carlo Maria Giulini as principal guest conductor. Solti will retain his title and responsibilities as musical director of London's Royal Opera house and Giulini will remain on the staff of the Rome Opera.

This is now the accepted pattern of podium activities. John Barbirolli was conductor at Houston the last few seasons and also of his old Halle orchestra in Manchester, England. St. Petersburg in Florida shares André Previn with London. Conductors are the air lines' best customers. Shades of Louis XIV: What validates all this hopping around?

* * * *

THERE ARE many reasons to be sure. Near the top in importance is the glamour with which we have invested the position of conductor. We no longer go, or at least go less and more's the pity, to hear the Mahler first or the Brahms third but to Bernstein's Mahler or to Szell's Brahms. Now whether this is an intelligent or a sophisticated approach to music need not be decided here, but the fact remains that a performance of an immortal symphony, per se, does not attract an audience. Glamour on the podium is the gimmick and the "u" is advisedly inserted because it is so often the magnetic ingredient.

Are conductors in short supply? When our old summertime-neighbor Charles Munch died two months ago, a Paris report named a half-dozen possible candidates to replace him, all of international repute, but all already with permanent contractual posts. No huddle of Monday-morning quarterbacks has a busier agenda than the one which presumes to assign conductors to orchestras. But of all those mentioned by the unofficial authorities the man who assembled and trained the fine Parisian orchestra which Munch brought to this country, Serge Baudo, was not even considered. Probably because he has no international reputation as yet.

* * * *

ONE POSITIVE reason for these games of musical chairs is the wider horizon of programs this situation affords. Audiences get to know a conductor's repertory after he has filled a post year after year of 30-week seasons. Guests bring their favorites, often music outside the interest or acquaintance of the regular conductor. Last fall, Boston had a guest, new to it, who played a Scriabin symphony for the first time in that city. The symphony was written in 1901 while the young Russian composer was a protegé of Serge Koussevitzky. Koussevitzky, two years the composer's junior, was already the patron of the many composers he was to favor during his long and fruitful life.

Orchestras are notoriously polyandrous, entertaining visitors for short terms without a fillip for public opinion. While such a man as Von Karajan is unashamedly polygamous. Some short time ago he held the posts of command at Berlin, Milan, Salzburg and Vienna simultaneously and evidently to everyone's satisfaction. It would be interesting someday to learn which American orchestras have angled for him and, from the other direction, what European offers have been tendered Bernstein. Leinsdorf's engagement list following Boston reads like a catalogue of the opera houses of the Western world.

* * * *

AIR LINES now offer opera tours which will take you to and provide tickets for the world's most famous opera houses, or to the various successive music festivals of Europe. Anyone so inclined could follow Von Karajan and hear "Das Rheingold" in a half-dozen different cities, follow Casals to Prades in the Pyrennes Orientales, to Puerto Rico, Israel and Marlboro and hear him direct the exact same programs in several languages. You could follow Mehta, Ozawa, Maazel, Colin Davis and all the other supernovas and hear the same masterpieces in different halls and with different orchestras.

There appears to be nothing but advantages to this current dispensation. For until such time as we listen to music with eyes closed, as we may in front of our record players, and no longer require that meaning and spirit and emotion be conveyed through the hands and ballet contortions of a man holding a baton, we shall probably flock to the favorites, whether they be deuterogamous or devoted solely to one orchestra.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JAN 18 1969

New England Newsclip

Music

Washington Has Conductor Woes

BY PAUL HUME

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Who will be the conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra after Howard Mitchell retires in 1970?

The hottest item about any orchestra is its conductor. It was true in the days when Lully was conducting orchestras for Louis XIV and died of gangrene after bopping himself on the foot with his long staff-baton. It is still true today when men from India and Japan match podium stances with the best of Austria, Italy and the United States.

Every time an orchestra that has been great has been turned over to a second or third or fourth-rate conductor, it has begun to play and sound like a less-than-great orchestra on the road to mediocrity.

Two things about this kind of situation are bad: Audiences, which often take it for granted that if a man can get 100 musicians to play together and in tune he must have something special, begin to forget what really great music sounds like; and musicians, allowed to dip from their former high level of playing, get used to slips that quickly lead to shoddiness.

Rule: A great conductor, acting as guest, can make a less-than-great orchestra sound better than it does in its usual performances.

Rule: An ordinary conductor cannot make a less-than-great orchestra sound better than its customary self.

The National Symphony Orchestra has never been a great orchestra. Founded in 1931 by Hans Kindler, it moved through the difficult early years of becoming an integrated ensemble to what we can call the status of a third-class orchestra.

"The National Symphony is capable of becoming a very fine orchestra"

Kindler worked hard at first to help his players achieve a kind of precision and tone that would be presentable in the standard repertoire and in those new works he regularly introduced to his audiences.

In 1949, Howard Mitchell succeeded the deposed Kindler, and began the work of improving the orchestra, succeeding to the point where, for a number of years, the National Symphony was rated alongside the orchestras of Pittsburgh, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Detroit and Cincinnati as a solid second-class ensemble, though not to be compared to those of Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, New York or Philadelphia.

Mitchell achieved this upgrading through technical improvements, the engaging of better players and a steady strengthening of the repertoire. But, as often happens in the history of orchestras and their conductors, Mitchell reached a plateau beyond which he was unable to rise. And after roughly 14 or 15 years, the orchestra began to slip slowly but unmistakably back from its highest attainments. The reasons for the drop were by no means entirely musical.

As he became more securely established in his position, Mitchell and the orchestra's management went through a pair of strikes which were intensely bitter and not unrelated to the players' widespread dislike of Mitchell. It is not at all unusual for orchestral musicians to dislike, even to hate their conductors. Stories with plenty of truth to them pile up around the antipathy with which players reacted toward Fritz Reiner, Toscanini and today, George Szell.

Those men attained the highest peaks as supreme conductors, and musicians played their best for them even while they hated them. Howard Mitchell, being no Reiner or Toscanini, has not, in recent years, been able to compel from the National Symphony its best playing except in rare moments. As a rule the orchestra has played at its peak only under the welcome spur of some outstanding soloist for whom they wanted to give their best.

Hume is music critic for the Washington Post.

As a result, National Symphony concerts have become a uniform shade of gray, usually described in New York reviews as "pallid, academic, pedestrian," or just plain "dull." The reason is, always and without exception, the conducting.

When Alfred Wallenstein, Leonard Bernstein and Eugene Ormandy have appeared as guest conductors with the National Symphony within the past three years, the results have been nothing less than transforming. Afterwards, each of those conductors has insisted that the orchestra is, basically, a fine one.

Thus it seems irrefutable that the National Symphony Orchestra as it stands today, with some minor changes, is capable of being and becoming a very fine orchestra. The word "great" is withheld since that achievement depends upon the precise man put in charge of its future.

Basically the National Symphony, like any great orchestra, needs those two things which are the conductor's chief province: technical and tonal excellence, as a norm; and a repertoire that reflects today's world of music. These have been long absent from National Symphony programs.

Washington is a choice prize for a conductor today. The Kennedy Center, to open in less than two years, will be the focal spot for close study both by Americans and artists from all over the world. The National Symphony Orchestra must be qualified for its proper place in that center, a qualification it does not now possess.

The new conductor of the National Symphony will take for granted a free hand in his choice of repertoire, soloists and, to the extent that the rule of the local chapter of the Musicians Union allows, the selection of new musicians for the orchestra, both to enlarge it and to replace those who may be retiring or who should be replaced.

Where is this new conductor of the National Symphony? Who is he? How old? What nationality? That last question was one of the first to be raised and answered by the NSO executive committee. They agreed, the day after Mitchell's impending retirement was announced, that the new conductor "did not have to be an American." That is a very wise decision. The world has become more closely knit and more internationalized in music lately. The right answer to the question of "who?" for the National Symphony is: "The very best man we can find, the absolute best."

In recent weeks I have made a list of conductors from all over the world. So far I have 102 names on the list, and it is by no means complete. But these men are now conducting.

Some have regular permanent orchestral assignments, others are in charge of opera houses. With few exceptions, each would conceivably jump at the opportunity of becoming the new conductor of the National Symphony—assuming that the changes necessary to its improvement lying outside their own talents were assured.

But the National Symphony is beginning its search in a competitive market. The New York Philharmonic is also looking. So is the Boston Symphony, though it has engaged William Steinberg as music director. After all, Steinberg is also in charge of the Pittsburgh Symphony, and his Boston assignment must be viewed as an interim affair to give the BSO further time. Cincinnati, too, wants a new man at the very same time as Washington.

"The orchestra begins its search for a new conductor in a competitive market"

This is not an era of many great conductors as it was when you could look at home and abroad and hear Toscanini, Koussevitsky, Stokowski, Reiner, Beecham, Kleiber, Monteux, Furtwängler, Ormandy, Klemperer, Szell and Rodzinski, all at work simultaneously.

The principal younger conductors who are always mentioned in any parlor where the name of the game is "who will get what orchestra?" are Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Istvan Kertesz, Lorin Maazel, Zubin Mehta and Seiji Ozawa. Each has been seen and heard in recent guest engagements with our greatest orchestras. Abbado, from Milan, is highly praised by Wanda Horowitz, daughter of Arturo Toscanini. Davis, from England, has made a strong impression with the orchestras of Boston, New York and Philadelphia.

Kertesz, a Hungarian—like Reiner, Szell, Ormandy and Solti—is highly rated by some of our top conductors. Maazel, born in Paris of American parents, is happy with the East Berlin Radio and Opera; Mehta, born in India, has the Los Angeles Philharmonic but could be persuaded to move; Ozawa, the vastly gifted young Japanese, has just signed with the San Francisco Symphony for the fall of 1970. But is that airtight?

HOWARD MITCHELL

Unusually strong impressions have been made on records by Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos, born in Spain of German parents; Charles Mackerras, from Australia, now busy in opera and symphony circles in Europe; Georges Pretre, probably the best qualified of French conductors today except for Pierre Boulez, who is extraordinary in a somewhat limited repertoire.

The dark horse division is larger in this race than a sharp handicapper likes. Names pop up like Christoph von Dohnanyi, nephew of the late composer and a gifted man working much in Vienna; Georg Semkow of Poland, who just wowed them up in Boston; Alain Lombard, a Mitropoulos Competition winner, now conductor of the Miami Symphony; or the younger Americans, Jorge Mester, with experience in Louisville, Aspen, and here with the Opera Society; and Erich Kunzel, greatly able assistant in Cincinnati, likely to finish well up in any race.

A salary in the range of $50 to $60,000 will probably bring Washington the conductor of its choice. For that figure, it should be possible to find the man who will revitalize a ready orchestra, give vitality and luster to a repertoire that has long failed to reflect the times, and introduce many soloists both established and less familiar whose continuing absence has been one of the unhappier puzzles of the present regime.

The new man also has a superb chance, in the orchestra's summer home at Columbia, Md., to offer the Washington-Baltimore area a truly exciting festive summer in place of the scandalously under-rehearsed mini-orchestra that has been palmed off on the relatively few who have gone out to see the Post Pavilion.

There is no good reason why a National Symphony concert should not be as genuinely satisfying as those by the orchestras of Cleveland, New York, Boston and Philadelphia.

Altogether, the board is facing its greatest challenge and its greatest opportunity.

Los Angeles Times
FEB 9 1969

Great Conductor Hunt Begun In Boston, New York, Chicago

NEW YORK (AP) — Music circles have been predicting that the three conductors to be found at the end of the Great Conductor Hunt will be very young men with a dramatic way with a baton and sex appeal for ladies in the audience.

Top job in three of the country's most prestigious orchestras recently became vacant. Leonard Bernstein is leaving the New York Philharmonic to write music. Erich Leinsdorf has resigned from the Boston Symphony because of overwork. Jean Martinon, under fire in Chicago, already has left the Chicago Symphony to conduct in Paris. So far the junior Bernsteins have not gotten their jobs.

Chicago is negotiating with Georg Solti, 56, of Covent Garden. The New York Philharmonic has hired Georg Szell, 71, music director of the Cleveland Symphony, as musical adviser and senior guest conductor, while it continues to look around.

The Boston Symphony has hired William Steinberg, 69, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, as its music director—making him the first conductor ever to be music director of two major United States orchestras at the same time.

Steinberg will conduct 15 of the Boston Symphony's 30 winter weeks, under a three-year contract to start next fall. Pittsburgh, perhaps as a show of appreciation, perhaps to keep Steinberg from moving to Boston, has given him a new contract with an unlimited duration. It calls for 16 weeks of conducting each season.

He was hired by Boston, Steinberg says frankly, partly for his opinion. All the conductors that Boston would consider hiring at the end of Steinberg's three years will be invited to be guest conductors and the board of directors wants to know what Steinberg thinks of them. "They want to be guided by my judgment. You can see what kind of responsibility this is."

And what about Pittsburgh, where he has been since 1952. Is its board also asking Steinberg to recommend a future successor? "Nobody has ever asked me," he says, smiling. "In Pittsburgh nobody believes I will ever stop. If I'm out, they close."

Steinberg is pleased that New York, Boston and Chicago did not rush out and hire some of the flashy young men on the international conducting scene.

"The translation of the word 'conducting' for me is 'experience.' It does not mean only learning repertoire but also maturity in order to approach the human angle from the proper side. No doubt that's the most difficult problem of our profession—how to approach an orchestra and get from the players the best they have.

"In the flamboyant approach to music, I always translate 'flamboyant' as 'wrong tempi.' These are my translations, understand.

"It is only to be hoped that audiences find their way back to music and forget about the visual aspects. Toscanini's unbelievable simplicity led the audience to believe that he was doing a job which everybody could have done. Bruno Walter was uneventful to look at compared to today's young chaps who dance in front of the audience. I'm told I'm just as uninteresting."

But if one thought that Steinberg would go farther and suggest that a listener play recordings at home, so the conductor wouldn't be visible at all, one would be wrong.

He says, "There is no substitute for any live performance. A person gets more out of a live performance, by feeling the physical proximity of the executors, by having your nervous system and theirs in the same room."

SENTINEL (e)
FITCHBURG, MASS.
CIRC. 20,496

MAR 24 1969

New England Newsclip

134

Changing Conductors Is Old Hat

By HARVEY SOUTHGATE

So another Rochester Philharmonic conductor moves toward the exit door after a relatively brief stay on the Rochester stage. Although he will conduct five of next season's 15 concerts, Laszlo Somogyi has announced his retirement next year.

Many of us will be genuinely sorry to see him go. He has given us many excellent programs in his four-year stay —with novelties mixed with well-liked warhorses. In spite of stories about smoldering resentments in the orchestra he leaves a large part of the public wondering what it is all about. On the surface he is a well-liked public figure. To his intimates he is a pleasant, affable, considerate gentleman.

Now we are due for another round of guest conductors, from one of whom, presumably, a new conductor will be picked. Then again maybe he will be none of these. Theodore Bloomfield, it will be recalled, was picked to succeed Erich Leinsdorf in 1958 without ever having been in Rochester. His name was unknown here, but his success as conductor of the Portland, Ore., symphony orchestra, persuaded members of the Civic Music Association he would bring a new tonic to Rochester music.

If the CMA has anybody in mind as Somogyi's successor it is keeping it closely hidden.

THIS IS THE THIRD TIME in the last dozen years that we have been through this business of changing conductors, and the pattern has been about the same each time. It has been more or less the pattern, in fact, since the orchestra was formed in 1923. Albert Coates, who was George Eastman's personal choice, was here for only two years, notwithstanding that older musicians say he was the best conductor the orchestra ever had.

Eugene Goosens, unknown here when he arrived from England in 1923 soon demonstrated he was an up and coming figure of great promise. For the first two years he was co-conductor with Coates. He left here in 1931 for Cincinnati. Jose Iturbi, perhaps the most colorful of them all, served from 1936 to 1944—including plenty of time off for other engagements, including piano appearances in Hollywood films. Erich Leinsdorf was here for eight years—1947-55.

The period from 1931 to 1936 was rather extraordinary in that it was filled entirely by guest conductors. It must have been a golden age for conductors, for the list included Fritz Reiner, Sir Thomas Beecham, Henry Hadley, Guy Fraser Harrison, Walter Damrosch, Hamilton Harty and others of world renown.

Actually the time the regular conductors have served the one orchestra is about par for the course. How many conductors can you think of who have remained more than a dozen years or so in any city? Ormandy at Philadelphia, Szell at Cleveland, Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic (we guess), and a few others but certainly not many.

It seems to be the fashion for conductors to move around. They are usually high strung, temperamental individuals, and they are dealing with temperamental, high strung artists—not to mention, money-minded, critical audiences. Not being able to please everybody, they usually end up trying to please mainly themselves—that is, in getting performances that they at least think are good.

THE PUBLIC AND THE board members who select the conductors are not of much help in keeping them on the job. What do the concertgoers who buy Philharmonic tickets think of Maestro Somogyi, for example? He came here after receiving standing ovations as a guest conductor. He seemed to be the people's choice out of a large number of other guest conductors. The CMA has told us that the number of paid subscribers to the Philharmonic in the last few years has broken records. His concerts have been well received, although not to the point of ovations except when some particularly popular soloist was featured.

If there has been any deep-seated dislike of the conductor or his programs it certainly has not been brought into the open. We wish it had, for after all it is the opinion of the people who buy tickets that ought to carry more weight than that of anybody else. Aside from the applause, there appears to be no way of getting a really sound expression of public opinion.

Yet it is the concertgoing public, not the orchestra nor the CMA, in theory at least, that ought to have the most to say about the man chosen. Of course theory can break down if the public is moved to toss the palm because a conductor is young and exotic, or an attractive foreigner, or perhaps because he is old and sentimentalized.

Who can say what the answer is? As usual we will have to wait and see.

Coates 1923-25 | Goossens 1923-31 | Iturbi 1936-44 | Leinsdorf 1947-55 | Bloomfield 1958-64 | Somogyi 1964-70

The Rochester Philharmonic has had these six permanent conductors since 1923.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 423,157
MAR 2 1969

Symphonic Scene Like Musical Chairs

By ALAN BRANIGAN
Newark News Music Critic

The great orchestral game of musical chairs is increasing its pace and it is interesting to see what has been happening. One thing is certain—the music lover in the next few years must get used to a whole new set of circumstances. In the words of Bob Dylan, the times, they are a-changing.

The biggest change will be in the Boston Symphony, which is not only an orchestra but also a complex of tours, recordings, a summer home and traditions of long standing. The dapper, intense Erich Leinsdorf, who succeeded Charles Munch in the post of musical director, is stepping down. Taking his place on the rostrum will be William Steinberg.

Steinberg presumably has been heading for this post over a period of years, and it is one that he should be able to hold with added prestige for the orchestra and his own boundless talent. As Montclairites saw this season in a Unity concert, and a recent Mahler concert in New York further demonstrated, Steinberg is a tremendously capable and scholarly conductor, with a solidity and profound grasp that remind one of Reiner and Monteux.

In his varied American career, Steinberg has had all sorts of positions. He came here first as assistant to Toscanini at the NBC Symphony, after a period with the Palestine Symphony, in existence even before Israel was a country. Subsequent jobs led finally to his immensely successful stay with the Pittsburgh, where he will continue while also conducting the Boston.

The Boston has had comparatively few directors over the past half a century, that is, after Karl Muck was banished for being a German. Pierre Monteux held the podium for a while; and then the long and prosperous regime of Serge Koussevitzky began. It was a unique period. The redoubtable Russian may not have been the world's best baton technician, but he had a abountiful list of assets — a personal magnetism, a rich wife, advanced taste in music and a remarkable executive ability in music. His encouragement of American composers alone would have made his regime notable.

The orchestra thrived under his rule and even became established in the beautiful estate of Tanglewood on the outskirts of Lenox, Mass. There began the Berkshire Festival, a glamorous retreat for many tourists.

After Leinsdorf departs, incidentally, the Tanglewood project will be directed by Seigi Ozawa in the musical field and Gunther Schuler in the educational area.

Dr. Charles Munch's decade of ruling the Boston contained many triumphs, especially in French music, in which Munch was pre-eminent. He was a traditionalist and a person of fastidious tastes. His interpretation of Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" was world famous.

Leinsdorf, tiny, well schooled in all kinds of music, a Viennese to his finger tips in matters of warmth and communication, will be missed in Boston, although there are a few who still think that the mingling of Leinsdorf and the Boston was not the best for all concerned. It is possible also that Leinsdorf's heart really is in the opera house rather than in the symphonic area.

Bernstein to Advise

The New York Philharmonic has its own problems. Leonard Bernstein is leaving at the end of this season. Among his future positions will be that of adviser at Tanglewood, where he learned much about conducting from Koussevitzky.

Just as Steinberg will be moonlighting from his Pittsburgh assignment, so will George Szell be holding two conductorships. He will be leading his own Cleveland Orchestra and at the same time will be senior conductor at the Philharmonic. It is a good thing that the breed of conductors is hardy, long-lived and tireless.

Still one more change in the musical scene — Antal Dorati has signed a two-year contract to conduct the National Symphony in Washington, D.C. after the retirement of Howard Mitchell. There will be others, assuredly, in a musical scene that is rife with change.

Russian Series

The Russians tend to do things in a large way. For instance, Mstislav Rostropovich two seasons ago played 36 cello concertos in one series in England. Now the Moscow Symphony Orchestra is in New York, midway through a series of 12 ambitious concerts within a few weeks and it has come to be one of the biggest hits of the season. It is, at any rate, with the capacity audiences who seem, to our eyes at least, to be of a distinctly Slavic nature.

The orchestra itself is a superbly trained ensemble, but different from American symphonies in some ways. As an example, the strings give off a different sound, traceable to the inferiority of the instruments they use. The strings just do not have the lushness of the Philadelphia or Boston Symphonies. The brass instruments of the Russians have an odd, thin sound, especially in the trumpets and French horns, which have a sensitive but somehow lacklustre tone. The oboes are strange, almost like ancient shawms. The double basses are fantastic, and so is the bazooka-type timpanist.

It is indicative of something that the programs of this Soviet series have had to rely to a very large extent on Czarist composers. Tchaikovsky is the big hero, with his tone poems, symphonies and instrumental concertos. Moussorgsky, Rachmaninov and Liadov are other old-regime musicians whose works are in use. About the only Soviet composer in view is Shostakovich, a program of whose works is being given, conducted, interestingly enough, by his son, Maxim.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 142,794 SUN. 218,586
APR 13 1969

SCHIPPERS TAKING OVER CINCINNATI BATON

CINCINNATI—Thomas Schippers has signed a three-year contract as music director of the Cincinnati Symphony beginning with the 1970-'71 season. Schippers will succeed Max Rudolf, who is retiring.

The appointment is the latest of a series of new conducting assignments for major U. S. orchestras. William Steinberg will succeed Erich Leinsdorf at the Boston Symphony; Seiji Ozawa replaces Josef Krips at San Francisco; Antal Dorati succeeds Howard Mitchell with the Washington National Symphony; and Georg Solti replaces Jean Martinon in Chicago. A successor has yet to be named for Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic, where George Szell will be principal guest conductor next season.

The Cincinnati is under exclusive recording contract to Decca and has recorded albums under Rudolf and Associate Conductor Erich Kunzel for that label. Schippers has recorded for RCA, Columbia, London and Angel.

Schippers' schedule with the Cincinnati will be arranged to permit his international schedule of guest conducting plus his conducting assignments at La Scala in Milan and the Metropolitan Opera in New York. Rudolf will head the opera department at Philadelphia's Curtis Institute of Music.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
APR 19 1969

Classical Notes

Pianist Rudolf Firkusny will be the soloist with William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony in an all-Beethoven pair on Friday (18) and Sunday (20) at Syria Mosque. . . . French pianist Jean-Bernard Pommier makes his New York debut with orchestra with Alexander Schneider and his chamber orchestra with two concerts at the New School Sunday (20). . . . Pierre Boulez conducts the Cleveland Orchestra in Battle Creek, Mich., Monday (14); East Lansing, Mich., Tuesday (15); Lafayette, Ind., Wednesday (16); Bloomington, Ind., Thursday (17); and Toledo, Friday (18). Soloists for the tour will be concertmaster Rafael Druian and principal clarinetist Robert Marcellus.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw" and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9" in the Boston Symphony's final concert pair of the season Friday (18) and Saturday (19). Soloists in the Beethoven symphony will be soprano Jane Marsh, mezzo-soprano Josephine Veasey, tenor Placido Domingo, and baritone Sherrill Milnes. Milnes also will be narrator in the Schoenberg work. . . . The Kansas Wesleyan Philharmonic Chior performed in Cincinnati Sunday (6); Worthington, Ohio, Monday (7), and Norwalk, Ohio, Tuesday (8).

134

Changing Conductors Is Old Hat

By HARVEY SOUTHGATE

So another Rochester Philharmonic conductor moves toward the exit door after a relatively brief stay on the Rochester stage. Although he will conduct five of next season's 15 concerts, Laszlo Somogyi has announced his retirement next year.

Many of us will be genuinely sorry to see him go. He has given us many excellent programs in his four-year stay —with novelties mixed with well-liked warhorses. In spite of stories about smoldering resentments in the orchestra he leaves a large part of the public wondering what it is all about. On the surface he is a well-liked public figure. To his intimates he is a pleasant, affable, considerate gentleman.

Now we are due for another round of guest conductors, from one of whom, presumably, a new conductor will be picked. Then again maybe he will be none of these. Theodore Bloomfield, it will be recalled, was picked to succeed Erich Leinsdorf in 1958 without ever having been in Rochester. His name was unknown here, but his success as conductor of the Portland, Ore., symphony orchestra, persuaded members of the Civic Music Association he would bring a new tonic to Rochester music.

If the CMA has anybody in mind as Somogyi's successor it is keeping it closely hidden.

Coates 1923-25 | Goossens 1923-31 | Iturbi 1936-44 | Leinsdorf 1947-55 | Bloomfield 1958-64 | Somogyi 1964-70

The Rochester Philharmonic has had these six permanent conductors since 1923.

THIS IS THE THIRD TIME in the last dozen years that we have been through this business of changing conductors, and the pattern has been about the same each time. It has been more or less the pattern, in fact, since the orchestra was formed in 1923. Albert Coates, who was George Eastman's personal choice, was here for only two years, notwithstanding that older musicians say he was the best conductor the orchestra ever had.

Eugene Goosens, unknown here when he arrived from England in 1923 soon demonstrated he was an up and coming figure of great promise. For the first two years he was co-conductor with Coates. He left here in 1931 for Cincinnati. Jose Iturbi, perhaps the most colorful of them all, served from 1936 to 1944—including plenty of time off for other engagements, including piano appearances in Hollywood films. Erich Leinsdorf was here for eight years—1947-55.

The period from 1931 to 1936 was rather extraordinary in that it was filled entirely by guest conductors. It must have been a golden age for conductors, for the list included Fritz Reiner, Sir Thomas Beecham, Henry Hadley, Guy Fraser Harrison, Walter Damrosch, Hamilton Harty and others of world renown.

Actually the time the regular conductors have served the one orchestra is about par for the course. How many conductors can you think of who have remained more than a dozen years or so in any city? Ormandy at Philadelphia, Szell at Cleveland, Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic (we guess), and a few others but certainly not many.

It seems to be the fashion for conductors to move around. They are usually high strung, temperamental individuals, and they are dealing with temperamental, high strung artists—not to mention, money-minded, critical audiences. Not being able to please everybody, they usually end up trying to please mainly themselves—that is, in getting performances that they at least think are good.

THE PUBLIC AND THE board members who select the conductors are not of much help in keeping them on the job. What do the concertgoers who buy Philharmonic tickets think of Maestro Somogyi, for example? He came here after receiving standing ovations as a guest conductor. He seemed to be the people's choice out of a large number of other guest conductors. The CMA has told us that the number of paid subscribers to the Philharmonic in the last few years has broken records. His concerts have been well received, although not to the point of ovations except when some particularly popular soloist was featured.

If there has been any deep-seated dislike of the conductor or his programs it certainly has not been brought into the open. We wish it had, for after all it is the opinion of the people who buy tickets that ought to carry more weight than that of anybody else. Aside from the applause, there appears to be no way of getting a really sound expression of public opinion.

Yet it is the concertgoing public, not the orchestra nor the CMA, in theory at least, that ought to have the most to say about the man chosen. Of course theory can break down if the public is moved to toss the palm because a conductor is young and exotic, or an attractive foreigner, or perhaps because he is old and sentimentalized.

Who can say what the answer is? As usual we will have to wait and see.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 423,157

MAR 2 1969

Symphonic Scene Like Musical Chairs

By ALAN BRANIGAN
Newark News Music Critic

The great orchestral game of musical chairs is increasing its pace and it is interesting to see what has been happening. One thing is certain—the music lover in the next few years must get used to a whole new set of circumstances. In the words of Bob Dylan, the times, they are a-changing.

The biggest change will be in the Boston Symphony, which is not only an orchestra but also a complex of tours, recordings, a summer home and traditions of long standing. The dapper, intense Erich Leinsdorf, who succeeded Charles Munch in the post of musical director, is stepping down. Taking his place on the rostrum will be William Steinberg.

Steinberg presumably has been heading for this post over a period of years, and it is one that he should be able to hold with added prestige for the orchestra and his own boundless talent. As Montclairites saw this season in a Unity concert, and a recent Mahler concert in New York further demonstrated, Steinberg is a tremendously capable and scholarly conductor, with a solidity and profound grasp that remind one of Reiner and Monteux.

In his varied American career, Steinberg has had all sorts of positions. He came here first as assistant to Toscanini at the NBC Symphony, after a period with the Palestine Symphony, in existence even before Israel was a country. Subsequent jobs led finally to his immensely successful stay with the Pittsburgh, where he will continue while also conducting the Boston.

The Boston has had comparatively few directors over the past half a century, that is, after Karl Muck was banished for being a German. Pierre Monteux held the podium for a while, and then the long and prosperous regime of Serge Koussevitzky began. It was a unique period. The redoubtable Russian may not have been the world's best baton technician, but he had a abountiful list of assets — a personal magnetism, a rich wife, advanced taste in music and a remarkable executive ability in music. His encouragement of American composers alone would have made his regime notable.

The orchestra thrived under his rule and even became established in the beautiful estate of Tanglewood on the outskirts of Lenox, Mass. There began the Berkshire Festival, a glamorous retreat for many tourists.

After Leinsdorf departs, incidentally, the Tanglewood project will be directed by Seigi Ozawa in the musical field and Gunther Schuler in the educational area.

Dr. Charles Munch's decade of ruling the Boston contained many triumphs, especially in French music, in which Munch was pre-eminent. He was a traditionalist and a person of fastidious tastes. His interpretation of Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" was world famous.

Leinsdorf, tiny, well schooled in all kinds of music, a Viennese to his finger tips in matters of warmth and communication, will be missed in Boston, although there are a few who still think that the mingling of Leinsdorf and the Boston was not the best for all concerned. It is possible also that Leinsdorf's heart really is in the opera house rather than in the symphonic area.

Bernstein to Advise

The New York Philharmonic has its own problems. Leonard Bernstein is leaving at the end of this season. Among his future positions will be that of adviser at Tanglewood, where he learned much about conducting from Koussevitzky.

Just as Steinberg will be moonlighting from his Pittsburgh assignment, so will George Szell be holding two conductorships. He will be leading his own Cleveland Orchestra and at the same time will be senior conductor at the Philharmonic. It is a good thing that the breed of conductors is hardy, long-lived and tireless.

Still one more change in the musical scene — Antal Dorati has signed a two-year contract to conduct the National Symphony in Washington, D.C. after the retirement of Howard Mitchell. There will be others, assuredly, in a musical scene that is rife with change.

Russian Series

The Russians tend to do things in a large way. For instance, Mstislav Rostropovich two seasons ago played 36 cello concertos in one series in England. Now the Moscow Symphony Orchestra is in New York, midway through a series of 12 ambitious concerts within a few weeks and it has come to be one of the biggest hits of the season. It is, at any rate, with the capacity audiences who seem, to our eyes at least, to be of a distinctly Slavic nature.

The orchestra itself is a superbly trained ensemble, but different from American symphonies in some ways. As an example, the strings give off a different sound, traceable to the inferiority of the instruments they use. The strings just do not have the lushness of the Philadelphia or Boston Symphonies. The brass instruments of the Russians have an odd, thin sound, especially in the trumpets and French horns, which have a sensitive but somehow lacklustre tone. The oboes are strange, almost like ancient shawms. The double basses are fantastic, and so is the bazooka-type timpanist.

It is indicative of something that the programs of this Soviet series have had to rely to a very large extent on Czarist composers. Tchaikovsky is the big hero, with his tone poems, symphonies and instrumental concertos. Moussorgsky, Rachmaninov and Liadov are other old-regime musicians whose works are in use. About the only Soviet composer in view is Shostakovich, a program of whose works is being given, conducted, interestingly enough, by his son, Maxim.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 142,794 SUN. 218,586

APR 13 1969

SCHIPPERS TAKING OVER CINCINNATI BATON

CINCINNATI—Thomas Schippers has signed a three-year contract as music director of the Cincinnati Symphony beginning with the 1970-'71 season. Schippers will succeed Max Rudolf, who is retiring.

The appointment is the latest of a series of new conducting assignments for major U. S. orchestras. William Steinberg will succeed Erich Leinsdorf at the Boston Symphony; Seiji Ozawa replaces Josef Krips at San Francisco; Antal Dorati succeeds Howard Mitchell with the Washington National Symphony; and Georg Solti replaces Jean Martinon in Chicago. A successor has yet to be named for Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic, where George Szell will be principal guest conductor next season.

The Cincinnati is under exclusive recording contract to Decca and has recorded albums under Rudolf and Associate Conductor Erich Kunzel for that label. Schippers has recorded for RCA, Columbia, London and Angel.

Schippers' schedule with the Cincinnati will be arranged to permit his international schedule of guest conducting plus his conducting assignments at La Scala in Milan and the Metropolitan Opera in New York. Rudolf will head the opera department at Philadelphia's Curtis Institute of Music.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

APR 19 1969

Classical Notes

Pianist Rudolf Firkusny will be the soloist with William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony in an all-Beethoven pair on Friday (18) and Sunday (20) at Syria Mosque. . . . French pianist Jean-Bernard Pommier makes his New York debut with orchestra with Alexander Schneider and his chamber orchestra with two concerts at the New School Sunday (20). . . . Pierre Boulez conducts the Cleveland Orchestra in Battle Creek, Mich., Monday (14); East Lansing, Mich., Tuesday (15); Lafayette, Ind., Wednesday (16); Bloomington, Ind., Thursday (17); and Toledo, Friday (18). Soloists for the tour will be concertmaster Rafael Druian and principal clarinetist Robert Marcellus.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw" and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9" in the Boston Symphony's final concert pair of the season Friday (18) and Saturday (19). Soloists in the Beethoven symphony will be soprano Jane Marsh, mezzo-soprano Josephine Veasey, tenor Placido Domingo, and baritone Sherrill Milnes. Milnes also will be narrator in the Schoenberg work. . . . The Kansas Wesleyan Philharmonic Chior performed in Cincinnati Sunday (6); Worthington, Ohio, Monday (7), and Norwalk, Ohio, Tuesday (8).

135

"THE WAY I HEARD IT"

by John Gruber

Last week I got started on symphony orchestras and the Boston Symphony in particular. This week I'm continuing on the subject. With Stokowski and Toscanini for competition, Koussevitsky really had to work, and he did. Whatever his shortcomings may have been in 1924, he was an excellent conductor in 1934.

He announced his retirement for that year; he was 60 years old and was at the top of his fame. There were conductors in the U.S. who might have taken his place. I have already mentioned Stock in Chicago. Reiner was conducting in Cincinnati, Rodzinsky in Cleveland, Ormandy in Minneapolis, and so on.

Nevertheless the BSO board of directors reached out to Greece and tapped Dmitri Mitropoulos for the succession. He came with a contract, and guest-conducted for a few appearances in Boston. He was definitely exciting, and a thoroughly good conductor.

Now Koussevitsky suffered a change of heart and decided to stay on. My personal feeling was that he didn't want to relinquish his baton to anyone who was too good, so that his memory would remain untarnished.

In any event, things worked out like this: Stokowski deserted Philadelphia for the lure of Hollywood money; Toscanini went back to Italy; Ormandy went to Philadelphia. The pressure was off in Boston, and Koussevitsky could relax. And he did.

Mitropoulos was "farmed out" to Minneapolis where he shortly demonstrated that he was even better than he appeared in his Boston guest appearances. Koussevitsky got the Tanglewood venture going and used this as an excuse to stay on at the helm of the BSO.

Finally Mitropoulos' contract ran out and it was apparent to him that he was never going to get in at Boston. He went to New York where the orchestra did not like his rather dictatorial manner, and the audience found him too brilliant after the lyricism of Toscanini.

His lack of success in the United States was due to the force of circumstances rather than any lack on his own part. But that lack of success contributed to a sort of fatalistic attitude and he began to go slowly down hill, both physically and artistically. Eventually he died.

Fifteen years after he had first announced his retirement, Koussevitsky actually retired. He was 75; the year was 1949. Charles Munch succeeded him. He certainly was no Koussevitsky. Moreover, he was very easy-going and hated to rehearse. The orchestra loved him in consequence.

He was not a personality, and while he did French music well French music is not the meat and potatoes of the symphonic repertoire. The audience in Boston, going weekly to his concerts, became a bit bored with his program, but they didn't realize how imperceptibly the orchestra was sliding down hill.

This was readily apparent in Hartford where the group appeared twice a year. The cumulative slippage between appearances was quite apparent. Six years ago he retired, and Eric Leinsdorf was hired. The damage had been done, and Leinsdorf set about trying to rectify it. This meant grinding work, and the orchestra resented him, to a man.

Leinsdorf had had his career interrupted by World War II at a time when he should have been learning the symphonic repertoire. His background had been in ballet and in opera. His technical knowledge of conducting was really excellent, but as an accompanist to opera stars, he had little personality of his own.

His weakness in knowledge of the symphonic repertoire has made him a poor program picker, which hurts at the box-office. His strength in opera has led him to include a goodly amount of "concertized opera," which hasn't endeared him to the dyed-in-the-wool symphonic buff.

He hasn't developed a personality of his own so far as interpretation is concerned. This is also bad box-office. But it is just about impossible to develop a musical personality today; some musicologist will crawl out of the woodwork to cry that the composer did not indicate this or that in the score.

There is a great deal needed in performance that cannot be included in the score and must be provided by the performer. As Richard Strauss often commented, "A score is a very imperfect blueprint of a composer's intent." He knew; he was both a first rate conductor and a first rate composer.

The performer or the conductor is the only one who can bring a composition to life, otherwise it will remain unheard. He brings it to life by infusing it with his own experience of life, necessarily differing from that of the composer.

Merely observing the notes and expression marks doesn't bring music to life; it embalms it for a museum. What makes Lennie Bernstein popular is that he manages to breathe life into music. Unfortunately his life has had little in common with most of the composers he interprets, nor has he studied them intensively. As a result, his interpretations carry little artistic conviction, though they carry all sorts of conviction as to his own personality.

From what I have heard of Steinberg (and it is a resonable amount) he, too, has little artistic personality. Consequently, I don't think he will make out too well in Boston, as I pointed out in the first paragraph of the preceeding column.

Still some pressure is off. Szell is going to try both the New York and the Cleveland simultaneously, which means he'll spread himself too thin, taking two orchestras out of competition with the Boston. On the other hand George Solti has been tapped to head the Chicago and he is truly a great and exciting conductor. In addition, the Minneapolis is coming up strong. Both organizations are excellent. My guess is that Chicago will easily top Boston, and that Minneapolis will equal it or perhaps surpass it. We'll just have to wait and see.

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
(E) 15,210

JUL 14 1969 New England Newsclip

Had refused The Job

Boulez to Philharmonic

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

So the New York Philharmonic has landed Pierre Boulez as its new music director beginning with the 1971-72 season, and they must have promised him the moon to do it. It is a hard job, perhaps the hardest in the profession. Leonard Bernstein, whose 11-year tenure came to an end a few weeks ago, survived it, but his three predecessors. Dimitri Mitropoulos, Artur Rodzinski and John Barbirolli, were all in some way defeated, even destroyed, by it. Moreover, the Philharmonic board had not made the search for a new music director easier by retaining Bernstein as conductor laureate, which means that Bernstein will continue to give concerts, make records, and do television programs with the orchestra.

Boulez was guest conductor with the Philharmonic for the first time in March and April of this year. Inevitably he was asked if he had been offered The Job and if he was interested, and characteristically he explained in trenchant terms that the position was not one he wanted, that he had no desire to be a prisoner of fame as he felt the Philharmonic's music director must be.

In any event, Boulez already had a three-year commitment to the BBC Symphony Orchestra (London) also beginning in 1971. In a conversation earlier this year, Boulez explained that the BBC post attracted him because it provided the possibility of controlling, or at least being influential in the control of, a whole musical environment, not just one particular series of concerts. If, for example, he wanted to do a Schoenberg cycle with the BBC Symphony, its effect could be strengthened by having the BBC concurrently produce performances of some of the chamber music, operas, solo works, and so on. That difference, he explained, was the reason an "ordinary" orchestral post, like, for example, the New York Philharmonic, did not interest him.

There also had been speculation about Boulez's relations with the Cleveland Orchestra. That was an orchestra he had been particularly happy with, and George Szell, its music director since 1946, had taken a great shine to the 30 years younger Boulez. For three seasons, beginning next Fall, Boulez will be Cleveland's principal guest conductor, with an increasing involvement each year, and some of us had wondered if he was being phased in as successor to the 72-year-old Szell. It is likely in any case that Szell, who last year was named music advisor and principal guest conductor by the New York Philharmonic to take care of the interim period following Bernstein's departure, was influential in leading the Philharmonic to the choice of Boulez, perhaps even in persuading the initially reluctant Boulez.

For three years at least, Boulez becomes one of the commuting conductors. In fact, during his first season as music director, Boulez will be available to New York for only eight weeks because of his commitments to London and Cleveland. For his second and third seasons, Boulez will be at the Philharmonic for a minimum of 14 weeks each, which is two weeks more than Bernstein has given New York in recent years.

Next Fall, Boston will become involved in a commuting arrangement since William Steinberg will retain the position he has had with the Pittsburgh Symphony since 1952. Bernard Haitink has the London Philharmonic as well as the Amster-Concertgebouw. Thomas Schippers will have the Cincinnati Symphony together with a job with Radiotelevisione Italiana in Rome, and Herbert von Karajan notoriously is in Berlin and everywhere. But these menages a trois are not always a success. Steinberg was not happy with a setup that some 10 years ago had him take on the London Philharmonic as well as Pittsburgh, Zubin Mehta found he could not take care of Montreal as well as Los Angeles, and Houton just fired Andre Previn because they felt neglected by a conductor they shared with the London Symphony (Previn's Houston predecessor Barbirolli, also had Manchester's Halle Orchestra, but was evidently a more gifted juggler).

It is worth remembering, for that matter, that Erich Leinsdorf, a man of great mental and physical energy, found just the one enormous job of being the Boston Symphony's music director too much to take. Quite a few of his colleagues would agree that conductors, or performers in general, tend to allow themselves too little time for recharging of batteries and for reflection, and that their work begins to suffer. It is a very much a conductors' market just now: There simply are not enough first-rate people in the 35 to 60 generation to fill the available positions. The money and prestige that go with having not just one, but two, major orchestras, are tempting. Trying to imagine 1971-74, I wonder who the principal beneficiary will be: Boulez, the BBC, the Philharmonic and its public, or BOAC or Pan-Am?

For Boulez, it has been a quick four years in New York. When he first conducted there — it was with the BBC Symphony in May, 1965 — his name was known to the general public, if at all, as that of a young avant-garde composer. The audience that attended his two extraordinarily impressive Carnegie Hall concerts then was a rather special one, including a high percentage of professionals, and with a particular interest in works like Debussy's "Jeux," Schoenberg's Five Pieces and the Webern Variations. Since then, Boulez has become a star conductor, one with a command of power in the musical establishment that makes him rank politically and financially only just below the superstars Bernstein and von Karajan. And Boulez the composer? Some of his works, I think, have survival power: even so, I should not be surprised if in 1990 Boulez is the most famous living conductor about whom it is dimly remembered that he was as a young man said to have been an interesting composer.

More remarkable still than Boulez's quick rise to fame as a conductor is that we have a very limited idea of what his conducting is like. He has specialized in the music of the first quarter of the 20th century, and even within that period head concentrated on a few works. His excursions into the music of the 19th and 18th centuries have been few and not often successful, and he has done almost no really contemporary music, hardly even his own.

His programs at the Cleveland Orchestra's Blossom Center this Summer list works like the Beethoven 5th and Barok's Concerto for Orchestra, and they should give more of an idea of what he might be like as a day-in day-out music director rather than as a guest conductor with his specialists.

Boulez' ear is phenomenal with respect both to pitch and texture. He has, as well, an uncommonly sharp rhythmic sense. He is devastatingly competent, hard-working, efficient and humorous, and orchestras like him. I would put Boulez with the virtuoso conductors whose particular strength is in getting orchestras to play brilliantly, rather than with the interpreters: As a musical personality, Boulez is closer to Szell, von Karajan, or Solti, than to Bernstein, Davis, Kubelik, or Klemperer. Boulez' interest in at least the classics of the 20th century repertory, of course, makes him a virtuoso conductor with a difference. So far he has done best with the music that most benefits from his ability to produce clarity of texture and rhythmic detail, a clarity often unprecedented in our experience, and least well in music requiring control of a long line and involving imagination and personal warmth. I remember brilliant, breath-taking achievements of Boulez's with Debussy, Webern, Schoenberg, some Berlioz, some Stravinsky, but also failures, some of them smashing, with Purcell, Haydn, Bartok, Berg, some Berlioz and some Stravinsky.

The New York Philharmonic is not just the local band. It is a national cultural resource. Who is in charge matters not just in New York. The Boulez appointment is interesting, not the least so because much about it is so thoroughly unpredictable. The Philharmonic has taken a risk, just as it did in choosing Bernstein for 1958, and it is to be congratulated, perhaps envied as well, for again having chosen to associate itself with one of the most fascinating and vital musicians of our time.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 15 1969 New England Newsclip

Americans ignored

Why import conductors?

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

When the New York Philharmonic recently announced the appointment of Pierre Boulez as its new music director, one of the first things that came to mind was that once again an orchestra had turned to Europe when there was an important vacancy to be filled.

That struck me, first, because Boulez succeeds Leonard Bernstein, whose appointment in 1958 was the first occasion that an orchestra of the Philharmonic's stature had chosen an American-born and American-trained conductor, and second, because of Boulez's low regard for most American composers. Concerning the second point, I would guess that Boulez will do as much for American music as many of his colleagues whose mouths are full of pious sayings on that subject, but who actually play very little, not to mention those who are convinced they have been sufficiently daring in putting "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance" or the Overture to "Candide" on a program.

But what is an American conductor anyway? To insist on American birth is too restrictive. Consider this list: Maurice Abravanel, Antal Dorati, Lukas Foss, Vladimir Golschmann, Erich Leinsdorf, Eugene Ormandy, Andre Previn, Hans Schwieger, Leopold Stokowski. Those are all conductors currently, recently, or soon to be, music directors of major American orchestras. All were born abroad, most are United States citizens now, some had their first musical training and professional experience in Europe, many of them began their real careers as conductors in this country, all of them have for many years and through most of their professional lives been associated with the American musical scene.

To be sure, there are some tricky borderline cases on the list. Still, I am sure that no matter how distinctively European a phenomenon Erich Leinsdorf is in many respects, no one would have thought in 1961, "the B.S.O. has picked a European conductor" (as it had with Munch and all his predecessors). Nor would one think of William Steinberg's appointment that way, even though Steinberg, 20 years older upon taking over the Boston Symphony than Leinsdorf was, already had acquired a substantial reputation in Europe and Palestine before coming to America.

The Boulez-Philharmonic situation is essentially different because the New York trustees picked someone who was not already part of the American scene. There are 28 major orchestras in the United States — a major orchestra, according to the American Symphony Orchestra League's official classification, is one whole annual budget is more than $500,000 and eight of them have either present or future arrangements with conductors brought over specially by those orchestras. The eight are in Chicago (Georg Solti), Detroit (Sixten Ehrling), Los Angeles (Zubin Mehta), Minneapolis (Stanislaw Skrowaczewski), New York (Boulez), Rochester (Laszlo Somogyi), St. Louis (Walter Susskind), and San Francisco (Seiji Ozawa). The National Symphony in Washington is another border-line situation: Dorati, the conductor-elect, is one of the conductors largely associated with American orchestras, though his last two posts have been with the BBC Symphony (London) and the Stockholm Philharmonic.

American orchestras long have been in the importing business. Boston, as I already have pointed out, got all its conductors that way until Leinsdorf. The New York Philharmonic did it until the appointment of Arthur Rodzinski in 1943. Josef Krips, Foss's predecessor in Buffalo, was an import, and so were such comparatively recent figures as Rafael Kubelik (Chicago), Paul Paray (Detroit), John Barbirolli (Houston), Dimitri Mitropoulos (Minneapolis), Eduard van Beinum (Los Angeles), Golschmann, Edouard van Remoortel, and Eleazar de Carvalho (all St. Louis), and Enrique Jorda (San Francisco).

Some of these men made valuable contributions to our musical life: Indeed, there is no performer to whom the community of American composers had more cause to be indebted than Mitropoulos. A few of these conductors did not stay in America long, in Kubelik's case to our great loss. Some of the list, though, looks like reverse serendipity at work. If not that, a death wish. Were we so badly off for conductors that it was necessary to bring a Jorda or a van Remoortel across the ocean on porpose?

At one time, of course, American orchestras used to import their players, too. The string shortage is so severe that we may need to continue to recruit violinists form Japan and Israel, but we no longer import wind players—I distinguish between employing recent arrivals and importing—because many of the imports, players like Gillet, Laurent, Longy, Tabuteau, stayed to become superb teachers of young Americans.

We have arrived at an efficient system of equipping student instrumentalists to take their places in orchestras. We have not got a comparably efficient way of trainig conductors, because once they leave the conservatory—and mostly while they are at the conservatory for that matter—they have no access to an instrument to practice on. We have not got all those opera houses that have been such good training grounds, and eventually springboards, for young conductors in Europe. The Metropolitan and the New York City Operas use young Americans as coaches and to conduct the off-stage band in "Carmen," but unlike in Europe, there is almost no vertical mobility in those houses. Leinsdorf, who made it up through the ranks at the Met, is an almost solitary example. Assistants stay invisible: When a new conductor is wanted, he is brought in from outside. Even Julius Rudel, who has been good about American singers the way Rudolf Bing has not, has persisted in bringing one European mediocrity after another—and, rarely, someone good—while Americans of demonstrated competence were under-employed or ignored.

In sum, if there is a young American who has great gifts as a conductor, it is rather, and unfairly, had for anyone to find out about him. It is also harder for such a gifted person to become a good conductor in America. Considering that America now produces the best equipped instrumentalists and singers in the world, both in enormous quantity, I cannot believe that our conservatory students do not also include a proportionate number of future and first-rate conductors. To discover them and to make use of them requires awareness and effort. The route—a Berkshire Music Center fellowship and the Koussevitzky Prize—that has led 24-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas to the assistant conductorship of the Boston Symphony is an example of what can be done, though, in context of the larger picture, perhaps no more than a drop on a hot stone. I hope that it will occur to more American orchestras, assuming they have energy to cope with problems other than those of their own immediate survival, to make themselves aware of the problem of the American conductor, and to address themselves to its solution. The Summertime educational activities in which more and more orchestras are becoming involoed may provide a basis for making a serious start.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 22 1969 New England Newsclip

136

The Arizona Daily Star
TUCSON, ARIZ.
D. 42,069 SUN. 72,623

JUN 29 1969

Symphony Outlook Not Bad

Conductors Disagree With Bernstein View

Same article but stops sooner

By HENRY RAYMONT
© New York Times News Service

SAN JUAN, P.R. — Are symphony orchestras in trouble because of rising costs or because their programs have become dusty? Is it true, as Leonard Bernstein says, [illegible] conventional symphony [illegible] said, [illegible] Mozart and Beethoven is just as modern nowadays as it was in the 18th century and it only becomes like a museum piece when it is played as a museum piece."

The young Israeli said he also felt the time had arrived when instrumentalists in an orchestra should be given more opportunity to develop themselves as soloists by incorporating chamber music as part of the regular symphony programs.

LOS ANGELES EVENING & SUNDAY
HERALD EXAMINER
D. 540,793 SUN. 529,466

JUN 29 1969

Conductors Say Symphony Music Not on the Way Out

By HENRY RAYMONT
(C) 1969 New York Times News Service

SAN JUAN, P.R. — Are symphony orchestras in trouble because of rising costs or because their programs have become dusty? Is it true, as Leonard Bernstein says, that conventional symphony concerts will inexorably become "museum pieces" for the young generation?

These questions were discussed here by five prominent conductors who participated at the annual festival directed by Pablo Casals, the cellist.

In separate interviews, William Steinberg, Yehudi Menuhin, Alexander Schneider, Sir John Barbirolli and Daniel Barenboim agreed that the outlook was not that bad.

They also decried as simplistic the alarm raised by numerous concert managers who contend that audiences are declining for fear of crime in the streets, competition with recordings and television, and dwindling interest in classical music among the young.

Though the conductors acknowledged the need to find new means of financing to meet the problem of expanded concert seasons, they rejected the view that America's symphony orchestras were in a state of acute cirsis.

"All this yelling for help and these expressions of distress we've been hearing recently are absolutely not proper," Steinberg said.

The 69-year-old Germanborn conductor, who will become music director of the Boston Symphony this fall, in addition to continuing as head of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, said:

"I know that there is a lot of speaking and a lot of writing about panic and I wish to state that my personal experience does not give any reason to alarm.

"Concerning attendance, in Pittsburg we have tried for years to keep the attention of the young by mixing the old and the new. In addition to Mozart and Beethoven we brought in the works of Bruckner, Mahler and Reger, which had been inexplicably neglected. This was done with equal success in our tours of New York and other cities, judging by the fact that we were always reengaged.

"Another example is that we wrote out an inexpensive subscription for student tickets and it went like hot cakes."

Menuhin, the concert violinist, who in recent years branched out into conducting, saw the problems facing orchestras as centered more on the role of music in a technological society than on economics.

William Steinberg

Pablo Casals

"There has been a tremendous increase in the knowability of audiences," he said. "There has never been a younger generation as informed, as aware, not only of contemporary trends but also very often of archaic music and medieval music."

Daniel Barenboim, the 27-year-old pianist-conductor, who makes frequent world tours with his English Chamber Orchestra, spoke impatiently about the pessimists.

"Among them, I am sorry to say, are some of my colleagues, saying that the concert is dead and all that will exist is the gramophone and so on," he said. "This is completely wrong because this shows a complete misunderstanding of the basis and the essence of music."

"Because the fact is," he said, "that a great piece of Mozart and Beethoven is just as modern nowadays as it was in the 18th century and it only becomes like a museum piece when it is played as a museum piece."

The young Israeli said he also felt the time had arrived when instrumentalists in an orchestra should be given more opportunity to develop themselves as soloists by incorporating chamber music as part of the regular symphony programs.

Sir John Barbirolli, the English conductor, is convinced that nothing bridges the generation gap as the impact of "inspiring personalities," in music as in the other arts.

"In the past," he said, "Shakespeare survived through great actors. He certainly would have survived in libraries and museums. But as a living force you need great actors."

This was also the view of Casals. The 92-year-old Spanish-born cellist, who still teaches here and at the Marlboro Music Festival each summer in Marlboro, Vt., said:

"Young people are the ones who have kept music alive for they know what they like and respect the integrity of true performances. The great music of today is the great music of the past and they know it. But it must have personality. To say that young people are drawing away from it is poppycock."

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

JUN 23 1969

Conductors Weigh Audience Decline

By HENRY RAYMONT

SAN JUAN, P.R.—Are symphony orchestras in trouble because of rising costs or because their programs have become dusty? Is it true, as Leonard Bernstein says, that conventional symphony concerts will inexorably become "museum pieces" for the young generation?

These questions were discussed here during the past few days by five prominent conductors who participated at the annual festival directed by Pablo Casals, the cellist.

In separate interviews, William Steinberg, Yehudi Menuhin, Alexander Schneider, Sir John Barbirolli and Daniel Barenboim agreed that the outlook was not that bad.

They also decried as simplistic the alarm raised by numerous concert managers who contend that audiences are declining for fear of crime in the streets, competition with recordings and television, and dwindling interest in classical music among the young.

Crisis View Rejected

Though the conductors acknowledged the need to find new means of financing to meet the problem of expanded concert seasons, they rejected the view that America's symphony orchestras were in a state of acute crisis.

"All this yelling for help and these expressions of distress we've been hearing recently are absolutely not proper," Mr. Steinberg said.

The 69-year-old Germanborn conductor, who will become music director of the Boston Symphony this fall in addition to continuing as head of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, said:

"I know that there is a lot of speaking and a lot of writing about panic and I wish to state that my personal experience does not give any reason to alarm.

"Concerning attendance, in Pittsburgh we have tried for years to keep the attention of the young by mixing the old and the new. In addition to Mozart and Beethoven we brought in the works of Bruckner, Mahler and Reger, which had been inexplicably neglected. This was done with equal success in our tours of New York and other cities, judging by the fact that we were always reengaged.

"Another example is that that we wrote out an inexpensive subscription for student tickets and it went like hot cakes. And, my dear colleagues in the music field, naturally conductors, should take notice of this."

Linked to Technology

Mr. Menuhin, the concert violinist, who in recent years branched out into conducting, saw the problems facing orchestras as centered more on the role of music in a technological society than on economics.

"There has been a tremendous increase in the knowledgeability of audiences," he said. "There has never been a younger generation as informed, as aware, not only of contemporary trends but also very often of archaic music and medieval music."

"I only wonder," he added, "if the leaders of our society are sufficiently aware of this and realize that an important part of the community wants its music and must be given help to get it. For instance, television has eaten up too much into the field of radio and has not taken over its own responsible share of music. Perhaps that will come."

The New York Times
Alexander Schneider

Henri Dauman
Daniel Barenboim

Daniel Barenboim, the 27-year-old pianist-conductor, who makes frequent world tours with his English Chamber Orchestra, spoke impatiently about the pessimists.

"Among them, I am sorry to say, are some of my colleagues, saying that the concert is dead and all that will exist is the gramophone and so on," he said. "This is completely wrong because this shows a complete misunderstanding of the basis and the essence of music."

"Because the fact is," he said rapidly, "that a great piece of Mozart and Beethoven is just as modern nowadays as it was in the 18th century and it only becomes like a museum piece when it is played as a museum piece. And no better example for that exists really than Casals here, who brought so much life and excitement especially to Bach and all sorts of music that is considered longhair and intellectual.

"International Language"

"And this is the great thing about music and why music is an international language: It can appeal to the intellect, it can appeal to the heart, it can appeal to the senses. And I think many times young people are afraid because they have not been educated to understand this so that they don't feel they can come to a concert without really knowing whether it is the third trumpet that is playing or whether the counterpoint goes up or down. I don't think those are things that matter and the schools should be able to put this across."

The young Israeli, who had been mentioned as a candidate to succeed Mr. Bernstein as director of the New York Philarmonic, also had some thoughts on how to bring new life and greater variety to symphony orchestras.

"Why not emulate big industry and diversify?" he asked with a chuckle.

The time has arrived, he feels, when instrumentalists in an orchestra should be given more an opportunity to develop themselves as soloists by incorporating chamber music as part of the regular symphony programs.

"I couldn't agree more," said Alexander Schneider, the former second violinist of the Budapest Quartet, who has become one of the most vital forces of American chamber music. "If you have good programs and good performers there will always be an audience. It's stupid to think young people will keep away. But, of course, they must be stimulated."

Sir John Barbirolli, the English conductor, is convinced that nothing bridges the generation gap as the impact of "inspiring personalities," in music as in the other arts.

"In the past," he said, "Shakespeare survived through great actors. He certainly would have survived in libraries and museums. But as a living force you need great actors."

This was also the view of Mr. Casals. The 92-year-old Spanish-born cellist, who still teaches here and at the Marlboro Music Festival each summer in Marlboro, Vt., said:

"Young people are the ones who have kept music alive for they know what they like and respect the integrity of true performances. The great music of today is the great music of the past and they know it. But it must have personality. To say that young people are drawing away from it is poppycock."

Sir John Barbirolli

Yehudi Menuhin

THE COURIER-NEWS
PLAINFIELD, N. J.
D. 53,566

JUL 15 1969

Musical Conference Scheduled

NEW BRUNSWICK — One step to combat the lack of string musicians in this country will be taken on the Douglass campus here next month when Rutgers University hosts the annual N.J. American String Teachers Association conference.

The vocational situation for players and teachers of stringed instruments was pinpointed recently by Erich Leinsdorf, former musical director of the Boston Symphony.

"In 10 years, unless the present shortage is alleviated, we may not to able to man our own string sections in America. We are already using kids," he said.

It is to meet this situation, as well as to encourage string musicianship for its own sake, that the New Jersey chapter of the American String Teachers launched its conference five years ago.

This year's conference, an intensive program of instruction, seminars and performances involving students and teachers, opens Sunday, Aug. 3 and will conclude the following Friday with a special concert.

Former recitals and concerts featuring faculty members and guest artists will be presented nightly at Hickman Hall and are open to the public free of charge. There will be a nominal fee for the Friday concert.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 17 1968
New England Newsclip

Dearth of American String Players Eased by Influx of Asian Violinists

The long-standing shortage of string players in the United States is being eased by the influx of hundreds of exceptionally talented young Asian violinists.

Leading teachers and other musical observers differ as to why the wave of talent is coming from the East, but all agree that it is happening none too soon. Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said in a recent interview that "in 10 years, unless the present shortage is alleviated, we may not be able to man our own string sections in America. We are already using kids."

Leinsdorf pointed out that last season the Cleveland Orchestra went so far as to place an advertisement for string players in the Sunday music section of the New York Times. As to the "kids," he noted that a young man named Richard Sher, who had attended the Red Fox Music Camp in New Marlboro, auditioned for the Boston Symphony, at 18, a few years ago. Before the audition, said Leinsdorf, he took the braces off his teeth to try to look a bit more mature. He got the job.

Only a Matter of Time

To Ivan Galamian, violin teacher at the Juilliard School of Music, it is only a matter of time before American orchestras will be stocked with Asian string players. "There will be more Orientals soon," he said, "because the orchestras badly need them. Most, you understand, come here as already advanced students, and they prefer to be soloists or go back home and teach."

Galamian pointed out that at his summer music camp near Lake Champlain, Meadowmount School of Music, there are 10 Koreans, eight Japanese and 3 Chinese out of an enrollment of 200.

Richard Burgin, the former Boston Symphony concertmaster who is now on the faculty of Florida State University in Saratoga, where he is musical director of the 10th annual Congress of Strings, said the difference in approaches between Japanese and American schools of teaching is responsible for the shortage of American string players and the abundance of their Eastern counterparts. "The basic issue is time," he said. "There is not enough time in American schools given to playing and studying music."

He noted that at the famous Toho School, near Tokyo, "they have 60 students of college age and all their time is devoted to music, applied music, morning to evening, no other subjects." There is no other way, he indicated, to produce a fine fiddler.

Cheaper Than a Piano

Burgin added that the violin is popular in Japan because it costs less than a piano, which most Japanese homes do not even have room for. Also, stringed instruments are traditional to the country, beginning with the strummed samisen and the complex koto.

But no observers seem to know precisely what has caused the appearance of so many gifted Asian students. "It's a very mysterious thing," said Galamian," very strange."

Although the Japanese have been slow to enter orchestral ranks so far, many have taken concertmaster positions, joined string quartets or joined American string faculties.

None of the nation's top-ranking symphony orchestras currently lists an Asian in its string sections, although in the smaller orchestras there is a liberal sprinkling.

Suzuki's Preschool Pupils

Some have contended that an important factor in the Japanese violin renaissance is the much publicized work with preschool children of Shinichi Suzuki.

Several years ago, Suzuki toured this country with some of his tiny students, demonstrating how they could play Bach and Vivaldi even before they could read Japanese, let alone music notation.

But several observers believe the Suzuki influence has been overemphasized. Galamian pointed out that only two of the eight Japanese children at his camp were "Suzuki children," and that in preparation schools where the Suzuki method has been tried in this country, "it has not seemed to work."

Suzuko Hillyer, a Toho graduate, was more certain. She said that the flood of Japanese violinists was "definitely" not because of Suzuki. "Not many professional players have been turned out by him," she contends. "Violinists have lots of doubts about his methods."

136 a

THE LIVELY ARTS

The Young Conductors Take Over

By ROY HEMMING

A GREAT guessing game has been going on among musicians and music-lovers. It started in New York last year when Leonard Bernstein announced that he would retire at the end of the 1968-69 season as conductor of the New York Philharmonic—and people began wondering who his successor might be. The game spread to Chicago this past fall when Jean Martinon and the Chicago Symphony decided to part ways, and then to Boston when Erich Leinsdorf announced that he had "had it" with the Boston Symphony. In each case a great American orchestra found itself hunting for a new conductor—with plenty of sideline public guesswork as to who would or should get the jobs.

What has been most interesting, however, is that the guessing has narrowed down not to the concert world's established names but to a dozen promising young comers. Of course, "young" in the conducting world doesn't mean quite the same as it does in the pop music world. But in a galaxy whose stars include Stokowski (86), Ansermet (84), Munch (77), Szell (72), and Ormandy (68), several generations do indeed separate them from the most frequently mentioned contenders for New York, Boston, and Chicago: Maazel (36), Kertesz (38), Skrowaczewski (42), Ozawa (32), etc.

Part of the reason can be found in a comment Leinsdorf (56) made in quitting Boston. A full-time conducting schedule today, he said, is just too exhausting. "I do not think a conductor should be regarded the same as a 27-inning pitcher," Leinsdorf complained.

Double Duty. The directorship of a major U .S. symphony today is a grueling job, involving long hours of planning, rehearsing, performing, and recording—not six or seven months a year as it was a generation ago, but 12 months a year. In 1930-31, for example, the New York Philharmonic gave 114 concerts over 26 weeks. Last year it gave 171 concerts over 48 weeks.

The effort of musicians' unions to win year-long income and security for orchestra players is a factor. Another is simply the growth of concert audiences in the U. S.—including the increasing number of concertgoers that the automobile and the superhighway have turned into regulars at summer festivals at Tanglewood, Mass., Saratoga, N. Y., Meadowbrook, Mich., Greensboro, N. C., and an ever-expanding cross-country list.

In many ways, then, leading a major symphony orchestra today requires someone with tremendous energy and stamina as well as musical ability. Thus the accent on younger conductors.

There are other reasons, not the least of which is the personal glamor of some of the comers. Leonard Bernstein set the image a few decades ago of a young handsome conductor exuding sex-appeal as well as musical talent—and men like Mehta, Maazel, Schippers, Mester, etc., have kept the image going ever since. The orchestras have found that it all pays off at the box-office, particularly as younger elements within their audiences have "identified" with the younger conductors. At the same time, our society as a whole has become a youth-oriented society in many ways. If a John F. Kennedy can be considered a "young" President at 43, then the conductors shown above are all young indeed.

Pitfalls. But the accent on youth has had its disadvantages—especially for the conductors themselves. Sometimes they have been given such major opportunities so early in their careers that they've literally had to learn "on the job." In such a situation, mistakes are bound to occur. Still, the talent of today's comers is often so tremendous that they find ways to outride their goofs and inexperience—and keep charging to the top.

All this doesn't mean that the older conductors have "had it." Great oldtimers like Stokowski, Munch, and others will continue to fill halls so long as they can raise their batons to give a downbeat. So, too, will the established leaders among the middle generation—Karajan (58), Solti (55), Giulini (53), plus Leinsdorf and Bernstein. But for the long pull—for the year-round directorships—more and more orchestras clearly have their sights set on men under 45.

ISTVAN KERTESZ, 38, born in Hungary; became a conductor at Budapest State Opera while in his 20's; fled to West during 1956 Hungarian revolt; has since conducted opera in West Germany (he presently heads the Cologne Opera) and been frequent guest-conductor of major European orchestras; was principal conductor of London Symphony 1965-67. A dynamic, impassioned, vividly communicative conductor of late 19th-century, early 20th-century repertory. Best recordings: Dvorak symphonies (complete, 1 to 9), Mozart symphonies 33, 39, Bartok's Bluebeard's Castle [all for London Records].

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI, 42, born in Lwow, Poland; studied there and in Paris; conductor of Warsaw Philharmonic before coming to U. S. in 1958; since 1960 conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, and a frequent guest-conductor of Philadelphia Orchestra (shared its 1967 tour of South America with Eugene Ormandy). A brilliant, incisive, sensitive interpreter of classics and neo-classics, and a standout champion of new music. Best recordings: Prokofieff Romeo & Juliet and Schubert 9th Symphony [both Mercury] and Chopin Piano Concerto No. 1 with Rubinstein [RCA Victor].

LORIN MAAZEL, 36, born in Paris of American parents; raised in U. S.; made conducting debut at age 9 at National Music Camp at Interlochen, Mich.; became a child prodigy conductor in early 1940's; entered Univ. of Pittsburgh at 15, became assistant conductor of Pittsburgh Symphony under Fritz Reiner; discouraged by lack of conducting opportunities in U. S., went to Rome in 1953 to study; stayed on to become one of most popular conductors in Europe; since 1964 has been director of (West) Berlin Radio Symphony and Berlin Opera. Noted for uncommonly clean-lined, taut, vividly detailed performances of broad symphonic and operatic repertory. Best recordings: Schubert symphonies 2, 3, 5, 6 [Deutsche Grammophon], Strauss Also Sprach Zarathustra [Angel], Handel Water Music and Royal Fireworks Music [Philips].

ZUBIN MEHTA, 31, born in Bombay, Vienna-educated; won first fame at Salzburg and Berlin Festivals in early 1960's; at 24 became conductor of Montreal Symphony; at 25 took over Los Angeles Philharmonic—the youngest conductor ever of a major U. S. orchestra. A fiery, colorful, expansive interpreter of romantic and modern repertory. Best LPs: Strauss Don Juan, Respighi Roman Festivals [RCA Victor], Scriabin Poem of Ecstasy, Schönberg Transfigured Night [London].

SEIJI OZAWA, 32, Japanese-born; educated in Japan, the U. S., and Berlin; served as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with N. Y. Philharmonic for two years; since 1965 has been conductor of both Toronto Symphony and the Chicago Symphony's Ravinia Summer Festival. Recently signed a 3-year contract as conductor of San Francisco Symphony beginning in 1970, the first Oriental ever to head a major U. S. Symphony. A colorful, versatile conductor who radiates excitement in both 19th- and 20th-century repertory. Best LPs: Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique [Columbia], Britten Young Person's Guide to Orchestra [RCA Victor].

THOMAS SCHIPPERS, 38, born in Kalamazoo, Mich.; won fame at 19 as conductor of Gian-Carlo Menotti opera The Consul on Broadway; has since guest-conducted most major U. S. orchestras, but has refused to accept a permanent post (except as a director of Menotti's summer festival in Spoleto, Italy). An exuberant, expressive, versatile conductor, perhaps presently identified more with opera than symphonic repertory. Best LPs: Prokofieff Alexander Nevsky [Columbia], Bizet Carmen [London], Puccini Boheme [Angel].

COLIN DAVIS, 40, considered Britain's best conductor since the late Sir Thomas Beecham; while assistant conductor of BBC's Scottish Orchestra in 1957, won fame by taking over on short notice for an ill conductor in London concert; U. S. debut in 1960 in Minneapolis; has led London Symphony on several world tours; in 1967 became chief conductor of the BBC Symphony in London. Noted for combination of elegance and excitement he gives a broad repertory from Mozart to Stravinsky. Best LPs: Handel Messiah, Mozart Requiem [Philips], Stravinsky Concerto in D [London].

ANDRE PREVIN, 39, Berlin-born, came to U. S. in 1938; though classically trained, first rose to fame as jazz pianist while still in teens, then became successful Hollywood film composer-arranger (won two Academy Awards, '63, '64); became conductor of Houston Symphony in 1967, and in 1968 also became principal conductor of London Symphony. Though some critics have sneered at his mixing of movie, jazz, and concert work, he has proved himself a perceptive, probing, dramatic interpreter of late-19th, 20th-century works. Best LPs: Rachmaninoff 3rd symphony, Shostakovich 5th symphony [both RCA Victor].

DONALD JOHANOS, 39, born in Cedar Rapids, Iowa; was conductor of Altoona (Pa.) and Johnstown (Pa.) Symphonies in mid-1950's; won Rockefeller Foundation grant to study with Ormandy, Szell, Klemperer; joined Dallas Symphony in 1957 as a violinist and assistant conductor, rose to become music director in 1962. A brilliant, discerning, penetrating conductor of broad repertory from Mozart to moderns. Best LPs: Charles Ives Holidays Symphony, Rachmaninoff Symphonic Dances [both Vox-Turnabout].

JORGE MESTER, 33, born in Mexico City of Hungarian parents; has lived in U. S. since age 14; joined faculty of Juilliard School of Music in New York as its youngest teacher in 1956, led many of Juilliard's opera premieres; during 1962-63 conducted for Martha Graham, American Ballet Theatre, and Robert Joffrey Ballet; in 1967 became music director of Louisville Orchestra. A dynamic, sensitive, expressive interpreter of romantics and moderns. Best LPs: Menotti Piano Concerto with Earl Wild [Vanguard], Shostakovich Music for Hamlet [Louisville].

CLAUDIO ABBADO, 34, born in Milan, Italy; studied in Milan, Vienna, New York (including a year as assistant conductor of N. Y. Philharmonic); scored major success at 1965 Salzburg Festival, has since guest-conducted widely in Europe and U. S., especially at Milan's La Scala Opera. A conductor of uncommon incisiveness, intensity, vigor and clarity. Best LPs: Beethoven 7th Symphony, Prokofieff Romeo and Juliet [both London], Brahms Serenade No. 2, Prokofieff 3rd Piano Concerto with Argerich [both Deutsche Grammophon].

HENRY LEWIS, 36, born in Los Angeles; a violinist and double-bass player in Los Angeles Philharmonic before going into Army in 1953; became conductor of 7th Army Symphony in Europe; founded Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra in 1958; has frequently guest-conducted U. S. and European orchestras in concerts with his wife, mezzo-soprano Marilyn Horne; becomes conductor of New Jersey Symphony in June 1968, the first Negro to hold such a U. S. post. An animated, probing, versatile interpreter of a wide range of repertory. Best LPs: Souvenir of a Golden Era, Presenting Marilyn Horne [both London].

BERNARD HAITINK, 38, Netherlands-born; in 1955 became chief conductor of four orchestras of the Netherlands Radio; in 1957 replaced an ill guest-conductor of Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra, and following year became its co-conductor; since 1961 has been the Concertgebouw's music director, leading it on several U. S. tours. A dramatic, assertive, thoughtful interpreter of late romantics and moderns. Best LPs: Bruckner 4th symphony, Mahler 1st, Beethoven 5 piano concertos with Arrau [all Philips].

RAFAEL FRUHBECK DE BURGOS, 34, born in Burgos, Spain, of a German father and Spanish mother; added "de Burgos" to family name to stress his Spanish roots; won a violin competition in Bilbao at 13, graduated from Madrid Conservatory at 18 with six diplomas; at 24 became conductor of Bilbao Municipal Orchestra, then at 28 the youngest director of Orquesta Nacional de España in Madrid. A compelling, dynamic, rhythmically masterful conductor of classics through modern impressionists. Best LPs: Orff Carmina Burana, Falla 3-Cornered Hat [both Angel].

DANIEL BARENBOIM, 26, born in Buenos Aires, Argentina; moved with parents to Israel at 10, now an Israeli citizen; became internationally known as pianist in his teens, meanwhile studied conducting; now divides time as conductor and piano soloist; married to cellist Jacqueline du Pré. Though youngest of "comers," has won acclaim in London and New York as dynamic, broad-lined, vibrant conductor. Best LPs: Mozart symphonies 32, 35, 38, Schönberg Transfigured Night [all Angel].

Salute to National Music Week (May 5-12)

Scholastic Magazines
N.Y.

136b

Box Office Myths Are Collapsing

By JOAN SIMMONS

Times-Union Music Critic

The myths about concerts and audiences are myriad and they are collapsing one by one around concert managers who have built an empire based on their faith in them.

The core myth in concerts (like films) is that certain magical names will invariably fill a house. What everybody seems to have forgotten is that even magic wears out. Note how Burton and Taylor are slipping on the box office ratings.

In music the guaranteed box office names have been Beethoven, Tchaikowsky, most any orchestra, and a limited collection of revered pianists and violinists.

Last summer six of Beethoven's nine symphonies were played at either Tanglewood or the Saratoga Performing Arts Center and two of them at both. Van Cliburn was given his seasonal trot around the summer circuit and both music festivals prominently featured the work of Tchaikowsky.

Both festivals were seeking larger audiences and increased box office, but their success was not overwhelming. And one of Van Cliburn's performances failed to sell out.

In the meantime the Lake George Opera Festival was proceeding with a Shakespearean opera festival despite the firm advice of a number of people who considered themselves well versed on the concert market.

David Lloyd, director of the festival, was advised not to lean on unknown and out of the way works at a time when he sorely needed an increase in box office. He got his larger box office anyway and from a visibly pleased public.

The winter subscription concert series which have been the backbone of the cultural life of every medium-sized city for the last thirty or forty years are a second example of how, when it comes to concerts, the old formulas don't indicate where it is at.

The subscription series, packaged by several New York management firms, have operated on one very basic formula. Usually in four installments, the series is anchored by a symphony orchestra, heavily supported by a pianist, a vocalist and one other instrumentalist most often a violinist. Each of these is the best name that the individual series budget can afford.

But in the last few years the average age of the audience for this type of concert has gone up and the average size of that audience has gone down.

While the Civic Music Association in Albany, for example, is struggling to make ends meet, the State University of New York at Albany has drawn exceptional crowds for chamber concerts staged in an art gallery, for electronic music and for a contemporary composer explaining his own music.

Hurok Genre . . .

A third example of this change in concert economics lies in the individual bookings of the Sol Hurok genre that dot the landscape. While once these could be counted on to bring out the cultural forces of a town en masse, they aren't doing that anymore.

Artur Rubinstein was the last such artist to sell out in this area when he appeared in Albany in March of 1966.

Marcel Marceau, an internationally renowned artist of a related field, had to be canceled a year ago because it proved cheaper to settle the contract than to take the indicated losses on actually staging the show.

And within the past year, Maurice Chevalier made a respectable but financially disappointing showing here while the Vienna Choir Boys did reasonably—but not spectacularly—well.

Rubinstein is returning this month and there is hope he will break the spell since he is the last known winner.

Rubinstein is selling well

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, February 2, [illegible]

Continued from Page 1

by 1969 concert-drawing standards, but the comparison to 1966 is inevitable and heartily disappointing.

Meanwhile, an unknown ballet company is running away with the audience for a program that has not been fully announced yet.

The Empire State Ballet Company, the official name of the organization as of tomorrow (it is that new,) under the direction of Vladimir Dokoudovsky was swamped with ticket orders before it could even get them printed for its debut production later this month. Dokoudovsky is well respected within the inner circles of ballet but relatively unknown to the public.

Obviously, a strong selling point for the ballet program is its featured guest soloist, Edward Villella of the New York City Ballet, who is a very new star of the traditional magnitude. But Villella is a very new kind of star, a male ballet dancer, who has come along at a time when most concert managers haven't caught up with the idea of pinning their hopes on dance, let alone a male ballet dancer.

Failures on Rise. . .

The instances of concert failures at the box office are seemingly more and more out-numbering the successes.

The reasons are becoming quite clear but some people just don't like to look at them. Technology has outdated the drawing power of Beethoven and the symphony orchestra. So many first class recordings are available that there is little urge to brave weather, traffic, and parking problems to spend the price of a recording for a single performance.

The concert hall simply isn't the chief supplier of the old standbys any longer and in many cases can't even be depended upon to be the best cource for the warhorses.

Audiences are more apt to be enticed by the new, unknown or more inaccessible. Note the comparative strength of dance at the box office. There is no other place dance can be obtained. It is also intrinsically more lively since ballets are as new and fluctuating as symphonies have become standard.

VAN CLIBURN
Didn't sell out . . .

When people do go out, the places they go to have changed radically. The summer music festivals can be more successful, even with the old formulas, because they have moved outside the cities simultaneously with the audience. Too, the festivals can take advantage of being where the audience spends much of its leisure time.

People who are oriented around shopping centers and even suburban movie theaters are less apt to go to the old downtown sections for a concert, especially one they coud nearly reproduce on their own stereo system.

The Albany Symphony Orchestra recognized this fact and took off on a new path when it established the repertoire for the current season, evoking the anger of many long standing supporters. The repertoire is unusual in its contemporary leanings and in the absence of warhorses. The season has been successful, nevertheless, and perhaps precisely because of this repertoire.

Strong Box Office . . .

The concert this week featured a Walton violin concerto and a little known Rachmaninoff symphony. Attendance was surprisingly strong, with a particularly good showing in box office sales above seasonal subscriptions.

Audiences simply refuse to be typecast and concert managers are beginning to realize their mistake. Those who aren't are simply doing everybody a disfavor by trying to reinforce certain accepted molds.

The public is interested in the arts and is generally more informed than it was in the past. When they aren't buying tickets there have to be good reasons.

The general contention has been that there are too many things vying for their attention. This is close to the truth, but the real problem is that there are too many of the wrong things vying for attention.

Concert managers are businessmen who like to bet on the sure things. But it might prove more interesting—and profitable—if they began to run a few more risks.

Max Rudolph Resigns Post

By LOUIS NICHOLAS

Max Rudolph, suffering from complete exhaustion following the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra's recent European tour, has resigned his post as Music Director of the Orchestra on the advice of his physicians.

He had planned to retire from the post following the gala 75th season and to become Head of the Opera Department at Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, in the fall of 1970, at which time Thomas Schippers will become Music Director of the Orchestra.

Erich Kunzel, Rudolph's assistant, has been named Resident Conductor, and noted guests are being secured to fill out the Orchestra's schedule for the coming season.

This development brings to mind the enormous turnover that is imminent in the leadership of a number of the foremost orchestras of the land, either this season or next.

Leonard Bernstein has become Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and will be succeeded as Music Director by Pierre Boulez, noted French composer-conductor.

Erich Leinsdorf is departing the Boston Symphony, and William Steinberg takes his place, but also retains his post in Pittsburgh.

Herbert von Karajan accumulated most of the biggest directorships in Europe several years ago, but had to relinquish most of them one by one as it became evident he could not give the necessary attention to any of them. He still keeps the directorships of the Berlin Philharmonic, however, along with that of the Salzburg Festivals—both summer and at Easter—to say nothing of annual stays at the Metropolitan Opera to conduct the unfolding drama of his production of the Wagner Ring operas — with one additional one added each season until the whole new cycle can be given.

The Music Scene

The Chicago Symphony is "making do" with a Resident Conductor and guests until Georg Solti comes to take over. However, he is another who has so many other commitments that one wonders whether Chicago will be willing to put up with so much coming and going.

After 20 years as Music Director of the Washington, D. C., National Symphony Orchestra (he was its principal cellist for 15 years before that), Howard Mitchell has asked to be relieved of administrative duties, and to become Chief Visiting Conductor.

He will be succeeded by Antal Dorati who had extensive tenures in Dallas and Minneapolis before going to Europe several years ago.

* * *

And, speaking of changes in the orchestral scene, one notes that Michael Semanitzky, former Nashville Symphony concertmaster and member of the Peabody College music faculty, is making the jump from academia to the sphere of professional orchestra directing.

Join Johnston

Following a tour of Europe (May-August) as conductor with Les Grand Ballets Canadiens of Montreal, Semanitzky severs his connection with Butler University in Indianapolis, where he has been since leaving Nashville, and becomes director of the Johnson (Pa.) Symphony Orchestra and the Pittsburgh Youth Symphony, where he will be under the watchful eyes of William Steinberg.

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 141,842 SUN. 234,036

AUG 24 1969

He will also work directly with the Johnstown Chorale and the local Youth Orchestra as well. It appears that he will be quite a busy fellow.

Plans are being made to take the Pittsburgh Youth Symphony to EXPO Japan next year.

Semanitzky, who guest-conducted the Nashville Symphony and Little Symphony as well as the performances of Les Ballets Intimes) season before last, garnered a sheaf of laudatory reviews of his work in Europe with the Ballet. In Lausanne, Switzerland, it was said he "must be rated among the top ballet conductors of our day," and Zurich called him "a conductor of extraordinarily high quality." In Paris, a reviewer said, "This is te best ballet conducting we have witnessed here in recent memory."

Semanitzky's many friends and admirers here have long been aware of his abilities and his increasing interest in conducting, and will wish him great success in his new venture.

Willis Page's engagement as conductor of the Des Moines (Iowa) Philharmonic, and as a member of the Drake University music faculty was announced some time ago, but was never mentioned here. Page went from the directorship of the Nashville Symphony Association two years ago to head the conducting department of the Eastman School of Music.

Another move of a former Nashvillian is that of Richard Rivers, baritone, from Tyler, Texas, to Richmond, Virginia, where he will be Associate Professor at the newly formed Virginia Commonwealth University.

Rivers, a graduate of the Juilliard School of Music and of George Peabody College, has been soloist a number of times with the Nashville Symphony, and has appeared in musicals and operas at Peabody and with Theater Nashville.

136b

Box Office Myths Are Collapsing

By JOAN SIMMONS

Times-Union Music Critic

The myths about concerts and audiences are myriad and they are collapsing one by one around concert managers who have built an empire based on their faith in them.

The core myth in concerts (like films) is that certain magical names will invariably fill a house. What everybody seems to have forgotten is that even magic wears out. Note how Burton and Taylor are slipping on the box office ratings.

In music the guaranteed box office names have been Beethoven, Tchaikowsky, most any orchestra, and a limited collection of revered pianists and violinists.

Last summer six of Beethoven's nine symphonies were played at either Tanglewood or the Saratoga Performing Arts Center and two of them at both. Van Cliburn was given his seasonal trot around the summer circuit and both music festivals prominently featured the work of Tchaikowsky.

Both festivals were seeking larger audiences and increased box office, but their success was not overwhelming. And one of Van Cliburn's performances failed to sell out.

In the meantime the Lake George Opera Festival was proceeding with a Shakespearean opera festival despite the firm advice of a number of people who considered themselves well versed on the concert market.

David Lloyd, director of the festival, was advised not to lean on unknown and out of the way works at a time when he sorely needed an increase in box office. He got his larger box office anyway and from a visibly pleased public.

The winter subscription concert series which have been the backbone of the cultural life of every medium-sized city for the last thirty or forty years are a second example of how, when it comes to concerts, the old formulas don't indicate where it is at.

The subscription series, packaged by several New York management firms, have operated on one very basic formula. Usually in four installments, the series is anchored by a symphony orchestra, heavily supported by a pianist, a vocalist and one other instrumentalist most often a violinist. Each of these is the best name that the individual series budget can afford.

But in the last few years the average age of the audience for this type of concert has gone up and the average size of that audience has gone down.

While the Civic Music Association in Albany, for example, is struggling to make ends meet, the State University of New York at Albany has drawn exceptional crowds for chamber concerts staged in an art gallery, for electronic music and for a contemporary composer explaining his own music.

Hurok Genre . . .

A third example of this change in concert economics lies in the individual bookings of the Sol Hurok genre that dot the landscape. While once these could be counted on to bring out the cultural forces of a town en masse, they aren't doing that anymore.

Artur Rubinstein was the last such artist to sell out in this area when he appeared in Albany in March of 1966.

Marcel Marceau, an internationally renowned artist of a related field, had to be canceled a year ago because it proved cheaper to settle the contract than to take the indicated losses on actually staging the show.

And within the past year, Maurice Chevalier made a respectable but financially disappointing showing here while the Vienna Choir Boys did reasonably—but not spectacularly—well.

Rubinstein is returning this month and there is hope he will break the spell since he is the last known winner.

Rubinstein is selling well

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, February 2,

Continued from Page 1

by 1969 concert-drawing standards, but the comparison to 1966 is inevitable and heartily disappointing.

Meanwhile, an unknown ballet company is running away with the audience for a program that has not been fully announced yet.

The Empire State Ballet Company, the official name of the organization as of tomorrow (it is that new,) under the direction of Vladimir Dokoudovsky was swamped with ticket orders before it could even get them printed for its debut production later this month. Dokoudovsky is well respected within the inner circles of ballet but relatively unknown to the public.

Obviously, a strong selling point for the ballet program is its featured guest soloist, Edward Villella of the New York City Ballet, who is a very new star of the traditional magnitude. But Villella is a very new kind of star, a male ballet dancer, who has come along at a time when most concert managers haven't caught up with the idea of pinning their hopes on dance, let alone a male ballet dancer.

Failures on Rise. . .

The instances of concert failures at the box office are seemingly more and more out-numbering the successes.

The reasons are becoming quite clear but some people just don't like to look at them. Technology has outdated the drawing power of Beethoven and the symphony orchestra. So many first class recordings are available that there is little urge to brave weather, traffic, and parking problems to spend the price of a recording for a single performance.

The concert hall simply isn't the chief supplier of the old standbys any longer and in many cases can't even be depended upon to be the best cource for the warhorses.

Audiences are more apt to be enticed by the new, unknown or more inaccessible. Note the comparative strength of dance at the box office. There is no other place dance can be obtained. It is also intrinsically more lively since ballets are as new and fluctuating as symphonies have become standard.

VAN CLIBURN
Didn't sell out . . .

When people do go out, the places they go to have changed radically. The summer music festivals can be more successful, even with the old formulas, because they have moved outside the cities simultaneously with the audience. Too, the festivals can take advantage of being where the audience spends much of its leisure time.

People who are oriented around shopping centers and even suburban movie theaters are less apt to go to the old downtown sections for a concert, especially one they coud nearly reproduce on their own stereo system.

The Albany Symphony Orchestra recognized this fact and took off on a new path when it established the repertoire for the current season, evoking the anger of many long standing supporters. The repertoire is unusual in its contemporary leanings and in the absence of warhorses. The season has been successful, nevertheless, and perhaps precisely because of this repertoire.

Strong Box Office . . .

The concert this week featured a Walton violin concerto and a little known Rachmaninoff symphony. Attendance was surprisingly strong, with a particularly good showing in box office sales above seasonal subscriptions.

Audiences simply refuse to be typecast and concert managers are beginning to realize their mistake. Those who aren't are simply doing everybody a disfavor by trying to reinforce certain accepted molds.

The public is interested in the arts and is generally more informed than it was in the past. When they aren't buying tickets there have to be good reasons.

The general contention has been that there are too many things vying for their attention. This is close to the truth, but the real problem is that there are too many of the wrong things vying for attention.

Concert managers are businessmen who like to bet on the sure things. But it might prove more interesting—and profitable—if they began to run a few more risks.

Max Rudolph Resigns Post

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 141,842 SUN. 234,036
AUG 24 1969

By LOUIS NICHOLAS

Max Rudolph, suffering from complete exhaustion following the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra's recent European tour, has resigned his post as Music Director of the Orchestra on the advice of his physicians.

He had planned to retire from the post following the gala 75th season and to become Head of the Opera Department at Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, in the fall of 1970, at which time Thomas Schippers will become Music Director of the Orchestra.

The Music Scene

Erich Kunzel, Rudolph's assistant, has been named Resident Conductor, and noted guests are being secured to fill out the Orchestra's schedule for the coming season.

This development brings to mind the enormous turnover that is imminent in the leadership of a number of the foremost orchestras of the land, either this season or next.

Leonard Bernstein has become Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and will be succeeded as Music Director by Pierre Boulez, noted French composer-conductor.

Erich Leinsdorf is departing the Boston Symphony, and William Steinberg takes his place, but also retains his post in Pittsburgh.

Herbert von Karajan accumulated most of the biggest directorships in Europe several years ago, but had to relinquish most of them one by one as it became evident he could not give the necessary attention to any of them. He still keeps the directorships of the Berlin Philharmonic, however, along with that of the Salzburg Festivals—both summer and at Easter—to say nothing of annual stays at the Metropolitan Opera to conduct the unfolding drama of his production of the Wagner Ring operas — with one additional one added each season until the whole new cycle can be given.

The Chicago Symphony is "making do" with a Resident Conductor and guests until Georg Solti comes to take over. However, he is another who has so many other commitments that one wonders whether Chicago will be willing to put up with so much coming and going.

After 20 years as Music Director of the Washington, D. C., National Symphony Orchestra (he was its principal cellist for 15 years before that), Howard Mitchell has asked to be relieved of administrative duties, and to become Chief Visiting Conductor.

He will be succeeded by Antal Dorati who had extensive tenures in Dallas and Minneapolis before going to Europe several years ago.

* * *

And, speaking of changes in the orchestral scene, one notes that Michael Semanitzky, former Nashville Symphony concertmaster and member of the Peabody College music faculty, is making the jump from academia to the sphere of professional orchestra directing.

Join Johnston

Following a tour of Europe (May-August) as conductor with Les Grand Ballets Canadiens of Montreal, Semanitzky severs his connection with Butler University in Indianapolis, where he has been since leaving Nashville, and becomes director of the Johnson (Pa.) Symphony Orchestra and the Pittsburgh Youth Symphony, where he will be under the watchful eyes of William Steinberg.

He will also work directly with the Johnstown Chorale and the local Youth Orchestra as well. It appears that he will be quite a busy fellow.

Plans are being made to take the Pittsburgh Youth Symphony to EXPO Japan next year.

Semanitzky, who guest-conducted the Nashville Symphony and Little Symphony as well as the performances of Les Ballets Intimes) season before last, garnered a sheaf of laudatory reviews of his work in Europe with the Ballet. In Lausanne, Switzerland, it was said he "must be rated among the top ballet conductors of our day," and Zurich called him "a conductor of extraordinarily high quality." In Paris, a reviewer said, "This is te best ballet conducting we have witnessed here in recent memory."

Semanitzky's many friends and admirers here have long been aware of his abilities and his increasing interest in conducting, and will wish him great success in his new venture.

Willis Page's engagement as conductor of the Des Moines (Iowa) Philharmonic, and as a member of the Drake University music faculty was announced some time ago, but was never mentioned here. Page went from the directorship of the Nashville Symphony Association two years ago to head the conducting department of the Eastman School of Music.

Another move of a former Nashvillian is that of Richard Rivers, baritone, from Tyler, Texas, to Richmond, Virginia, where he will be Associate Professor at the newly formed Virginia Commonwealth University.

Rivers, a graduate of the Juilliard School of Music and of George Peabody College, has been soloist a number of times with the Nashville Symphony, and has appeared in musicals and operas at Peabody and with Theater Nashville.

PASTE OVER

137

Young Violinists From Asia Gain Major Place on American Musical Scene

By DONAL HENAHAN

Hundreds of exceptionally talented Asian violinists have come swarming onto the American musical scene in recent years, and the long-standing shortage of string players may soon be eased as a result.

Just as there was a time early in this century when Russian Jews provided the greatest source of talented violinists, it is now the turn of Asians — Japanese and Koreans, in particular.

Leading teachers and other musical observers differ as to why the wave of talent is coming from the East, but all agree it is happening none too soon. Erich Leinsdorf, who leaves after next season as musical director of the Boston Symphony, said in an interview recently:

"In 10 years, unless the present shortage is alleviated, we may not be able to man our own string sections in America. We are already using kids."

Mr. Leinsdorf pointed out that the Cleveland Orchestra last season went so far as to place an advertisement for string players in the Sunday music section of The New York Times. As to the "kids," he noted that a boy named Richard Sher had auditioned for the Boston Symphony at 18 a few years ago. Before the audition, Mr. Leinsdorf said, he took the braces off his teeth to try to look a bit more mature. He got the job.

"I think American symphony orchestras will have more than half their string sections made up of Japanese players in a few years unless America does something about it," says Kazuko Hillyer, head of Pacific World Artists, a New York concern that manages Asian musicians.

One of its artists is Masuko Ushioda, second-place winner in the Tchaikovsky competition at Moscow in 1966. (Miss Ushioda will be soloist at the Saratoga Festival on Aug. 15, with her countryman, Seiji Ozawa, conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra.)

Thus far, however, in spite of the impressive numbers of young soloists turned out, Asians have been slow to find their way into American orchestral string sections.

"I am always being asked by orchestras and conductors to get young players for them. Practically all the orchestras in the United States have asked," said Mrs. Hillyer, the wife of Rafael Hillyer, violist of the Juilliard String Quartet.

But few of the players have chosen to go into orchestras, she said. "It's not because of the money. They are almost all still under 30, and they would first rather try for a solo career."

To Ivan Galamian, violin teacher at the Juilliard School of Music, it is only a matter of time before the orchestras will be stocked with Asians. Mr. Galamian, interviewed by phone at his summer music camp near Lake Champlain, Meadowmount School of Music, said, "There will be more Orientals soon, because the orchestras badly need them. Most, you understand, come here as already advanced students, and they prefer to be soloists or go back home and teach."

Tae Moon Lee

Ivan Galamian listens as Young Uck Kim rehearses a passage in Mr. Galamian's studio

Mr. Galamian pointed out that of an enrollment this summer of 200, Meadowmount had 21 Asians: 10 Koreans, 8 Japanese and 3 Chinese.

Richard Burgin, the former Boston Symphony concertmaster who is now on the faculty of Florida State University, in Saratoga, where he is musical director of the 10th Annual Congress of Strings, compared teaching in Japan and America.

He said "the basic issue is time—there is not enough time in American schools given to playing and studying music."

He noted that at the famous Toho School, near Tokyo, "they have 60 students of college age and all their time is devoted to music, applied music, morning to evening, no other subjects." There is no other way, he indicated, to produce a fine fiddler.

Suzuko Hillyer agreed. A Toho graduate (as is Seiji Ozawa and many of the other rising young Japanese virtuosos), Mrs. Hillyer said: "It is very hard for an American child to study the violin."

At Toho, children are brought to special classes two day a week for ear training, starting at age 3 or 4. The school was opened immediately after World War II to train very young children, she said, and through its founder, Hideo Saito, a former cello student of Emanuel Feuermann, the institution has been the most important force in producing the postwar flood of Japanese string talent.

Why should the Japanese take so readily to the violin? "It's because of the discipline needed for violin study," Mrs. Hillyer said. "Oriental discipline suits the violin. And Japanese children tend to have thin fingers, which helps them produce pure pitch."

Besides, she added, "the Japanese are good at small details, like making small transistor radios," and small details is what violin practice is all about.

Mr. Burgin had slightly different explanations for the phenomenon. "String playing is very much in vogue in Japan," he said. "Japan violin makers are very busy. The violin costs less, for instance, than a piano. When I was in Tokyo on tour with the Boston Symphony, a lady musician pointed out another important reason to me: Japanese homes generally do not have enough room to put a piano."

Mr. Burgin believes the Japanese think in terms of strings. Traditional to the country are the strummed samisen and the extraordinarily complex koto, a 13-stringed instrument with movable frets that is 12 centuries old.

Mr. Burgin also cited as an important influence in the Japanese violin renaissance the much-publicized work with preschool children of Shinichi Suzuki.

Several years ago, Mr. Suzuki toured this country with some of his tiny students, demonstrating how they could be playing Vivaldi and Bach even before they could read Japanese, let alone music notation.

But several observers believe the Suzuki influence had been overemphasized. Mr. Galamian pointed out that only two of the eight Japanese at his camp were "Suzuki children," and that in preparation schools where the Suzuki method has been tried in this country, "it has not seemed to work."

Mrs. Hillyer contended that the flood of Japanese violinists was "definitely" not because of Suzuki. "Not many professional players have been turned out by him," she said. Violinists have lots of doubts about his methods."

None of those questioned professed to know precisely what has caused the appearance of so many gifted Asian students. "It's a very mysterious thing," said Mr. Galamian. "Very strange."

It was stressed by Mrs. Hillyer that South Korea, which has no violin teacher of international standing, has been producing talented students. Two of the leading young concert performers at the moment are Korean: Young Uck Kim, who has scored important successes with many leading orchestras, and Kyung Wha Chung, a 20-year-old who won last year's Leventritt competition.

Although the Japanese have been slow to enter orchestral ranks thus far, many have taken concertmaster positions, joined string quartets, or joined American string faculties.

Kenji Kobayashi, a former student of Mr. Galamian at Meadowmount, made a name as a performer of difficult new music, and is now concertmaster of the Oklahoma City Symphony. Koji Toyota is concertmaster of the Berlin Radio Symphony. Hidetaro Susuki is concertmaster of the Quebec Symphony. Syoko Aki, a former student of Broadus Erle, teaches at Yale University and is a member of the Yale Quarter. Mr. Erle, leader of the quartet and also a Yale teacher, himself spent several years as concertmaster of the Japan Philharmonic.

Although there are a few young Chinese violinists coming into the picture, China has been a poor third in producing Oriental string players.

Ma Si-Hon, who escaped from the mainland some years ago, has made a name as a soloist. Mr. Burgin, Mr. Galamian and others named other promising Chinese students.

But one teacher felt that the Chinese definitely "are not as musically inclined as the Koreans, for instance."

He added: "The Koreans are extremely sensitive. And the Japanese all seem to desire to make music." Oddly enough, Mrs. Hillyer said, Chinese children grow up attuned to fine pitch differences, because theirs is a language in which each word may vary in meaning depending upon subtleties of intonation.

Korean and Japanese, she said, are not pitched languages. So that explanation was ruled out.

Several persons theorized that World War II and its aftermath, and the Korean war had been instrumental in arousing Japanese and Korean interest in Western music and the violin, Western music's most honored traditional instrument.

None of the nation's top-ranking symphony orchestras currently lists an Asian in its string sections, although in the smaller orchestras there is a liberal sprinkling.

The Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia, for instance, has Yumi Ninomya among the first violins. The preponderance of top-ranking orchestral violinists still is Jewish, and most often of Central European ancestry, though that picture is changing fast.

The great prestige of the violin among Jews apparently is past. Jewish parents apparently are not insisting with the same vigor of a generation or two ago that their children take up the violin.

Much of the instrument's prestige among Jews in this century traces directly to the days in Imperial Russia, when proficiency on the violin was one of the few escape routes from behind the Pale, the Jewish ghetto in southwestern Russia and southeastern Poland.

Under the tutelage of Leopold Auer in St. Petersburg, an extraordinary number of these pupils developed into internationally ranked virtuosos. They swept out of Russia in several stages, with results that kept the violin's prestige high until fairly recent years in this country.

Among the Auer students were Jascha Heifetz, Effrem Zimbalist, Mishel Piastro, Nathan Milstein, Paul Stassevitch, Mischa Elman, Toscha Seidel, Josef Knitzer, Alexander Hilsberg, Richard Burgin and many others.

There is a newly flourishing school of young violinists today in Israel, carrying on the Central European tradition. Itzhak Perlman, Shmuel Ashkenasi and Pinchas Zuckerman are three who have made names for themselves recently.

But if the present trend persists the ancient Occidental art of violin playing may soon have an Asian orientation.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

AUG 2 1968

Symphonies and black musicians

Michael Steinberg, music critic for The Globe, undertook to answer a question which I posed in a brief letter to the editor. That question concerned the lack of black musicians in the Boston Symphony, most conspicuous when the orchestra performed in Roxbury's Franklin Park. I believe that for the serious black musician, both those waiting in the wings and those active in the field, Steinberg's analysis must appear superficial and foolish. I am not a musician, but have had considerable contact with black musicians—probably more than Mr. Steinberg. I answer him not from a sense of arrogance, but from the experience of my blackness.

The subtlety of prejudice, better known as racism, is as much a sedative for the black musician today as overt discrimination disabled his counterpart yesterday. It was a totally useless gesture for Steinberg to poll symphony orchestras about their "hiring practices" since no one could seriously expect any institution in this age of equal opportunity to publicly confess discrimination — not even George Wallace.

The subtleties of prejudice are invisible, amorphous and filter through only if closely observed. Racism is largely revealed in attitudes toward a minority group.

It is not even obvious to white America that black people don't participate in the symphonic world. That is the first instance of racism. . . .

Historically, white America has manipulated certain roles for blacks and controlled these boundaries rigidly. White America has traditionally admitted black artists into the world of pure entertainment, mainly for its self-gratification—from the old time minstrel show to the present day TV comedian or black Boy Scouts singing for the local Jaycees or a night club entertainer who entered through the back door. Black people kept their places this way. When Roland Hayes or Dean Dixon or Marian Anderson or even the presently engaged Henry Lewis appeared as virtuoso artists, white America was psychologically unprepared to accept them. Thus their route to success and recognition was unnecessarily difficult, made triumphant only by extraordinary patience and discipline and a superiority more brilliant than their white counterparts. Roland Hayes, master artist of the leider, rented Symphony Hall himself when the B.S.O. told him that he could not perform with the Symphony.

Even today, white America is unprepared to accept a black classic violinist because white America does not expect him to produce in this creative media. It can accept a black jazz drummer, but not a concert percussionist . . . And this truth applies to all other orchestral instruments . . .

The unions have effectively played their part, but their supporting role must be discussed at a later time. In the symphonic world, the conservatories must be held directly accountable because it is here symphonic musicians are largely produced. Mr. Steinberg can account for "several black singers, a good many jazz players, a handful of pianists, and just two players of orchestral instruments" at the conservatory where he taught for several years because this breakdown represents precisely the limitations that white America has imposed and desired for black people . . .

It is not true, as Steinberg submits, that black musicians "do not come to auditions," but I don't know how many specific examples he would want before he would relinquish his opinion. The principle issue, however, is that if the music world realizes the absence of black musicians from the auditioning process, it must ask why and take affirmative steps to eliminate the vacuum.

Again, Mr. Steinberg is wrong when he says that there are few qualified black players. Indeed there are enough of them. To say that there are too few is to remain blind to those that do exist. Furthermore, he admits that "the majority of good black instrumentalists have wound up among the freelancers." This "majority" which he points to should and can be the first reservoir for orchestras to tap . . .

If the symphony orchestras are seriously committed to securing black musicians, they can do so without threatenening professional standards.

It is up to boards of trustees, personnel managers, conductors, "friends" of the orchestras, even the orchestra members themselves to aggressively recruit black symphony musicians. They know who the blacks are. They know where to find them.

The symphony orchestras must behave like other industries and corporations which have secured top quality employees when they want them. They must allow for the difference in experience simply because the black man has neither control nor choice in his life experiences. They must give special attention to the black musician on the scene by encouraging his participation in the symphonic world. They must exert an influence on their seeding beds, namely the music schools and community orchestras. Boston has some of the finest music preparatory schools and yet the B.S.O. has no black musicians.

BETTYE I. LATIMER

Roxbury

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

AUG 7 1968

New England Newsclip

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

NOV 1968

players. He quotes York Philharmonic's violinist Sanford Allen as saying, "I'm still the only black in the 'Big Three' orchestras" —by which Allen presumably means Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. Many would today dispute his choice of the three. But even if we take in Cleveland and Chicago and speak of the "Big Five," there is only one more name, the Cleveland's cellist, Donald White. A roster of more than five hundred players with only two Negroes constitutes nothing short of a scandal.

In fairness, as I recently had occasion to point out elsewhere, the Boston Symphony's former conductor Charles Munch did appoint a Negro contrabassist, Ortiz Walton, who was on the roster from 1957 to 1962 (and it was also Munch who raised eyebrows by daring in 1952 to appoint a woman, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, as principal flutist—and a superlative appointment, too). Mr. Russcol states that the Boston Symphony is now "on the lookout for a Negro percussionist." Perhaps there was no intention of sounding condescending, but this seems to put the orchestra in the position of saying, "Everybody knows that Negroes have rhythm, so maybe we could find a black drummer." The orchestra ought to welcome Negro players of any instruments for which vacancies arise. And, despite all the disclaimers to the contrary, there are such players around, although they are not plentiful. It is up to our major orchestras to go out and actively recruit them for auditions from the minor-league orchestras and elsewhere.

If we turn to the ranks of instrumental concert soloists, the picture is no b[illegible] The sole Negro musician who study[illegible] not stringed instruments, where a shortage of good ensemble players is likely to go on for some time. A satisfactory state of affairs will not come about overnight, but there is no excuse for continued complacency and delay.

Caldwell Titcomb
Department of Music
Brandeis University
Waltham, Mass.

PASTE OVER

137

Young Violinists From Asia Gain Major Place on American Musical Scene

By DONAL HENAHAN

Hundreds of exceptionally talented Asian violinists have come swarming onto the American musical scene in recent years, and the long-standing shortage of string players may soon be eased as a result.

Just as there was a time early in this century when Russian Jews provided the greatest source of talented violinists, it is now the turn of Asians — Japanese and Koreans, in particular.

Leading teachers and other musical observers differ as to why the wave of talent is coming from the East, but all agree it is happening none too soon. Erich Leinsdorf, who leaves after next season as musical director of the Boston Symphony, said in an interview recently:

"In 10 years, unless the present shortage is alleviated, we may not be able to man our own string sections in America. We are already using kids."

Mr. Leinsdorf pointed out that the Cleveland Orchestra last season went so far as to place an advertisement for string players in the Sunday music section of The New York Times. As to the "kids," he noted that a boy named Richard Sher had auditioned for the Boston Symphony at 18 a few years ago. Before the audition, Mr. Leinsdorf said, he took the braces off his teeth to try to look a bit more mature. He got the job.

"I think American symphony orchestras will have more than half their string sections made up of Japanese players in a few years unless America does something about it," says Kazuko Hillyer, head of Pacific World Artists, a New York concern that manages Asian musicians.

One of its artists is Masuko Ushioda, second-place winner in the Tchaikovsky competition at Moscow in 1966. (Miss Ushioda will be soloist at the Saratoga Festival on Aug. 15, with her countryman, Seiji Ozawa, conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra.)

Thus far, however, in spite of the impressive numbers of young soloists turned out, Asians have been slow to find their way into American orchestral string sections.

"I am always being asked by orchestras and conductors to get young players for them. Practically all the orchestras in the United States have asked," said Mrs. Hillyer, the wife of Rafael Hillyer, violist of the Juilliard String Quartet.

But few of the players have chosen to go into orchestras, she said. "It's not because of the money. They are almost all still under 30, and they would first rather try for a solo career."

To Ivan Galamian, violin teacher at the Juilliard School of Music, it is only a matter of time before the orchestras will be stocked with Asians. Mr. Galamian, interviewed by phone at his summer music camp near Lake Champlain, Meadowmount School of Music, said, "There will be more Orientals soon, because the orchestras badly need them. Most, you understand, come here as already advanced students, and they prefer to be soloists or go back home and teach."

Tae Moon Lee

Ivan Galamian listens as Young Uck Kim rehearses a passage in Mr. Galamian's studio

Mr. Galamian pointed out that of an enrollment this summer of 200, Meadowmount had 21 Asians: 10 Koreans, 8 Japanese and 3 Chinese.

Richard Burgin, the former Boston Symphony concertmaster who is now on the faculty of Florida State University, in Saratoga, where he is musical director of the 10th Annual Congress of Strings, compared teaching in Japan and America.

He said "the basic issue is time—there is not enough time in American schools given to playing and studying music."

He noted that at the famous Toho School, near Tokyo, "they have 60 students of college age and all their time is devoted to music, applied music, morning to evening, no other subjects." There is no other way, he indicated, to produce a fine fiddler.

Suzuko Hillyer agreed. A Toho graduate (as is Seiji Ozawa and many of the other rising young Japanese virtuosos), Mrs. Hillyer said: "It is very hard for an American child to study the violin."

At Toho, children are brought to special classes two day a week for ear training, starting at age 3 or 4. The school was opened immediately after World War II to train very young children, she said, and through its founder, Hideo Saito, a former cello student of Emanuel Feuermann, the institution has been the most important force in producing the postwar flood of Japanese string talent.

Why should the Japanese take so readily to the violin? "It's because of the discipline needed for violin study," Mrs. Hillyer said. "Oriental discipline suits the violin. And Japanese children tend to have thin fingers, which helps them produce pure pitch."

Besides, she added, "the Japanese are good at small details, like making small transistor radios," and small details is what violin practice is all about.

Mr. Burgin had slightly different explanations for the phenomenon. "String playing is very much in vogue in Japan," he said. "Japan violin makers are very busy. The violin costs less, for instance, than a piano. When I was in Tokyo on tour with the Boston Symphony, a lady musician pointed out another important reason to me: Japanese homes generally do not have enough room to put a piano."

Mr. Burgin believes the Japanese think in terms of strings. Traditional to the country are the strummed samisen and the extraordinarily complex koto, a 13-stringed instrument with movable frets that is 12 centuries old.

Mr. Burgin also cited as an important influence in the Japanese violin renaissance the much-publicized work with preschool children of Shinichi Suzuki.

Several years ago, Mr. Suzuki toured this country with some of his tiny students, demonstrating how they could be playing Vivaldi and Bach even before they could read Japanese, let alone music notation.

But several observers believe the Suzuki influence had been overemphasized. Mr. Galamian pointed out that only two of the eight Japanese at his camp were "Suzuki children," and that in preparation schools where the Suzuki method has been tried in this country, "it has not seemed to work."

Mrs. Hillyer contended that the flood of Japanese violinists was "definitely" not because of Suzuki. "Not many professional players have been turned out by him," she said. Violinists have lots of doubts about his methods."

None of those questioned professed to know precisely what has caused the appearance of so many gifted Asian students. "It's a very mysterious thing," said Mr. Galamian. "Very strange."

It was stressed by Mrs. Hillyer that South Korea, which has no violin teacher of international standing, has been producing talented students. Two of the leading young concert performers at the moment are Korean: Young Uck Kim, who has scored important successes with many leading orchestras, and Kyung Wha Chung, a 20-year-old who won last year's Leventritt competition.

Although the Japanese have been slow to enter orchestral ranks thus far, many have taken concertmaster positions, joined string quartets, or joined American string faculties.

Kenji Kobayashi, a former student of Mr. Galamian at Meadowmount, made a name as a performer of difficult new music, and is now concertmaster of the Oklahoma City Symphony. Koji Toyota is concertmaster of the Berlin Radio Symphony. Hidetaro Susuki is concertmaster of the Quebec Symphony. Syoko Aki, a former student of Broadus Erle, teaches at Yale University and is a member of the Yale Quarter. Mr. Erle, leader of the quartet and also a Yale teacher, himself spent several years as concertmaster of the Japan Philharmonic.

Although there are a few young Chinese violinists coming into the picture, China has been a poor third in producing Oriental string players.

Ma Si-Hon, who escaped from the mainland some years ago, has made a name as a soloist. Mr. Burgin, Mr. Galamian and others named other promising Chinese students.

But one teacher felt that the Chinese definitely "are not as musically inclined as the Koreans, for instance."

He added: "The Koreans are extremely sensitive. And the Japanese all seem to desire to make music." Oddly enough, Mrs. Hillyer said, Chinese children grow up attuned to fine pitch differences, because theirs is a language in which each word may vary in meaning depending upon subtleties of intonation.

Korean and Japanese, she said, are not pitched languages. So that explanation was ruled out.

Several persons theorized that World War II and its aftermath, and the Korean war had been instrumental in arousing Japanese and Korean interest in Western music and the violin, Western music's most honored traditional instrument.

None of the nation's top-ranking symphony orchestras currently lists an Asian in its string sections, although in the smaller orchestras there is a liberal sprinkling.

The Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia, for instance, has Yumi Ninomya among the first violins. The preponderance of top-ranking orchestral violinists still is Jewish, and most often of Central European ancestry, though that picture is changing fast.

The great prestige of the violin among Jews apparently is past. Jewish parents apparently are not insisting with the same vigor of a generation or two ago that their children take up the violin.

Much of the instrument's prestige among Jews in this century traces directly to the days in Imperial Russia, when proficiency on the violin was one of the few escape routes from behind the Pale, the Jewish ghetto in southwestern Russia and southeastern Poland.

Under the tutelage of Leopold Auer in St. Petersburg, an extraordinary number of these pupils developed into internationally ranked virtuosos. They swept out of Russia in several stages, with results that kept the violin's prestige high until fairly recent years in this country.

Among the Auer students were Jascha Heifetz, Effrem Zimbalist, Mishel Piastro, Nathan Milstein, Paul Stassevitch, Mischa Elman, Toscha Seidel, Josef Knitzer, Alexander Hilsberg, Richard Burgin and many others.

There is a newly flourishing school of young violinists today in Israel, carrying on the Central European tradition. Itzhak Perlman, Shmuel Ashkenasi and Pinchas Zuckerman are three who have made names for themselves recently.

But if the present trend persists the ancient Occidental art of violin playing may soon have an Asian orientation.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

AUG 2 1968

Symphonies and black musicians

Michael Steinberg, music critic for The Globe, undertook to answer a question which I posed in a brief letter to the editor. That question concerned the lack of black musicians in the Boston Symphony, most conspicuous when the orchestra performed in Roxbury's Franklin Park. I believe that for the serious black musician, both those waiting in the wings and those active in the field, Steinberg's analysis must appear superficial and foolish. I am not a musician, but have had considerable contact with black musicians—probably more than Mr. Steinberg. I answer him not from a sense of arrogance, but from the experience of my blackness.

The subtlety of prejudice, better known as racism, is as much a sedative for the black musician today as overt discrimination disabled his counterpart yesterday. It was a totally useless gesture for Steinberg to poll symphony orchestras about their "hiring practices" since no one could seriously expect any institution in this age of equal opportunity to publicly confess discrimination — not even George Wallace.

The subtleties of prejudice are invisible, amorphous and filter through only if closely observed. Racism is largely revealed in attitudes toward a minority group.

It is not even obvious to white America that black people don't participate in the symphonic world. That is the first instance of racism. . . .

Historically, white America has manipulated certain roles for blacks and controlled these boundaries rigidly. White America has traditionally admitted black artists into the world of pure entertainment, mainly for its self-gratification—from the old time minstrel show to the present day TV comedian or black Boy Scouts singing for the local Jaycees or a night club entertainer who entered through the back door. Black people kept their places this way. When Roland Hayes or Dean Dixon or Marian Anderson or even the presently engaged Henry Lewis appeared as virtuoso artists, white America was psychologically unprepared to accept them. Thus their route to success and recognition was unnecessarily difficult, made triumphant only by extraordinary patience and discipline and a superiority more brilliant than their white counterparts. Roland Hayes, master artist of the leider, rented Symphony Hall himself when the B.S.O. told him that he could not perform with the Symphony.

Even today, white America is unprepared to accept a black classic violinist because white America does not expect him to produce in this creative media. It can accept a black jazz drummer, but not a concert percussionist . . . And this truth applies to all other orchestral instruments . . .

The unions have effectively played their part, but their supporting role must be discussed at a later time. In the symphonic world, the conservatories must be held directly accountable because it is here symphonic musicians are largely produced. Mr. Steinberg can account for "several black singers, a good many jazz players, a handful of pianists, and just two players of orchestral instruments" at the conservatory where he taught for several years because this breakdown represents precisely the limitations that white America has imposed and desired for black people . . .

It is not true, as Steinberg submits, that black musicians "do not come to auditions," but I don't know how many specific examples he would want before he would relinquish his opinion. The principle issue, however, is that if the music world realizes the absence of black musicians from the auditioning process, it must ask why and take affirmative steps to eliminate the vacuum.

Again, Mr. Steinberg is wrong when he says that there are few qualified black players. Indeed there are enough of them. To say that there are too few is to remain blind to those that do exist. Furthermore, he admits that "the majority of good black instrumentalists have wound up among the freelancers." This "majority" which he points to should and can be the first reservoir for orchestras to tap . . .

If the symphony orchestras are seriously committed to securing black musicians, they can do so without threatenening professional standards.

It is up to boards of trustees, personnel managers, conductors, "friends" of the orchestras, even the orchestra members themselves to aggressively recruit black symphony musicians. They know who the blacks are. They know where to find them.

The symphony orchestras must behave like other industries and corporations which have secured top quality employees when they want them. They must allow for the difference in experience simply because the black man has neither control nor choice in his life experiences. They must give special attention to the black musician on the scene by encouraging his participation in the symphonic world. They must exert an influence on their seeding beds, namely the music schools and community orchestras. Boston has some of the finest music preparatory schools and yet the B.S.O. has no black musicians.

BETTYE I. LATIMER

Roxbury

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

AUG 7 1968

New England Newsclip

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

NOV 1968

... now-
... players. He quotes
... York Philharmonic's violinist
Sanford Allen as saying, "I'm still the only black in the 'Big Three' orchestras" —by which Allen presumably means Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. Many would today dispute his choice of the three. But even if we take in Cleveland and Chicago and speak of the "Big Five," there is only one more name, the Cleveland's cellist, Donald White. A roster of more than five hundred players with only two Negroes constitutes nothing short of a scandal.

In fairness, as I recently had occasion to point out elsewhere, the Boston Symphony's former conductor Charles Munch did appoint a Negro contrabassist, Ortiz Walton, who was on the roster from 1957 to 1962 (and it was also Munch who raised eyebrows by daring in 1952 to appoint a woman, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, as principal flutist—and a superlative appointment, too). Mr. Russcol states that the Boston Symphony is now "on the lookout for a Negro percussionist." Perhaps there was no intention of sounding condescending, but this seems to put the orchestra in the position of saying, "Everybody knows that Negroes have rhythm, so maybe we could find a black drummer." The orchestra ought to welcome Negro players of any instruments for which vacancies arise. And, despite all the disclaimers to the contrary, there are such players around, although they are not plentiful. It is up to our major orchestras to go out and actively recruit them for auditions from the minor-league orchestras and elsewhere.

If we turn to the ranks of instrumental concert soloists, the picture is no b... The sole Negro musician who ... really to make it big is the ... pianist André Watts ... the late pianist P... created a fl... child pr...

...ed
...study of stringed instruments, where a shortage of good ensemble players is likely to go on for some time. A satisfactory state of affairs will not come about overnight, but there is no excuse for continued complacency and delay.

Caldwell Titcomb
Department of Music
Brandeis University
Waltham, Mass.

138.

Sandlot scouting

Crisis for strings

By Louis Snyder

Along with other crises that American orchestras are facing—like the supply and demand of financial aid—is a shortage of qualified string players. It first became apparent several years ago and, despite some remedial measures, just has not gone away. Not only is it becoming increasingly difficult to scrape up a fourth to play quartets, but some of the country's leading symphonic organizations are finding it hard to fill once highly-prized vacancies in their string sections.

Of course musicians are still showing up for auditions, and orchestral seasons are opening with a full complement of players onstage. But in the perennial game of musical chairs, there doesn't seem to be any undue rush to the seats reserved for violinists, violists, and cellists.

In an interview on the subject, Erich Leinsdorf admitted that in recent years, for the first time in its history, the Boston Symphony had engaged as members instrumentalists who were practically "fresh from the conservatories." In the past, attainment of a seat in any of the BSO's string sections was the result of watchful waiting for a vacancy to occur. Meanwhile one gained playing experience in less illustrious orchestras.

Sandlot scouting

Mr. Leinsdorf believes all of that is changed now. "The system of sending string players to the minor leagues and bringing them back to the majors is no longer valid," he said recently. "You have to go right to the sandlots and choose the best."

In 1965, two openings in the Boston's cello section were filled not by seasoned veterans, but by 23-year-olds—Carol Procter (a girl!), just graduated from the New England Conservatory across the street from Symphony Hall, and Stephen Geber, whose talents had been observed at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. Both remain with the orchestra.

The following year Richard Sher, who was all of 17, was selected by Mr. Leinsdorf on the basis of his abilities, in spite of his youth and inexperience. He left after one year to become first cellist of the St. Louis Symphony, and was succeeded in Boston by Ronald Feldman, in his 20's, an alumnus of Red Fox Music Camp. After the 1967-68 season, he also departed—to succeed Mr. Sher in St. Louis.

Still in the Boston's cello section is Jerome Patterson, who also arrived in 1967, at the age of 25; he is a veteran of three years with the New Haven Symphony and a summer at the Berkshire Music Center.

System changed

According to Carlos Moseley, manager of the New York Philharmonic, musicians are not appearing there in the usual large numbers for auditions to fill vacancies in the violin and cello sections. Competition usually produces higher standards of playing. A reduction in the number of choices has sometimes resulted in no choice being made at all—and the hope that a winner will respond to the next audition call.

While the appearance of young musicians in our major orchestras is not a new phenomenon—Toscanini was a champion of the youthful orchestra player—there is a paradoxical generation gap in the ranks of string players. Between the musicians who have remained at their posts in the big orchestras for 30 years or so, and the youngsters who are looking over the prospects of a career in music, exists a middle group who would logically be stepping into vacancies now. But the tenacity of older players, and the larger rewards in other branches of music—teaching, free-lancing, artist residency at universities—have made permanent orchestra berths less attractive. What's more, except for Boston and a few other orchestra-minded cities, the status in the community of the player is not always of the highest—an understandable sore point with any musician.

To this middle generation, learning to play other instruments than strings — oboe, clarinet, even the once-lowly trombone, all of which lead double lives in the popular and serious music fields — has made more financial sense. There aren't many string trios playing tea music under the potted palms at resort hotels any more.

Back to school

Fortunately, many dedicated young musicians still remain for whom violin, viola, or cello are the only instruments, and who are resolved to face the hard facts of musical life when they meet them. While the admissions offices of such well-known training grounds for young hopefuls as the New England Conservatory in Boston and Manhattan School of Music in New York have no trouble filling their string quotas, they report a smaller number of string applicants than for voice or other instruments. Families just aren't raising their boys (or girls) to be fiddlers these days.

Staying put

For those who do persist, and make the grade, a career in the string section of a major orchestra can be very satisfying. Within recent years, pay scales have reached unprecedented levels, and in many instances, employment is on a twelve-month basis. With most conductors there is a trend to explore new music, which maintains a challenge for the performer, and if one believes old things are best, there are plenty of those in the orchestral repertory too.

However, as Joseph Silverstein, the BSO concertmaster and head of New England Conservatory's string department, points out, pay increases and longer seasons are good reasons for staying put in a first- or second-desk post in a smaller orchestra, when moving on to a larger organization means to begin at the rear of the section. Here, it is a case of the narrowing of the financial rather than the generation gap.

There don't seem to be any ready answers to the enigma of the dwindling string supply. On one hand, a survey reports that the number of symphony orchestras in the United States has tripled since 1939, and that the present 1,500 total represents more than half the number of such organizations in the whole world.

On the darker side, the performing arts study sponsored several years ago by the Twentieth Century Fund found that box office receipts could be relied on to meet less than one-half of a typical major orchestra's budget. So does one cast his lot with an organization which relies on the year-to-year generosity of persons unknown for its existence? Does one build his house on sand?

Nevertheless, for the young, any job that starts at $14,000 a year, includes a reasonable amount of travel, and allows you to perform on your chosen instrument, can't be all bad. And there are some signs that interest in strings may be reviving.

Local chapters of the American Federation of Musicians throughout the country have been awarding scholarships for attendance at an annual summer Congress of Strings, and statistics show that more than 7,500 United States high schools have orchestras (with strings) as opposed to 51,000 marching and concert bands (presumably without).

String shots

Several years ago, a picture appeared extensively in the United States press of a boundless Tokyo field full of infant Japanese children, all playing violins. The "Suzuki method," which they were demonstrating, has since been introduced here. Similarly, last year, more doublebass players than one would believe existed were photographed with their instruments ringing the shore of a Wisconsin lake. They were attending an institute formed to propagate interest in the bass by its virtuoso exponent, Gary Karr.

So far, violists and cellists have not swarmed in any appreciable number before the camera.

The crisis remains unresolved, but at least everyone concerned is thinking and trying. Probably right now some youngster is cooped up in the house practicing, when he'd rather be out playing ball. On second thought, perhaps he should be allowed to take his fiddle out to the sandlots — there just might be a BSO scout lurking around!

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 15 1969

New England Newsclip

Buddinng Violinists From Brookline

By MURIEL COHEN

A MUSIC TEACHER in the Brookline public schools has launched a one-man movement to overcome a growing shortage in string players in this country. In the last two years Paul Paradise has exposed 1,500 children in the third grade to violin instruction. From that group he has developed 180 youngsters who are taking lessons on string instruments and performing in school bands or orchestras.

Not long ago Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that in 10 years it may not be possible to man an orchestra in this country with American string players. Most today come from Japan and Korea.

Richard Burgin, former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, blames the decline in American string players to the failure of American schools to devote enough time to the playing and studying of music.

Two years ago Paradise began a program to offer violin instruction to every third grader in the Brookline public schools. "The purpose," he explains, "is to discover instrumental musical talent at an early age so that the potential of each child may be explored by the parent in the form of private lessons, class lessons, purchase of instruments, and so on. By using a real musical instrument, in this case the violin, every child will experience the feeling and understanding of what it is like to play an instrument."

The course of study includes elementary note reading, introduction of legato, spiccato, staccato and pizzicato techniques, scales and folk songs, and correlation with third-grade vocal instruction.

At the conclusion of a 15-lesson course, Paradise gives a program for the parents at which the children demonstrate what they have learned and each parent receives an evaluation sheet compiled on his child.

At the annual Brookline High School quardrangle concert, Paradise-trained platoons of violinists perform en masse in an impressive production. Three hundred children, eight and nine years old, are divided into two groups to perform on 150 school-owned violins.

Paradise selected the violin for universal instruction because, as he says, "The violin sound is the closest to the human voice and the skills learned on the violin are transferrable to all the other instruments."

When he conceived the program, he said that if 10 per cent of those beginning would continue then the undertaking would be an "overwhelming success." By his own standards, Paradise has outstripped his most hopeful projection for success.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 367,123

SEP 29 1968

New England Newsclip

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

NOV 17 1968

New England Newsclip

Where Have The Audiences Gone?

By McLAREN HARRIS

There seems to be some general head - shaking agreement around Boston that the music business is not now, nor promises to be in the immediate future, what it was only a few short years ago. Along with blank looks comes the question, words, where have the audiences and support gone?

The Boston Symphony, whose series seemed to admit new subscribers only in the event of deaths among old subscribers, has actually taken to advertising the availability of tickets during the past year.

Certain observers would attribute this to some failure in musical standards or content of Symphony programs But look further: solo recitals, unless graced with the name of a world-famous personage, are suffering, as witness the New England Conservatory's Artist Series; the Philharmonia concerts, for no reason worth its weight in print, have not drawn their due; choral organizations are locked in a perennial struggle for patronage; and the long-established Celebrity Series has not come close to equalling the string of sell-outs attained just a few seasons back.

IS IT BECAUSE Greater Boston, basking in the simmering torchlight of its cultural heritage, can no longer muster the audience potential to fill two concert halls on a given evening or four within a week? Or is Boston not alone at all, but going through a downward trend in attendance which can be discovered in other cities as well?

The questions were put to Thomas Dunn, music director of the Handel and Haydn Society with wide choral-orchestral conducting experience in that rival city to the south to whose leadership in music and the arts in general any loyal Bostonian will give only tacit concession: New York City. Judging by published schedules things look prosperous down there.

"It may look that way on paper," said Dunn, "but remember, concerts in New York are scheduled at least a year or two in advance, so last year turned out to be the biggest year. But audiences were down, way down, and I think they've got some curtailment in store.

"AND IT'S THE SAME virtually all over the country. Take for example the artist series at Penn. State University. You know where University Park is? It's nowhere. What can you do for culture when you have to go 50 miles to get a drink? You'd think an artist series there would be marked for success, but the audiences last year were sometimes down to 50 people.

"To some extent people are deserting live concerts for records," stated Dunn. "I have a theory that part of the problem is that they play records too loud at home and therefore find live performances unsatisfying. Ted Schultz, an acoustician at Bolt, Beranek and Newman, reports that recordings are now on the market which incorporate supposedly ideal characteristics of orchestral balance, concert-hall reverberation and so forth. From them one gets a sound one may never encounter in an auditorium. It may be pleasing in itself but it creates a false esthetic; yet it may be keeping people at home. Attendance is just plain bad, just as in church.

"However, it's said that people are going back to movies again, now that the television scare has worn off, so there may be hope yet for live music."

"WHAT DO YOU THINK of the thesis that orchestras and opera companies are dying institutions?

"Well, sometimes I'm inclined to believe certain people are right to say that orchestras may become obsolete, both through problems of repetoire and diminishing support," Dunn said. "I certainly hope a few remain to play the music we have now. With choirs the problem is even more severe, and church choirs may be the first to go. The amount of congregational participation is less and less as weekend vacations become year-round. Perhaps some central pick-up groups will arise to supplant the existing separate organizations we have now.

"But if there is to be any final dissolution, even before it comes program formats will have to change. We need more programs like those of the early 19th century—varying forms and idioms, solo pieces mixed in with the ensemble works. What we have planned for the Handel and Haydn series are potpourri-types like this, even including some visual activity, like the French film we're going to show in conjunction with a Satie work on a later program. Records can't compete with that."

DOES CORPORATE or foundation support offer a solution?

"Corporate support just got started a couple of years ago in New York, and it was supposed to be the wave of the future," said Dunn, "but it's not going the way it was hoped. The tendency of corporations is to buy productions at the Met and support the establishment generally instead of emphasizing creativity.

"And foundation grants can, in some cases, cause more havoc than rejoicing. The large Ford matching grants, for example, went to aid endowments, and most smaller groups don't have endowments and can't afford them. Many of them became discouraged and this, frankly, is what helped put the Festival Orchestra under. The financial support went to other campaigns."

Government support? "Europe has done it," said Dunn, "and we're getting there. It may be the only way."

PETER, PAUL & MARY, one of America's most outstanding musical trios will appear in concert at Symphony Hall for two nites, Friday and Saturday, November 22 and 23. Their latest album on Warner Bros. entitled "Late Again," has become one of the top albums in the country.

66 The Boston Globe — Wednesday, October 9, 1968

Hub arts future: a dim view

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Mrs. Aaron Richmond, head of the concert management that brings Boston its Celebrity Series, takes a glum view of the future of the business. Advance sales for the 1968-69 concerts are going very well, Mrs. Richmond and her associate, Walter Pierce, report, but taking a broad view of present and future, they see trouble.

Some of the difficulties are local: the lack of a proper theater for opera and ballet, and insufficient concern of the press for the arts Some are general: getting performers to come up with interesting programs, and, particularly, that rising price spiral.

The Music Hall, where they have booked most ballet performances in recent years, has too shallow a stage and too small a pit. Ben Sack, who owns it, charges an arm and a leg for its use, and is in any case disinclined to make a profitable movie house available for week-ends.

In the Spring of 1967, the Richmond Management booked London's Royal Ballet into the War Memorial Auditorium in order to be able to mount their "Romeo and Juliet" production. Pierce explained that given the available repertory that year, it would otherwise have been a question of nothing but highlights programs or not bringing the Royal at all. And Mrs. Richmond talks as though her office walls were still resonating with the howls of subscribers who had put down a lot of money to find that they could see Fonteyn and Nureyev only from mid-calf on up.

If prospects for an opera house materialize, there will be sharp disagreement about various of its attributes, but particularly its size. The relatively small house The Opera Company of Boston dreams of—Artistic Director Sarah Caldwell would like 1700 seats, President Laszlo Bonis thinks 2500 is a reasonable compromise—is something Mrs. Richmond regards as untenable in practical terms, "of use only to Sarah when what we need is an opera house for Boston." With artists charging more, but with a limit on how ticket prices can reasonably go, the margin of safety has to be maintained by the quantity of seats sold. "A 4000-seat house is the practical minimum today," says Pierce firmly. Artistic hazards? Yes, of course, but . . .

The small house-large house dilemma is something Mrs. Richmond and Pierce live with daily with respect to Jordan (1100) and Symphony (2600) halls. As artists become famous, they tend to price themselves out of smaller halls into larger ones; their fees cannot possibly be recouped by even maximal box office intake in the small hall. Yet some of them belong in the smaller halls. A Lieder recital or a chamber music program cannot make a good effect in a hall as large as Symphony.

Some people aren't even audible in Symphony Hall. Every time the guitarist Segovia plays there, Mrs. Richmond gets complaints from people sitting at the rear of the orchestra who simply could not hear him. She has asked him to play in Jordan Hall, she says, but he won't discuss it. "He only plays big halls now, Carnegie, and Orchestra Hall in Chicago. He's getting old; that way he can give fewer concerts, and I guess he's after the big money."

And there is also the peculiar position of the performer — always "the artist," in manager's lingo — who is too expensive to be feasible for Jordan Hall, but who hasn't the box office draw to fill Symphony. Mrs. Richmond and Pierce are worried now about one of their 1968-69 artists who falls into this category, someone, incidentally, who sells out Carnegie Hall in a couple of days. Mrs. Richmond spoke gratefully about Judith Raskin, a typical Jordan Hall artist who gave an exquisite Lieder recital there last year, and who was, I inferred, willing to discuss modifying her usual fee in order to be able to sing a concert in Boston, to do the kind of program she wanted, and to give it under the right conditions. Too often, though, these problems culminate in financial loss (or no profit) for the management, artistic loss for the audience and occasionally both.

It is a choice, as Mrs. Richmond sees it, between bringing the performers here sometimes under less than ideal conditions, or not bringing them at all. "When we present these artists in Boston, it is under the conditions they themselves dictate."

I asked Mrs. Richmond about the programs done at Celebrity Series concerts. To hear performers tell it, local managements refuse the most interesting suggestions they offer. A member of the Juilliard Quartet told me that it was not their fault they had never played a Schoenberg quartet here (No. 4, composed in 1936, still awaits its Boston premiere). Mrs. Richmond, on her part, said that she had specifically asked for Schoenberg this year, had been offered the Quartet No. 1 in D minor, had listened to a record of it, had found it insufferable, had been convinced that her subscribers would find it so, and had turned it down. The Julliard then suggested the still earlier, recently rediscovered D major quartet, which Mrs. Richmond refused sight unseen. Schoenberg No. 2 has had several performances here recently, but curiously enough, Nos. 3 and 4 seems not to have been mentioned at all by either party in the Richmond - Juilliard correspondence.

Performers offer a limited choice of programs when they tour, and some offer none. Many of them, when told, for example, that the Liszt Sonata has just been played here, would you mind playing something else, tend to regard that as all the more reason why they should play it — "wait till you hear mine."

I suggested that stereotyped programs were perhaps an inevitable feature of the music business since many of the performing celebrities had gotten where they were by studious avoidance of disturbing the customers in any way. "Oh no," said Mrs. Richmond, "look at Serkin. People don't like his program. Someone alway says to me, 'Oof, that was stiff!' They're looking for something emotionally satisfying. After all, that's what music is all about, isn't it? But with Serkin, even if they don't enjoy it, they sense that they're in the presence of greatness." Serkin's, I presume Mrs. Richmond meant, not Beethoven's.

The name of the pianist Alfred Brendel came up repeatedly in our conversation. His Jordan Hall recital two seasons ago had been extraordinary, musically, but he had not filled the hall. Mrs. Richmond was inclined to impute that to his program, Liszt and Beethoven's Diabelli Variations. To a musician one of the most depressing aspects of the management business is that it seems to be necessary to regard what is arguably Beethoven's greatest keyboard work as a nuisance and the man who wants to play it as dangerous.

Mrs. Richmond and Pierce regret that they cannot present more of the Brendels — "it's a big-name business entirely now," said Pierce — or gradually to build audiences for lesser-known performers, an activity in which the late Aaron Richmond took pride in the early, financially less perilous days of the Celebrity Series he founded.

As for the audience, Mrs. Richmond regards New York as altogether special, and Boston normal, its mass audience no more and no less adventurous or discerning than big city audiences elsewhere. She is pained, though, by the seeming indifference to music of most of the Boston press as manifested in the inadequacy of available space for stories and even reviews.

We stood in the rain on Dartmouth street. "I gather you think it will get very much worse before it gets better," I said. "I certainly do," replied Mrs. Richmond. "Or that it might not get better at all?" "That's right."

Conductors Still Prefer Old Masters

NEW YORK (UPI)—A newly published and authoritative work of 20th century music found 150 composers and over 1,500 compositions worthy of mention but you'd never know there were so many from the way the new symphony orchestra season has been shaping up.

Last season the major orchestras seemed to be vying with one another in giving house to the music of our times. This season they seem to be competing with old masters and with the newer masters whose music is in the traditional cast and has been accepted.

The Reaction

This could be reaction to last season's spree with the new, when the New York Philharmonic led the way with several dozen brand new works commissioned for its 150th anniversary. That put the heat on its bigtime rivals to give the musical present its due, also.

For its most recent New York concert the Philadelphia Orchestra's annotator remembered a devastating remark of Giuseppe Verdi's about the contemporary music of his time. "To return to the past would be progress," said Verdi.

He was annotating a piece of the 20th century composer Ottorino Respighi, who was a young man when Verdi was old and who consistently composed on ancient models. There was no intent by the annotator to disparage the output of our contemporaries but to many musical traditionalists, Verdi's remark still has point.

Old Forms

The Philadelphia's program opened with a reverent playing of Bach and proceeded through 20th century composers who looked back at old forms rather than seeking to create new ones.

Reverence for Bach is particularly deep this season. Colin Davis, the English conductor who has just ended a four-week stint of conducting Leonard Bernstein's New York Philharmonic, went so far as to have three violinists and three violists stand and play while the rest of the huge orchestra sat and didn't play except for three cellists, one harpsichordist and one of the men on the stools behind the big bass fiddles. The piece was Bach's 3rd Brandenburg Concerto and Bach scored it that way.

Last week the Boston Symphony gave three concerts in New York. Two were devoted to works of Arnold Schoenberg, Kurt Weill and Sergei Rachmaninoff which, while of this century, are now accepted as mainstream "classics." The third program was devoted to Bach and Brahms.

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850

NOV 25 1968

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
NOV 1 1968
New England Newsclip

Hub arts future: a dim view

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Mrs. Aaron Richmond, head of the concert management that brings Boston its Celebrity Series, takes a glum view of the future of the business. Advance sales for the 1968-69 concerts are going very well, Mrs. Richmond and her associate, Walter Pierce, report, but taking a broad view of present and future, they see trouble.

Some of the difficulties are local: the lack of a proper theater for opera and ballet, and insufficient concern of the press for the arts. Some are general: getting performers to come up with interesting programs, and, particularly, that rising price spiral.

The Music Hall, where they have booked most ballet performances in recent years, has too shallow a stage and too small a pit. Ben Sack, who owns it, charges an arm and a leg for its use, and is in any case disinclined to make a profitable movie house available for week-ends.

In the Spring of 1967, the Richmond Management booked London's Royal Ballet into the War Memorial Auditorium in order to be able to mount their "Romeo and Juliet" production. Pierce explained that given the available repertory that year, it would otherwise have been a question of nothing but highlights programs or not bringing the Royal at all. And Mrs. Richmond talks as though her office walls were still resonating with the howls of subscribers who had put down a lot of money to find that they could see Fonteyn and Nureyev only from mid-calf on up.

If prospects for an opera house materialize, there will be sharp disagreement about various of its attributes, but particularly its size. The relatively small house The Opera Company of Boston dreams of—Artistic Director Sarah Caldwell would like 1700 seats, President Laszlo Bonis thinks 2500 is a reasonable compromise—is something Mrs. Richmond regards as untenable in practical terms, "of use only to Sarah when what we need is an opera house for Boston." With artists charging more, but with a limit on how ticket prices can reasonably go, the margin of safety has to be maintained by the quantity of seats sold. "A 4000-seat house is the practical minimum today," says Pierce firmly. Artistic hazards? Yes, of course, but . . .

The small house-large house dilemma is something Mrs. Richmond and Pierce live with daily with respect to Jordan (1100) and Symphony (2600) halls. As artists become famous, they tend to price themselves out of smaller halls into larger ones; their fees cannot possibly be recouped by even maximal box office intake in the small hall. Yet some of them belong in the smaller halls. A Lieder recital or a chamber music program cannot make a good effect in a hall as large as Symphony.

Some people aren't even audible in Symphony Hall. Every time the guitarist Segovia plays there, Mrs. Richmond gets complaints from people sitting at the rear of the orchestra who simply could not hear him. She has asked him to play in Jordan Hall, she says, but he won't discuss it. "He only plays big halls now, Carnegie, and Orchestra Hall in Chicago. He's getting old; that way he can give fewer concerts, and I guess he's after the big money."

And there is also the peculiar position of the performer — always "the artist," in manager's lingo — who is too expensive to be feasible for Jordan Hall, but who hasn't the box office draw to fill Symphony. Mrs. Richmond and Pierce are worried now about one of their 1968-69 artists who falls into this category, someone, incidentally, who sells out Carnegie Hall in a couple of days. Mrs. Richmond spoke gratefully about Judith Raskin, a typical Jordan Hall artist who gave an exquisite Lieder recital there last year, and who was, I inferred, willing to discuss modifying her usual fee in order to be able to sing a concert in Boston, to do the kind of program she wanted, and to give it under the right conditions. Too often, though, these problems culminate in financial loss (or no profit) for the management, artistic loss for the audience and occasionally both.

It is a choice, as Mrs. Richmond sees it, between bringing the performers here sometimes under less than ideal conditions, or not bringing them at all. "When we present these artists in Boston, it is under the conditions they themselves dictate."

I asked Mrs. Richmond about the programs done at Celebrity Series concerts. To hear performers tell it, local managements refuse the most interesting suggestions they offer. A member of the Juilliard Quartet told me that it was not their fault they had never played a Schoenberg quartet here (No. 4, composed in 1936, still awaits its Boston premiere). Mrs. Richmond, on her part, said that she had specifically asked for Schoenberg this year, had been offered the Quartet No. 1 in D minor, had listened to a record of it, had found it insufferable, had been convinced that her subscribers would find it so, and had turned it down. The Julliard then suggested the still earlier, recently rediscovered D major quartet, which Mrs. Richmond refused sight unseen. Schoenberg No. 2 has had several performances here recently, but curiously enough, Nos. 3 and 4 seems not to have been mentioned at all by either party in the Richmond - Juilliard correspondence.

Performers offer a limited choice of programs when they tour, and some offer none. Many of them, when told, for example, that the Liszt Sonata has just been played here, would you mind playing something else, tend to regard that as all the more reason why they should play it — "wait till you hear mine."

I suggested that stereotyped programs were perhaps an inevitable feature of the music business since many of the performing celebrities had gotten where they were by studious avoidance of disturbing the customers in any way. "Oh no," said Mrs. Richmond, "look at Serkin. People don't like his program. Someone alway says to me, 'Oof, that was stiff!' They're looking for something emotionally satisfying. After all, that's what music is all about, isn't it? But with Serkin, even if they don't enjoy it, they sense that they're in the presence of greatness." Serkin's, I presume Mrs. Richmond meant, not Beethoven's.

The name of the pianist Alfred Brendel came up repeatedly in our conversation. His Jordan Hall recital two seasons ago had been extraordinary, musically, but he had not filled the hall. Mrs. Richmond was inclined to impute that to his program, Liszt and Beethoven's Diabelli Variations. To a musician one of the most depressing aspects of the management business is that it seems to be necessary to regard what is arguably Beethoven's greatest keyboard work as a nuisance and the man who wants to play it as dangerous.

Mrs. Richmond and Pierce regret that they cannot present more of the Brendels — "it's a big-name business entirely now," said Pierce — or gradually to build audiences for lesser-known performers, an activity in which the late Aaron Richmond took pride in the early, financially less perilous days of the Celebrity Series he founded.

As for the audience, Mrs. Richmond regards New York as altogether special, and Boston normal, its mass audience no more and no less adventurous or discerning than big city audiences elsewhere. She is pained, though, by the seeming indifference to music of most of the Boston press as manifested in the inadequacy of available space for stories and even reviews.

We stood in the rain on Dartmouth street. "I gather you think it will get very much worse before it gets better," I said. "I certainly do," replied Mrs. Richmond. "Or that it might not get better at all?" "That's right."

Where Have The Audiences Gone?

By McLAREN HARRIS

There seems to be some general head - shaking agreement around Boston that the music business is not now, nor promises to be in the immediate future, what it was only a few short years ago. Along with blank looks comes the question, words, where have the audiences and support gone?

The Boston Symphony, whose series seemed to admit new subscribers only in the event of deaths among old subscribers, has actually taken to advertising the availability of tickets during the past year.

Certain observers would attribute this to some failure in musical standards or content of Symphony programs But look further: solo recitals, unless graced with the name of a world-famous personage, are suffering, as witness the New England Conservatory's Artist Series; the Philharmonia concerts, for no reason worth its weight in print, have not drawn their due; choral organizations are locked in a perennial struggle for patronage; and the long-established Celebrity Series has not come close to equalling the string of sell-outs attained just a few seasons back.

IS IT BECAUSE Greater Boston, basking in the simmering torchlight of its cultural heritage, can no longer muster the audience potential to fill two concert halls on a given evening or four within a week? Or is Boston not alone at all, but going through a downward trend in attendance which can be discovered in other cities as well?

The questions were put to Thomas Dunn, music director of the Handel and Haydn Society with wide choral-orchestral conducting experience in that rival city to the south to whose leadership in music and the arts in general any loyal Bostonian will give only tacit concession: New York City. Judging by published schedules things look prosperous down there.

"It may look that way on paper," said Dunn, "but remember, concerts in New York are scheduled at least a year or two in advance, so last year turned out to be the biggest year. But audiences were down, way down, and I think they've got some curtailment in store.

"AND IT'S THE SAME virtually all over the country. Take for example the artist series at Penn. State University. You know where University Park is? It's nowhere. What can you do for culture when you have to go 50 miles to get a drink? You'd think an artist series there would be marked for success, but the audiences last year were sometimes down to 50 people.

"To some extent people are deserting live concerts for records," stated Dunn. "I have a theory that part of the problem is that they play records too loud at home and therefore find live performances unsatisfying. Ted Schultz, an acoustician at Bolt, Beranek and Newman, reports that recordings are now on the market which incorporate supposedly ideal characteristics of orchestral balance, concert-hall reverberation and so forth. From them one gets a sound one may never encounter in an auditorium. It may be pleasing in itself but it creates a false esthetic; yet it may be keeping people at home. Attendance is just plain bad, just as in church.

"However, it's said that people are going back to movies again, now that the television scare has worn off, so there may be hope yet for live music."

"WHAT DO YOU THINK of the thesis that orchestras and opera companies are dying institutions?

"Well, sometimes I'm inclined to believe certain people are right to say that orchestras may become obsolete, both through problems of repetoire and diminishing support," Dunn said. "I certainly hope a few remain to play the music we have now. With choirs the problem is even more severe, and church choirs may be the first to go. The amount of congregational participation is less and less as weekend vacations become year-round. Perhaps some central pick-up groups will arise to supplant the existing separate organizations we have now.

"But if there is to be any final dissolution, even before it comes program formats will have to change. We need more programs like those of the early 19th century—varying forms and idioms, solo pieces mixed in with the ensemble works. What we have planned for the Handel and Haydn series are potpourri-types like this, even including some visual activity, like the French film we're going to show in conjunction with a Satie work on a later program. Records can't compete with that."

DOES CORPORATE or foundation support offer a solution?

"Corporate support just got started a couple of years ago in New York, and it was supposed to be the wave of the future," said Dunn, "but it's not going the way it was hoped. The tendency of corporations is to buy productions at the Met and support the establishment generally instead of emphasizing creativity.

"And foundation grants can, in some cases, cause more havoc than rejoicing. The large Ford matching grants, for example, went to aid endowments, and most smaller groups don't have endowments and can't afford them. Many of them became discouraged and this, frankly, is what helped put the Festival Orchestra under. The financial support went to other campaigns."

Government support? "Europe has done it," said Dunn, "and we're getting there. It may be the only way."

PETER, PAUL & MARY, one of America's most outstanding musical trios will appear in concert at Symphony Hall for two nites, Friday and Saturday, November 22 and 23. Their latest album on Warner Bros. entitled "Late Again," has become one of the top albums in the country.

Conductors Still Prefer Old Masters

NEW YORK (UPI)—A newly published and authoritative work of 20th century music found 150 composers and over 1,500 compositions worthy of mention but you'd never know there were so many from the way the new symphony orchestra season has been shaping up.

Last season the major orchestras seemed to be vying with one another in giving house to the music of our times. This season they seem to be competing with old masters and with the newer masters whose music is in the traditional cast and has been accepted.

The Reaction

This could be reaction to last season's spree with the new, when the New York Philharmonic led the way with several dozen brand new works commissioned for its 150th anniversary. That put the heat on its bigtime rivals to give the musical present its due, also.

For its most recent New York concert the Philadelphia Orchestra's annotator remembered a devastating remark of Giuseppe Verdi's about the contemporary music of his time. "To return to the past would be progress," said Verdi.

He was annotating a piece of the 20th century composer Ottorino Respighi, who was a young man when Verdi was old and who consistently composed on ancient models. There was no intent by the annotator to disparage the output of our contemporaries but to many musical traditionalists, Verdi's remark still has point.

Old Forms

The Philadelphia's program opened with a reverent playing of Bach and proceeded through 20th century composers who looked back at old forms rather than seeking to create new ones.

Reverence for Bach is particularly deep this season. Colin Davis, the English conductor who has just ended a four-week stint of conducting Leonard Bernstein's New York Philharmonic, went so far as to have three violinists and three violists stand and play while the rest of the huge orchestra sat and didn't play except for three cellists, one harpsichordist and one of the men on the stools behind the big bass fiddles. The piece was Bach's 3rd Brandenburg Concerto and Bach scored it that way.

Last week the Boston Symphony gave three concerts in New York. Two were devoted to works of Arnold Schoenberg, Kurt Weill and Sergei Rachmanioff which, while of this century, are now accepted as mainstream "classics." The third program was devoted to Bach and Brahms.

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850
NOV 25 1968

140

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 175,118
SUN. - CIRC. 185,817

047

FEB-2--69 NX

The World Of Music

Sense Of Purpose Needed For Success Of Orchestra

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

Today, seasonal performances by American orchestras are sold on the strength of the conductor. He may be the well-known maestro who can be trusted with the traditional, or he may be the comet in the sky who is expected to perform the miracle of blending the old and the new, the forgotten and the experimental.

In any event, when something goes wrong, or doesn't get off the ground, the first one blamed is the conductor. He is expendable, as any orchestra board member will tell you, like a pair of shoes.

Big-name soloists do pull crowds, of course, but not like yesteryears, unless it is a Horowitz or a Rubinstein.

Any organization, musical or otherwise, however, is in trouble when it spends its energies finding someone to blame for something which is usually a shared and a collective guilt. Complaints in the cloakrooms and gossip at dinner-parties never alter anything.

In many places, dissatisfactions are handled quietly and responsibly by the parties immediately involved. In others, it becomes a matter of public concern and the problem is out in the open. In a few other places still, it becomes a cloak-and-dagger affair, like a poor B-movie.

What every orchestra needs is a clear-cut division of labor and a clearly stated mandate as to who is in charge of the business, the finances, the music programs.

And in what direction does the orchestra wish to go?

★ ★ ★

I have heard too many unkind things in recent weeks, by too many irritated people, regarding our own Toledo Symphony Orchestra programs. We need no longer hide the fact that there is a dissatisfaction.

The common complaint: "When I go to the concert, I don't want to be irritated."

Might I rephrase the complaint thusly: "When I go to the concert, I don't want to be stimulated."

Another: "All the new stuff! I only have to read it in the program, and I won't go!"

Again, a rephrase: "All the new stuff! I am afraid of it!"

And still another: "Can't we do a better job of mixing the old and the new?"

Now, to this I fully subscribe, especially since much of the old is also new to many; they have never heard it before.

I always have urged that we not stand still. We have four treasures of music to dip into for good programs:

► The standard masterpieces. They must never be forgotten.

► The lesser of little-known works of time gone by. These are for us a glance backward that takes our measure.

► The contemporary world of music. It is of our own time, but look how we take to the outrageous designs in clothing and housing — and bear it with a grin, despite a certain amount of discomfort (and possible financial investment).

► The experimental, way-out, electronic, computerized, mixed media trial balloons into the agonies to come.

To do justice to just one category is a heavy-enough burden; to cover all is quite impossible. To put together programs as crowd-pleasers or shockers is self-defeating. You can never please nor shock everyone at the same time.

But again, what is the purpose of an orchestra? What is its direction? What purpose are programs to serve?

★ ★ ★

Some years ago, the orchestra board in Buffalo, N.Y., deciding to do something specific, brought in a young composer-conductor who has set the musical world of that city on its head.

He has irritated, angered, literally revolutionized the musical and cultural images of that city.

Lukas Foss was given a mandate and he lived up to it brilliantly. Not that everything has been successful; it hasn't, but he has managed to stimulate and to imbue a spirit of youthful adventurousness into the orchestra as well as into its audiences.

Personally, I have never thought of going to a concert to relax. I want instead stimulation and involvement. I simply can't imagine anyone going to the theater or a ballgame to relax.

The announcement has just been made that 43-year-old French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez was chosen to head the BBC Symphony Orchestra in London beginning in Sept., 1971. He also is in the second year of a five-year contract as guest conductor of The Cleveland Orchestra, in which capacity he will be heard in Toledo later on in the season.

The curious thing here is that Boulez is known as an avant-garde composer and a conductor with a specific affinity for "modern" music.

★ ★ ★

But the "old" and "new" really always surround us.

A national news magazine recently devoted its cover and a lead story to Bach, dead for more than 200 years.

The New York Philharmonic premiered Roya Harris' Symphony No. 11 (he's 70); Howard Hanson's Symphony No. 6 (he's 71), and Roger Sessions' Symphony No. 8 (he's 71). These were all new works, but not by older composers.

Benjamin Lee's Piano Concerto No. 2 (he's 44) was premiered by the Boston Symphony, and there's Oliver Knussens' Symphony No. 1, which he conducted (he's 15). These, too, were all new works, but not by older composers.

Los Angeles Philharmonic tympanist, William Draft, 44, had his "Contextures: Riots-Decade 60" played by the orchestra with films and stills.

And then there is an amazingly non-traditionalist exhibition at the Toledo Museum of Art right now, at which I met some of the Toledo Orchestra listeners, laughing and curious and obviously enjoying themselves hugely. One lady was wearing a miniskirt, and her escort was wearing a turtle-neck sweater in chartreuse — but they were not teeny-boppers.

By all means let us call new junk just that — junk; but only after we have looked at it, listened to it. But let's also uphold the past and restudy it and approach it with fresh eyes and ears.

Let not one be sacrificed for the other. Let's balance it out and peg the new against the old and vice versa. Let's be comfortable but also stimulated, even to the point of outright irritation; but let's listen. Let's not be peevish and deny anything its chance in the market place.

How else would it be possible for anyone to select from 4,000 submissions, 12 outstanding recordings of the year, among which are Richard Strauss' "Elektra," alongside Beethoven's Five Piano Concertos; Stravinsky's Violin Concerto, alongside Handel's "Julius Caesar" and Duke Ellington's "And His Mother Called Him Bill," alongside Debussy's "Jeux"?

'Relate II' unwarranted intruder

Babbitt's music requires special audience

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

A composer with a commission and a performance by the New York Philharmonic is someone you probably picpicture as a proud and happy man. Recently, though, when the Philharmonic was about to play the premiere of one of its 125th Anniversary commissions, Milton Babbitt's "Relata II," Babbitt said it was as though a philosopher were to read a learned paper on the Johnny Carson show. Leonard Bernstein's reaction to that evaluation of his shop is not recorded.

Babbitt, 52, a pioneer years ago on the 12-tone scene in America, one of our first composers of electronic music, an outstanding theorist and influential teacher, made his remark in a New York Times interview that appeared on the Sunday before the Jan. 16 premiere of his work. He talked about who would hear the piece which his publisher was not planning to publish, and of which there would be no broadcast, tape, or recording. His "interested musical colleagues, those for whom I really offer it," would have no access to the piece unless they could get to Philharmonic Hall for one of the four performances.

"On the other hand," Babbitt continued, "the regular Philharmonic audience does not want to hear this piece. And why should they have to? How can it be coherent for them? It is as though a colleague of mine in the field of philosophy were to read his paper on the Johnny Carson show. The milieu is inappropriate for the event."

70

STEINBERG
Continued on Page A-85

Economic problems a factor

★ STEINBERG
Continued from Page A-85

70

Let us look. The program at the "Relata II" premiere went like this: Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 (violinist Isaac Stern, flutist Julius Baker, pianist Bernstein), Violin Concerto No. 1 by Prokofiev (Stern), the Babbitt, and Mozart's Violin Sonata in B flat, K.378 (Stern, Bernstein). The inclusion of a Sonata that does not involve the orchestra at all is of course extremely unusual, but it was done, obviously and commendably, to make a little more desperately needed rehearsal time available for the Babbitt. The 5th Brandenburg, which also involved the orchestra minimally in personnel and time, was a contribution in that direction, too.

Even so, "Relata II" failed to get what it most wants, an adequate performance; moreover, given its difficulty and the realities of orchestral economics, we may be waiting some time for that (see last Sunday's Globe). What it next needs — and this is a question of tender, loving care more than of sheer survival — is sympathetic, intelligent placing on a program. The other works ought to be intellectually, expressively, and sensuously congruent to it, and the atmosphere has to convey some sense of congeniality. Starting, we must assume, from the best of reasons, Bernstein ended by constructing a program whose primary intent was to glorify two glamorous star performers. What it amounted to really was a Stern-Bernstein Festival, a family entertainment in which Babbitt's work, not helped by its completely unrepresentative performance, could only appear to most of the audience as a rude, incomprehensible, and unwanted intruder. That at the Thursday concert the playing of the Brandenburg was musically absurd and technically insufficient, that the Prokofiev performance was imprecise and flabby, that, in sum, the fabled performing establishment was on display in so indecent a condition of decrepitude, sharpened the irony of the occasion.

The Philharmonic's 7579th through 7582d concerts, the group at which "Relata II" was played, are essentially representative of the values and the problems that militate against their being an appropriate milieu for "difficult" new music like Babbitt's. There are both professionals and amateurs for whom this is evidence that Babbitt is in some important sense wrong to compose his sort of music.

The symphony orchestra is a musical instrument whose vast and exciting possibilities are by no means exhausted. That is why Babbitt, as he says, "jumped at the chance to compose for the New York Philharmonic."

The nuisance of it is, though, that the symphony ochestra is an institution as well as an instrument. As an institution, it is burdened with economic problems so severe that the survival for long of the great instruments like the Philharmonic or the Boston Symphony is by no means to be taken for granted under present conditions. The pressing problem of financial security is one of the factors that have led orchestras to rely on the subscription system. That makes the orchestra a social institution as well. As anyone who goes to many public performances of different sorts can attest, a subscription audience is not a problematic beast. The importance of a subscription as social cachet probably has been exaggerated by observers for all but a few series (Boston and Philadelphia on Friday afternoons, the Met on Mondays, for example), but even if there are relatively people for entirely nonmusical reasons, the audience that has come out specifically for a particular event almost certainly will offer more in preparation, attention and appreciation (not synonymous with a shouting and standing ovation), than that which has appeared because it is Tuesday or Saturday again.

Babbitt's music is for a special audience. That seems to me quite proper: It is true as well of "The Art of Fugue," Thelonious Monk, the motets of the Ivrea codex, "Falstaff" (as compared to "Rigoletto") and the Beethoven 5th. In an essay on Schoenberg's "Moses and Aron," Babbitt has defined as "the most concrete principle of artistic conduct: The obligation of the responsible artist to do that which he is convinced must be done, and which others appartenly are unable or unwilling to do." With respect to his own music, Babbitt always has been clear about his audience, "my interested musical colleagues, those for whom I really offer it."

The dilemma is that Babbitt will not find his "ideal other" (Stravinsky's phrase) embodied in the Philharmonic subscription audience. There is some validity to pointing that some other composers who have written abtruse music have not done so for orchestra, but have addressed themselves to highly specialized performers, small groups of listeners, or even smaller groups of professional colleagues. Think, for example, of Beethoven's late quartets and Diabelli Variations, of Bach's "Art of Fugue" and Canonic Variations, though some of this music, not all, did find a fairly large audience much later. Indeed, Babbitt himself suggested 11 years ago in his thoughtful, thought-provoking article, "Who Cares If You Listen?" (the snappy and misleading title was an editor's), "that the composer would do himself and his music an immediate and eventual service by total, resolute, and voluntary withdrawal from this public world to one of private performance and electronic media, with its very real possibility of complete elimination of the public and social aspects of musical composition."

He choes to ignore his own suggestion, as though making believe that that "complete elimination," that separation, had taken place, and I must say I think it attractive in him that the musician fascinated by the possibilities of the modern orchestra won out over the potential hermit. It may be that the atmosphere at orchestral concerts will change or that a second, more specialized orchestral life will grow up alongside the one we have, like comparable developments in chamber music. I would welcome both and am not truly optimistic about either. Perhaps Babbitt, with his rule candor, has added something to the slim hope for a system in which "Relata II" can be regarded as a piece of music rather than an irritant and source of frustration.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

FEB 2 1969

New England Newsclip

Symphony Offers Challenge to Ozawa

Robert Commanday

THE ROYAL road to unpopularity is to remind people that time is flying, to say with storm-cloud tones, "It's later than you thought." The next surest anti-popular move is to discover unforeseen expenditures for someone else. To make both deeds in one move is to be a regular brother-in-law.

So today, it is my unbidden task to remind the San Francisco Symphony that just three seasons from now, in 1972-73, it will be 60th anniversary time, a time to reap and a time to sow.

What is so special about a symphony orchestra's anniversary has been elucidated for us by two exemplary models, the New York Philharmonic and the Chicago Symphony.

★ ★ ★

THE NEW York Philharmonic anticipated its 125th season in some far-sighted planning that provided for the commissioning of no fewer than 25 major composers. Of these the Philharmonic has already performed Aaron Copland's "Inscape," Roger Sessions' Eighth Symphony, Takemitsu's "November Steps," Berio's Sinfonia, Roberto Gerhard's Fourth Symphony, Henze's Fifth Symphony, Roy Harris's 11th Symphony, plus works by Thomson, Nabokov, Rhodion Shchedrin, Howard Hanson, Leon Kirchner, and others.

Next year, the Chicago Symphony greets its 80th season with ten works commissioned for the event.

The significance of these gestures is vast and inescapable. These orchestras are stating a performer's credo, saying in effect, "We stand as part of the creative process, ready to share responsibility for the initiating of new music into the current of the literature. We are not simply consumers, renting and buying what the publishers offer, or borrowing with a smile from composers who come to the door with scores outstretched.

"We believe in the orchestra's commitment to help in the process of renewal which is creation. We believe also in the creative gifts of our composer-colleagues without whose music we could not speak for or to our generation. We honor them as creators without whom we could not long exist nor justify existence."

As with any handsome gesture properly tendered, a reward returns to the giver. If only a fraction of the works commissioned fulfill their creator's intents with musical success, both the Orchestra and its anniversary are honored beyond the premiere concert and the anniversary year — for the life of the work itself.

HISTORY RECORDS indelibly that Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms was commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This was a contribution of significance far greater and more lasting than even that orchestra's famed performing prowess. Besides the Stravinsky masterpiece, the Boston Symphony commissioned for its 50th anniversary in 1930, works by Copland, E. B. Hill, Respighi, Honegger's Third Symphony, Prokofiev's Fourth Symphony, Roussel's Third Symphony. Who remembers exactly how well the Boston Symphony played in that year, or who were the soloists?

Similarly, Sergei Koussevitzky's role in instigating new music — like Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra and Britten's "Peter Grimes" through the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and with his orchestra will still be memorialized when his specified gifts as a conductor and orchestra builder have become more legend than clear memory.

The point to all this is that if the San Francisco Symphony has any aspirations along these lines for the observance of its 60th, the time for planning is already pressing. Major composers must and do work far ahead, won't even consider commissions with deadlines closer than two and three years.

★ ★ ★

THE San Francisco Symphony will have to get a hustle on to find funds and select composers. As with anything else affecting a broad public and reflecting a broad program, the selection should be far-sighted and representative, neither all avant-garde, nor all-conservative. If six commissions are planned, four should rightly be assigned to Americans at least two of whom should be connected in some way with California if not the Bay Area.

Seiji Ozawa will be in his second year as Director during 1972-73 and so these and the other anniversary decisions revolve in his direction: 1. Special guest conductors — How about the great ones who have never been here? Both the young and the old great ones. 2. Recordings — the San Francisco Symphony must begin recording at last, starting with some long overdue projects for that anniversary year. 3. Tours — based on pride in the Orchestra for reasons of its special repertory as well as its performing excellence.

It will take a lot of doing, that 1972-73 anniversary year. It is already upon us.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 491,909 SAT. 464,450

FEB 25 1969

140

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 175,118
SUN. - CIRC. 185,817

FEB-2-69 NX

'Relate II' unwarranted intruder

Babbitt's music requires special audience

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

A composer with a commission and a performance by the New York Philharmonic is someone you probably picpicture as a proud and happy man. Recently, though, when the Philharmonic was about to play the premiere of one of its 125th Anniversary commissions, Milton Babbitt's "Relata II," Babbitt said it was as though a philosopher were to read a learned paper on the Johnny Carson show. Leonard Bernstein's reaction to that evaluation of his shop is not recorded.

Babbitt, 52, a pioneer years ago on the 12-tone scene in America, one of our first composers of electronic music, an outstanding theorist and influential teacher, made his remark in a New York Times interview that appeared on the Sunday before the Jan. 16 premiere of his work. He talked about who would hear the piece which his publisher was not planning to publish, and of which there would be no broadcast, tape, or recording. His "interested musical colleagues, those for whom I really offer it," would have no access to the piece unless they could get to Philharmonic Hall for one of the four performances.

"On the other hand," Babbitt continued, "the regular Philharmonic audience does not want to hear this piece. And why should they have to? How can it be coherent for them? It is as though a colleague of mine in the field of philosophy were to read his paper on the Johnny Carson show. The milieu is inappropriate for the event."

70

STEINBERG
Continued on Page A-89

Economic problems a factor

★ STEINBERG
Continued from Page A-85

70

Let us look. The program at the "Relata II" premiere went like this: Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 (violinist Isaac Stern, flutist Julius Baker, pianist Bernstein), Violin Concerto No. 1 by Prokofiev (Stern), the Babbitt, and Mozart's Violin Sonata in B flat, K.378 (Stern, Bernstein). The inclusion of a Sonata that does not involve the orchestra at all is of course extremely unusual, but it was done, obviously and commendably, to make a little more desperately needed rehearsal time available for the Babbitt. The 5th Brandenburg, which also involved the orchestra minimally in personnel and time, was a contribution in that direction, too.

Even so, "Relata II" failed to get what it most wants, an adequate performance; moreover, given its difficulty and the realities of orchestral economics, we may be waiting some time for that (see last Sunday's Globe). What it next needs — and this is a question of tender, loving care more than of sheer survival — is sympathetic, intelligent placing on a program. The other works ought to be intellectually, expressively, and sensuously congruent to it, and the atmosphere has to convey some sense of congeniality. Starting, we must assume, from the best of reasons, Bernstein ended by constructing a program whose primary intent was to glorify two glamorous star performers. What it amounted to really was a Stern-Bernstein Festival, a family entertainment in which Babbitt's work, not helped by its completely unrepresentative performance, could only appear to most of the audience as a rude, incomprehensible, and unwanted intruder. That at the Thursday concert the playing of the Brandenburg was musically absurd and technically insufficient, that the Prokofiev performance was imprecise and flabby, that, in sum, the fabled performing establishment was on display in so indecent a condition of decrepitude, sharpened the irony of the occasion.

The Philharmonic's 7579th through 7582d concerts, the group at which "Relata II" was played, are essentially representative of the values and the problems that militate against their being an appropriate milieu for "difficult " new music like Babbitt's. There are both professionals and amateurs for whom this is evidence that Babbitt is in some important sense wrong to compose his sort of music.

The symphony orchestra is a musical instrument whose vast and exciting possibilities are by no means exhausted. That is why Babbitt, as he says, "jumped at the chance to compose for the New York Philharmonic."

The nuisance of it is, though, that the symphony ochestra is an institution as well as an instrument. As an institution, it is burdened with economic problems so severe that the survival for long of the great instruments like the Philharmonic or the Boston Symphony is by no means to be taken for granted under present conditions. The pressing problem of financial security is one of the factors that have led orchestras to rely on the subscription system. That makes the orchestra a social institution as well. As anyone who goes to many public performances of different sorts can attest, a subscription audience is not a problematic beast. The importance of a subscription as social cachet probably has been exaggerated by observers for all but a few series (Boston and Philadelphia on Friday afternoons, the Met on Mondays, for example), but even if there are relatively people for entirely nonmusical reasons, the audience that has come out specifically for a particular event almost certainly will offer more in preparation, attention and appreciation (not synonymous with a shouting and standing ovation), than that which has appeared because it is Tuesday or Saturday again.

Babbitt's music is for a special audience. That seems to me quite proper: It is true as well of "The Art of Fugue," Thelonious Monk, the motets of the Ivrea codex, "Falstaff" (as compared to "Rigoletto") and the Beethoven 5th. In an essay on Schoenberg's "Moses and Aron," Babbitt has defined as "the most concrete principle of artistic conduct: The obligation of the responsible artist to do that which he is convinced must be done, and which others appartenly are unable or unwilling to do." With respect to his own music, Babbitt always has been clear about his audience, "my interested musical colleagues, those for whom I really offer it."

The dilemma is that Babbitt will not find his "ideal other" (Stravinsky's phrase) embodied in the Philharmonic subscription audience. There is some validity to pointing that some other composers who have written abtruse music have not done so for orchestra, but have addressed themselves to highly specialized performers, small groups of listeners, or even smaller groups of professional colleagues. Think, for example, of Beethoven's late quartets and Diabelli Variations, of Bach's "Art of Fugue" and Canonic Variations, though some of this music, not all, did find a fairly large audience much later. Indeed, Babbitt himself suggested 11 years ago in his thoughtful, thought-provoking article, "Who Cares If You Listen?" (the snappy and misleading title was an editor's), "that the composer would do himself and his music an immediate and eventual service by total, resolute, and voluntary withdrawal from this public world to one of private performance and electronic media, with its very real possibility of complete elimination of the public and social aspects of musical composition."

He choes to ignore his own suggestion, as though making believe that that "complete elimination," that separation, had taken place, and I must say I think it attractive in him that the musician fascinated by the possibilities of the modern orchestra won out over the potential hermit. It may be that the atmosphere at orchestral concerts will change or that a second, more specialized orchestral life will grow up alongside the one we have, like comparable developments in chamber music. I would welcome both and am not truly optimistic about either. Perhaps Babbitt, with his rule candor, has added something to the slim hope for a system in which "Relata II" can be regarded as a piece of music rather than an irritant and source of frustration.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,005

FEB 2 1969

New England Newsclip

The World Of Music

Sense Of Purpose Needed For Success Of Orchestra

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

Today, seasonal performances by American orchestras are sold on the strength of the conductor. He may be the well-known maestro who can be trusted with the traditional, or he may be the comet in the sky who is expected to perform the miracle of blending the old and the new, the forgotten and the experimental.

In any event, when something goes wrong, or doesn't get off the ground, the first one blamed is the conductor. He is expendable, as any orchestra board member will tell you, like a pair of shoes.

Big-name soloists do pull crowds, of course, but not like yesteryears, unless it is a Horowitz or a Rubinstein.

Any organization, musical or otherwise, however, is in trouble when it spends its energies finding someone to blame for something which is usually a shared and a collective guilt. Complaints in the cloakrooms and gossip at dinner-parties never alter anything.

In many places, dissatisfactions are handled quietly and responsibly by the parties immediately involved. In others, it becomes a matter of public concern and the problem is out in the open. In a few other places still, it becomes a cloak-and-dagger affair, like a poor B-movie.

What every orchestra needs is a clear-cut division of labor and a clearly stated mandate as to who is in charge of the business, the finances, the music programs.

And in what direction does the orchestra wish to go?

★ ★ ★

I have heard too many unkind things in recent weeks, by too many irritated people, regarding our own Toledo Symphony Orchestra programs. We need no longer hide the fact that there is a dissatisfaction.

The common complaint: "When I go to the concert, I don't want to be irritated."

Might I rephrase the complaint thusly: "When I go to the concert, I don't want to be stimulated."

Another: "All the new stuff! I only have to read it in the program, and I won't go!"

Again, a rephrase: "All the new stuff! I am afraid of it!"

And still another: "Can't we do a better job of mixing the old and the new?"

Now, to this I fully subscribe, especially since much of the old is also new to many; they have never heard it before.

I always have urged that we not stand still. We have four treasures of music to dip into for good programs:

► The standard masterpieces. They must never be forgotten.

► The lesser of little-known works of time gone by. These are for us a glance backward that takes our measure.

► The contemporary world of music. It is of our own time, but look how we take to the outrageous designs in clothing and housing — and bear it with a grin, despite a certain amount of discomfort (and possible financial investment).

► The experimental, way-out, electronic, computerized, mixed media trial balloons into the agonies to come.

To do justice to just one category is a heavy-enough burden; to cover all is quite impossible. To put together programs as crowd-pleasers or shockers is self-defeating. You can never please nor shock everyone at the same time.

But again, what is the purpose of an orchestra? What is its direction? What purpose are programs to serve?

★ ★ ★

Some years ago, the orchestra board in Buffalo, N.Y., deciding to do something specific, brought in a young composer-conductor who has set the musical world of that city on its head.

He has irritated, angered, literally revolutionized the musical and cultural images of that city.

Lukas Foss was given a mandate and he lived up to it brilliantly. Not that everything has been successful; it hasn't, but he has managed to stimulate and to imbue a spirit of youthful adventurousness into the orchestra as well as into its audiences.

Personally, I have never thought of going to a concert to relax. I want instead stimulation and involvement. I simply can't imagine anyone going to the theater or a ballgame to relax.

The announcement has just been made that 43-year-old French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez was chosen to head the BBC Symphony Orchestra in London beginning in Sept., 1971. He also is in the second year of a five-year contract as guest conductor of The Cleveland Orchestra, in which capacity he will be heard in Toledo later on in the season.

The curious thing here is that Boulez is known as an avant-garde composer and a conductor with a specific affinity for "modern" music.

★ ★ ★

But the "old" and "new" really always surround us.

A national news magazine recently devoted its cover and a lead story to Bach, dead for more than 200 years.

The New York Philharmonic premiered Roya Harris' Symphony No. 11 (he's 70); Howard Hanson's Symphony No. 6 (he's 71), and Roger Sessions' Symphony No. 8 (he's 71). These were all new works, but not by older composers.

Benjamin Lee's Piano Concerto No. 2 (he's 44) was premiered by the Boston Symphony, and there's Oliver Knussens' Symphony No. 1, which he conducted (he's 15). These, too, were all new works, but not by older composers.

Los Angeles Philharmonic tympanist, William Draft, 44, had his "Contextures: Riots-Decade 60" played by the orchestra with films and stills.

And then there is an amazingly non-traditionalist exhibition at the Toledo Museum of Art right now, at which I met some of the Toledo Orchestra listeners, laughing and curious and obviously enjoying themselves hugely. One lady was wearing a miniskirt, and her escort was wearing a turtle-neck sweater in chartreuse — but they were not teeny-boppers.

By all means let us call new junk just that — junk; but only after we have looked at it, listened to it. But let's also uphold the past and restudy it and approach it with fresh eyes and ears.

Let not one be sacrificed for the other. Let's balance it out and peg the new against the old and vice versa. Let's be comfortable but also stimulated, even to the point of outright irritation; but let's listen. Let's not be peevish and deny anything its chance in the market place.

How else would it be possible for anyone to select from 4,000 submissions, 12 outstanding recordings of the year, among which are Richard Strauss' "Elektra," alongside Beethoven's Five Piano Concertos; Stravinsky's Violin Concerto, alongside Handel's "Julius Caesar" and Duke Ellington's "And His Mother Called Him Bill," alongside Debussy's "Jeux"?

Symphony Offers Challenge to Ozawa

Robert Commanday

THE ROYAL road to unpopularity is to remind people that time is flying, to say with storm-cloud tones, "It's later than you thought." The next surest anti-popular move is to discover unforeseen expenditures for someone else. To make both deeds in one move is to be a regular brother-in-law.

So today, it is my unbidden task to remind the San Francisco Symphony that just three seasons from now, in 1972-73, it will be 60th anniversary time, a time to reap and a time to sow.

What is so special about a symphony orchestra's anniversary has been elucidated for us by two exemplary models, the New York Philharmonic and the Chicago Symphony.

★ ★ ★

THE NEW York Philharmonic anticipated its 125th season in some far-sighted planning that provided for the commissioning of no fewer than 25 major composers. Of these the Philharmonic has already performed Aaron Copland's "Inscape," Roger Sessions' Eighth Symphony, Takemitsu's "November Steps," Berio's Sinfonia, Roberto Gerhard's Fourth Symphony, Henze's Fifth Symphony, Roy Harris's 11th Symphony, plus works by Thomson, Nabokov, Rhodion Shchedrin, Howard Hanson, Leon Kirchner, and others.

Next year, the Chicago Symphony greets its 80th season with ten works commissioned for the event.

The significance of these gestures is vast and inescapable. These orchestras are stating a performer's credo, saying in effect, "We stand as part of the creative process, ready to share responsibility for the initiating of new music into the current of the literature. We are not simply consumers, renting and buying what the publishers offer, or borrowing with a smile from composers who come to the door with scores outstretched.

"We believe in the orchestra's commitment to help in the process of renewal which is creation. We believe also in the creative gifts of our composer-colleagues without whose music we could not speak for or to our generation. We honor them as creators without whom we could not long exist nor justify existence."

As with any handsome gesture properly tendered, a reward returns to the giver. If only a fraction of the works commissioned fulfill their creator's intents with musical success, both the Orchestra and its anniversary are honored beyond the premiere concert and the anniversary year — for the life of the work itself.

HISTORY RECORDS indelibly that Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms was commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This was a contribution of significance far greater and more lasting than even that orchestra's famed performing prowess. Besides the Stravinsky masterpiece, the Boston Symphony commissioned for its 50th anniversary in 1930, works by Copland, E. B. Hill, Respighi, Honegger's Third Symphony, Prokofiev's Fourth Symphony, Roussel's Third Symphony. Who remembers exactly how well the Boston Symphony played in that year, or who were the soloists?

Similarly, Sergei Koussevitzky's role in instigating new music — like Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra and Britten's "Peter Grimes" through the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and with his orchestra will still be memorialized when his specified gifts as a conductor and orchestra builder have become more legend than clear memory.

The point to all this is that if the San Francisco Symphony has any aspirations along these lines for the observance of its 60th, the time for planning is already pressing. Major composers must and do work far ahead, won't even consider commissions with deadlines closer than two and three years.

★ ★ ★

THE San Francisco Symphony will have to get a hustle on to find funds and select composers. As with anything else affecting a broad public and reflecting a broad program, the selection should be far-sighted and representative, neither all avant-garde, nor all-conservative. If six commissions are planned, four should rightly be assigned to Americans at least two of whom should be connected in some way with California if not the Bay Area.

Seiji Ozawa will be in his second year as Director during 1972-73 and so these and the other anniversary decisions revolve in his direction: 1. Special guest conductors — How about the great ones who have never been here? Both the young and the old great ones. 2. Recordings — the San Francisco Symphony must begin recording at last, starting with some long overdue projects for that anniversary year. 3. Tours — based on pride in the Orchestra for reasons of its special repertory as well as its performing excellence.

It will take a lot of doing, that 1972-73 anniversary year. It is already upon us.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST

FEB 25 1969

MUSIC:

Leonard Bernstein

Manners, since Mozart, have slid from courtly to casual and continue on downhill. These days we celebrate the anti-hero. Most of the music played by our symphony orchestras, however, is reminiscent of an ambiance of powdered nobility in perukes with lace at cuff and collar—or there are the heroic sonorities of the symphonic form. The symphony orchestra has become an anachronism, a museum. Not one of those shiny new chrome and glass museums, either, but one like the National Gallery of Art in Washington, which will not hang the work of a painter unless he has been dead more than fifty years. The symphony orchestra is the corporate body of music.

The anti-establishment is a lively and adventurous avant-garde, which in music, as in the other arts, has burned the rulebook and is trying to make a new system under which it can live in comfortable disharmony. By definition music is: "the science or art of pleasing, expressive, or intelligible combinations of tones; the art of making such combinations into compositions of definite structure and significance." (Webster). A composer of music, following this definition, sets marks upon paper specifying certain notes to be played by certain instruments in a certain key for a certain duration of time at a certain tempo in a certain mood. The composer in the currently influential field of aleatory (chance) music has dispensed with these fundamentals. He provides his players with a set of boundaries in which they operate by improvisation and random choice. The patterns are left for the performer to choose according to his impulse.

John Cage, probably the best-known American avant-garde composer, has gone far beyond these tenuous boundaries. As long ago as the early fifties, he created Music for Twelve Radios, which is the highly amplified sound of those radios tuned to twelve different stations—a collage of the sound of the time selected at random. Another piece of his called 4:33, is four minutes and thirty-three seconds of silence. Other composers using contact microphones attached to instruments produce sounds sometimes amplified above the point of electronic squeal, which can cause one hell of a pain in the ear. Of the same school there is a "piece of music" that is nothing more than its performers sitting, looking at the audience. There is a "composition" that is the sound made by a violin as it is destroyed by a fire lit by the "performer."

Milton Babbitt, one of the most prolific composers of the electronic school, has influenced a large group of younger composers in the use of machines that pre-record sounds on sets of tape. The performance consists of the playback of these tapes through loudspeakers. By the choice of what is recorded and the adjustment of switches and dials during the performance, these machines can reproduce just about any sound within the capacity of the ear to assimilate. Some composers use these techniques, along with live performers, on traditional instruments producing juxtapositions of force and originality. These are latter-day developments of trends started as long ago as 1930 by Edgard Varèse. Many of the most advanced composers of this "new" music are men in middle age who have been exploring this field for two and three decades. Cage is fifty-six, Babbitt, fifty-two; Varèse died at seventy-eight. What they have in common with the younger composers of this genre, Lukas Foss, Morton Feldman, Earle Brown and many others, is an effort to make a whirlwind of new sounds and techniques that will clear the stale air of the traditional concert halls. So far they have not been successful in reaching a mass audience. They play for small groups of the already persuaded, mostly at college recitals.

Leonard Bernstein, because of his super stardom, enjoys the freedom to express his adventurous spirit and eclectic tastes; so the New York Philharmonic, more than most orchestras, does play this unorthodox music. But few conductors of symphony orchestras are intellectually or emotionally oriented toward the avant-garde music, and if they were, would have to fight their employers for the right to play it. Most of them put their seasons together with deference to a powerful old-guard faction of season ticket-holders, and a board of trustees inclined almost without exception toward conservatism.

"Today, the conductor is a sort of curator," Bernstein said in an interview last year. "He hangs up these equivalents of masterpieces by Rembrandt, only they're by Beethoven. And he tries to light them as well as possible and put them next to the right other picture, and that's called programming. The whole idea of the concert hall grew up with the symphony . . . from Mozart to Mahler, roughly. The symphonic form is dead, finished. But why despair about it? Just accept it. That tremendous repertory of masterpieces should go on and on for hundreds of years, just as Rembrandts do."

culture cry

Why is the Philharmonia on a Boston breadline?

by George Gelles

Let me begin with two obviously-answered questions: "Can we in Boston be content while our storied Symphony, an octogenarian now, keeps grinding out the famous 50 pieces for the fabulous 400 Propers? Is it unreasonable to expect a wider repertory, relevant programming, a steady stream of first-rate conductors?

Two years ago, the Boston Philharmonia — which will play its final concert of the season in Sanders Theater on April 13th — was founded to fill these needs. Artistically it's on rock solid ground; but it's on quicksand financially.

Among major musical cities, the situation in Boston is singular. Cultural life here is dominated by two monoliths, the BSO and the Museum of Fine Arts; these Establishment organizations are first on line for funds, both those privately and publicly doled, and they get the grandest handouts.

But beneath them there is a considerable handful of smaller groups, each more adventurous, each individually distinctive, each equally deserving of support. I'm thinking of such performing organizations as the Handel and Haydn Society, the Cantata Singers, the Cecelia Society, the Opera Company of Boston, Boston Ballet, and of course, the Philharmonia.

Funding these groups adequately is the problem, and setting priorities among them the crux of the problem. If I put the Philharmonia at the top of my list, it's for these reasons: in its two seasons it has shown a sense of responsibility and relevance in programming that is unmatched on the East Coast (though I think the Los Angeles Monday Night Concerts maintain a similar standard); it has brought to town conductors of the first order, men like Alexander Schneider (whose work I admire, though stylistically I find it foreign), Richard Burgin, ex-concertmaster and Associate Conductor of the BSO, and composer and Harvard professor Leon Kirchner; and finally, it holds together an uncommonly gifted group of free-lancers.

The direct cost to the Philharmonia per concert is $7500 (all these figures are approximate), of which two-thirds goes to the players, $1000 to the conductor, the remainder for hall rental, programs, advertising, mailings, and so on.

Concerts this season have been divided between Sanders Theater and Jordan Hall, the former seating 1200, the latter 1019. And though Sanders costs considerably less to rent, it (or Harvard University, which owns it) insists that a top admission charge of $3.50 be respected; thus, while a $5.00 top can be asked at Jordan, it's a

(Continued on page 17)

Let's hear it for Philharmonia . . .

(Continued from page 2)

smaller house. In fact, then, neither hall offers a clear cut advantage from the financial point of view.

However, Sanders is the more attractive for another reason; centered in Cambridge, it seems to draw a large and well-informed audience, and it is on popular support that the success of the Philharmonia — or of any group — has to be based.

The concert on the 13th will be led by Michael Tilson Thomas, who is still this side of thirty and makes his home on the West Coast. Thomas was at Tanglewood this past summer, where he earned the Koussevitsky Award, given annually to the outstanding young professional conductor. From what I heard of his work there — a stunning performance of the Schoenberg "Five Pieces," put together in a three hour rehearsal — he well deserved it.

Thomas and the Philharmonia will be taking the concert to Western Massachusetts, as well, playing at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst on the 15th of April and in Fitchburg the following day. We can expect, I think, to see much more of this, a moving into the suburbs and opening up of outlying areas. It's economically wise (since the bulk of the money paid the players goes for rehearsal time) and culturally sincere. It will keep going and give broader-based support to an organization we can't afford to let die.

(Editor's Note: Mr. Gelles is the music critic of the Record American.)

HARPER'S BAZAAR
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 425,000

FEB 1969

With the custodians of conventional music repeating their decorous repertories and the avant-garde making its mannered noises in subgroup, the healthiest music today is rock. Antipathetic to the snobbery of intellectual sectarianism, rock has become a tradition-buster of such dynamism that it makes what's called the serious avant-garde look like a pedantic cult up a doctrinarian creek far out of the mainstream.

"Nothing really affected me until Elvis," says John Lennon, who at the age of sixteen got his first guitar and met Paul McCartney. With the addition of George Harrison and Ringo Starr, these boys brought the Mersey beat to the world and became the progenitors of the most popular single trend in the history of music. The driving vigor of the Beatles' rhythm was its primary attraction to young people, who then became seduced by the freshness of the sound, and upon listening to the words found them quite a bit richer in poetry, idealism and spiritual adventure than "Three Coins in the Fountain" or other pop tunes of the time.

The disrespect of the rock artist for convention, demonstrated from his shoulder-length hair to his Hell's Angels boots, to the style of his life, to the music that came out of this style, made him a magnetic figure to a generation rebelling against the materialism of their parents and the disparities between political expediency and good faith. Rock became more and more consciously a music of protest; from the folk-rock dissent of Bob Dylan to the latter day Eliot-alienation-theme-accusations of Simon and Garfunkel, to the raunchy apostasy of The Fugs against our sexual hypocrisies.

The Fugs

Simon and Garfunkel

Meanwhile, the musical refinements of the style brought it, in just a few years, from an ear-splitting accompaniment to the frug, to a point of sometimes exquisite sophistication, retaining that powerful immediacy of communication. At its best, rock is not unlike a space-age baroque; there is evidence of Vivaldi in filigrees of delicate and mysterious subtlety superimposed on the provocative beat. In its adventurous use of combinations of the newest electronic instruments with ancient ones—the dulcimer, harpsichord, oud, with horns, oboes, bassoons—rock can produce moods like shifting shadows. It can be lyric, whimsical, romantic or Funky and this undirected diversity of range along with the primitive intensity of its throb and the unflinching adventurousness of its creators makes it more than any other the music of the times, with no sign of a dead end in sight. Rock, in its infinity of permutations, is much more likely the genesis of a kind of classic.

Birgit Nilsson as Brunnhilde in Die Walkuere.

Mama Cass of The Mamas and The Papas.

"... the culture prosperity, like the missile-rattling economic prosperity, is absurdly inflated, antiquatedly isolationist, naively quantitative, and wholly misdirected in emphasis."

Stravinsky

"Speaking for myself, I could not begin to distinguish music and non-music in some of the concert hall activity I have observed of late, nor would I be confident of recognizing a new musical genius."

Stravinsky

Erich Leinsdorf conducts The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Nieuhause playing an Earle Brown composition.

HARPER'S B
NEW YORK,
MONTHLY 425
FEB 196

MUSIC:

Leonard Bernstein

Manners, since Mozart, have slid from courtly to casual and continue on downhill. These days we celebrate the anti-hero. Most of the music played by our symphony orchestras, however, is reminiscent of an ambiance of powdered nobility in perukes with lace at cuff and collar—or there are the heroic sonorities of the symphonic form. The symphony orchestra has become an anachronism, a museum. Not one of those shiny new chrome and glass museums, either, but one like the National Gallery of Art in Washington, which will not hang the work of a painter unless he has been dead more than fifty years. The symphony orchestra is the corporate body of music.

The anti-establishment is a lively and adventurous avant-garde, which in music, as in the other arts, has burned the rulebook and is trying to make a new system under which it can live in comfortable disharmony. By definition music is: "the science or art of pleasing, expressive, or intelligible combinations of tones; the art of making such combinations into compositions of definite structure and significance." (Webster). A composer of music, following this definition, sets marks upon paper specifying certain notes to be played by certain instruments in a certain key for a certain duration of time at a certain tempo in a certain mood. The composer in the currently influential field of aleatory (chance) music has dispensed with these fundamentals. He provides his players with a set of boundaries in which they operate by improvisation and random choice. The patterns are left for the performer to choose according to his impulse.

John Cage, probably the best-known American avant-garde composer, has gone far beyond these tenuous boundaries. As long ago as the early fifties, he created Music for Twelve Radios, which is the highly amplified sound of those radios tuned to twelve different stations—a collage of the sound of the time selected at random. Another piece of his called 4:33, is four minutes and thirty-three seconds of silence. Other composers using contact microphones attached to instruments produce sounds sometimes amplified above the point of electronic squeal, which can cause one hell of a pain in the ear. Of the same school there is a "piece of music" that is nothing more than its performers sitting, looking at the audience. There is a "composition" that is the sound made by a violin as it is destroyed by a fire lit by the "performer."

Milton Babbitt, one of the most prolific composers of the electronic school, has influenced a large group of younger composers in the use of machines that pre-record sounds on sets of tape. The performance consists of the playback of these tapes through loudspeakers. By the choice of what is recorded and the adjustment of switches and dials during the performance, these machines can reproduce just about any sound within the capacity of the ear to assimilate. Some composers use these techniques, along with live performers, on traditional instruments producing juxtapositions of force and originality. These are latter-day developments of trends started as long ago as 1930 by Edgard Varèse. Many of the most advanced composers of this "new" music are men in middle age who have been exploring this field for two and three decades. Cage is fifty-six, Babbitt, fifty-two; Varèse died at seventy-eight. What they have in common with the younger composers of this genre, Lukas Foss, Morton Feldman, Earle Brown and many others, is an effort to make a whirlwind of new sounds and techniques that will clear the stale air of the traditional concert halls. So far they have not been successful in reaching a mass audience. They play for small groups of the already persuaded, mostly at college recitals.

Leonard Bernstein, because of his super stardom, enjoys the freedom to express his adventurous spirit and eclectic tastes; so the New York Philharmonic, more than most orchestras, does play this unorthodox music. But few conductors of symphony orchestras are intellectually or emotionally oriented toward the avant-garde music, and if they were, would have to fight their employers for the right to play it. Most of them put their seasons together with deference to a powerful old-guard faction of season ticket-holders, and a board of trustees inclined almost without exception toward conservatism.

"Today, the conductor is a sort of curator," Bernstein said in an interview last year. "He hangs up these equivalents of masterpieces by Rembrandt, only they're by Beethoven. And he tries to light them as well as possible and put them next to the right other picture, and that's called programming. The whole idea of the concert hall grew up with the symphony . . . from Mozart to Mahler, roughly. The symphonic form is dead, finished. But why despair about it? Just accept it. That tremendous repertory of masterpieces should go on and on for hundreds of years, just as Rembrandts do."

culture cry

Why is the Philharmonia on a Boston breadline?

by George Gelles

Let me begin with two obviously-answered questions: "Can we in Boston be content while our storied Symphony, an octogenarian now, keeps grinding out the famous 50 pieces for the fabulous 400 Propers? Is it unreasonable to expect a wider repertory, relevant programming, a steady stream of first-rate conductors?

Two years ago, the Boston Philharmonia — which will play its final concert of the season in Sanders Theater on April 13th — was founded to fill these needs. Artistically it's on rock solid ground; but it's on quicksand financially.

Among major musical cities, the situation in Boston is singular. Cultural life here is dominated by two monoliths, the BSO and the Museum of Fine Arts; these Establishment organizations are first on line for funds, both those privately and publicly doled, and they get the grandest handouts.

But beneath them there is a considerable handful of smaller groups, each more adventurous, each individually distinctive, each equally deserving of support. I'm thinking of such performing organizations as the Handel and Haydn Society, the Cantata Singers, the Cecelia Society, the Opera Company of Boston, Boston Ballet, and of course, the Philharmonia.

Funding these groups adequately is the problem, and setting priorities among them the crux of the problem. If I put the Philharmonia at the top of my list, it's for these reasons: in its two seasons it has shown a sense of responsibility and relevance in programming that is unmatched on the East Coast (though I think the Los Angeles Monday Night Concerts maintain a similar standard); it has brought to town conductors of the first order, men like Alexander Schneider (whose work I admire, though stylistically I find it foreign), Richard Burgin, ex-concertmaster and Associate Conductor of the BSO, and composer and Harvard professor Leon Kirchner; and finally, it holds together an uncommonly gifted group of free-lancers.

The direct cost to the Philharmonia per concert is $7500 (all these figures are approximate), of which two-thirds goes to the players, $1000 to the conductor, the remainder for hall rental, programs, advertising, mailings, and so on.

Concerts this season have been divided between Sanders Theater and Jordan Hall, the former seating 1200, the latter 1019. And though Sanders costs considerably less to rent, it (or Harvard University, which owns it) insists that a top admission charge of $3.50 be respected; thus, while a $5.00 top can be asked at Jordan, it's a

(Continued on page 17)

Let's hear it for Philharmonia . . .

(Continued from page 2)

smaller house. In fact, then, neither hall offers a clear cut advantage from the financial point of view.

However, Sanders is the more attractive for another reason; centered in Cambridge, it seems to draw a large and well-informed audience, and it is on popular support that the success of the Philharmonia — or of any group — has to be based.

The concert on the 13th will be led by Michael Tilson Thomas, who is still this side of thirty and makes his home on the West Coast. Thomas was at Tanglewood this past summer, where he earned the Koussevitsky Award, given annually to the outstanding young professional conductor. From what I heard of his work there — a stunning performance of the Schoenberg "Five Pieces," put together in a three hour rehearsal — he well deserved it.

Thomas and the Philharmonia will be taking the concert to Western Massachusetts, as well, playing at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst on the 15th of April and in Fitchburg the following day. We can expect, I think, to see much more of this, a moving into the suburbs and opening up of outlying areas. It's economically wise (since the bulk of the money paid the players goes for rehearsal time) and culturally sincere. It will keep going and give broader-based support to an organization we can't afford to let die.

(Editor's Note: Mr. Gelles is the music critic of the Record American.)

HARPER'S BAZAAR
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 425,000

FEB 1969

142

Critic Renews Furor By Placing Jazz On Par With Classical

By HILMAR GRONDAHL
Music Editor, The Oregonian

Fourteen years ago Henry Pleasants wrote a book entitled "The Agony of Modern Music" which aroused a furor of reactions, for and against. The pith of his argument was that contemporary American composers are bound to a European tradition which they cannot renounce without renouncing the special status they enjoy as serious composers; "which status is the result of a pouplar superstition that serious music is superior to popular muic."

"There is," he wrote, "more really creative musical talent in the music of Armstrong and Ellington, in the songs of Gershwin, Rodgers, Kern and Berlin, than in all serious music composed since 1920."

He went on to say, "New music which cannot excite the enthusiastic participation of the lay listener has no claim to his sympathy and indulgence . . . all the music which survives in the standard repertoire has met this condidition in its own time" . . . "The evolution of Western music has continued in American popular music."

It is easy to imagine that certain segments of the musical public were furious. William Schuman, then composer-president of Juilliard, said, "This volume is destructive, misleading and gross in its attempt to justify the author's bias." However, Eric Leinsdorf, the conductor, wrote, "I hope that it will be recognized as the most important piece of writing in behalf of a truly modern and truly democratic music." And Morton Gould, the composer, wrote that "this kind of thinking is a healthy and clarifying counterbalance to the cerebral approach to music which has been so prevalent and fashionable."

Book Maps Decline

Well, the controversy raised by that book was a long time dying down. And now Pleasants comes up with a new work called "Serious Music . . . and All That Jazz" which he subtitles "An Adventure in Music Criticism." Simon and Schuster is the publisher.

His thesis now is that serious composers in the period between his two books have sunk even deeper in the slough of non-communication, while jazz is being absorbed into the mainstream of Western music. He points out the success of jazz-oriented film composers and the growing acceptance of jazz in formal music education as further evidence of its growing respectability and status.

It should be pointed out, in view of the direction his writing takes, that Henry Pleasants is a product of serious music. He studied voice, piano, solfege and theory at Curtis Institute and with private teachers here and abroad. From 1930 to 1942 he was music critic for the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin. From 1945 to 1955 he was central European music correspondent for the New York Times. He covered the first American production of "Wozzeck," was intimately familiar with Stokowski's operations with the Philadelphia Orchestra and heard many first performances of serious music in Europe and America.

While Pleasants was continuously hearing and reviewing "good" music rather than "popular" music, it was in 1934 that something happened that brought the virtuosity of jazz vividly and excitingly to his consciousness. It was almost an epithany. At a benefit for the Newspaper Guild of Philadelphia, Sidney Bechet and his combo had been engaged to play. From 10 that night to four in the morning Pleasants, as he writes it, "never moved from a spot barely ten feet from the stand where he was holding forth. What he whispered and shouted and sang on that curious soprano saxophone of his came right through to me. It was a kind of inspired minstrelsy, joyous, despairing, hopeful, tender, exultant, forceful, compassionate and always eloquently communicative."

Twenty years later in Paris, he took up jazz where he had left off, at the feet of Sidney Bechet. Thereafter he made an intensive study of jazz and jazz-influenced music. He contends that our critics, musicologists, and educators, some of whom advise the foundations and are consultants for the arts councils, do not know what the new music is. They are the musical Establishment, he writes, and they studiously avoid paying any attention to music unless it has demonstrated its suitability to the concert hall and opera house in accordance with the dogmas associated with Serious, or European music. The word "popular" to these arbiters of musical taste, is a nauseating epithet.

Pleasants sums up, "In our country, and in our own society, the vitality and the production . . . as demonstrated in ragtime, early jazz, swing, bop, rhythm and blues, country and western, gospel song, urban blues, folk and pop . . . have been stupendous, stimulated constantly by new facilities for communication. In no previous culture, probably, has contemporary music been so pervasive a part of the life of so large a percentage of the world's populace."

He has no patience with the current productions of the electronic laboratories. "This may be acoustics," he writes. "But it is not music." In fact, except for jazz, he contends that modern music is neither modern nor music.

Thus, in the period between the two books, his belief in the viability of jazz has grown to a champion's faith. Obviously Pleasants has created a second storm.

Attitude Conventional

The more conventional attitude toward what is happening in what Pleasants calls the Musical Establishment is contained in a new book "Twentieth Century Music" edited by Rollo H. Myers and published by the Orion Press of New York. Myers has gathered essays by 20 or more writers, including Eric Blom, Theodore Adorno, Norman Del Mar, Humphrey Searle, Dyneley Husswy and Norman Fraser, on various aspects of the situations. Their subjects cover serialism since Webern, modern music and the conductor, the composer and his audience, music and the cinema, and experimental media. A special section of over 100 pages is devoted to a survey of contemporary music in the USA, parts of Europe and Latin America. It is a good sampling of some well considered observations.

From Doubleday and Co. comes Martin Bookspan's "101 Masterpieces of Music and Their Composers." Why 101, and who is to vouch for these or plead for the 100 not listed? It is another listing of a basic library with a listing of selected records and tapes.

Also from Doubleday comes a revised and enlarged edition of Balanchine's "New Complete Stories of the Great Ballets" as edited by Francis Mason. Two hundred and thirty ballets are described, which is an addition of 100 to the earlier edition. It is a handy catalog, with some photographs, of new and established choreographings and includes a section devoted to the fundamental steps and positions.

The Oregonian
PORTLAND, OREGON
D. 245,132 SUN. 407,186
MAY 25 1969

Who's 'We'?

The Globe editorial of Mar. 20 asks the Boston Symphony to return to Boston where "we love you."

So, who's "we"??

It's just possible that there are thousands of music lovers who are disenchanted, as I am, by the Boston Symphony. Could it be that the audience in Washington, D.C., has a bit more courage to express their real feelings than some of us in the Greater Boston area?

Week after week I read in The Globe of the upcoming B.S.O. offerings, and it is a rare week when I find a program that is not unbalanced by the "music" of Varese et al. As a result I just don't go to the Symphony concerts any more.

So I'm a "square" musically, you say, I confess. Perhaps I just don't know enough of the right people, but the music lovers I talk to are, for the most part "square" too. Just who is the Boston Symphony playing for?

It's a dilemma for us. The average square Joe who honestly loves classical music has no place to go so he stays home to listen to his records. Or he goes to the Boston Symphony concert, winces through half the program, and goes home with a headache.

Please don't include me in your "we."

NORMAN C. WOOD
Hamilton

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
MAR 8 1969
New Engl New

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
MAR 28 1969

Anti-Semantics

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

WHAT IS THE opposite of serious music? Is it frivolous? Is unpopular the opposite of popular music? What is the opposite of classic? Is it irregular and shapeless? There seem to be so many terms which, when applied to music, can be tripped up by a quibbler.

Between terms denoting natural simplicity and highly refined sophistication are whole volumes of words of which none is really satisfactorily exclusive. Somewhere along the line there are attempts to differentiate between music in which interest and love endure and that in which interest is but a passing fad and quickly disappears.

Dictionaries use a half-column to define the words "primitive" and "controlled," but there is still no clear, convincing way to set apart random singers and disciplined vocalists. When friends bring little Susie from her trundle bed and tell her to sing "Annie Laurie" for the company, I can enjoy it as well as the next one. However, when Susie, 20 years later and no more practiced and informed about singing than she was when she was a cute 4, still persists in singing the same song in the same way, we beg to be excused.

* * * *

IT IS NOT necessary that I go on record concerning my appraisal of Grandma Moses or of Douanier Rousseau, but I have no hesitancy in declaring my disinterest in those "spectacular" television heroes turned singers with their own musical hour. Handsome men and women appear who are a delight to look at but who know as much about singing as I know about the atom.

This becomes a matter of taste and there would be no point in attempting to deprive anyone of his favorites. That the masters of ceremony lack discrimination is a matter which time can heal. That some of these "phenomenal" artists vanish swiftly and end up as hat-check girls is additional proof, if any were needed, to put one's faith in nature. That it is infuriating for those self-appointed experts to inflate their ladies and gentlemen of the evening with a sort of glamor is probably understandable and forgivable.

* * * *

I READ the weekly lists of best-selling records (I paid $9.25 for a Beatles record for some nieces!) and find no cause for concern nor for interference in the cultural progress of the nation. I don't need to be reminded what size audiences the Establishment drew at Tanglewood last summer. Nor do I need my attention called to the audiences Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops orchestra draw as against those attracted by the Symphony and Erich Leinsdorf. I see no precipitate plunge to perdition in this trend but, while it needn't necessarily be me, I think there should be someone or some agency to uphold standards and oppose approval of "instant" music. To apply the same tolerance to grownups that we devote to little Susies isn't even cricket.

* * * *

THERE IS NO muddier field on which to play than that on which taste is discussed. Who dares interfere with those who choose instant coffee or any of the gimmicky food, pre-readied, to "warm and serve"? Or who dares interfere with the faction that holds out for brewed coffee, baked bread, simmered stew and any of the other choices and preferences of the rearguard?

I just happen to like my music disciplined. I wouldn't have a law passed to prohibit bathtub singing, or baby-soothing mothers' humming. I would cast my humble vote to prohibit music over loudspeakers or from jukeboxes in places of public assembly, knowing full well I would be outvoted. Their only justification is when banks play that sweet lovesong, "Alone at Last."

I don't envisage two hostile camps. "The Rain in Spain" is as welcome to my ears as to those of anyone else and there is a whole long list to which I would be a signatory. I would not be sorry to be absent when some gorgeously gowned diva gets romantic over "Sa-Wan-EEE" or postromantic over "Cornbeef at Lindy's." (She probably made a typographical error and meant to be pastramintic.)

* * * *

ONE CAN GO to extremes in both directions. There is such a thing as over-intellectualism which can result in boredom equal to the effect of the glorification of a random happening. There is nothing accidental about by ideas of art. I recall that Yastrzemski, after the first game of the '67 World Series when he didn't have a good day at the plate, stayed on the lot after the game and practiced batting for a half-hour. Talented and gifted as he is, he realized that he might do better by practice.

In bygone days when there was really a backwoods so far as entertainment was concerned, we snobs might have referred to unsophisticated masses and non-intellectual rabble, but today with our communication facilities there is no longer a backwoods. We know as soon as any metropolis does what picture, play, opera or ballet is new and approved. A man seeking a client to whom he might offer to sell the Brooklyn Bridge might have difficulty finding a customer these days. The attempts of those at the helm of the huge entertainment medium to establish deceitful standards should not be abetted.

FRIENDS

Boston Symphony Friends

PLANNING ACTIVITIES for newly-formed Lincoln Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were Mrs. Elliott Grabill, Mrs. Leonard Moss, Mrs. John F. Loud, Mrs. Edwin Cole, Mrs. John A. Carley and Mrs. Albert C. England, Jr., chairman of the group. (England)

LINCOLN - Chairman Mrs. Albert C. England, Jr. of Old Concord road announces the formation of the Lincoln Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The new Area Committee for Lincoln consists of Mrs. John A. Carley, Mrs. Edwin M. Cole, Mrs. Elliot V. Grabill, Mrs. John F. Loud, Mrs. Leonard G. Moss and Mrs. Frederick B. Taylor. On Monday, June 10, the Committee met at the home of Mrs. Carley to discuss plans for the coming year.

The goal of the Council of Friends is to increase the number of Friends and to retain the present Friends for each new season. Any contribution makes one a Friend for the year, with gifts ranging from $5 to $5000. Anyone can become a Friend and the roster includes many students and members of the radio audience as well as annual Symphony subscribers.

Plans are under way for a reception to be held at Pierce House in the early fall to which all Town members will be invited. At that time one may learn more about the privileges which accompany a membership in the Friends of the BSO, learn of the Orchestra's plans for the coming season, and meet with some of the fine musicians.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500

JUL 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Lincoln Friends Of Boston Symphony To Co-Sponsor Luncheon

LINCOLN -- The Lincoln chapter of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will co-sponsor a pre-concert luncheon at Horticultural Hall, on Friday, September 27, the opening day of the BSO's 88th concert year. Other co-sponsoring local chapters will be those from Milton, the South Shore, Wayland-Sudbury, and Weston. There will be three additional pre-concert luncheons, sponsored by chapters in other Boston and towns. The Lincoln luncheon chairman will be announced next week. Meanwhile, women interested in attending are urged to save the date.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500

SEP 5 1968 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

As has been illustrated in many a book and anecdote, old-line Bostonians are conservative to a degree. According to their chronicler Cleveland Amory they "have" their hats and western travel to them means west of Dedham!

In no area are they more obviously conservative than in their choice of music. Many a seat has been vacated at a sacred Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall because some "never before performed" work has incurred their wrath.

At the start of his final season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor Erich Leinsdorf is playing it safe and truly giving this type of audience what they want. Nothing could please the conservative Friday afternoon audience more than Mozart, Beehtoven and Wagner, and to have all three on one program will be to them a suitable and enjoyable concert. It might also soften them towards the many new and seldom heard pieces Mr. Leinsdorf plans to spring on them later in the season.

The opening of the 88th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which also is the unofficial opening of the fall and winter social season, will take place Sept. 27. The opening program wil consist of Mozart's Symphony in E Flat, Beethoven's concert aria "Ah, Perfido," and excerpts from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung.

Many of the audience will have come directly across the street from Horticultural Hall where the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have held the first of their four pre-concert luncheons.

So successful were these affairs last year, and so high a standard in decorations and food did they set, that it is certain that the series will be completely sold out within a very few days of the mailing of the invitations.

Once again the committee is following the same practice as last year, that of having each luncheon under the auspices of different area groups of the Council of Friends. The organization of the opening luncheon is the responsibility of the Lincoln, Milton, South Shore, Wayland-Sudbury, and Weston groups, for which Mrs. Albert C. England, Jr. represents Lincoln, Mrs. Lewis Kane Milton, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy of Duxbury the South Shore, Mrs. Thomas B. Gannett the Wayland-Sudbury area, and Mrs. Richard Ely, Weston.

Mrs. B. Barton Loomis and Mrs. George A. Parson, neighbors on Beacon Hill, are co-chairmen of the series. The members of their committee are Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich of Marblehead, Mrs. George E. Bates of Boston, Mrs. John M. Bradley of Manchester, Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy, Jr. of Manchester, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot of Beacon Hill, Mrs. Stanford Calderwood of Cambridge, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Jr. of Cambridge, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow of Duxbury, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord, Mrs. John M. Ferry of Cambridge, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey of Chestnut Hill, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell of Westwood, and Mrs. Robert Kistner of Needham.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

SEP 5 1968 New England

BSO luncheon plans announced

The girls had to turn away some of their best friends last year, so be early.

The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra thought up an idea and a half when they whipped up the elegant but nicely intime luncheon parties at Horticultural Hall before Symphony. Flowers were inspired and so was the food, and wine. Not since Mrs. Anthony Kutten had to give up her top-star pre-symphonys that were geared round that music mastermind, the B.S.O.'s Harry Ellis Dickson, have there been such good times.

Each area that's part of the Council of friends has a chance to put on practically a flower show of its own as the luncheon dates roll round. On Sept. 27, the opening concert day of the BSO's 88th year, Lincoln, Milton, South Shore, Wayland-Sudbury, and Weston will divide the honors, and on Nov. 15 it'll be a turn for Marblehead, the North Shore, Newton, and Worcester. Feb. 14 will be hearts and flowers for Brookline, Boston, Chestnut Hill, and Dedham Council members, and the last luncheon on Apr. 18 will be a chance for Andover, Cambridge, Concord, and Wellesley-Needham to shine.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. are co-chairmen of the Council, and Mrs. Barton Loomis and Mrs. George A. Parson share the luncheon series planning. Their job corps includes such gems as Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. John M. Ferry, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy Jr., Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. Stanford Calderwood, Mrs. George Bates and Mrs. Lewis H. Clark Jr.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

MRS. LEWIS CABOT
On BSO committee

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

SEP 9 1968 New England Newsclip

Pre-Symphony Series Sold Out

PUBLICITY PAYS, it seems. Due to an unprecedented response, reservations have been closed for the 1968-69 Pre-Symphony Luncheon Series, according to Mrs. B. Barton Loomis and Mrs. George A. Parson, co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Symphony Orchestra.

However, the ticket resale plan in practice for Symphony tickets will also apply to the Luncheon Series. Subscribers who wish to release one or more of the luncheon tickets for resale are asked to call Mrs. Whitty in the Friends office at Symphony Hall.

A sell-out of series tickets for the Celebrity Luncheon Series to benefit the North Shore Children's Hospital, is also announced by the chairman, Mrs. Marshal Fabyan Jr. of Manchester. She regrets that the seating capacity at the King's Grant Motor Inn Auditorium in Danvers will not permit the selling of single tickets. Samuel Robert will be the speaker, Sept. 28, and Bess Myerson of Miss America fame will discuss "Personality Precepts," Oct. 14.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

SEP 14 1968 New England Newsclip

OF

Social Chatter

Sept. 27 Is a Day of Firsts For Friends of Boston Symphony

A DAY OF FIRSTS for Friends of the Boston Symphony will be Friday, Sept. 27. This is the date of the first Friday afternoon Symphony of the season, the first Pre-Symphony Luncheon of this year's series, and the first time records of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be available for mail order sale at Symphony Hall.

Always a much heralded event, the opening concert of the 1968-69 season will be even more festive than ever. Fall flowers, many from members' own gardens, will transform Horticultural Hall into a garden setting for greeting old friends and comparing notes on the summer.

Aperitifs and cocktails will be available at 12:15 and luncheon will be served promptly at 12:45 in order to allow plenty of time for a leisurely luncheon since Symphony Hall is only a few steps away.

Hostesses will be under the direction of Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock. Order forms for records will be included in each program and at record display booths on the main floor of Symphony Hall and in the balconies. Profits will go to the Council of Friends who are sponsoring this project. All profits on the records will be matched by the Ford Foundation.

WALSH

Pre-Symphony Luncheon Season

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

SEP 9 1968 New England Newsclip

COUNCIL OF FRIENDS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have exciting plans for the season beginning Friday afternoon, Sept. 27, before the first Symphony concert of the year. A second annual series of four pre-symphony luncheons will start off their activities. And, for the first time, records of the BSO will be available for mail order at Symphony Hall.

For the luncheon, to be served promptly at 12:45, preceded by apertifs and cocktails, Horticultural Hall will be festive with fall flowers brought by members of the Friends from their own gardens. After refreshments and conversation, the Symphony subscribers will walk across the street to Symphony Hall for the afternoon of music.

Heading the corps of red ribbon-decorated hostesses will be Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock. Area chairmen and friends are assisting Mrs. Charles F. Hovey and Mrs. John M. Ferry with the flower arrangements.

Among other Council of Friends members working on the committee are Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. John M. Bradley, originators of the popular luncheon series; Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. George Bates, Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy, Jr., Mrs. Stanford Calderwood, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow, Jr., and Mrs. James Hunnewell.

Since space is limited at Horticultural Hall, members are reminded to send for their tickets without delay. BSO records, on display in Symphony Hall, will be for sale at suggested retail value on a mail order basis. Mrs. Howard Davis, in charge of this project, has announced that all profits on the records (aiding the work of the Council of Friends) will be matched by the Ford Foundation Fund.

★ ★ ★

BSO

144

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Among the surging thousands of ladies pouring into Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon for the opening of the Symphony season were a few privileged hundreds who proudly wore bright badges of honor that identified them from their fellow subscribers.

These special few were the lucky ones who had made early reservations for the Pre-Symphony Luncheons across the street at Horticultural Hall which the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sponsored for the second season. An immediate sell-out, the series of four luncheons could only accommodate a fraction of the number who wanted to attend, and so it was that the ladies wearing the bright red or white carnations that had decorated their tables at the luncheon, and for which a pin had been thoughtfully provided, were the recipients of many envious glances from their less lucky concert-going friends.

The standard of decorations is always high at these affairs, and Friday's luncheon continued the tradition. In addition to the carnations and ivy at every table, tall shrubs covered in orange berries decorated the lower lobby, while planters filled with pachysandra and geraniums flanked the stairway.

On every side the guests could be heard enquiring about summer plans, for this was the first time many of them had met after a summer away. Being warmly welcomed back from North East Harbor, from which she had only just returned, was Mrs. George Cheever Shattuck of Brookline, A charming and beloved figure in Boston society, she has done much for many worthwhile causes and is always welcomed wherever she goes.

Many of the same committee that had worked for one of Mrs. Shattuck's favorite causes, the Pan American Society Fashion show, on Wednesday, were also responsible for this event. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord, Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead, who, together with Mrs. John L. Grandin of Chestnut Hill, is co-chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Lewis Clark of Cambridge, Mrs. George Parson of Beacon Hill, Mrs. Charles Hovey of Chestnut Hill, and many others were busy helping older guests find seats after they had been served the Quiche Lorraine, salt and garlic bread at the buffet. A New York company, Julius Wile Sons, had thoughtfully provided the tall bottles of Rosay wine on each table.

The center of all eyes was Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, the new young wife of the conductor of the B.S.O. She obviously had much in common with Harold D. Hodgkinson who, with his wife, was seated at her table, for they conversed together throughout the entire luncheon.

Despite the warm day many of the guests decided to wear their new fall suits. Mrs. Louis Cabot of Beacon Hill chose one of the new longer jackets over a matching camel colored dress. Attractive Mrs. B. Barton Loomis, co-chairman of the luncheon series, wore dark brown garbardine, and Mrs. George Parson, her co-chairman, a black wool edged with bands of brown and white at wrists, waist and hem.

Among the many enjoying the luncheon, and the fun later of being escorted across the street by two of "Boston's Finest" mounted on their sleek horses, were Mrs. Hollis Gleason of Cohasset, Mrs. James Jenkins, Jr. of Dedham, Mrs. Nathaniel Whittier of Medfield, Mrs. George Dabney of Dedham, Mrs. Frederick Ritchie of Wellesley Hills, and Mrs. Stephen Ames of Milton.

* * *

Three of the hostesses from the South Shore group of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra greet Mrs. Charles Devens of Milton (righ) as she arrives at the Pre-Symphony Luncheon at Horticultural Hall on Friday. They are (left to right) Mrs. F. Weston Lyons, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow, Jr. and Mrs. Brewster Stetson, all of Duxbury.

Mrs. B. Barton Loomis of Beacon Hill (right), chairman of the Pre-Symphony Luncheons, sponsored by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, admires some of the decorations at Friday's opening lunch with Mrs. Raymond S. Wilkins, whose husband Judge Wilkins, is a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The same scene of friend greeting friend was repeated again at Symphony Hall as the Friday afternoon patrons returned for the 88th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The presence of ushers is almost unnecessary on these afternoons as everyone knows exactly where their seat is, for, in many cases, it has been in the family for several generations.

Mrs. Reynolds Fuller did not get far beyond the entrance door as friend after friend came up to greet her. She looked stunning in a rose pink silk coat, perfect with her dark hair. Another in bright pink was Mrs. Edwin Green of Cambridge, while Mrs. Charles Mason of Chestnut Hill wore a lime green and pink tweed suit.

Arriving together were the Asa Phillips of Brookline, and Mrs. John Carter of Weston was greeting friends on her way to her seat.

Others glimpsed as they came into the hall were Mrs. Stanford Calderwood of Cambridge, Mrs. Walter Powers of Beacon Hill, Mrs. Edward C. Johnson, Jr. of Boston, Mrs. James Baty of Belmont and Duxbury, Miss Ellen Stillman of Hanson, Mrs. Charles Devens of Milton, who had been at the luncheon, Mrs. Miles Nelson Clair and Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard of Newton who came together, and many more.

* * *

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

SEP 30 1968 New England

Symphony Friends Propose Bus from Belmont to Hall

Won't it be easier, pleasanter in a bus? If you think so and are a Friday afternoon Boston Symphony-goer, let Mrs. Robinson Murray, Jr. know at 484-0588.

The better to avoid customary parking problems, plus hazardous winter driving, and emulating the example of several nearby towns, members of Belmont's Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are negotiating for a comfortable, dependable bus. This equipage will transport subscribers, not necessarily friends, to and from Symphony Hall, starting at 11:30 from a no-meter central parking lot near Belmont Center, making several convenient stops in Boston and returning at the concert's conclusion.

These plans, as described by Bus chairman Mrs. Murray, were discussed recently at a meeting at the home of Belmont's Council chairman, Mrs. Herbert C. Lee.

Proposed price for this "leave-the-driving-to-us" plan is $1.50 round trip, with a full bus, on a season ticket basis. Before implementing the plan, the Council needs to know how many prospective riders Belmont will produce. So please phone Mrs. Murray (484-0588) to report your wishes. If you are a ticket-sharer, she will be grateful for the name of your partners.

Among Council members working on the project are Mesdames Theodore Ames, Harold S. Bird, S. Roy Burroughs, Charles A. Coolidge, Jr., Carlton Perry Fuller, Harold L. Hazen, David R. Pokross, George H. Simonds and Alfred Willmann.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800

SEP 26 1968

Symphony soiree aids Retina Fund

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

Champagne with Van Cliburn, anyone?

Or how about a glass of the bubbly with Marilyn Horne?

You'll have to wait until March to share toasts with the Texas pianist, but Friends of the Boston Symphony will be handing round the long-stemmed glasses this Saturday night following the young soprano's performance with the B.S.O. The Howard Davises and the Donald Sinclairs will be hosts.

Symphony's mellow halls, which have heard the whap of many a cork at season after season of its world-noted Pops, will be the bailiwick for the Van Cliburn rally, too.

The drinkers will be awfully distinguished, too, for the whole thing will benefit the Retina Foundation, Institute of Medical and Biological Sciences. Dr. Charles Schepens, who established the Foundation, and a roster of top men in the field will supplement the committee which includes Mrs. Albert Sylvester, Mrs. Schepens, Mrs. James H. Means and Mrs. George G. Monks.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

SEP 24 1968

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

SEP 24 1968

BSO Friends gather

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

Those hostesses with the mostest, the Council of Friends of Boston Symphony, came up with another coup for their sell-out of a luncheon series that have the BSO gals of all ages waiting in line.

They produced the new, young Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf as honor guest at the trustees' table for Friday's 88th BSO opener.

Not even the buzz about dearly-loved President Henry Cabot's retirement (he's still prexy according to the new-format BSO programs) could top the appearance of the soignee dark-haired bride (and ex-student) of the music director. Violinist Vera Leinsdorf paid little, if any, attention to her Quiche Lorraine, salad, or sherbet, contenting herself with asking trustee Harold Hodgkinson "what should I know about Boston?"

The lissome, 30-ish bride, wrapped in a short emerald and white polka dot, was still the focus for all eyes as she took the special first-balcony chair at Symphony Hall where two Koussevitzky wives succeeded one another before the Munch Symphony reign.

Seeing that Mrs. L. and the Hodgkinsons, and everyone else at the elegant luncheon safely made the 100-foot transit from Horticultural Hall to musicdom's most sacred steps, were mounted police like Michael Connolly. Symphony Council's No. 1 Idea Gal, Fran Fahnestock, made a special trip to the MDC stables to see that the boys on the horses came early.

The mike system didn't work at Horticultural Hall, but everything else did, including the marvelous committee pros like Betsy (Mrs. Albert) Goodhue, Olga (Mrs. Lewis) Cabot, Elaine (Mrs. Jerome) Rosenfeld, and Georgia Kidtner.

Mrs. Howard David gets the kudos for the already-working sale of BSO records. She put an efficient yellow order form right into the Symphony program. It's even stamped with a mailing permit. And every sale benefits the Council as well as giving everybody superservice on favorite records, often hard to get.

The families so long a part of the Symphony scene —Putnams and Russells, and Fullers and Bigelows, second and third generations like lovely Edith (Mrs. Charles) Devens, Wolcotts, and Adamses, Grews, and Grays, and Lymans, filled the rows that need no ushers to point the way. It's still one of the most privileged audiences in the world.

MRS. LEINSDORF talks with B.S.O. Trustee Harold Hodgkinson. (Paul Connell Photo)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

SEP 28 1968 New England

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Large Crowd Attends Opening Of Boston Symphony's 88th Season

MOUNTED POLICE escorted Symphony subscribers across the street from Horticultural Hall to Symphony Hall yesterday after the first Symphony Luncheon of the season. It was the opening of the Symphony's 88th season and a warm summer-like day, so there was a huge turnout. From now on until spring, Friday afternoons will be reserved for Symphony.

Tucked in each program for the first time was an order blank for records by the orchestra. Boston's beloved Beethoven was included in the opening concert, along with a Mozart Symphony. Marilyn Horne was guest soloist and the program ended with Wagner's Die Gotterdammerung.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. are co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sponsoring the luncheons. Mrs. B. Barton Loomis and Mrs. George A. Parson are committee chairmen for the successful luncheons that were instituted last year by Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. John M. Bradley.

Yesterday's luncheon was under the auspices of the Lincoln, Milton, South Shore, Wayland-Sudbury and Weston divisions of the Council of Friends, including Mrs. Albert C. England Jr., Mrs. Lewis Kane, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy, Mrs. Thomas B. Gannett, Mrs. Francis Devlin and Mrs. Richard Ely.

Mrs. Goodhue, looking as usual as if she had just stepped out of the pages of the latest fashion magazine, greeted everyone, although the microphone was most unco-operative. And Mrs. George Parson and Mrs. Howard W. Davis, who is in charge of the sale of records, also tried their voices on the microphone without much success.

But everything else ran like clockwork from the apertifs and cocktails and the Quiche Lorraine, to the red and white carnations used as table decorations and worn to Symphony by the ladies.

The new Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, wife of the Symphony director, was at the luncheon, wearing an emerald green and black print. She was deep in conversation with Harold D. Hodgkinson, who sat at her right and was one of the few men present.

A special bus from Plymouth brought South Shore subscribers to Boston for the luncheon and concert and took them home afterwards. This will be a regular feature, and among yesterday's passengers were Mrs. Sherman L. Whipple and Mrs. Paul W. Bittinger of Plymouth, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Mrs. F. Weston Lyons and Mrs. Edward Hutton of Duxbury, Mrs. Hollis Gleason of Cohasset and Mrs. Mayo Shattuck of Hingham.

Among other Symphony-goers at the luncheon were Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Lewis Cabot, Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. Miles Nelson Clair, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. A. Turner Wells, Mrs. Louis Cabot, Mrs. Charles Bartlett, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. John Hill, Mrs. Harold D. Hodgkinson, Mrs. Charles F. Eaton Jr., Mrs. Brewster Stetson, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Richard B. Bailey, Mrs. Nelson Aldrich and Mrs. Eugene Redmond. The next luncheon will be on Nov. 15.

* * *

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

SEP 28 1968 New England

FADED TEXT

145

Symphony luncheons sold out until April

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

We warned you. And sure enough, those Symphony girls have done it again.

The Friday luncheons before the concerts are sold out right through Apr. 18, and you can get in on the goodies (and they are) at these cozy sessions in Horticultural Hall only if you can find someone who'll sell you one of her tickets. It's always been a cardinal-sin division in Boston to waste a Symphony ticket—you Make Arrangements, with the Hall, or that friend you want to do something nice about, if Junior's first football game comes on Friday afternoon.

The late Mrs. Alvan Fuller used to say "we never make engagements on a Symphony Friday," and it's true Boston philosophy. When that big privileged audience makes its familar way along the hollowed and hallowed hallways to the seat that was more likely than not Mama's or even Grandma's, on Sept. 27 for the Mozart, Beethoven, and Wagner, it will certainly be doing what comes naturally.

The 88th season of Henry Lee Higginson's venture in music will, in spite of both sell-out and status, face a deficit and a match-fund series of projects. The Council of Friends, whose co-chairmen Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John Grandin Jr. are as capable as they are chic, are already up to their pretty necks in the kind of plans that spell S.R.O. and funds for the B.S.O.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

SEP 19 1968 New England

Friends Of The Symphony

Concord music buffs will be afforded a unique opportunity to purchase recordings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by mail this year. Under the direction of Mrs. Howard W. Davis, chairman of the Records Sale Committee, the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has placed a list of available recordings and an order coupon in all Symphony programs. Profits from the sale of the records will directly benefit the Council of Friends.

Purchases of the RCA Victor Red Seal and RCA Victrola recordings may be taken as a tax deduction. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the first orchestra in the country to make its recordings available to patrons by mail.

Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, another Concord resident, has been appointed to the new Board of Overseers of the Orchestra to assist the trustees.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200

OCT 10 1968 New England

* * *

One of the most rewarding of the groups of "Friends" of various organizations to which to belong is the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These Friends have the opportunity of meeting the members of the orchestra and visiting soloists, and are invited to attend the pre-symphony luncheons held at Horticultural Hall during the season.

Like the members of the Museum of Fine Arts, the number of Friends of the B.S.O. has been increasing in leaps and bounds as more and more subscribers are supporting the orchestra this way.

Never ones to rest on their laurels Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead and Mrs. John Grandin, Jr. of Chestnut Hill, co-chairmen of the Friends, are devising new ways in which to attract more membership.

Recently the Council gave a luncheon for the trustees and staff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at which they showed the Bell Telephone Hour's film of the B.S.O. at Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Festival. The event was the "kick-off" of the Council's membership drive for 1968-69.

Among the trustees who attended were Henry B. Cabot, Philip K. Allen, Edward A. Taft, Sidney R. Rabb, Henry A. Laughlin, Harold D. Hodgkinson and Mrs. James H. Perkins of Westwood.

The staff was represented by Thomas D. Perry, Jr.; Harry J. Kraut, Miss Mary H. Smith, Marvis Schofer, Andrew Raeburn, Jordan Whitelaw and Mrs. Kay Whitty.

Among the Council members present were Mrs. B. Barton Loomis of Beacon Hill; Mrs. Richard Ely of Weston; Mrs. Robert Dean and Mrs. Thomas Chesterton of Wellesley; Mrs. C. Russell Eddy of Duxbury and Mrs. Josiah Spaulding of Manchester.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

NOV 16 1968 New England

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Many at Symphony Luncheon, Including North Shore Turkey

A NORTH SHORE TURKEY was guest of honor at the Symphony Luncheon in Horticultural Hall yesterday. Spotlessly white, he held court in a pen decorated with bittersweet and milkweed pods. Other autumn touches were a rakish scarecrow, corn shocks and gourds. And mounds of fruit were the centerpieces on the luncheon tables. This is the second season of these pleasant luncheons and this year there are 350 subscribers instead of 250.

"It looks like an elegant lunch!" we heard a subscriber remark as she stood in line at the buffet table. And her companion agreed heartily as they carried their brimming plates to a nearby table. And afterwards, there were mounted police to escort them across the street to Symphony Hall for the concert.

Yesterday's luncheon was under the auspices of the members of the Marblehead, Newton, North Shore and Worcester areas of the orchestra's Council of Friends. The hostesses and decorating committee included Mrs. Nelson Aldrich Mrs. Raymond Ellis, Mrs. Erick Kauders, Mrs. James Marsh, Mrs. John McCandless, Mrs. Drayton Phillips, Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Mrs. Howard Wheeler and Mrs. Miles N. Clair.

Also, Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. Morgan Campbell, Mrs. Shepard Williams, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Robert Bennett, Mrs. Edmund Piehler, Mrs. Harlan Pierpont, Mrs. Stanley Morton, Mrs. Robert Massey and Mrs. Robert Whipple.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. are co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who sponsor the luncheons. Among the members of their committee who were there yesterday were Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Lewis H. Clark.

Mrs. Howard Davis, who has charge of the records made by the orchestra, was there, and among the many others were Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. Frederic C. Church, Mrs. Whitney Hale, Mrs. Weston Adams, Mrs. George A. Parson, Mrs. A. Turner Wells, Mrs. James C. Hopkins, Mrs. John Hill, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Frank G. Allen and Mrs. Joseph W. Lund.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

DEC 9 1968 New England

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

NOV 7 1968 New

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

NOV 18 New England

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

If there is one attribute the ladies of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have to have it's to be good "apple polishers" — in the nicest possible way, of course.

The committee for Friday's second Pre-Symphony Luncheon at Horticultural Hall sponsored by the Council of Friends, certainly proved this for they had hand polished the 600 apples used in the center pieces on the luncheon tables and in the decorations around the hall.

In addition to this they had set up corn shocks, made an ingenious and delightful scarecrow, and had conveyed a pure white and very much alive turkey into Horticultural Hall from Marblehead, after first giving him an antiseptic bath to remove any extra wildlife he might have brought along.

The hostesses responsible for all this at the second in a series of four pre-symphony luncheons, given for the members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were from the Marblehead, Newton, North Shore and Worcester areas. They made Thanksgiving come two weeks early with their decorating scheme, for they transformed the barren Horticultural Hall into a veritable harvest festival.

In addition to the snow white turkey in his bayberry decorated pen, squashes, pumpkins, berries, apples, leaves and vines were used in abundance everywhere, their brilliant colors vivid against the old grey stone walls. The seven foot scarecrow among his corn shocks watched over the buffet table and was the imaginative work of Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard and Mrs. Samuel Levine of Newton. From his straw and fruit face to his plaid shirt and blue jeans, he was magnificent as he held an old fashioned apple picker in one hand and an iron rake in the other.

As the guests enjoyed a luncheon of chicken Divan, tossed and cranberry salads, and lemon tartlets, they could see groups of friends seated together at the round tables. One of these groups included Mrs. Richard Thompson of Swampscott, Mrs. George Bates of Boston, Mrs. Thomas Perry, whose husband is manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mrs. Frank Allen of Boston, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord, whose olive green suit was designed with an A line skirt, the lower half of which was decorated with rows and rows of circular stitching; her aunt, Miss Frances Wheedon; and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld of Chestnut Hill.

Mrs. Richard Ely of Weston and Mrs. Thomas Chesterton of Wellesley were seated together as were Mrs. Stephen Wellington of West Newton and Mrs. Walter Robb of Concord.

Answering queries about Dr. Shattuck's health, the answers to which happily were good, was Mrs. George Cheever Shattuck of Brookline. A charming and gracious lady, her progress was slow when she later arrived for the concert at Symphony Hall for everyone wished to stop and speak to her.

Others at the luncheon and later at the concert at Symphony Hall were Mrs. Reynolds Fuller, in a white Persian Lamb coat and matching beret, and her tall daughter, Mrs. Alfred L. Donovan, in bright red; Mrs. Norman Cahners, wearing a stunning lavender tweed suit with a scarf collar of the same material; Mrs. Arnold Jenkins of Dedham; Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley; Mrs. Louis Cabot of Wenham; Mrs. Charles Mason, Jr. of Chestnut Hill, and Mrs. John Carter of Weston, in an unusual tweed coat in a soft apricot color.

Membership in Society of Friends Of BSO Ideal Christmas Gift

FOR LEISURELY SHOPPING try Symphony Hall this year. Symphony tickets have long been a favorite gift. Now the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have added two new ideas for your Christmas shopping pleasure. The first is a gift membership in the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tax deductible and available in almost any price range, each membership benefits the giver, the recipient and the orchestra.

Members of the Friends receive invitations to luncheons, receptions, the annual meeting of the Friends, and special events of the concert series they attend. Members also have the opportunity to meet many famous guest artists and conductors, as well as members of the orchestra and their families.

While you don't have to be a member to give this gift, the Council of Friends extends a cordial invitation to all non-members to join and share the privileges given to the Friends. Just call Mrs. Whitty in the Friends office and she will give you further details and send you an attractive acknowledgment folder and membership card.

Another suggestion for holiday giving is a recording made by the orchestra. These records are suitable for all ages. Sure to please everyone who enjoys beautiful music, they make a welcome present for any occasion. Gay red and white order forms and selection lists are available at record display tables and from ushers at Symphony Hall, or call Mrs. Whitty and she will send an order form to you.

The Council of Friends reminds you that each record sold benefits the orchestra, both through royalties and by the record profit that is matched by funds from the Ford Foundation. This plan is a "first" for Boston and other Symphony Orchestras throughout the country are watching to see how successful this venture will be.

* * *

* * *

A NEW Christmas shopping mecca is Boston's famous Symphony Hall, where the Council of Friends of the BSO have gotten together on good ideas for gift giving to music-loving friends. The ladies suggest a gift membership in the Society of Friends of the BSO. It's tax deductible and available in almost any price range. Each membership benefits the giver, the recipient and the Orchestra.

While one does not have to be a member to give this gift, the Council of Friends extends a cordial invitation to all non-members to join and share the many privileges extended to the group. Mrs. Frank W. Witty in the Friends Office will answer all queries.

Another suggestion is the gift of a recording made by our world-famous BSO. The records are suitable for all ages and a joy to receive. Selected lists are available. Each record sold, benefits the Orchestra both through royalties and by the record profit which is matched by funds from the Ford Foundation.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

DEC 10 1968 New England

ROSE WALSH

Turkey Steals Show At Symphony Luncheon

I WONDER what that beautiful white, proud, live turkey from Marblehead told his chums after he had been the center of attention at Friday's second-in-the-series of four Pre-Symphony Luncheons sponsored by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Horticultural Hall. (How lucky can a turkey be?) Planned under the co-chairmanship of Mrs. B. Barton Loomis and Mrs. George A. Parson, the fashionable luncheons benefitting the B.S.O. are hostessed by members from the different areas.

For Friday's party the Marblehead, Newton, North Shore and Worcester "friends" did the honors which included the decorations. Very cleverly the ladies gave the stark foyer of the Hall a real New England ambience. On trees made from branches one group had tied hand-polished MacIntosh apples from the Worcester area. The turkey ("We wanted to get a brown one but had to settle for the white and cleaned him up a bit with alcohol," one of the ladies told us) was transported in a crate by Mrs. James Marsh. His cage in the corner was aritstically decorated with milkweed pods. Heaps of pumpkins, squash and gourds marked the entrance to the luncheon hall. A carefree scarecrow, rake in one hand and an apple catcher, loaned by Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, stood guard over the bountiful buffet table. Individual tables were centered with arrangements of apples, nuts and bittersweet.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., headed the hostess group among whom were Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. Raymond Ellis, Mrs. Erick Kauders, Mrs. John McCandless, Mrs. Drayton Phillips, Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Mrs. Howard Wheeler, Mrs. Miles N. Clair.

Also Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. Morgan Campbell, Mrs. Shepard Williams, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Robert Bennett, Mrs. Edmund Piehler, Mrs. Harlan Pierpont, Mrs. Stanley Morton, Mrs. Robert Massey and Mrs. Robert Whipple. Mrs. Howard Davis answered queries about the BSO records that may be ordered through the Council of Friends for the benefit of the Orchestra.

* * *

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

NOV 18 New England

FADED TEXT

145

Symphony luncheons sold out until April

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

We warned you. And sure enough, those Symphony girls have done it again.

The Friday luncheons before the concerts are sold out right through Apr. 18, and you can get in on the goodies (and they are) at these cozy sessions in Horticultural Hall only if you can find someone who'll sell you one of her tickets. It's always been a cardinal-sin division in Boston to waste a Symphony ticket—you Make Arrangements, with the Hall, or that friend you want to do something nice about, if Junior's first football game comes on Friday afternoon.

The late Mrs. Alvan Fuller used to say "we never make engagements on a Symphony Friday," and it's true Boston philosophy. When that big privileged audience makes its familar way along the hollowed and hallowed hallways to the seat that was more likely than not Mama's or even Grandma's, on Sept. 27 for the Mozart, Beethoven, and Wagner, it will certainly be doing what comes naturally.

The 88th season of Henry Lee Higginson's venture in music will, in spite of both sell-out and status, face a deficit and a match-fund series of projects. The Council of Friends, whose co-chairmen Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John Grandin Jr. are as capable as they are chic, are already up to their pretty necks in the kind of plans that spell S.R.O. and funds for the B.S.O.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

SEP 19 1968 New England

* * *

One of the most rewarding of the groups of "Friends" of various organizations to which to belong is the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These Friends have the opportunity of meeting the members of the orchestra and visiting soloists, and are invited to attend the pre-symphony luncheons held at Horticultural Hall during the season.

Like the members of the Museum of Fine Arts, the number of Friends of the B.S.O. has been increasing in leaps and bounds as more and more subscribers are supporting the orchestra this way.

Never ones to rest on their laurels Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead and Mrs. John Grandin, Jr. of Chestnut Hill, co-chairmen of the Friends, are devising new ways in which to attract more membership.

Recently the Council gave a luncheon for the trustees and staff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at which they showed the Bell Telephone Hour's film of the B.S.O. at Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Festival. The event was the "kick-off" of the Council's membership drive for 1968-69.

Among the trustees who attended were Henry B. Cabot, Philip K. Allen, Edward A. Taft, Sidney R. Rabb, Henry A. Laughlin, Harold D. Hodgkinson and Mrs. James H. Perkins of Westwood.

The staff was represented by Thomas D. Perry, Jr.; Harry J. Kraut, Miss Mary H. Smith, Marvis Schofer, Andrew Raeburn, Jordan Whitelaw and Mrs. Kay Whitty.

Among the Council members present were Mrs. B. Barton Loomis of Beacon Hill; Mrs. Richard Ely of Weston; Mrs. Robert Dean and Mrs. Thomas Chesterton of Wellesley; Mrs. C. Russell Eddy of Duxbury and Mrs. Josiah Spaulding of Manchester.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

DEC 9 1968 New England

Membership in Society of Friends Of BSO Ideal Christmas Gift

FOR LEISURELY SHOPPING try Symphony Hall this year. Symphony tickets have long been a favorite gift. Now the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have added two new ideas for your Christmas shopping pleasure. The first is a gift membership in the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tax deductible and available in almost any price range, each membership benefits the giver, the recipient and the orchestra.

Members of the Friends receive invitations to luncheons, receptions, the annual meeting of the Friends, and special events of the concert series they attend. Members also have the opportunity to meet many famous guest artists and conductors, as well as members of the orchestra and their families.

While you don't have to be a member to give this gift, the Council of Friends extends a cordial invitation to all non-members to join and share the privileges given to the Friends. Just call Mrs. Whitty in the Friends office and she will give you further details and send you an attractive acknowledgment folder and membership card.

Another suggestion for holiday giving is a recording made by the orchestra. These records are suitable for all ages. Sure to please everyone who enjoys beautiful music, they make a welcome present for any occasion. Gay red and white order forms and selection lists are available at record display tables and from ushers at Symphony Hall, or call Mrs. Whitty and she will send an order form to you.

The Council of Friends reminds you that each record sold benefits the orchestra, both through royalties and by the record profit that is matched by funds from the Ford Foundation. This plan is a "first" for Boston and other Symphony Orchestras throughout the country are watching to see how successful this venture will be.

* * *

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

NOV 7 1968 New

* * *

A NEW Christmas shopping mecca is Boston's famous Symphony Hall, where the Council of Friends of the BSO have gotten together on good ideas for gift giving to music-loving friends. The ladies suggest a gift membership in the Society of Friends of the BSO. It's tax deductible and available in almost any price range. Each membership benefits the giver, the recipient and the Orchestra.

While one does not have to be a member to give this gift, the Council of Friends extends a cordial invitation to all non-members to join and share the many privileges extended to the group. Mrs. Frank W. Witty in the Friends Office will answer all queries.

Another suggestion is the gift of a recording made by our world-famous BSO. The records are suitable for all ages and a joy to receive. Selected lists are available. Each record sold, benefits the Orchestra both through royalties and by the record profit which is matched by funds from the Ford Foundation.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

DEC 10 1968 New England

Friends Of The Symphony

Concord music buffs will be afforded a unique opportunity to purchase recordings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by mail this year. Under the direction of Mrs. Howard W. Davis, chairman of the Records Sale Committee, the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has placed a list of available recordings and an order coupon in all Symphony programs. Profits from the sale of the records will directly benefit the Council of Friends.

Purchases of the RCA Victor Red Seal and RCA Victrola recordings may be taken as a tax deduction. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the first orchestra in the country to make its recordings available to patrons by mail.

Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, another Concord resident, has been appointed to the new Board of Overseers of the Orchestra to assist the trustees.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200

OCT 10 1968 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

NOV 16 1968 New England

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Many at Symphony Luncheon, Including North Shore Turkey

A NORTH SHORE TURKEY was guest of honor at the Symphony Luncheon in Horticultural Hall yesterday. Spotlessly white, he held court in a pen decorated with bittersweet and milkweed pods. Other autumn touches were a rakish scarecrow, corn shocks and gourds. And mounds of fruit were the centerpieces on the luncheon tables. This is the second season of these pleasant luncheons and this year there are 350 subscribers instead of 250.

"It looks like an elegant lunch!" we heard a subscriber remark as she stood in line at the buffet table. And her companion agreed heartily as they carried their brimming plates to a nearby table. And afterwards, there were mounted police to escort them across the street to Symphony Hall for the concert.

Yesterday's luncheon was under the auspices of the members of the Marblehead, Newton, North Shore and Worcester areas of the orchestra's Council of Friends. The hostesses and decorating committee included Mrs. Nelson Aldrich Mrs. Raymond Ellis, Mrs. Erick Kauders, Mrs. James Marsh, Mrs. John McCandless, Mrs. Drayton Phillips, Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Mrs. Howard Wheeler and Mrs. Miles N. Clair.

Also, Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. Morgan Campbell, Mrs. Shepard Williams, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Robert Bennett, Mrs. Edmund Piehler, Mrs. Harlan Pierpont, Mrs. Stanley Morton, Mrs. Robert Massey and Mrs. Robert Whipple.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. are co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who sponsor the luncheons. Among the members of their committee who were there yesterday were Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Lewis H. Clark.

Mrs. Howard Davis, who has charge of the records made by the orchestra, was there, and among the many others were Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. Frederic C. Church, Mrs. Whitney Hale, Mrs. Weston Adams, Mrs. George A. Parson, Mrs. A. Turner Wells, Mrs. James C. Hopkins, Mrs. John Hill, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Frank G. Allen and Mrs. Joseph W. Lund.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

NOV 18 New England

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

If there is one attribute the ladies of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have to have it's to be good "apple polishers" — in the nicest possible way, of course.

The committee for Friday's second Pre-Symphony Luncheon at Horticultural Hall sponsored by the Council of Friends, certainly proved this for they had hand polished the 600 apples used in the center pieces on the luncheon tables and in the decorations around the hall.

In addition to this they had set up corn shocks, made an ingenious and delightful scarecrow, and had conveyed a pure white and very much alive turkey into Horticultural Hall from Marblehead, after first giving him an antiseptic bath to remove any extra wildlife he might have brought along.

The hostesses responsible for all this at the second in a series of four pre-symphony luncheons, given for the members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were from the Marblehead, Newton, North Shore and Worcester areas. They made Thanksgiving come two weeks early with their decorating scheme, for they transformed the barren Horticultural Hall into a veritable harvest festival.

In addition to the snow white turkey in his bayberry decorated pen, squashes, pumpkins, berries, apples, leaves and vines were used in abundance everywhere, their brilliant colors vivid against the old grey stone walls. The seven foot scarecrow among his corn shocks watched over the buffet table and was the imaginative work of Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard and Mrs. Samuel Levine of Newton. From his straw and fruit face to his plaid shirt and blue jeans, he was magnificent as he held an old fashioned apple picker in one hand and an iron rake in the other.

As the guests enjoyed a luncheon of chicken Divan, tossed and cranberry salads, and lemon tartlets, they could see groups of friends seated together at the round tables. One of these groups included Mrs. Richard Thompson of Swampscott, Mrs. George Bates of Boston, Mrs. Thomas Perry, whose husband is manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mrs. Frank Allen of Boston, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord, whose olive green suit was designed with an A line skirt, the lower half of which was decorated with rows and rows of circular stitching; her aunt, Miss Frances Wheedon; and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld of Chestnut Hill.

Mrs. Richard Ely of Weston and Mrs. Thomas Chesterton of Wellesley were seated together as were Mrs. Stephen Wellington of West Newton and Mrs. Walter Robb of Concord.

Answering queries about Dr. Shattuck's health, the answers to which happily were good, was Mrs. George Cheever Shattuck of Brookline. A charming and gracious lady, her progress was slow when she later arrived for the concert at Symphony Hall for everyone wished to stop and speak to her.

Others at the luncheon and later at the concert at Symphony Hall were Mrs. Reynolds Fuller, in a white Persian Lamb coat and matching beret, and her tall daughter, Mrs. Alfred L. Donovan, in bright red; Mrs. Norman Cahners, wearing a stunning lavender tweed suit with a scarf collar of the same material; Mrs. Arnold Jenkins of Dedham; Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley; Mrs. Louis Cabot of Wenham; Mrs. Charles Mason, Jr. of Chestnut Hill, and Mrs. John Carter of Weston, in an unusual tweed coat in a soft apricot color.

ROSE WALSH

Turkey Steals Show At Symphony Luncheon

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

NOV 18 New England

I WONDER what that beautiful white, proud, live turkey from Marblehead told his chums after he had been the center of attention at Friday's second-in-the-series of four Pre-Symphony Luncheons sponsored by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Horticultural Hall. (How lucky can a turkey be?) Planned under the co-chairmanship of Mrs. B. Barton Loomis and Mrs. George A. Parson, the fashionable luncheons benefitting the B.S.O. are hostessed by members from the different areas.

For Friday's party the Marblehead, Newton, North Shore and Worcester "friends" did the honors which included the decorations. Very cleverly the ladies gave the stark foyer of the Hall a real New England ambience. On trees made from branches one group had tied hand - polished MacIntosh apples from the Worcester area. The turkey ("We wanted to get a brown one but had to settle for the white and cleaned him up a bit with alcohol," one of the ladies told us) was transported in a crate by Mrs. James Marsh. His cage in the corner was aritstically decorated with milkweed pods. Heaps of pumpkins, squash and gourds marked the entrance to the luncheon hall. A carefree scarecrow, rake in one hand and an apple catcher, loaned by Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, stood guard over the bountiful buffet table. Individual tables were centered with arrangements of apples, nuts and bittersweet.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., headed the hostess group among whom were Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. Raymond Ellis, Mrs. Erick Kauders, Mrs. John McCandless, Mrs. Drayton Phillips, Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Mrs. Howard Wheeler, Mrs. Miles N. Clair.

Also Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. Morgan Campbell, Mrs. Shepard Williams, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Robert Bennett, Mrs. Edmund Piehler, Mrs. Harlan Pierpont, Mrs. Stanley Morton, Mrs. Robert Massey and Mrs. Robert Whipple. Mrs. Howard Davis answered queries about the BSO records that may be ordered through the Council of Friends for the benefit of the Orchestra.

* * *

146

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JAN 27 1969

Buy Christmas Gifts At Symphony Hall

For leisurely and elegant shopping, try Symphony Hall this year. Symphony tickets have long been a favorite gift. Now the Council of Friends of the BSO have added two new ideas for your holiday shopping.

The first is a gift membership in the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tax deductible and available in almost any price range, each membership benefits the giver, the recipient and the Orchestra.

Members of the Friends receive invitations to luncheons, teas, receptions, the Annual Meeting of the Friends and special events of the Concert Series they attend. Members also have the opportunity to meet in person, many famous guest artists and conductors, as well as members of the BSO and their families.

While you do not have to be a member to give this gift, the Council of Friends extends a cordial invitation to all non members to join and share the privileges extended to Friends of the BSO. Just call Mrs. Kay Whitty in the Friends Office for further details, and she will send you an acknowledgement folder and membership card.

Another suggestion for holiday giving is a recording, made by our world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. These records are suitable for all ages.

Red and white order forms and selection lists are available at record display tables and from ushers at Symphony Hall or by calling Kay Whitty.

The Council of Friends reminds you that each record sold benefits the Orchestra, both through royalties and by the record profit which is matched by funds from the Ford Foundation. This plan is a "first" for Boston and other Symphony Orchestras throughout the country are watching to see how successful this venture will be.

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200

DEC 19 1968

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500

DEC 19 1968

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,400

DEC 19 1968

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

JAN 29 1969 New England

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

One of the most rewarding organizations to join is, without doubt, the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Not only do members help support one of Boston's most prestigious institutions, but their support is returned by the number of events to which they are invited.

The Friends are divided into geographical groups, and sometimes several towns band together to form a unit, such as Wellesley-Wayland-Weston. Various affairs are planned for each group. They, in turn, are responsible for certain events, such as the pre-symphony luncheons at Horticultural Hall, when the different areas rotate the responsibility of arranging the affairs.

Among the many happenings planned for the 1969 season by the Friends are a series of receptions for guest artists. Each area group will meet a famous guest artist appearing with the Boston Symphony.

Yesterday, the Cambridge-Belmont group attended a reception after the evening concert for guest artist Georges Pretre. Reception chairmen were Mrs. Edwin Green of Cambridge, and Mrs. Charles Coolidge Jr. and Mrs. Herbert Lee of Belmont.

Among those greeting guests were the co-chairmen of the entire Friends group, Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. of Chestnut Hill.

On Jan. 19 a reception was held to honor Talcott Banks, the new president of the board of trustees of the B.S.O. and Mrs. Banks at Pierce House in Lincoln. Mrs. Albert C. England Jr. and Mrs. Edwin Cole, co-chairmen of the Lincoln area, greeted members of the orchestra and the more than 200 guests, Friends, and subscribers who attended.

Members of the Wellesley-Wayland-Weston area will meet Pierre Boulez at a reception Feb. 11 following his concert, and on Feb. 25 the South Shore and Milton group will greet Eugene Istomin at a small reception.

March will see a reception for Jorge Bolet, which Mrs. Samuel A. Levine and Mrs. Robert M.P. Kennard, co-chairmen of the Newton area, are arranging for their members.

On March 29 the Dedham-Dover area is planning a reception for George Lewis.

All area groups will meet April 16 and attend a private concert and reception for Erich Leinsdorf in Symphony Hall.

Friends of the Symphony To Honor Guest Artists

THE SOCIAL SIDE of life plays an important part in furthering worthwhile causes. Plans for a series of receptions for guest artists following the Symphony concerts are announced by the Council of Friends of the Symphony Orchestra. 047

Tomorrow, there will be a reception for Georges Pretre for Friends who are subscribers to the Cambridge series. This has been planned by the chairmen of the Cambridge-Belmont areas, who are Mrs. Edwin Green, Mrs. Charles Coolidge Jr. and Mrs. Herbert Lee. Invited guests will be greeted by Ladies of the Council, including Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., co-chairmen.

A reception was held in honor of Talcott Banks, new president of the Board of Trustees, and Mrs. Banks, at Pierce House in Lincoln, last Sunday. Mrs. Albert C. England Jr. and Mrs. Edwin Cole, co-chairmen of the Lincoln area, greeted members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and more than 200 guests, loyal Friends, and subscribers.

A reception for Pierre Boulez, Feb. 11, will be in charge of the chairmen of the Wellesley, Weston and Wayland areas. On Feb. 25, Eugene Istomin will be guest of honor at a reception in charge of the South Shore and Milton areas.

Mrs. Samuel A. Levine and Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, co-chairmen of the Newton area, will be hostesses at a March 6 reception for Jorge Bolet. George Lewis will be honored at a reception, March 29, given by the Dedham and Dover area.

All members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be invited to the private concert and reception for Erich Leinsdorf, at Symphony Hall, Wednesday afternoon, April 16.

★ ★ ★

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800

DEC 19 1968

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200

DEC 19 1968 New England

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

FEB 10 1969

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Luncheon for Symphony Friends To Have a Valentine Motif

HEARTS AND FLOWERS will transform bleak Horticultural Hall into a Valentine setting, Friday, Feb. 14, for the luncheon for the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be accomplished by the decorating talents of Mrs. Charles F. Hovey and Mrs. John M. Ferry and their committee. Gay pots of geraniums will provide bright table decorations for the third of the pre-concert luncheon series, and will be on sale after the luncheon.

Hostesses from the Boston, Brookline-Chestnut Hill, Dedham and Lexington areas will greet the guests. They will include luncheon co-chairmen Mrs. B. Barton Loomis and Mrs. George A. Parson, and area chairman, Mrs. Allen Joslin, Mrs. Richard R. Higgins, Mrs. James Jackson Jr. and Mrs. Robert Siegfried.

Members of the decorating committee are Mrs. Wells Morss, Mrs. James Currens, Mrs. Herbert Harwood, Mrs. John Knowles, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. George Darrell, Mrs. Thomas Otis, Mrs. J. Linzee Weld, Mrs. A. Osborne Willauer, Mrs. Vcevold Strekalovsky, Mrs. Bruce Currie, Mrs. Louis Mead and Mrs. Sidney Williams.

Other hostesses include Mrs. Guido Perera, Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, Mrs. Walter Cahners, Mrs. Eliot Snider, Mrs. Stephen Harris, Mrs. Philip Dean, Mrs. Talbot Baker, Mrs. Arnold D. Jenkins, Mrs. Daniel Pierce and Mrs. Charles W. Bartlett.

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., co-chairmen of the Council of Friends, remind you that the ticket resale plan in practice for Symphony tickets also applies to tickets for the luncheon series.

Subscribers who wish to release a ticket for an individual luncheon are urged to call Mrs. Kay Whitty at Symphony Hall. They will receive a written acknowledgment for their donation.

Since tickets for the luncheons are in great demand, the resale plan provides an opportunity for those on the waiting list to attend at least one of these popular affairs.

* * *

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

FEB 15 1969 New England

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Pre-Symphony Luncheon Stresses Valentine Motif

HEARTS AND CUPIDS were the Valentine motif at the Pre-Symphony Luncheon at Horticultural Hall yesterday. Pots of red geraniums made gay notes of color on the tables and were sold afterwards for a dollar a piece to add to the fund for the orchestra. This was the third in this season's pleasant series of four luncheons for the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which welcomes new members.

The requirement for membership in the Council of Friends is a contribution to the orchestra. Application blanks may be obtained from Mrs. Frank W. Whitty, executive secretary, at Symphony Hall. You may contribute $5 or $5,000. According to Kay Whitty, there is no minimum. But she hastened to add: "There's no maximum, either."

But don't hesitate to become a Friend if you can't afford to give thousands of dollars to the orchestra. Even small amounts—if there are enough of them—will help. Friends turned out for yesterday's luncheon in spite of traffic conditions. Afterwards, mounted policemen helped them across the sodden snowdrifts to Symphony Hall.

There were many stories of the storm. Mrs. Albert Goodhue, co-chairman of the Council of Friends with Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., was without lights, heat or telephone in Marblehead. Mrs. Thomas D. Perry Jr. was snowed in at her summer place in Stockbridge, but admitted she quite enjoyed it.

Fur coats, mufflers and boots were much in evidence. Mrs. George E. Bates wore knee-high black shiny boots with her leopard coat. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock's dress was Valentine red and her little sparkly hat was a conversation piece. Taking tickets at the door was Mrs. Wells Morss.

The luncheon was under the auspices of the members of the Boston, Brookline-Chestnut Hill, Dedham and Lexington areas, among them Mrs. Stephen Harris, Mrs. Allen Joslin, Mrs. Richard Higgins, Mrs. John H. Knowles, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. Joseph Lund, Mrs. Guido Perera, Mrs. J. Linzee Weld and Mrs. James Jackson Jr.

Mrs. George Lewis came in from Sherborn and Mrs. Edward L. Francis came from Dover. Among others were Mrs. James Hunnewell, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot and Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy Jr.

The next luncheon will take place Friday, April 18. Another series of four luncheons is planned for next season with Mrs. B. Barton Loomis and Mrs. George A. Parson as co-chairmen.

* * *

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

JAN 27 1969 New England

★ ★ ★

HOSPITALITY is ever present in the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra co-chairmanned by Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., who have inaugurated a series of receptions for guest artists following the concerts.

Invitations have gone to Friends who are subscribers to the Cambridge series for a reception in honor of French conductor Georges Pretre on Tuesday. Chairmen of the Cambridge-Belmont areas, Mrs. Edwin Green, Mrs. Charles Coolidge Jr., and Mrs. Herbert Lee arranged this get-together.

Recently, Mr. and Mrs. Talcott Banks (he is the new president of the Board of Trustees) were feted at a reception. Mrs. Albert C. England, Jr., and Mrs. Edwin Cole, co-chairmen of the Lincoln areas welcomed members of the B.S.O. plus about 200 guests, loyal friends and subscribers.

Wellesley-Weston and Wayland areas chairmen will hostess a reception to Pierre Boules, conductor and composer, on Feb. 11. On Feb. 23 Eugene Estomin, pianist will be honored by the South Shore and Milton areas. Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard and Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, co-chairmen of the Newton area will share hostess duties for pianist Jorge Bolet's gathering on March 6. Conductor Henry Lewis will be entertained by the Dedham and Dover areas on March 29.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

FEB 17 1969 New England

ROSE WALSH

BSO Friends Beautify Drab Old Showplace

WITH SOME kind of magic wand which they wield with cheerful energy, members of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra manage to transform drab Horticultural Hall into the loveliest garden settings for their pre-Symphony luncheons. Friday's gay party was done with the thought "Spring's right around the corner," and since it was Valentine's Day, the flowering plants — cyclamens and geraniums — were bursting with shaded pink and heart-red blossoms.

Romance pink and white cyclamens adorned the foyer of the luncheon area where the tables were centered with perky red geraniums resting on shocking pink saucers. Mrs. B. Barton Loomis, co-chairman with Mrs. George A. Parson of the noon day social, topped her pink-buttoned suit with a large brimmed hat.

Hostesses and the ingenious decorating committee were members of the Boston, Brookline-Chestnut Hill, Dedham and Lexington areas. Council co-chairmen, Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., had in their corps of helpers, Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock (complementing her Valentine red dress with a small jewelled hat); Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. John M. Ferry, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. James Hunnewell, Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. Joseph Lund, Mrs. Wells Morss and a great many more.

★ ★ ★

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

FEB 11 1969 New England

★ ★ ★

MRS. CHARLES F. HOVEY and Mrs. John M. Ferry and their committee will transform Horticultural Hall into a hearts and flowers setting for the third of the pre-Symphony rehestra concert luncheons on Friday noon. Council of Friends of the B.S.O. are the sponsors. Gay pots of geraniums will highlight the colorful table decor and will be on sale after the luncheon.

Hostesses for the party are members of the Boston, Brookline-Chestnut Hill, Dedham and Lexington areas. The group will include Mrs. B. Barton Loomis and Mrs. George A. Parson, co-chairmen, assisted by area chairmen, Mrs. Allen Joslin, Mrs. Richard R. Higgins, Mrs. James Jackson, Jr., and Mrs. Robert Siegfried, Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr. are co-chairmen of the Council of Friends.

★ ★ ★

Social News

The Patriot Ledger, Tues., Feb. 18, 1969 Page 15

Hearts and flowers appropriately broke out like banners all over the place on Friday. They decorated the backdrop behind the buffet table at the Pre-Symphony luncheon held in the vast and cavernous Horticultural Hall. They hung from trees and added the prettiest touches to the tables at the Valentine Ball at Sidney Hill Country Club that the Junior Aid Association gave for the benefit of the Newton-Wellesley Hospital, and they graced the Buddy Dog Ball at the Sheraton Boston where more than mere paper hearts were given away to the appealing canines who came to show their intelligence and skills to the ball guests after dinner.

The design on the enormous backdrop at the Pre-Symphony Luncheon had been planned by Mrs. Herbert Harwood of Brookline, who had pasted a series of hearts and flowers and a cupid holding a bird cage in an enchanting pattern. Pink and white azaleas lined the steps leading to the upper level of the old hall, and red tulips stood sentinel around an old Italian statue of a little cupid-style boy.

Pots for red geraniums wrapped in red and pink crepe paper stood on each table, and were eagerly snapped up by the guests after the luncheon, the proceeds going to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Several ladies chose Valentine pink in their hats and dresses. Mrs. Barton Loomis, cochairman of the luncheon series, wore a fuschia pink velvet hat that exactly matched the wrapping on the geraniums, and Mrs. Stephen Harris of Brookline chose a tiny flat pancake-style hat in palest pink velvet.

As always the luncheon was a complete sell-out with Symphony supporters there from all around Boston. Mrs. Howard Hansen and Mrs. Walter Amory were there from Wellesley; Mrs. Harold Davis from Concord; Mrs. Richard Ely from Weston and Mrs. Hollis Gleason from Cohasset.

Also Mrs. Charles Bartlett and Mrs. Vcevold Strekalovsky from Dedham; Mrs. Chauncey Gray from Cambridge; Miss Constance Learned who lives in the Back Bay and who had just returned from a trip to Mexico; and so many others enjoying a delicious lunch of boeuf Bourguignonne, carrots with orange sections and coconut, tossed salad and rice, and helping at the same time to support one of the biggest jewels in Boston's crown, her own illustrious Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

BSO may permit names on seats

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

Boston Symphony may come to the Philadelphia-New York custom of names on seats after all. For a price, of course, that would help the deficit this most prestigious of orchestras is facing. (And so, of course, are its Pennsylvania and New York counterparts.) It will be a sponsor-size donation that, by present planning, would entitle you to the family name on the family chair in Symphony Hall.

There was an excited buzz about it here and there as Symphony's Valentine-color Council of Friends' lunch yesterday went on round rose-red geraniums at Horticultural Hall. There were luscious pink cyclamen, too, and a yummy assortment of Boston's idea gals, like Betsy (Mrs. Albert) Goodhue; Anita (Mrs. Charles) Hovey, in candy pink, and Fran (Mrs. Harris) Fannestock with a red-red rose in small crystals twisted round her dark hair, Chic Marian (Mrs. Stephen) Harris wore pink and Mrs. Barton Loomis had the hat everyone wanted—a fuchsia velvet with a flare that just suited her distinction and matched the small buttons on her sleek suit. She's a co-chairman for these really super luncheons, part of the tremendous effort the council is making to keep Friends of Symphony lists growing. Mrs. Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. are sharing the Council top spot and their time and talent add up to a real Midas touch.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

FEB 15 1969 New England

Launch Telephone Campaign

Symphony Friends Seek New Members

The last two weeks in February are Telephone Time for members of the Belmont Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Under the direction of Mrs. Herbert Lee, chairman, members of the group are phoning local Friends who have overlooked their annual contribution to remind them of the enormous help their support of the orchestra has been in the past, and will be in the future

There is neither maximum nor minimum for the contribution that makes a Symphony subscriber a Friend. The stalwart group of some 6000 raised more than $300,000 last year-good news as musical and operational costs increase because the Ford Foundation contributes $1 for every $3 raised.

New friends will be heartily welcomed and will enjoy the extra-benefit of a closer relationship with the orchestra through invitations to the Friends' annual meeting and concert.

Among the Telephoners alerting Belmont subscribers to this important cause are Mrs. Theodore Ames, Mrs. S. Roy Burroughs, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge Jr., Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., Mrs. Harold L. Hazen, Mrs. August R. Meyer, Mrs. George H. Simonds, Jr., Mrs. Roman Totenberg, and Mrs. Alfred Willmann

HERALD
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,750

FEB 20 1969 New Engl

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800

FEB 27 1969 New England

ROSE WALSH

BSO Friends to Spring Full-Bloom Luncheon

WITH THE energetic help of Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, slow-poke Spring will burst into full bloom at Friday's end-of-the-season Symphony Luncheon in Horticultural Hall. Andover, Cambridge, Concord and Wellesley members are doing a small patio garden in a background of golden forsythia and baskets of pansies.

This artistic setting is the work of Mrs. Jack S. Parker, Mrs. Robert M. Mustard, Mrs. Howard E. Hansen, Mrs. Lawrence H. Boling, Mrs. Paul E. Dodson, Mrs. Frederic S. O'Brien, Mrs. W. S. Malcolm and Mrs. Thatcher Luquer.

Subscribers to the luncheon series chairmanned by Mrs. B. Barton Loomis and Mrs. George A. Parson have been so enthusiastic about them—excellent food and much gaiety—that next season's series is already planned. Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr. are co-chairman of the Council of Friends of the B.S.O.

Friday's hostesses will be Mrs. Frederic Worthen, Mrs. Philip K. Allen, Mrs. James H. Grew, Mrs. C. Baker Clotworthy, Mrs. Edwin Green, Mrs. David E. Gates, Mrs. David Bird, Mrs. John G. Cushman, Mrs. Donald P. Babson, Mrs. Thomas W. Chesterton, Mrs. Robert C. Dean, Mrs. Frederick J. Stare, Mrs. William B. Moses, Jr., Mrs. Howard Davis and Mrs. Donald W. Sinclair.

★ ★ ★

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

APR 14 1969 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

APR 19 1969 New England

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

APR 15 1969 New England

✱ ✱ ✱ ✱

One supposes it was unforeseeable, but why, oh why do two top events have to be not only on the same day but at exactly the same hour?

No doubt Friday is the only day the World Affairs Council could arrange their luncheon in honor of King Hussein of Jordan, for doubtless his visit to Boston is brief. The response has been terrific, which makes all the sadder the fact that the final Pre-Symphony Luncheon sponsored by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on the same day and at the same hour. There are many committed to this brief affair who would have been extremely interested in hearing King Hussein, especially in the light of the tense situation in the Middle East.

The World Affairs luncheon has had to be moved to the Somerset Hotel ballroom from the Sheraton-Plaza Oval Room due to the great response. Gen. James A. Gavin, member of the Advisory Committee for the World Affairs Council, will be chairman of this luncheon, and Patrick Fitzpatrick is chairman of the luncheon series.

Among those to be seated with King Hussein at the head table will be the Rev. Dr. Forrest L. Knapp, general secretary of the Massachusetts Council of Churches; George Seybolt of Dedham, president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce; Archbishop Philip Saliba of the Syrian Antioch Archdiocese of New York and North America; Mrs. Bradford K. Bachrach of Wellesley, vice-president of the World Affairs Council; and Frank Maria, chairman of the Department Near East and Arab Refugee Problems.

Many well-known Bostonians are planning to attend the luncheon. Among them Miss Isabella Grandin of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. William Claflin of Belmont, Miss Amelia Peabody of Dover; Harold D. Hodgkinson of Beacon Hill, Mrs. Margaret Penrose, Mrs. David Little of Salem, Henry Lee of Boston, Alden Hoag, Mrs. Hollis T. Gleason of Cohasset, Dewey D. Stone, Mrs. Edward D. Churchill of Belmont, Mr. and Mrs. S. Abbot Smith of Boston and Manchester, H. Shippen Goodhue of Wellesley and many others.

BSO Friends Invited to Rehearsal

THE 3500 Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have received invitations from the trustees of the orchestra to hear Arthur Fiedler rehearsing the Boston Pops Orchestra, Wednesday morning, April 30, at 11:45, in Symphony Hall. This special program will celebrate the 35th annual meeting of the Friends that will follow with Talcott Banks presiding.

Afterwards, Arthur Fiedler and members of the orchestra will be guests of honor at cocktails and a box luncheon. Each person will be charged $3 to cover the cost of the cocktails and luncheon. Guests should arrive promptly as no one will be seated once the orchestra has begun to play. As there will be no intermission, late-comers will miss the entire rehearsal.

If you have not yet become a Friend of the orchestra, you may do so by sending a contribution to the Friend's office at Symphony Hall by April 25. You will then receive an invitation to the rehearsal. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock and Mrs. Richard H. Thompson are co-chairmen of the annual meeting.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

MAR 29 1969 New England

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Pre-Symphony Luncheons End For Season—New Series Planned

PANSIES BLOSSOMED on the luncheon tables in Horticultural Hall yesterday for the last in this season's series of Pre-Symphony Luncheons. Sprays of golden forsythia and pots of pastel tulips made a springlike setting in the foyer, where there were white iron garden chairs and tables. These luncheons have been so successful and enjoyable that another series is planned for next season for Friday subscribers who are members of the Council of Friends of the Symphony Orchestra.

The warm spring day brought out summer silks. Mrs. George A. Parson and Mrs. B. Barton Loomis, co-chairmen of the luncheons, both wore striped silks. Mrs. Parson's was jade green and black, and Mrs. Loomis's combined red, white and blue and she wore bright red patent leather shoes to match her handbag. She also wore a silk turban of the same colors.

Hats were practically non-existent. However, Mrs. James H. Perkins, the orchestra's only woman trustee, wore a wide-brimmed panama with her jonquil yellow suit, and Mrs. Harold Keller sported a tiny hat with a perky pale pink cockade.

"These luncheons make the Symphony such fun!" Mrs. Perkins exclaimed. Everyone seemed to agree and friends chatted with friends while waiting in line at the long buffet table.

Sitting at a table together were Mr. and Mrs. Talcott Banks, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft and Mr. and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock. Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. are co-chairmen of the Council of Friends.

Their committee includes Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, Mrs. George E. Bates, Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy Jr., Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. Stanford Calderwood, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Mrs. John M. Ferry, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Robert Kistner and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld.

Yesterday's luncheon was under the auspices of the members of the Andover, Cambridge, Concord and Wellesley areas. Hostesses included Mrs. James H. Grew, Mrs. Philip K. Allen, Mrs. C. Baker Clotworthy, Mrs. Frederic Worthen, Mrs. Edwin Green, Mrs. David E. Gates, Mrs. David Bird, Mrs. John G. Cushman, Mrs. Paul Dodson, Mrs. Thatcher Luquer and Mrs. Alfred A. Lane.

Also, Mrs. Howard Hansen, Mrs. Donald P. Babson, Mrs. Thomas W. Chesterton, Mrs. Robert C. Dean, Mrs. Frederick J. Stare, Mrs. Jack S. Parker, Mrs. Robert M. Mustard, Mrs. William B. Moses Jr., Mrs. Howard W. Davis, Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair, Mrs. Lawrence Boling, Mrs. A. A. Haemmerle, Mrs. W. S. Malcolm and Mrs. Albert B. Wolf.

After the luncheon, mounted police escorted the guests across the street to Symphony Hall for the last Friday afternoon concert of the 88th season, which ended with Beethoven's 9th Symphony and Erich Leinsdorf's farewell as a "regular," although he will return as guest conductor next season. On Tuesday evening, April 29, the Pops season will begin.

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

It constantly continues to amaze guests at that perennial favorite, the pre-symphony luncheon, that the clever committee of these affairs can come up with yet another way to decorate that venerable old barn, Horticultural Hall, and make it a delightful bower in which to lunch.

Of all the locations in Boston in which top society events are held Horticultural Hall must surely be the barest and most cavernous. Rising to the height of three stories with bare stone walls it has the feeling of an institution of Victorian times, with walls it has the feeling of an institution of Victorian times, with nary a piece of molding or decoration in sight to soften the bleak lines. From these inauspicious beginnings the ladies of the committee of the pre-spmphony luncheons have four times this season turned the hall into a wonderland gay with flowers and trees for the two short hours of the luncheon.

Friday was the final one of the four and was the responsibility of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Andover, Concord, Cambridge and Wellesley. The beautiful almost summer-like day did much to help the gay effect achieved for guests came dressed in their prettiest spring outfits, and the colors sang against the grey stone walls.

The decorating committee, among them Mrs. Howard Hansen, Mrs. Thomas W. Chesterton, Mrs. Robert C. Dean, Mrs. Jack S. Parker and Mrs. Robert M. Mustard, all of Wellesley, had made a summer garden of the lower level of the hall, complete with trees, white iron chairs and tables, and white urns holding forsythia and blue hyacinths and ivy. Up the wide stone stairway leading to the upper level where the luncheon was served they massed pink cinerarias, pink and white tulips, pots of ivy and other greenery. Slender birch trees stood behind the long buffet table, and on each round table was a white basket holding plants in white, yellow and blue.

Unlike many menus which are served to several hundred people the food at these affairs always resembles the kind that the guests might serve in their own homes. Friday's menu of tiny scallops in cream sauce served on a patty shell, lime and tomato jellied salad, peas and rolls was delicious and one that many of the guests planned to try at home.

In days past most people would not have dreamed of attending symphony without a hat. The occasion was as sacred as church and the same hats were trotted out each week for both occasions. Now, however, even among the older guests, hats are on the wane, and the majority come bare-headed. On Friday most of the hats that were worn were gay and spring-like and a far cry from the Boston lady who, when asked where she bought her hats, said "We have our hats." Mrs. Frederick Stare's spring green one matched her green and white suit, and Mrs. Donald Babson of Wellesley chose a shocking pink silk with her navy suit. Mrs. James Perkins of Westwood, the only woman trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wore a wide brimmed panama, and chairman of the luncheon series, Mrs. B. Barton Loomis, was in a silk beret of red, white and blue that was an exact match of her suit.

Among the hundreds at this last popular luncheon of this series which, it was announced, would be continued next year, were Mrs. Edwin Ohl of Dedham, Mrs. Walter Amory of Wellesley, Mrs. Lewis Cabot of Beacon Hill and Mrs. Louis Cabot of Wenham, Mrs. George Bates of Boston, Mrs. Robert Kistner of Needham and Mrs. Frank Allen of Boston.

✱ ✱ ✱

★ ★ ★

Baskets of large purple, yellow and white pansies centered the tables at Friday's last-of-the-season pre-Symphony luncheons sponsored by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Horticultural Hall. Over 300 subscribers all looking like Spring fashion plates went on to Symphony Hall for the last concert of BSO's 88th season.

Compliments went to members of the Andover, Cambridge, Concord and Wellesley areas who had transformed the Hall into a glowing April garden of tulips, jonquils, forsythia and azaleas. Members of the decorating committee included Mrs. James H. Grew, Mrs. Philip K. Allen, Mrs. C. Baker Clotworthy, Mrs. Frederic Worthen, Mrs. Samuel S. Rogers, Mrs. Frederic O'Brien, Mrs. Edwin Green, Mrs. David B. Gates, Mrs. David Bird, Mrs. John G. Cushman, Mrs. Robert C. Dean, Mrs. Alfred A. Lane, and Mrs. Thomas W. Chesterton.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

APR 21 1969 New England

148.

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Anonymous Friend of Symphony Pledges $25,000 to Orchestra

NEARLY A THOUSAND Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gathered in Symphony Hall yesterday morning for their 35th annual meeting. So intense was their enthusiasm that an anonymous Friend promised to donate $25,000 to their cause—the support and perpetuation of the orchestra. Talcott Banks, president of the trustees, made an impressive plea in behalf of the orchestra, one of the finest in the world.

He stressed the fact that, although it is musically strong, it needs money, as do most other world-famous orchestras, and that "the problems are real and immediate." The Friends, 3571 strong, are urged to do their bit, and more Friends are needed. The days are gone when the Symphony trustees and Board of Overseers said smugly: "We HAVE our members."

As a special feature of the meeting, the Friends were allowed to hear Arthur Fiedler rehearse the Boston Pops Orchestra, in shirt sleeves and turtle necks. He, himself, wore a long-sleeved black shirt as he conducted and tossed his silvery mane. The offering was from Bizet's "Carmen" and the 47 percussion instruments used were guaranteed to keep the audience awake.

Huge golden chrysanthemums were added to the traditional bouquets of salmon pink gladioli on the stage. The audience sat in little gold chairs at small tables, Pops style, and after the meeting and rehearsal, munched on box lunches, picnic style.

Indefatigable Mrs. Harris Fahnestock and Mrs. Richard H. Thompson were co-chairmen of the successful meeting. Mrs. Albert Goodhue, who kept saying: "Isn't this exciting!" and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. are co-chairmen of The Council of Friends.

Among the hostesses yesterday were Mrs. Thomas Perry, Mrs. Roger Voisin, Mrs. Henry Hornblower 2nd, Mrs. David Wilder, Mrs. Hart Leavitt, Mrs. Charles Lyman and Mrs. C. Rodgers Burgin.

Pastels and summery prints were much in evidence. Mrs. James Perkins, the orchestra's only woman trustee, wore a yellow and white ensemble. Yellow was worn by Mrs. George Bates, whose hat was a tiny cluster of flowers. Also in yellow was Mrs. Howard Davis, who caused a friend to exclaim: "You look just like a daffodil."

Mrs. Walter Amory wore white shoes and a white belt with her strawberry pink dress and also in pink with a flowered hat was Mrs. Alfred Willmann. Mrs. Talcott Banks wore a white cartwheel hat with her navy blue costume.

Among others were Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, Mrs. John Knowles, Mrs. George Parson, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, Mrs. B. Barton Loomis, Mrs. James H. Grew, Mrs. Edwin T. Green and Mrs. Nelson Aldrich.

Also, Mrs. Marcien Jenckes, Mrs. Charles E. Bacon, Miss Frances Whedon, the Harold Hodgkinsons, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. Alexander Wheeler, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Lewis Clark, Mrs. Stephen Harris, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. Charles P. Howard, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Earl Grenquist, Mrs. Michael Caliri, Mrs. Laura Benedict, Mrs. Samuel Levine and Mrs. Reginald Foster.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

MAY 1 1969 New England

BSO Friends' munch-in yields $25,000

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

We've been telling you about those Symphony idea-gals like Fran Fahnestock and Betsy Goodhue for so long that you won't be surprised at their first-ever yesterday.

They dreamed up a Fiedler rehearsal and box lunch party that brought out nearly a thousand Friends of Symphony — and a check for $25,000, number one gift for the 90th Anniversary Fund.

Trustees president Talcott Banks gave the girls the accolade for "Symphony's continued existence," and spoke fervently of the long round-the-year disciplines involved for the orchestra in presenting 200 concerts, "best of their kind in the world," hours of study, practice, rehearsal, and tour "extras."

Symphony's regulars, like Mr. and Mrs. Banks, the Perrys, the Fieldlers (pleased the young Debbie has been accepted at Harvard, Berkeley, AND Stanford) trustees Harold Hodgkinson, Philip Allen, Henry Cabot and Edward Taft (who thought of asking the girls to help), have all been spending so many hours in and out of Boston's best-known bailiwick that the BSO is thinking of putting in cots.

It's six million dollars, less yesterday's $25,000, that has to pile up before th eend of 19u0, and that's a serious sum.

Boston is a small city compared to New York or even Philadelphia, Banks reminded his attentive audience. And they have their problems right now, too, even with some support from business firms which the Boston Symphony has never had.

It was a pretty thoughtful picnic party, though the star guests were a treat — the wise and witty men we all watch on stage.

Gen "Bobby" Cutler had a double table of lunch companions and enjoyed them all, Harry Dickson was kept busy filling in Danny Kaye's fans with the latest news, and those who shared sandwiches and little cakes at the familiar green Pops tables "wouldn't have missed it for anything," even with Boston's night-after-night schedule of the past week or so.

They were there by the score, the faithful, like 50-year subscriber Mrs. Eugene Redmond, Allens and Aldriches, two and three generations deep in the BSO, Hoveys and Mixters, Birds, Putnams and Lewises — a remarkable day for a remarkable purpose.

First word about a new-new for Fall The Looking Glass Ball· an Alice-in-Wonderland kind of fantasy as you'd naturally think, and all for the Scholarship and Fellowship Funds of the Learning Disabilities Foundation Inc., which serves perceptually handicapped children Mrs. Edward Kennedy, who is on the board for the Foundation, will be honorary chairman for the ball, and she and the senator expect to be here on Oct. 17 for this big and gala night.

Mrs. Edwin Bacon and Mrs. Frederick Hawkins are co-chairmen, with Ann Sargent's help on reservations, and a committee already wheeling out the ideas includes Mrs. John Nott, Mrs. Chase Kimball, Mrs. Peter Fuller, Mrs. William Ebersol and Mrs. Justin Griess.

Symphony Friend Mrs. Eugene Redmond enjoys box lunch. (John Sheahan Photo)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAY 1 1969 New England

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

SEP 1968

GIFTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently received a $20,000 grant from Sears Roebuck and Company of Boston. It is the fifty-first business firm in the Boston corporate community to contribute to the symphony fund. These gifts now total $419,600 . . . Ed Taylor, president of COMBO II, presented the San Diego Symphony Orchestra Association with a check for $7,500 for its Ford Foundation Matching Fund, which brings to $67,500 the amount COMBO II has contributed to the orchestra. It also received a $50,000 contribution from COMBO I.

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Friends of Boston Symphony Plan Dining and Dancing Fete for '70

YOU'LL BE DINING AND DANCING to the Pops orchestra on April 27, 1970. This Happening was announced yesterday at the annual meeting of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall, and will be one of the "big Dos" planned for next season.

The meeting and luncheon took place in the Huntington Avenue lobby of the Symphony Hall while trucks and buses roared past, punctuated by automobile horns. At the cocktail hour beforehand the cacophony of conversation grew so loud that no one could hear what anyone said. But no one cared. It was all for the cause.

And the cause was the welfare of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. While the Friends ate chicken salad and sandwiches at long tables covered with peacock blue cloths and made more festive by pots of purple ageratum, Mrs. Albert Goodhue presided at the meeting.

She introduced Mrs. Harris Fahnestock as "superb and original," and Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., area chairman, as a "fixed star surrounded by satellites." But the highest accolade went to Mrs. Kay Whitty, secretary, who was called "ne plus ultra" and who had a standing ovation.

Mrs. Howard Davis was praised for the success of the sale of records made by the orchestra, which made a profit of $900 this year. Others making reports were Mrs. John Knowles, Mrs. Josiah Spaulding, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Mrs. Charles Devens, and Mrs. George Parson. She announced that the Symphony Luncheons will be continued next year. There'll be four with a limit of 350 at each one. The first will be on Dec. 5.

There are more than 4,000 Friends of the Symphony and more than 300 are members of the Council of Friends. Talcott Banks, president of the trustees, congratulated the members for their support and made a plea for their continued zeal. And David Rockefeller Jr. gave an informal talk on Tanglewood.

Among those listening were Mrs. James Perkins, the orchestra's only woman trustee, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Mrs. Samuel Levine, Mrs. George Sargent, Mrs. Sherman Thayer, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. Eliot Snider, Mrs. William McCormick, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Alfred Willmann, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Richard Ely and Mrs. Fairfield Raymond.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

MAY 30 1969 New England

PASTE OVER

149.

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
AUG 4 1969

Age doesn't wither com

By JOHN J. MULLINS

BOSTON (AP) — "I'd love to see what's coming. That's why I want to live forever," says Margaret Ruthven Lang, the only person who has been listed in all 35 editions of "Who's Who in America."

The 101-year-old composer lives alone in a second-floor apartment at the Charles River foot of Beacon Hill.

"I'm not doing anything except keep going," she said recently. "I feel well. I'm only perfectly old, that's all. You wouldn't be here if I weren't.

"I don't listen to music anymore. I'd rather read a book. Nothing takes the place of the symphony concert, and that's gone."

CONCERT DEVOTEE

Her reference was to the Boston Symphony and in particular to its Friday afternoon concerts which she attended regularly, going by subway, until this year.

Composer Margaret Ruthven Lang only persons whose nam
"Who's Who in A is condu pa

Music May Help Explain Secret of Long Life

Composer, at 101, Prefers Reading to Music

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
JUL 20 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JUL 20 1969

In a way she'll always have one. On Nov. 24, 1967, three days before her 100th birthday, Miss Lang was honored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Friday concert.

Then-director Erich Leinsdorf waved from the stage toward her first balcony seat, and the orchestra stood and applauded

101, Going On 102—
Composer Margaret Lang Is Only Person Listed in Every "Who's Who"

By JOHN J. MULLINS

BOSTON (AP) — "I'd love to see what's coming. That's why I want to live forever,"

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
JUL 20 1969

—Associated Press Newsfeatures Photo

"I'd love to see what's coming," says Margaret Ruthven Lang at the age of 101. She is the only person whose name has appeared in every "Who's Who in America" published so far. She became known through her composing and is seen here with conductor Erich Leinsdorf at her 100th birthday party in Boston last year.

Honored in 1967

Arthritis, several falls and a doctor's ban against her going out alone, ended her attendance at concerts. But she still subscribes to a seat, gives the ticket away and dreads the thought "of not being alive to have a seat."

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,219,382
AUG 24 1969

Youngstown Vindicator
Youngstown, O.
D. M. 100,792
S. 116,517
AUG 3 - 69

Boston Symphony Lover Is 101—and She Wants to Live Forever

By JOHN J. MULLINS
(Associated Press)

I'd love to see what's coming. That's why I want to live forever," says Margaret Ruthven Lang, the only person who has been listed in all 35 editions of 'Who's Who in America."

The 101-year-old composer lives alone in a second-floor apartment at the foot of Beacon Hill.

"I'm not doing anything except keep going,' she said recently. "I feel well. I'm only perfectly old, that's all. You wouldn't be here if I weren't.

"I DON'T LISTEN to music anymore. I'd rather read a book. Nothing takes the place of the symphony concert, and that's gone."

Her reference was to the Boston Symphony and in particular to its Friday afternoon concerts which she atended regularly, going by subway, until this year.

Arthritis, several falls and a doctor's ban against her going out alone, ended her attendance at concerts. But she still subscribes to a seat, gives the ticket away and dreads the thought "of not being alive to have a seat."

In a way she'll always have one. On Nov. 24, 1967, three days before her 100th birthday, Miss Lang was honored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Friday concert.

Then—director Erich Leinsdorf waved from the stage toward her first balcony seat, and the orchestra stood and applauded her. They played two numbers in her honor—"The Old Hundredth" and Bach's Cantata No. 208.

Henry B. Cabot, then president of the orchestra trustees, donated $2,500 to the symphony in her name. The chair she regularly occupied was dedicated to her, and now has a brass plate attached with her name on it.

Her last musical composition was "The Heavenly Noel," for women's voices, and she said she played it on the piano for a Boston art society, and then, by invitation, in New York.

Asked when this was, Miss Lang replied, "I don't think about my life that way at all. You're talking about facts. I can't tell you in years. Oh, a long, long time ago."

The piece was published in 196 and carries the opus number of 57. But, asked if she had any idea of the number of pieces she composed, she said, "Oh, my soul, no. Of course not. I can't tell you. It's my whole life's work."

MARGARET RUTHVEN LANG, 101, with conductor Erich Leinsdorf at her 100th birthday party.—(AP)

She composed solos, songs, choruses and orchestral works.

"Why did I stop? I had nothing to say."

She said she composed her first piece, a quartet, when she was 13 or 14 to play with three friends on violins. "That was just in the summer," she says. She took up the violin because her friends were studying it, and learned by watching them play.

Later she studied it in Munich, Germany, but not seriously, she said, and she gave up the instrument when she left Munich.

SHE STUDIED PIANO under her father, and she also studied composition in Munich and orchestration.

Miss Lang's was a musical family. She is one of three children and she said everyone played the piano. Her mother also sang, but not professionally.

Her father, Benjamin J. Lang, played and taught the piano, was conductor of three societies in Boston, and played the organ at historic King's Chapel on Tremont Street.

She said her parents knew opera composer Richard Wagner in Germany, and "the other day" she read a letter written by her mother shortly after she was married saying that Wagner had hidden her bonnet so they shouldn't go home from a visit.

Miss Lang said she did not think her music is played any longer—"I've outlived everyone."

"Don't say I 'liked' to compose. I wasn't composing because I liked it but because it was given me to do.

Pinning down details is difficult. "It's my life," she said. "I grew up in its. It wasn't anything to think about at all. It's like eating and breathing, a matter of course."

And, at another point, "My past is as dead, as dead, as dead."

As for living alone in the old brick building in the area where she has spent most of her life, she says, "This is all right for me. I was a solitary person. I'm a solitaire." She gets up at 5 a.m. and goes to bed about 8:30 p.m.

Since the doctor told her she could not go out alone, she has had a nurse at her apartment seven hours a day. With the nurse and using a cane, she walks every day, she says, and attends services at a nearby church.

There is a piano in her living room, but she doesn't play it. In fact, she says it is "not really" a piano because the heat has ruined its strings.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 471,961 SUN. 423,790
JUL 26 1969

Glens Falls Leader Herald
Thursday, July 24, 1969

DAILY TRIBUNE
EL RENO, OKLAHOMA
CIRC. 4,461
DATE: 7-27-69

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 318,020 SUN. 362,408
JUL 25 1969

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, September 28, 1969

Boston Composer at 101 Wants 'to Live Forever'

BOSTON (AP) — "I'd love to see what's coming. That's why I want to live forever," says Margaret Ruthven Lang, the only person who has been listed in all 35 editions of "Who's Who in America."

The 101-year-old composer lives alone in a second-floor apartment at the Charles River foot of Beacon Hill.

"I'm not doing anything except keep going," she said recently. "I feel well. I'm only perfectly old, that's all. You wouldn't be here if I weren't.

"I don't listen to music any more. I'd rather read book. Nothing takes the place of the symphony concert, and that's gone."

Her reference was to the Boston Symphony and in particular to its Friday afternoon concerts which she attended regularly, going by subway, until this year.

Still Subscribes

Arthritis, several falls and a doctor's ban against her going out alone, ended her attendance at concerts. But she still subscribes to a seat, gives the ticket away and dreads the thought "of not being able to have a seat."

In a way she'll always have one. On Nov. 24, 1967, three days before her 100th birthday, Miss Lang was honored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Friher, and no brass plate attached wit

La

Her la was "F en's playe ton inv

abo
You're can't tell y
long, long time ag

The piece was pu
1916 and carries the opus ber of 57. But, asked if she ha any idea of the number of pieces she composed, she said, "Oh, my soul, no. Of course not. I can't tell you. It's my whole life's work."

She composed solos, song
choruses and orchestral wor

"Why did I stop? I had nothi to say."

She said she composed her first piece, a quartet, when she was 13 or 14 to play with three friends on violins. "That was just fine in the summer," she says. She took up the violin because her friends were studying it, and learned by watching them play.

Studied in Munich

Later she studied it in Munich,

Notes From A Life Filled With Music

At 101 Margaret Ruthven Lang remembers composing was like "eating, breathing, a matter of course"

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127
AUG 3 1969

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111
JUL 20 1969

Associated P

Miss Lang at her 100th birthday with conductor Erich Leins

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 133,950
JUL 20 1969

Centenarian Compose

TON, (AP)—"I'd love
e what's coming. That's
I want to live forever," s Margaret Ruthven
ng, the only person who as been listed in all 35 editions of Who's Who in America.

The 101-year-old composer lives alone in a second-floor apartment at the Charles River foot of Beacon Hill.

"I'm not doing anything except keep going," she said recently. "I feel well. I'm only perfectly old, that's all."

"I don't listen to music anymore. I'd rather read a book."

Until this year, she at-

"She composed solos, songs, choruses and orchestral works—'Why did I stop? I had nothing to say.'"

Her last musical composition was "The Heavenly Nole," for women's voices, and she said she played it on the piano for a Boston art society, and then, by invitation, in New York.

She said she composed her first piece, a quartet, when she was 13 or 14 to play with three friends on violins. Miss Lang's father taught piano and played the organ and she said the rest of the family was musical, too.

Miss Lang said she did not think her music is played any longer—"I've outlived everyone." She added, "Don't say I 'liked' to compose. I wasn't composing because I liked it but because it was given me to do."

As for living alone in the old brick building in the area where she has spent

PASTE OVER

149

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
AUG 4 1969

Age doesn't wither com

By JOHN J. MULLINS

BOSTON (AP) — "I'd love to see what's coming. That's why I want to live forever," says Margaret Ruthven Lang, the only person who has been listed in all 35 editions of "Who's Who in America."

The 101-year-old composer lives alone in a second-floor apartment at the Charles River foot of Beacon Hill.

"I'm not doing anything except keep going," she said recently. "I feel well. I'm only perfectly old, that's all. You wouldn't be here if I weren't.

"I don't listen to music anymore. I'd rather read a book. Nothing takes the place of the symphony concert, and that's gone."

CONCERT DEVOTEE

Her reference was to the Boston Symphony and in particular to its Friday afternoon concerts which she attended regularly, going by subway, until this year.

Composer Margaret Ruthven Lang only persons whose nam "Who's Who in A is condu pa just fine in the summer," she says. She took up the violin because her friends were studying it, and learned by watching them play.

Later she studied it in Munich, Germany, but, not seriously, she said, and she gave up the instrument when she left Munich.

She studied piano under her father, and she also studied composition in Munich and orchestration.

Miss Lang's was a musical family. She is one of three children and she said everyo played the piano also san past is dead."

As for living alo brick building in the area she has spent most of her lif she says, "This is all right for me. I was a solitary person. I'm a solitaire." She gets up at 5 a.m. and goes to bed about 8:30 p.m.

Since the doctor told her she could not go out alone, she has had a nurse at her apartment seven hours a day. With nurse and usi play it. In not really' heat has al," she s about self-ad- an indi-secret of longevity? "It's the Lord's doing. I've got to

Music May Help Explain Secret of Long Life

Composer, at 101, Prefers Reading to Music

her. They played two numbers in her honor—"The Old Hundredth" and Bach's Cantata No about my life that way at all. You're talking about facts. I can't tell you in what year. Oh,

She said her pare era composer Rich in Germany, and day" she read a le by her mother shortl was married saying

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
JUL 20 1969

New England Newspa

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JUL 20 1969

New England Newspa

In a way she'll always have one. On Nov. 24, 1967, three days before her 100th birthday, Miss Lang was honored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Friday concert.

Then-director Erich Leinsdorf waved from the stage toward her first balcony seat, and the orchestra stood and applauded

101, Going On 102—
Composer Margaret Lang Is Only Person Listed in Every "Who's Who"

By JOHN J. MULLINS

BOSTON (AP) — "I'd love to see what's coming. That's wh want to live forev aret Rut wh

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
JUL 20 1969

ne Hill.

doing anything ex- going," she said re- feel well. I'm only old, that's all. You wou be here if I weren't.

"I don't listen to music anymore. I'd rather read a book. Nothing takes the place of the symphony concerts ed regularly, subway, until this

Honored in 1967

Arthritis, several falls and a doctor's ban against her going ne, ended her attendance But she still sub- gives the tick- thought a

Miss

e y, che

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,219,382
AUG 24 1969

—Associated Press Newsfeatures Photo

"I'd love to see what's coming," says Margaret Ruthven Lang at the age of 101. She is the only person whose name has appeared in every "Who's Who in America" published so far. She became known through her composing and is seen here with conductor Erich Leinsdorf at her 100th birthday party in Boston last year.

Boston Symphony Lover Is 101—and She Wants to Live Forever

By JOHN J. MULLINS
(Associated Press)

I'd love to see what's coming. That's why I want to live forever," says Margaret Ruthven Lang, the only person who has been listed in all 35 editions of 'Who's Who in America."

The 101-year-old composer lives alone in a second-floor apartment at the foot of Beacon Hill.

"I'm not doing anything except keep going,' she said recently. "I feel well. I'm only perfectly old, that's all. You wouldn't be here if I weren't.

"I DON'T LISTEN to music anymore. I'd rather read a book. Nothing takes the place of the symphony concert, and that's gone."

Her reference was to the Boston Symphony and in particular to its Friday afternoon concerts which she atended regularly, going by subway, until this year.

Arthritis, several falls and a doctor's ban against her going out alone, ended her attendance at concerts. But she still subscribes to a seat, gives the ticket away and dreads the thought "of not being alive to have a seat."

In a way she'll always have one. On Nov. 24, 1967, three days before her 100th birthday, Miss Lang was honored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Friday concert.

Then—director Erich Leinsdorf waved from the stage toward her first balcony seat, and the orchestra stood and applauded her. They played two numbers in her honor—"The Old Hundredth" and Bach's Cantata No. 208.

Henry B. Cabot, then president of the orchestra trustees, donated $2,500 to the symphony in her name. The chair she regularly occupied was dedicated to her, and now has a brass plate attached with her name on it.

Her last musical composition was "The Heavenly Noel," for women's voices, and she said she played it on the piano for a Boston art society, and then, by invitation, in New York.

Asked when this was, Miss Lang replied, "I don't think about my life that way at all. You're talking about facts. I can't tell you in years. Oh, a long, long time ago."

The piece was published in 196 and carries the opus number of 57. But, asked if she had any idea of the number of pieces she composed, she said, "Oh, my soul, no. Of course not. I can't tell you. It's my whole life's work."

MARGARET RUTHVEN LANG, 101, with conductor Erich Leinsdorf at her 100th birthday party.—(AP)

Associated P

Miss Lang at her 100th birthday with conductor Erich Leins

She composed solos, songs, choruses and orchestral works.

"Why did I stop? I had nothing to say."

She said she composed her first piece, a quartet, when she was 13 or 14 to play with three friends on violins. "That was just in the summer," she says. She took up the violin because her friends were studying it, and learned by watching them play.

Later she studied it in Munich, Germany, but not seriously, she said, and she gave up the instrument when she left Munich.

SHE STUDIED PIANO under her father, and she also studied composition in Munich and orchestration.

Miss Lang's was a musical family. She is one of three children and she said everyone played the piano. Her mother also sang, but not professionally.

Her father, Benjamin J. Lang, played and taught the piano, was conductor of three societies in Boston, and played the organ at historic King's Chapel on Tremont Street.

She said her parents knew opera composer Richard Wagner in Germany, and "the other day" she read a letter written by her mother shortly after she was married saying that Wagner had hidden her bonnet so they shouldn't go home from a visit.

Miss Lang said she did not think her music is played any longer—"I've outlived everyone."

"Don't say I 'liked' to compose. I wasn't composing because I liked it but because it was given me to do.

Pinning down details is difficult. "It's my life," she said. "I grew up in its. It wasn't anything to think about at all. It's like eating and breathing, a matter of course."

And, at another point, "My past is as dead, as dead, as dead."

As for living alone in the old brick building in the area where she has spent most of her life, she says, "This is all right for me. I was a solitary person. I'm a solitaire." She gets up at 5 a.m. and goes to bed about 8:30 p.m.

Since the doctor told her she could not go out alone, she has had a nurse at her apartment seven hours a day. With the nurse and using a cane, she walks every day, she says, and attends services at a nearby church.

There is a piano in her living room, but she doesn't play it. In fact, she says it is "not really" a piano because the heat has ruined its strings.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 471,961 SUN. 423,790
JUL 26 1969

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 318,020 SUN. 362,408
JUL 25 1969

Boston Composer at 101 Wants 'to Live Forever'

BOSTON (AP) — "I'd love to see what's coming. That's why I want to live forever," says Margaret Ruthven Lang, the only person who has been listed in all 35 editions of "Who's Who in America."

The 101-year-old composer lives alone in a second-floor apartment at the Charles River foot of Beacon Hill.

"I'm not doing anything except keep going," she said recently. "I feel well. I'm only perfectly old, that's all. You wouldn't be here if I weren't.

"I don't listen to music any more. I'd rather read book. Nothing takes the place of the symphony concert, and that's gone."

Her reference was to the Boston Symphony and in particular to its Friday afternoon concerts which she attended regularly, going by subway, until this year.

Still Subscribes

Arthritis, several falls and a doctor's ban against her going out alone, ended her attendance at concerts. But she still subscribes to a seat, gives the ticket away and dreads the thought "of not being able to have a seat."

In a way she'll always have one. On Nov. 24, 1967, three days before her 100th birthday, Miss Lang was honored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Friher, and no brass plate attached wit

La

Her la was "F en's v playe ton inv

I abo You're can't tell y long, long time a

The piece was pu 1916 and carries the opus ber of 57. But, asked if she ha any idea of the number of pieces she composed, she said, "Oh, my soul, no. Of course not. I can't tell you. It's my whole life's work."

She composed solos, songs choruses and orchestral wor

"Why did I stop? I had nothi to say."

She said she composed her first piece, a quartet, when she was 13 or 14 to play with three friends on violins. "That was just fine in the summer," she says. She took up the violin because her friends were studying it, and learned by watching them play.

Studied in Munich

Later she studied it in Munich,

Notes From A Life Filled With Music

At 101 Margaret Ruthven Lang remembers composing was like "eating, breathing, a matter of course"

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,010 (S) 56,127
AUG 3 1969

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111
JUL 20 1969

Centenarian Compose

TON, (AP)—"I'd love what's coming. That's I want to live forever," s Margaret Ruthven ng, the only person who as been listed in all 35 edi- ions of Who's Who in America.

The 101-year-old composer lives alone in a second-floor apartment at the Charles River foot of Beacon Hill.

"I'm not doing anything except keep going," she said recently. "I feel well. I'm only perfectly old, that's all."

"I don't listen to music anymore. I'd rather read a book."

Until this year, she at-

"She composed solos, songs, choruses and orchestral works—'Why did I stop? I had nothing to say.'"

Her last musical composition was "The Heavenly Nole," for women's voices, and she said she played it on the piano, for a Boston art society, and then, by invitation, in New York.

She said she composed her first piece, a quartet, when she was 13 or 14 to play with three friends on violins. Miss Lang's father taught piano and played the organ and she said the rest of the family was musical, too.

Miss Lang said she did not think her music is played any longer—"I've outlived everyone." She added, "Don't say I 'liked' to compose. I wasn't composing because I liked it but because it was given me to do."

As for living alone in the old brick building in the area where she has spent

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 437,950
JUL 20 1969

Glens Falls Leader Herald
Thursday, July 24, 1969

DAILY TRIBUNE
EL RENO, OKLAHOMA
CIRC. 4,461
DATE:

150

Women's Pages

Society, A-23—A-36
Weddings, A-27
Engagements, A-28, A-29
Fashions, A-31
Confidential Chat, A-35

THEY'RE THERE before the doors open on Friday afternoons. Russell Codman (left) walks from his downtown office to Symphony Hall as his father did before him.

HER GREAT-GREAT-GRANDFATHER was President of the United States, and so was his father, but Abigail Adams Homans still likes to ride to Symphony "up front" with her chauffeur.

Proper Bostonians maintain a tradition

Friday afternoon at the Symphony

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

Even that late and lambent individualist Mrs. Jack Gardner learned to live with it.

The lady with the palace who asked only men to her dinner parties because she thought Boston wives were "too dull," went to Symphony. Not, mind you, because it was "the thing to do," but because she was passionately interested in music and this was the most exciting orchestra of its kind.

So, like the rest of Boston Proper, she too gave up all engagements to be at "the Friday rehearsals." And the wives who clique-claqued against "that woman from New York" bid like mad for the seats right above her favorite first row, left balcony, so they could copy her rageous hats.

These towering confections so completely hid the stage that stern notes appeared in the concert programs requesting those "whose millinery exceeded 10 inches to please refrain from blocking the orchestra from view." Whereupon hats soared, and so did the auction sales for the second balcony.

The Friday afternooners still wear their hats to Symphony, though the seats aren't sold at auction any more.

Maybe President Banks and Treasurer Thorndike should consider reviving those auctions and let those bids soar again, with an eye to the deficit?

In a very changed world, much remains the same at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avs. And elbow to elbow, patrons who've spent a lifetime of Fall and Winter afternoons together still hoard their Symphony seats along with the family portraits and silver. They're often in The Will, and always in demand, and if you are called away or ill, your first duty is to see that the seats are used.

But that pearl above price, the family chauffeur, is fast vanishing, and the once-impotent ring around the hall has. There are only a proud few who fight their way, Cadillac by shiny Cadillac, across from their Horticultural Hall front corner refuge, to find their little old ladies.

The subway, though renamed Symphony, is only for the brave and sure of foot, but a happier answer is the chartered bus, and in front of the peerless purlieus, of the Chilton and the purple-paned windows of the twin Bulfinch houses that are the Women's City Club, the big chromy monsters pant and wait, while the late lunchers tiptoe out warily, feeling a little racy about it all.

The men, and there are quite a few, mostly walk from their downtown offices or their club, even as their fathers did before them. And trustees have the fun of leaving their coats in the side office, an immemorial custom.

There are hundreds of customers who merely murmur their seat location as they shuffle up the hallowed and hollowed marble steps, and if "the regulars" are at the door, a nod of greeting is sufficient.

It's exactly as Francis Lee Higginson visualized it and gave his life to it, in this, its prestigious 88th season, students, dear old girls, and all. And Mr. Higginson has trouble with deficits, too.

FOR THE UNCHAUFFEURED, chartered buses (above) run from such salient luncheon points as the Chilton Club or the Women's City Club. But that vanishing American, the chauffeur (left) is a priceless asset on a slippery Symphony afternoon.

Globe photos by Paul J. Connell

157

Kennedys to bus concert guests

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

If you had any doubt about party-busing being the in-symbol, forget it.

We told you that Joan and Ted Kennedy are giving one of those elegant suppers-at-home at their Virginia house after the Boston Symphony concert at Constitution Hall in Washington March 17.

Well, the invitations are here and with them directions to the Kennedys for those driving, but a discreet note points out that "because of limited parking at Mr. and Mrs. Kennedy's home, it is hoped that many guests will avail themselves of the bus transportation from Constitution Hall. Buses will return at regular intervals after midnight."

Another few pertinent lines remind guests who want tickets for the Washington concert, that "reservations can be accepted only for those invited."

And 10 days later there'll be another BSO — oriented "for those invited" — the long-awaited "Toast to Fiedler" that's taken a year of heart-to-heart planning by the BSO's Harry Ellis Dickson, Cabots and trustees. It'll be Mar. 26 at the Sheraton-Plaza.

★

Cancelled, with an eye to snow problems, is the Cambridge party, for sub--debs at the Continental Hotel this Friday. Still on schedule, the Cambridge Dinner Dance, on Saturday at the same hotel.

It's a snow-or--no date, on Sunday, at Jordan Hall, when the young Israel Chamber Orchestra — conducted by Gary Bertini — will give a concert under the auspices of the America-Israel Cultural Fund (violinist Isaac Stern is president) and the Combined Jewish Philanthropies. Patrons of the concerts are invited to the Berton Steirs for a reception honoring the young visitors after the concert.

★

Moved up from Mar. 21 to Mar. 14 will be the Treasure Sale and Auction of the North Shore Mt. Holyoke Club at the home of Mrs. John Pope in Marblehead. Husbands and guests welcome. A founder's birthday party for the 132-year-old college on July 1 will welcome Dr. David Truman, vice president and provost of Columbia University, as the new president of Mt. Holyoke.

★

They rehearsed in spite of the snow — and they'll open right on schedule, Friday. It's a two-night stand at the New Briscoe Junior High School for the Beverly Hospital Aid's "In Stitches," and lots of credit to the cast and director Calvin Swanson who have a show in spite of storm-curtailed rehearsals. Mrs. Samuel Batchelder and Tom Cooke wrote the songs, and the cast includes Dr. and Mrs. James Hewson, Adm and Mrs. Harry Hull, Dr. A. S. MacDonald, Mayor James Vitale and lots more.

Adding a third conflict to Friday the 14th, with the handsome once-a-year Flower Show preview and the Ball of the International Institute already head-to-head, will be the constituents of the Country Evening Concerts in Weston. Sanroma, longtime favorite of Boston audiences, is playing and there will be a hospitable round of dinners by the Manices, Parkers, Cabots and Bradleys.

★

Definitely a date, even if it's-n-o-w-s is "King Doubletalk" this Saturday at the Chalres Playhouse for Children. The very gala program will benefit the Douglas Thom Clinic, which does such a badly needed job in helping prevent adolescent delinquency.

In Boston alone, one out of every 10 children today is emotionally disturbed.

The performance at the Charles will be at 2 p.m.. If you're a patron and can't be there, please give your tickets to the committee so that a youngster will have a chance to go.

Mrs. Arthur Hilsinger Jr. is president of the board or the Clinic and Mrs. George Stephenson of Brookline is ticket chairman.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAR 6 1969 New England

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357

FEB 4 1969

Kennedys Giving a Party

Sen. Edward M. (Ted) Kennedy is a member of the board of the Boston Symphony. His wife, Joan, is a member of the board of the National Symphony. March 17, needless to say, is St. Patrick's Day. So, those are reasons enough for the Kennedys to be giving a party for Boston Symphony Conductor Erich Leinsdorf after his orchestra plays here as part of the National Symphony series on that night.

HUB CONDUCTOR WELCOMED — Mrs. Edward Kennedy, wearing mini-skirt, talks with Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf during party for friends at the Kennedy home in McLean, Va. Leinsdorf is retiring soon as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

MAR 18 1969

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAR 18 1969

Photos by Ken Feil—The Washington Post

Joan Kennedy offers Boston Symphony Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and Mrs. Leinsdorf (left) some refreshment.

Joan greets Secretary of Transportation John Volpe.

GALLERY

By Dorothy McCardle

There was a poignant backdrop of history at the after-concert reception which Sen. and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy gave at their home in McLean on Monday night.

At first the house was so crowded by the 200 guests who had come from the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall that no one could inspect the gallery of photographs jamming every table and desk in the Kennedy drawing room and library.

As the crowd thinned out Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and his wife, the guests of honor, could see family pictures of John F. Kennedy and Robert F. Kennedy.

One color photograph on an end table beside a golden sofa showed the three Kennedy brothers together, their hair tousled by the wind and their heads thrown back in a gale of laughter.

One very large black and white photograph of Bobby Kennedy in his mountain-climbing outfit bore a handwritten inscription by the late Sen. Robert Kennedy's widow.

It said: "For Teddy who was always there, sharing the challenge and who was by his side for the most exhilarating run of all—and whom he loved so much. Ethel, Christmas, 1968."

Downstairs on the lower level where Joan Kennedy has her office and where guests' coats were hung, there was a different kind of picture gallery. In huge frames were color snapshots of the three young children of the Edward Kennedys.

In Mrs. Kennedy's office where her secretary works at one desk and Joan at another, there are huge framed crayon scrawls done in school by Kara Kennedy, 10, and Edward Jr., 8. Patrick Joseph, almost 2 years old, is too young to have his art works framed yet.

The files in Mrs. Kennedy's office contain a complete indexed record of every treasure in the house, its history and its value. This is Joan's own efficient system which she revealed to guests when they admired the antique Irish silver on display for her St. Patrick's Day reception.

Guests included the new Secretary of Transportation and Mrs. John A. Volpe and the new Under Secretary of State Elliott Richardson. The Richardsons have purchased the Alexander B. Hagner river front home just down the Potomac from the Kennedy home.

Members of the Boston Symphony showed particular interest in the elaborate stereophonic system in the Kennedy library which pipes music all over the house.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357

MAR 19 1969

Kennedys hosts after concert

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

WASHINGTON — Joan Kennedy's short silver dress which opened eyes in Washington and led Mrs. Nixon to shorten her own traditional long dress for the Gridiron wives dinner, sparked glances as blonde Joan and the senator came into Constitution Hall for the Boston Symphony concert last night.

The Kennedys were emphatic about "easy clothes" for the posh supper party they gave at their Virginia house after the concert.

"We really want to make it fun for our friends coming down just for the evening," said Mrs. Kennedy earnestly. "I know how frustrating it is to have to rush from one dress into another and we want everyone to have a relaxing time."

Joan and Ted shared a box in the famous old gold-starred blue hall with Boston's Robert Gardiners and Conductor Leinsdorf's new young wife. Mrs. Gardiner wore a slim lovely silk in a pale grey shade and Mrs. Leinsdorf a white dress.

The orchestra wore quite noticeable Miami pants. Most of them had been fishing while there on location for their concert. They drew lots for the Kennedy supper party as without the garden terraces 200 is the limit for the McLean house parties.

The guest list had to include a good many of the national Symphony friends as well as those from Boston like B.S.O.'s Pres. Talcott Banks and his wife. They sat with National Symphony President Lloyd Symington.

Quite a few John F. Kennedy Arts Center trustees were invited like the Harvey McPhersons, Ralph Becke, Mr. and Mrs. Roger Stevens (he's chairman of the center.), Harold Spivak, who's chairman of the Library of Congress Music Department and a trustee of the center.

Still others: B.S.O. Trustee John Noonan; Symphony Manager and Mrs. Thomas Perry; Berkshire patrons like the John Davidge Jr's.; Paul Callaway; Mrs. Arthur Fiedler and her daughter Debbie reunioning with Johanna Fiedler, wwho is here on the National Symphony staff, Johanna with one of the eye-catching pant suits of the evening; another of these Paris pants favorites worn by Mrs. David Rockefeller Jr., whose husband is development coordinator for the B.S.O.

Lucky draws from the orchestra included Concert Master Joseph Silverstein, viola player Burton Fine, violinist Gerald Gelblour, trombonist Kauko Kahila, and harpist Bernard Zighera.

AT BOSTON'S CONCERT in Washington— Mrs. Arthur Fiedler, wife of Pops orchestra leader, and daughters Deborah and Joanna.

CONCERT ATTIRE—Mini-skirted Joan Kennedy at Washington's Constitution Hall last night. (AP)

152

Portrats Provide Look at the Past

By DOROTHY McCARDLE

WASHINGTON—There was a poignant backdrop of history at the after-concert reception which Sen. and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy gave at their home recently.

At first the house was so crowded by the 200 guests who had come on from the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall that no one could inspect the gallery of photographs jamming every table and desk in the Knnedy drawingroom and library.

As the crowd thinned out, Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and his wife, the guests of honor, could see family pictures of John F. Kennedy and Robert F. Kennedy.

* * *

ONE COLOR PHOTOGRAPH on an end table beside the golden sofa showed the three Kennedy brothers together, their hair tousled in the wind and their heads thrown back in a gale of laughter.

One very large black and white photograph of Bobby Kennedy in his mountain-climbing outfit bore a handwritten inscription by the late Sen. Robert Kennedy's widow.

It said: "For Teddy who was always there, sharing the challenge and who was by his side for the most exhilarating run of all . . . and whom he loved so much. Ethel, Christmas, 1968."

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 348,294 SUN. 406,966

MAR 30 1969

200 Attend Ted Ks' Gala Party to Fete Symphony Director

By ROSE WALSH

WASHINGTON — At their charming, five-acre hospitable home on the edge of the Potomic River in McLean, Va., Sen. and Mrs. Edward Moore Kennedy entertained more than 200 guests after last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Constitution Hall.

Ted and Joan personally and formally welcomed each arrival. Around cheery open fireplaces groups gathered to talk about the evening's fine music and admired the beautiful appointments in the palatial home. "Its not that large," Joan explained," "but the view is so beautiful."

A bar had been set up in the weathered oak beam library. A pen and ink drawing of Sen. Robert Kennedy was flanked with bouquets of tulips and white snap dragons and shannon belles. The portrait carried a message from Ethel Kennedy and read, "For Teddy who was always there ready for the challenge and was by his side for the most exhilarating run of all — and whom he loved so much—Christmas 1968." Signed "Ethel"

The strictly social supper was in honor of Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Leinsdorf.

The gala party followed the first of two Washington, D. C., sold out B. S. O. concerts in Constitution Hall, given by the orchestra during its two-week southeastern tour. In Washington, the concerts were part of the Capitol's National Symphony series, and of course was sold out.

Advance word on the "dress of the evening" was "easy clothes." So tall, blonde Joan Kennedy wore the glittering, silver, mini-skirted dress that startled Washington Society at the recent President and Mrs. Nixon's reception. Senator Ted wore a dark business suit, and dark tie. But there were long gowns, pants-suits and flowing dress culottes, as well as the popular mini-mini-cocktail dresses in the audience.

In the Boston guest list were Sen. and Mrs. Edward Brooke, Transportation Sec. John A. Volpe, and Mrs. Volpe, Mr. and Mrs. Talcott Banks (he is president of the B. S. O. Trustees), David Rockefeller, Development Co-ordinator of B. S. O., and Mrs. Rockefeller, Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, John T. Noonan, B. S. O. trustee and Mrs. Noonan.

Also, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of B. S. O., and Mrs. Perry, Under-Sec. of Defense Thaddeus Beal, J. Carter Brown, Mrs. Arthur Fiedler, whose noted Pops-conductor husband is on tour, and her daughter, Johanna, who is on the staff of the National Symphony Orchestra, and Debbie.

Such noteables as S. Dillon Ripley, of the Smithsonian Institute and Mrs. Ripley attended the concert and supper, Princess Kotchoubey de Beauharnais and Mrs. Jouett Shouse, Mr. and Mrs. Robert C. Alsop, chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends, Mrs. Charles R. Austrian, Richard Bales, curator of music, National Gallery, and Mrs. Bales, Paul Callaway, organist in the National Cathederal.

JFK Center friends included Ambassador and Mrs. Sol Linowitz, Sen. and Mrs. Ralph Yarborough, the Ralph E. Beckers, Mr. and Mrs. Harry C. McPherson, Jr., Roger Stevens, who is Chairman of the JFK and National Council Arts and Humanities, Lloyd Symington, president of B. S. O., and Mrs. Symington.

Since the capacity of dinner guests was limited to 200, only about 20 members of the B. S. O. were able to attend the party. In that group were Harry Ellis Dickson, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Silverstein, Roger Voisin, Burton Fine, Kauko Kahila, Miss Lillian Kallir, soloist at the concert, Jerome Lipson and Bernard Zighera.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

MAR 19 1969

New England

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

MAR 18 1969

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 47,948

MAR 18 1969

Sen. and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy visit backstage with Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf during intermission at Constitution Hall.

AP Wirephoto

Intermission visit

Sen. and Mrs. Ted Kennedy visit with Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf and his wife during intermission tonight in the Boston Orchestra's concert at Washington's Constitution Hall. Mrs. Kennedy stands next to Leinsdorf who is retiring at the end of the season.

OSSINING CITIZEN REGISTER
Wednesday, March 19, 1969

CONCERT ATTIRE — mini-skirted Joan Kennedy walks backstage Monday during intermission in performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Washington's Constitution Hall. Her husband, Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy, is a trustee of the orchestra. — AP Wirephoto.

MOUNT VERNON ARGUS
Wednesday, March 19, 1969

CONCERT ATTIRE — Mini-skirted Joan Kennedy walks backstage last night during intermission in performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Washington's Constitution Hall. Her husband, Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy, is a trustee of the orchestra. — AP Wirephoto.

AP Wirephoto

Concert attire

Mini-skirted Joan Kennedy walks backstage last night during intermission in performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Washington's Constitution Hall. Her hubsand, Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy, is trustee of the orchestra.

153

The Issue Was Briefly Skirted

By DONNIE RADCLIFFE
Star Staff Writer

Not even a tempest in a dressmaker's thimble can come between a son of the auld sod and his wife of the new mod.

And certainly not on St. Patrick's Day when an Irishman without a sense of humor is like a shamrock without built-in luck.

"I'm not saying anything," pleaded Sen. Edward M. Kennedy last night on hemlines in general and his wife's in particular.

But at a party the Kennedys gave in their McLean, Va., home for the Boston Symphony's Erich Leinsdorf, the Massachusetts senator indicated he was quite aware of the sensation his wife created in her silver mini-dress at last week's White House reception.

Mrs. Kennedy was aware of it, too.

"After the other night," she grinned, "I feel I ought to let everything down six inches."

Like the dress she wore to the Nixon reception, last night's dress also was silver. This one, however, was in silver sequined and was "factory-made" in New York.

"It's my conservative dress," she said wryly, glancing down at the hemline which ended rather abruptly about four inches above her knees.

Frankly, she confided, she didn't understand what all the fuss has been about.

"If I'd known that was going to happen, I wouldn't have worn it. I don't do things like that deliberately."

She declined to identify the "little dressmaker" who designed last week's dress. It was not, as some onlookers have speculated, Mme Paul of Georgetown.

"This one is little, I mean REALLY little," the blonde, attractive Mrs. Kennedy giggled.

She said she does wear other colors besides silver, including a green suit which she usually unpacks for St. Patrick's Day.

"Teddy marches in the parade at Boston, but since he didn't this year, I didn't wear the suit."

Mixture

If neither of the Kennedys wore green at their party, there was plenty of it around in food, floral arrangements and wallets.

Guests were a mixture of Boston and Washington socialites, politicians and just plain musicians.

"I didn't know I was coming tonight until this morning when I got on the plane in Miami and someone handed me an invitation," said the Boston Symphony's Bill Waterhouse.

He and about 30 other musicians, some with their wives, were chauffeured to the Kennedy home in four chartered buses, one of which got lost and was 45 minutes late in arriving.

Kennedy, himself, helped several of the musicians find places to store the instruments they had brought from Constitution Hall.

And he was under the impression that all 110 members of the orchestra had been invited to his party.

"That's the reason we're having it," he said, "unless somebody isn't telling me something."

Somebody wasn't.

A secretary to Mrs. Kennedy described the senator as "the most hospitable man in the world who always thinks the house can hold more people than it can."

Obviously it couldn't, she said, so the orchestra's management decided to draw lots for musicians who could attend.

One guest who was neither musician nor Kennedy invitee, the indomitable man, Nathaniel Knight, showed up in his party-crashing best with a peace offering in the shape of a painting.

Kennedy invited him in with the same geniality he showed all his guests, then quickly forgot about him.

Leinsdorf, with his attractive Argentina-born wife of eight months, was as exhilarated by the boos from his Washington audience as he was by their bravos.

"I knew I wasn't playing buttermilk," he said of the Varese number which had aroused concertgoers' dislike so audibly earlier in the evening.

He has been booed before, he said, and when a composer later complained, Leinsdorf said he told him:

"When you write controversial music, you get controversial reaction."

Like Desert Wind

Texas Sen. Ralph Yarborough called the electronic sound effects "intriguing," said the piece reminded him of "a desert wind off the Chihuahuas."

A colleague of Leinsdorf's was not there, but "by orders of the maestro himself," Mrs. Arthur Fiedler and her daughter Deborah came down from Boston for the Kennedy party.

So did Mr. and Mrs. Robert Gardiner, who, with Mrs. Leinsdorf, shared a box with the Kennedys at Constitution Hall. Both Gardiner and Ken-

Continued on Page C-3

Star Photographer Walter Oates

Secretary of Transportation John Volpe is greeted by Mrs. Kennedy at her home.

Short Skirted Issue

Continued From Page C-1

nedy are trustees of the Boston orchestra.

Also here from Boston were the young David Rockefellers, who had meant to go sightseeing yesterday but wound up with a bag lunch picnicking instead in the Tidal Basin.

Young Rockefeller, who is development coordinator of the Boston Symphony, and his wife Sydney live in what she called relative "obscurity" in Boston, unplagued as others of their famous family are by scandal sheets and curiosity seekers.

"Poor Sharon (Mrs. Jay Rockefeller), her life's been miserable," Sydney said.

She wore a white silk crepe pants suit which her father-in-law, head of the Chase Manhattan Bank, gave her for Christmas.

"Actually, David picked them out," she giggled. "When things are too expensive for David, he points them out to his father."

Ex-Bostonians

Former Bostonians in the crowd included Secretary of Transportation and Mrs. John Volpe and Undersecretary of State Elliott Richardson.

"We're neighbors of yours," Richardson, whose wife did not accompany him, told Joan Kennedy. "We've bought a place on Crest Lane."

But inevitably, stem it though she might have tried, talk of the evening usually got back to Mrs. Kennedy and her mini.

"It was very difficult to read the music tonight," a young Israeli violinist told his hostess.

"Really?" she said, her face sobering sympathetically.

"Yes, I kept being blinded up there on the stage by you in that dress."

"Oh, dear," Mrs. Kennedy said, sympathy changing to a creeping blush.

Star Staff

At the Kennedy reception, from left, Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, Mr. Leinsdorf and Mrs. Jouett Shouse.

POST (M)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 467,500
MAR 18 1969
New England

047

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
MAR 23 1969
New England

For Joan Kennedy:

There's a time for entertaining...

Following the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program in Washington's Constitution Hall, Ted and Joan Kennedy entertained its members and guests in their McLean, Va., home.

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

There are showplaces far bigger all up and down the Potomac.

Elaborate terraces are doodled with white iron furniture. The long concrete veranda has a plain iron railing, high, so the children won't get over, and there's one of their little green benches tucked against the house.

The tall trees hold bare, budded branches above it, and through their slim boles there's the gleam and turn of the river.

Light spills out of the house, but there aren't any shiny spotlights. The buses from Washington's Constitution Hall back gently foot by foot down the narrow turn of the driveway, guided by the Fairfax County police, who brought over a couple of red flares to keep the trees from getting scraped.

Joan and Ted Kennedy stand at the open door of their low grey house, their hands held out in welcome.

There's the smell of apple wood burning in the wide fireplaces, and the spicy sweetness of Joan's favorite carnations, little ones in corals and lemon yellow to match the small sofas and plum-cushioned armchairs. There are family photographs everywhere, and the shine of candlelight on old Irish silver.

An epergne holds little green clusters of tiny shamrocks, and a child's bunch of them is pushed into a small silver cup.

There's the fragance of coffee to mingle with opulent perfumes as the mink jackets come off and short-skirted guests turn to the fires in the beautiful house.

"It's really quite small," apologizes Joan earnestly, "except when we can use the outdoors, but we just love it and being by the river stretches our view."

The Senator's office, tucked downstairs, is full of books, Senate memorandum pads, phones, and a couple of colleagues writing speeches for the next day. "It's always this way," Ted grins at them, "I'll bring you down a plate."

Supper is simple, hearty and good, rice and beef burgundy and great bowls of salad and plates of cakes.

Everyone wants to find out where the silvery, weathered, barn siding came from that Ted Kennedy used for his bookshelved den. "Go look on the Cape yourself," he chaffs BSO manager Tom Perry, "You won't find this stuff in the Berkshires," and Tom tells him their small house there is "Eight feet under snow." It's a friendly house.

Ambassadors sit by the fire like schoolboys, eating plates of little iced cakes.

A Washington publisher, tired, grim, picks up a silver-framed picture of a dozen laughing children and three young fathers and holds it in his hand for a long time.

The buses begin their crawl back down the hill. There's a flurry of coats.

ERICH LEINSDORF, B.S.O. conductor, chats with Joan Kennedy.

Mme. Serge Koussevitsky, frail-boned widow of the man who was the Boston Symphony, puts her arms out to Joan and her husband, and bright tears, like diamonds, slip down to her silver lace dress.

A man with the fine sensitive hands of a violinist is next to say goodbye. "I could play it perhaps; the words I have not."

An urbane ex-chief of protocol just kisses Joan and says "thanks," but host and hostess walk with him into the fine, cool night.

The burly bus driver shakes the Senator's hand as though he couldn't stop.

There are hundreds of glittering parties in Washington, but this is the one you remember.

153

The Issue Was Briefly Skirted

By DONNIE RADCLIFFE
Star Staff Writer

Not even a tempest in a dressmaker's thimble can come between a son of the auld sod and his wife of the new mod.

And certainly not on St. Patrick's Day when an Irishman without a sense of humor is like a shamrock without built-in luck.

"I'm not saying anything," pleaded Sen. Edward M. Kennedy last night on hemlines in general and his wife's in particular.

But at a party the Kennedys gave in their McLean, Va., home for the Boston Symphony's Erich Leinsdorf, the Massachusetts senator indicated he was quite aware of the sensation his wife created in her silver mini-dress at last week's White House reception.

Mrs. Kennedy was aware of it, too.

"After the other night," she grinned, "I feel I ought to let everything down six inches."

Like the dress she wore to the Nixon reception, last night's dress also was silver. This one, however, was in silver sequined and was "factory-made" in New York.

"It's my conservative dress," she said wryly, glancing down at the hemline which ended rather abruptly about four inches above her knees.

Frankly, she confided, she didn't understand what all the fuss has been about.

"If I'd known that was going to happen, I wouldn't have worn it. I don't do things like that deliberately."

She declined to identify the "little dressmaker" who designed last week's dress. It was not, as some onlookers have speculated, Mme Paul of Georgetown.

"This one is little, I mean REALLY little," the blonde, attractive Mrs. Kennedy giggled.

She said she does wear other colors besides silver, including a green suit which she usually unpacks for St. Patrick's Day.

"Teddy marches in the parade at Boston, but since he didn't this year, I didn't wear the suit."

Mixture

If neither of the Kennedys wore green at their party, there was plenty of it around in food, floral arrangements and wallets.

Guests were a mixture of Boston and Washington socialites, politicians and just plain musicians.

"I didn't know I was coming tonight until this morning when I got on the plane in Miami and someone handed me an invitation," said the Boston Symphony's Bill Waterhouse.

He and about 30 other musicians, some with their wives, were chauffeured to the Kennedy home in four chartered buses, one of which got lost and was 45 minutes late in arriving.

Kennedy, himself, helped several of the musicians find places to store the instruments they had brought from Constitution Hall.

And he was under the impression that all 110 members of the orchestra had been invited to his party.

"That's the reason we're having it," he said, "unless somebody isn't telling me something."

Somebody wasn't.

A secretary to Mrs. Kennedy described the senator as "the most hospitable man in the world who always thinks the house can hold more people than it can."

Obviously it couldn't, she said, so the orchestra's management decided to draw lots for musicians who could attend.

One guest who was neither musician nor Kennedy invitee, the indomitable man, Nathaniel Knight, showed up in his party-crashing best with a peace offering in the shape of a painting.

Kennedy invited him in with the same geniality he showed all his guests, then quickly forgot about him.

Leinsdorf, with his attractive Argentina-born wife of eight months, was as exhilarated by the boos from his Washington audience as he was by their bravos.

"I knew I wasn't playing buttermilk," he said of the Varese number which had aroused concertgoers' dislike so audibly earlier in the evening.

He has been booed before, he said, and when a composer later complained, Leinsdorf said he told him:

"When you write controversial music, you get controversial reaction."

Like Desert Wind

Texas Sen. Ralph Yarborough called the electronic sound effects "intriguing," said the piece reminded him of "a desert wind off the Chihuahuas."

A colleague of Leinsdorf's was not there, but "by orders of the maestro himself," Mrs. Arthur Fiedler and her daughter Deborah came down from Boston for the Kennedy party.

So did Mr. and Mrs. Robert Gardiner, who, with Mrs. Leinsdorf, shared a box with the Kennedys at Constitution Hall. Both Gardiner and Ken-

Continued on Page C-3

Star Photographer Walter Oates

Secretary of Transportation John Volpe is greeted by Mrs. Kennedy at her home.

Short Skirted Issue

Continued From Page C-1

nedy are trustees of the Boston orchestra.

Also here from Boston were the young David Rockefellers, who had meant to go sightseeing yesterday but wound up with a bag lunch picnicking instead in the Tidal Basin.

Young Rockefeller, who is development coordinator of the Boston Symphony, and his wife Sydney live in what she called relative "obscurity" in Boston, unplagued as others of their famous family are by scandal sheets and curiosity seekers.

"Poor Sharon (Mrs. Jay Rockefeller), her life's been miserable," Sydney said.

She wore a white silk crepe pants suit which her father-in-law, head of the Chase Manhattan Bank, gave her for Christmas.

"Actually, David picked them out," she giggled. "When things are too expensive for David, he points them out to his father."

Ex-Bostonians

Former Bostonians in the crowd included Secretary of Transportation and Mrs. John Volpe and Undersecretary of State Elliott Richardson.

"We're neighbors of yours," Richardson, whose wife did not accompany him, told Joan Kennedy. "We've bought a place on Crest Lane."

But inevitably, stem it though she might have tried, talk of the evening usually got back to Mrs. Kennedy and her mini.

"It was very difficult to read the music tonight," a young Israeli violinist told his hostess.

"Really?" she said, her face sobering sympathetically.

"Yes, I kept being blinded up there on the stage by you in that dress."

"Oh, dear," Mrs. Kennedy said, sympathy changing to a creeping blush.

Star Staff

At the Kennedy reception, from left, Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, Mr. Leinsdorf and Mrs. Jouett Shouse.

POST (M)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 467,500

MAR 18 1969

047

New England

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

MAR 23 1969

New England

For Joan Kennedy:

There's a time for entertaining...

Following the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program in Washington's Constitution Hall, Ted and Joan Kennedy entertained its members and guests in their McLean, Va., home.

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

There are showplaces far bigger all up and down the Potomac.

Elaborate terraces are doodled with white iron furniture. The long concrete veranda has a plain iron railing, high, so the children won't get over, and there's one of their little green benches tucked against the house.

The tall trees hold bare, budded branches above it, and through their slim boles there's the gleam and turn of the river.

Light spills out of the house, but there aren't any shiny spotlights. The buses from Washington's Constitution Hall back gently foot by foot down the narrow turn of the driveway, guided by the Fairfax County police, who brought over a couple of red flares to keep the trees from getting scraped.

Joan and Ted Kennedy stand at the open door of their low grey house, their hands held out in welcome.

There's the smell of apple wood burning in the wide fireplaces, and the spicy sweetness of Joan's favorite carnations, little ones in corals and lemon yellow to match the small sofas and plum-cushioned armchairs. There are family photographs everywhere, and the shine of candlelight on old Irish silver.

An epergne holds little green clusters of tiny shamrocks, and a child's bunch of them is pushed into a small silver cup.

There's the fragance of coffee to mingle with opulent perfumes as the mink jackets come off and short-skirted guests turn to the fires in the beautiful house.

"It's really quite small," apologizes Joan earnestly, "except when we can use the outdoors, but we just love it and being by the river stretches our view."

The Senator's office, tucked downstairs, is full of books, Senate memorandum pads, phones, and a couple of colleagues writing speeches for the next day. "It's always this way," Ted grins at them, "I'll bring you down a plate."

Supper is simple, hearty and good, rice and beef burgundy and great bowls of salad and plates of cakes.

Everyone wants to find out where the silvery, weathered, barn siding came from that Ted Kennedy used for his bookshelved den. "Go look on the Cape yourself," he chaffs BSO manager Tom Perry, "You won't find this stuff in the Berkshires," and Tom tells him their small house there is "Eight feet under snow." It's a friendly house.

Ambassadors sit by the fire like schoolboys, eating plates of little iced cakes.

A Washington publisher, tired, grim, picks up a silver-framed picture of a dozen laughing children and three young fathers and holds it in his hand for a long time.

The buses begin their crawl back down the hill. There's a flurry of coats.

ERICH LEINSDORF, B.S.O. conductor, chats with Joan Kennedy.

Mme. Serge Koussevitsky, frail-boned widow of the man who was the Boston Symphony, puts her arms out to Joan and her husband, and bright tears, like diamonds, slip down to her silver lace dress.

A man with the fine sensitive hands of a violinist is next to say goodbye. "I could play it perhaps; the words I have not."

An urbane ex-chief of protocol just kisses Joan and says "thanks," but host and hostess walk with him into the fine, cool night.

The burly bus driver shakes the Senator's hand as though he couldn't stop.

There are hundreds of glittering parties in Washington, but this is the one you remember.

154.

POST (M)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 467,500
047
MAR 19 1969
New England Newsclip

Photos by Ken Feil—The Washington Post

Joan Kennedy offers Boston Symphony Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and Mrs. Leinsdorf (left) some refreshment.

GALLERY

By Dorothy McCardle

Joan greets Secretary of Transportation John Volpe.

There was a poignant backdrop of history at the after-concert reception which Sen. and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy gave at their home in McLean on Monday night.

At first the house was so crowded by the 200 guests who had come from the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall that no one could inspect the gallery of photographs jamming every table and desk in the Kennedy drawing room and library.

As the crowd thinned out Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and his wife, the guests of honor, could see family pictures of John F. Kennedy and Robert F. Kennedy.

One color photograph on an end table beside a golden sofa showed the three Kennedy brothers together, their hair tousled by the wind and their heads thrown back in a gale of laughter.

One very large black and white photograph of Bobby Kennedy in his mountain-climbing outfit bore a handwritten inscription by the late Sen. Robert Kennedy's widow.

It said: "For Teddy who was always there, sharing the challenge and who was by his side for the most exhilarating run of all—and whom he loved so much. Ethel, Christmas, 1968."

Downstairs on the lower level where Joan Kennedy has her office and where guests' coats were hung, there was a different kind of picture gallery. In huge frames were color snapshots of the three young children of the Edward Kennedys.

In Mrs. Kennedy's office where her secretary works at one desk and Joan at another, there are huge framed crayon scrawls done in school by Kara Kennedy, 10, and Edward Jr., 8. Patrick Joseph, almost 2 years old, is too young to have his art works framed yet.

The files in Mrs. Kennedy's office contain a complete indexed record of every treasure in the house, its history and its value. This is Joan's own efficient system which she revealed to guests when they admired the antique Irish silver on display for her St. Patrick's Day reception.

Guests included the new Secretary of Transportation and Mrs. John A. Volpe and the new Under Secretary of State Elliott Richardson. The Richardsons have purchased the Alexander B. Hagner river front home just down the Potomac from the Kennedy home.

Members of the Boston Symphony showed particular interest in the elaborate stereophonic system in the Kennedy library which pipes music all over the house.

THE MONEY PROBLEM

155

Eugene Cook

Managing Orchestras Is a Fine Art Too

Rising costs hold a special threat for the performing arts, and for their faithful trustees.

by Martin Mayer

Some years back, an imaginary report from an imaginary time-study engineer circulated among musicians and their friends. Its author had been shocked by what he saw at a symphony concert: Sixteen first violins, all doing the same thing, nine double basses just to swing back and forth on the notes of a single chord. Even the woodwinds, which looked as though they had individual functions, often proved on examination to be doubling the notes already being played by the strings. Many players, especially in the brass and percussion sections, were idle most of the evening. Worse yet, much of the music the orchestra played was made up of short repetitive phrases, and sometimes entire sections of a piece were played all over again. It was no wonder, the time-study man wrote, that orchestras lost money. He recommended a program of personnel reduction and musical editing that would improve productivity and enable half as many people to play twice as much music during a two-hour concert.

Anyone concerned about the business end of the performing arts risks a plunge into this pit of incomprehension; there really are people who don't know that art is an economic surplus operation. A professional symphony orchestra that provides a living for a hundred-odd people is among the more luxurious artistic institutions: it can no more pay for itself at the box office than a well-staffed museum can pay its way with admission charges.

There is, however, no reason for its backers to pay for the additional luxury of weak management. As a Rockefeller Panel Report put it in 1965, "Resourceful business and administrative leadership is a necessary element in the successful development of the performing arts." And as a number of orchestras have been discovering in recent years, there is all the difference in the world between an annual deficit of $250,000 and one of $1,250,000. The rising costs that narrow profit margins in business rapidly widen the "income gap" in the performing arts, where it That's George Szell directing the Cleveland Orchestra, which is perhaps the best in the world. This summer it left Cleveland to start an annual festival in this imposing new theatre off the Ohio Turnpike.

FORTUNE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 440,000

SEP 1 1968

NEW PROBLEM

155

is l d both to control expenses and to predict revenues. De te rising attendance and ticket prices over the last five ears, most orchestras are in trouble; and some, espec ly where the business management has been weak, are bad trouble.

A ll for Hercules

T e current crisis of the Chicago Symphony is instructive Its unrestricted endowment shrank from $6,200,000 in t e spring of 1964 to little more than $1 million this spri g—with most of that almost certain to be lost next yea Between 1964 and 1967 the orchestra's annual operating expenses rose about $1,400,000 (to $3,250,000), whi e operating income rose only about $600,000 (to $1,551,000). The 1964 operating deficit of $840,000 was more or less manageable on endowment income, plus a small grant from the city, plus the sort of fund raising that could be done, as an officer of the symphony puts it, "by a small group of men sitting around the Chicago Club." The operating deficit of $1,700,000 in 1967 could be managed only by taking $776,000 out of the orchestra's endowment.

The four-year period was marked by several changes on the executive committee of the volunteer board of trustees that controls the orchestra, and two changes in the top-level paid management. "The administration of the Chicago Symphony," says its present general manager, John S. Edwards, "doesn't resign or get fired. It disappears, like a Central American government." Edwards, a veteran of more than thirty years in orchestra management and until this year president of the American Symphony Orchestra League, came to Chicago in June, 1967, after twelve years in Pittsburgh. George Szell, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra and an old friend, warned him about what he would find, saying, "It's like cleaning the Augean stables." Edwards took the job and told Szell, "We'll just find out whether I'm Hercules."

Two contracts were the proximate cause of the troubles. The more damaging was the contract with the musicians' union, signed in 1965, guaranteeing the orchestra players a longer season every year until they achieved a full fifty-two weeks of pay in 1968-69. (This past season the orchestra still had one week of unpaid leave.) Yearlong employment for musicians was already, clearly, the wave of the future, and the Chicago Symphony management had to bargain under pressure from Mayor Richard J. Daley. But the trustees seem to have signed up without even thinking very hard about finding the added bookings that would justify the added weeks on the payroll.

The second contract was bothersome in a quite different wa In 1965 the symphony's trustees were planning to spe d around $2 million to remodel Orchestra Hall; they wo ld dip into endowment funds but later replenish these wi the proceeds of a special renovation-fund drive. This pl was put aside, however, after the symphony received an fer of support from Mrs. Arma Wyler, heiress to a fo une from a dehydrated-food business. She agreed to pa the costs of remodeling Orchestra Hall; she would pr de $1,950,000—$100,000 of it in 1970, the other $1,-85 00 to be paid after her death. In return for these fu s, the auditorium was to be renamed Silvain and Ar a Wyler Hall, with large gold letters bearing that legen ver the lobby doors.

mbers of the board of trustees, who had apparently bee woolgathering when the contract was originally discus d, were shocked on their arrival for the opening concert of the 1966-67 season to find the large gold letters. They were further shocked by the discovery that, as the contract had been drawn, Mrs. Wyler's legacy could be diminished if an economic downswing should depress the total value of her estate. During the intermission at the opening concert, Louis Sudler, the newly elected president of the board, visited with several influential Chicagoans active in the symphony's affairs. He was strongly urged to get Mrs. Wyler's name off the hall; the fear was that any such prominent recognition of one donor might diminish the enthusiasm of others. Sudler arranged to cancel the contract, but the entire cost of the modernization—it turned out to be close to $3 million—had to be charged against the unrestricted endowment. And there were of course no offsetting funds from any renovation drive.

"When I became a trustee in 1965," Sudler says reflectively, "I didn't—and neither did the board generally—have any sense of impending trouble. Now at least we know what we have to do. We have to double the annual giving, raise endowment, find new markets for our services, and get a profitable recording contract. Meanwhile, we're still trying to get down to the bottom, find our base—the way any corporation in trouble does." Among the shocks Sudler has had to absorb was the revelation that several profit items—e.g., from past recording contracts—were illusory. The 1966-67 statement of income and expenses carried an income item of about $60,000 from "recording royalties, etc."; the 1967-68 statement shows a $132,000 "net cost" of recordings.

How to get by in the summer

Though nobody else has got into quite such hot water as Chicago, all the major orchestras face problems of the same kind. ("Major," as the term is used in the symphony field, refers to organizations whose annual budget is over $500,000. There are now thirty of them.) All the "Big Five" orchestras—New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Cleveland—have or soon will have year-round employment contracts, and at least a dozen others have contracts for thirty-five weeks or more; meanwhile their local subscription series, the foundation of any such enterprise, run twenty weeks or less. Baltimore, for example, under the contract expiring this year, must maintain its orchestra thirty-six weeks although its subscription series covers only sixteen Wednesday night concerts (eight of which can be paired with a repeat of the same program on Thursday night).

Faced with these longer-term contracts, all of the Big Five have naturally worked hard to nail down as much "summer business" as they can. Chicago is blessed by the separately managed and financed Ravinia Festival just north of the city, which buys the orchestra's services for eight weeks every summer. The Philadelphia Orchestra has the long-established Robin Hood Dell Concerts in July and the newer Saratoga Festival in August. Boston has its famous and flourishing Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in the summer. The New York Philharmonic has created a May-June series of Promenade concerts, found four corporate and government sponsors for free concerts in the parks, and organized extended tours (last year across Canada, sponsored by the Canadian Government as part of the centennial celebration; this summer to Europe, helped by $150,000 from T.W.A. and $200,000 from the State Department). And the Cleveland Orchestra has invested almost $7 million ("Twice what I would have told you it was going to cost if you had asked me a year

FORTUNE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 440,000

SEP 1 1968

THE MONEY PROBLEM

155

Eugene Cook

is hard both to control expe
Despite rising attendance a five years, most orchestras a pecially where the business are in bad trouble.

A call for Hercules

The current crisis of the Ch tice. Its unrestricted endowme in the spring of 1964 to little mo spring—with most of that almost year. Between 1964 and 1967 the ope erating expenses rose about $1,400,00 while operating income rose only abou 551,000). The 1964 operating deficit of or less manageable on endowment inc grant from the city, plus the sort of could be done, as an officer of the
"by a small group of men sitting ar Club." The operating deficit of $1,700 be managed only by taking $776,000 tra's endowment.

The four-year period was marked on the executive committee of the v trustees that controls the orchestra, a the top-level paid management. "The the Chicago Symphony," says its pre ager, John S. Edwards, "doesn't resign appears, like a Central American gover a veteran of more than thirty years in ment and until this year president of t phony Orchestra League, came to Chic after twelve years in Pittsburgh. Geor of the Cleveland Orchestra and an old f about what he would find, saying, "It Augean stables." Edwards took the
"We'll just find out whether I'm Hercu

Two contracts were the proximate ca
The more damaging was the contract union, signed in 1965, guaranteeing th a longer season every year until they a two weeks of pay in 1968-69. (This chestra still had one week of unpaid employment for musicians was already of the future, and the Chicago Symp had to bargain under pressure from Daley. But the trustees seem to have even thinking very hard about that would justify the added
The second contract was way. In 1965 the symph spend around $2 million would dip into endowme with the proceeds of a s plan was put aside, how an offer of support fro fortune from a dehyd pa the costs of rem provide $1,950,000—85 ,000 to be paid a funds, the auditoriu
Arena Wyler Hall, wit en over the lobby do
Members of the b been woolgathering
cussed, were shocked o

FORTUNE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 440,000

SEP 1 1968

156.

Talented Partners in Talented Performances

The "chief operating officers" of most symphony orchestras are their paid managers, and the "chief executive officers" are the volunteer presidents and chairmen, usually drawn from the business community.

The managers are a varied, and very special, group. John S. Edwards, fifty-six, who has been running orchestra affairs since the mid-1930's, was hired away in 1967 from the Pittsburgh Symphony by the Chicago Symphony; he liked the salary offered (believed to be about $40,000) and also liked the challenge presented by Chicago—which President Louis Sudler made no effort to understate. A. Beverly Barksdale, fifty-four, took a master's degree in music in Louisiana, taught a year in Emporia, Kansas, then spent seventeen years building up a music program at the Toledo Art Museum before he was recruited in 1957 to be manager in Cleveland. New York's Carlos Moseley, fifty-three, was an aspiring concert pianist (he played a Brahms concerto under the baton of Leonard Bernstein at Tanglewood when they were both students), later served five years as professor of music and director of the School of Music at the University of Oklahoma, arriving at the Philharmonic in 1955. Richard Cisek, thirty-nine, Minneapolis' managing director, hung around the offices of the Buffalo Philharmonic while he was an economics student at Canisius College. He went on to the Wharton School, wrote a master's thesis on the marketing of symphonic music, and worked his way up in the Minneapolis organization from a beginning in public relations.

Seattle's Alan Watrous, sixty-two (not shown below), taught music and conducted in public schools before becoming director of recreational music for Boeing in Wichita during World War II, and was one of a group of teachers and amateurs who decided in 1944 that the city ought to have an orchestra. He wound up assistant concertmaster and manager, and in the process learned how to run an orchestra. After giving the Wichita Symphony a firm foundation, he yielded to offers from Dallas in 1957, then two years ago was lured to Seattle.

Most of the presidents and chairmen carry their heavy administrative burdens joyously, because they care about music. New York's Chairman David Keiser, sixty-two, president of North American Sugar Industries, is a good enough pianist to have played with the Philharmonic. Frank E. Joseph, sixty-four, president of the Cleveland Orchestra, is a Cleveland native, a corporation lawyer, and the husband of a pianist who is also president of the Cleveland Institute of Music. Sudler of Chicago is a professional singer as well as a real-estate developer. He holds a card in the American Guild of Musical Artists, and when the steelwork was topped out at the hundred-story John Hancock Center, which his firm manages, Sudler sang the Star-Spangled Banner to climax the celebration. He still accepts engagements to sing in oratorios, even though the symphony's crisis (see accompanying article) took no less than four-fifths of his time in 1966-67.

Judson Bemis of Bemis Co. says that his presidential duties with the Minneapolis Symphony can be accomplished in about 20 percent of his time—"because we don't have any honorary vice presidents, they're all functional." Bemis, fifty-five, is not a musician himself, however. "I'm fond of music," he explained recently, "but I took this job because it seemed to me a business job, not just a musical job."

In Philadelphia, C. Wanton Balis Jr., sixty-one (not shown below), runs a major re-insurance firm with his left hand while his right hand controls the Philadelphia Orchestra. He says it takes about half his time: "It's a three-ring circus—the musical director, the business manager and office staff, 106 musicians and their union. Then there's the Academy of Music, which we own, and a large, broad-spectrum board which has to be kept active."

Carlos Moseley Managing Director

David Keiser Chairman

The New York Philharmonic

Richard Cisek Managing Director

Judson Bemis President

The Minneapolis Symphony

John S. Edwards General Manager

Louis Sudler President

The Chicago Symphony

A. Beverly Barksdale Manager

Frank E. Joseph President

The Cleveland Orchestra

ing the same program one more time are obviously small, and the orchestra can often hope to build a constituency that will contribute money and political support.

Baltimore has dug itself out of what once looked like a hopeless deficit situation largely by concentration on runouts, which now account for forty-one of the orchestra's evening engagements (as against only thirty-six, including pops concerts, in the city's own Lyric Theatre). Twelve separately organized symphony societies have been established to sponsor the series of three to five concerts in towns around Baltimore. "Our judgment," says the orchestra's young general manager, Oleg Lobanov, "is that a fair price for outside concerts, in the halls where we play them, is $2.50 per adult per concert. We take the risks and the net after expenses." The price suggests a money-losing operation, but the resulting statewide support for the symphony makes possible an annual legislative grant of $125,000—and the new societies are already producing contributors to the annual maintenance drive. Pittsburgh's unprofitable runouts to small towns in the western half of the state are underwritten by Columbia Gas of Pennsylvania.

A boost from a brew

Perhaps the most envied of the middling-large orchestras is Seattle's, whose $1,200,000 budget is handsomely supported in several different ways. Nearly 5,900 subscriptions are sold for twelve pairs of concerts—"giving us," says manager Alan Watrous, "the nation's sixth-largest subscription audience, in the nineteenth-largest city"—and the orchestra plays in seventeen other cities in the state, fourteen of them under the sponsorship of each city's own, independent Seattle Symphony Society. In addition, Olympia Brewing supports a low-priced series in Seattle itself that offers younger and less wealthy audiences the chance to hear the same programs that the subscription audiences will hear, with young artists substituted for the big names who help sell the subscriptions for the more expensive series. Of the orchestra's 163 performances in 1967–68, about three-fifths were for school audiences; these too are well supported. "We get some money from Title III [of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act]," says Watrous airily, not talking about the work that must have gone into the litany, "some city, some county, some school system, some that the children pay for themselves, some from the union's Music Performance Trust Fund . . ."

Seattle has certain advantages other orchestras do not enjoy. It has only seventy-five men under annual contract, beefing up as needed for specific programs. Moreover, because the separately financed and managed local opera company employs the same musicians, the union permits the orchestra to pay its personnel a separate fee for each service rather than a weekly salary, thus relieving the pressure to find employment for the symphony in dry seasons. Seattle's conductor Milton Katims, as Watrous puts it, "relates beautifully to the community." In 1967 the Real Estate Board chose Katims as Seattle's Citizen of the Year.

Several other success stories argue that the soil for symphony can be found anywhere, given the right gardeners. Good management has helped give Cleveland what is probably the world's finest symphony orchestra (European musicians think it is, though Americans tend to be provincially fearful about praising their own); it has put Minneapolis in a position where it is likely to add a sixth name to the Big Five; it has given Salt Lake City, with a population of around 500,000, one of the dozen best orchestras in the country; it has enabled Detroit, for the first time in its long and mostly

continued page 153

156.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ago," says General Manager A. Beverly Barksdale) in the physical plant of the Blossom Music Center, which in mid-July began providing off-season concerts and a summer music school in a wooded setting near the Ohio Turnpike between Cleveland and Akron. "Blossom," says Barksdale, "does have a little bit of pure idealism in it—it bothers me and some others that during our season we play in a small elegant hall, and reach so few people." But its major purpose, the justification of the financial risk, is to find employment for the nation's largest orchestra—108 men and women who must be paid all year round.

Years ago the answer to an employment contract longer than the local season was the tour, which in theory was artistically stimulating for the men (who got a chance to play before fresh and enthusiastic audiences in fresh and acoustically different halls) and financially profitable for the orchestra. But in the last decade or so, rising costs of transportation and accommodations have made it necessary to book an orchestra for six concerts a week on tour, which often means six moves a week, which is hell on men and management. Carlos Moseley, managing director of the New York Philharmonic, still remembers clearly a week in its 1959 tour of Europe when the orchestra played Monday in Paris, Tuesday in Basel, Wednesday in Munich, Thursday in Belgrade, Friday in Zagreb, and Saturday in Venice—and taped a C.B.S. television show at the close of the Venice concert. And whatever artistic enchantment distance may lend is quickly dissipated by the need to play parts of one program—usually a relatively popular program—over and over again.

And even at such forced draft, a tour can be financially debilitating. Costing out its most recent cross-country tour, the New York Philharmonic found that receipts would have to be $18,750 a night for the orchestra to break even. These figures were indeed met, thanks to the audience appeal of Leonard Bernstein and bookings in big outdoor amphitheatres like the Hollywood Bowl and Denver's Red Rocks. The Philadelphia Orchestra asks a fee of $12,500 a night on the road, but is unable to break even on that. Orchestras of the quality of Detroit and Los Angeles played last year for as little as $3,500 a night to fill out a week's schedule while on tour. The Minneapolis Symphony—punished at the traveling box office by the absence of its regular conductor, who was ill—actually went out of pocket $10,000 on its eastern tour last winter, without counting any of the payroll or overhead costs of the orchestra.

The perils of four-a-week

Expansion of the regular home market is obviously what the orchestras need, but making this policy is much easier than executing it. Quality considerations dictate a limit both in the size of the hall and in the number of performances in a week. A full-time union orchestra contracts to give eight (sometimes nine) "services" a week, usually two and a half hours each. About half of these services may be devoted to performances and the other half to full orchestra rehearsals. Except for pops concerts, or with the reduced standards of summer festivals, orchestral programs of professional quality cannot be prepared in a single rehearsal; if anything of even moderate difficulty is billed, up to four rehearsals may be required for each program. And artistic quality suffers if a program is repeated too often. Even if the union will go along, it's hard to play more than four performances a week.

An orchestra on any such schedule will have trouble expanding its market. The great majority of regula ason tickets are marketed on a subscription basis, e.g., ome-one planning to come every Thursday evening f our-teen weeks. Since an orchestra cannot play the sa piece twice for the same audience in the same season, fo separate audiences are required every week. And a lon eason will usually mean more than one subscription pe d and more than four separate audiences. Very few pe e love symphony concerts enough to want to go every we —and a long subscription series may cost $200 or mo for a pair of tickets. Short series sell out these days muc faster than long series; the resistance is apt to be e ecially severe for periods of more than twenty weeks.

The New York Philharmonic has a thirty-two-week subscription season (the nation's longest) at Lincoln Center; it can play more or less the same program there four times a week and sell out every night. But the Philharmonic plays for the nation's most sophisticated and affluent audience. No other city could sell as many tickets as New York does for a fourteen-week series at $105 for a seat in the orchestra. Also, New York has been unusually imaginative in devising subscription combinations; at present there are twelve covering different time spans.

Mrs. Tiffany's husband hates music

Any expansion of the home season, then, begins with an effort to market the product in and around the home territory. Unfortunately, the demand for the product is uneven and variously motivated; it is affected not only by pure musical interest, but by ethnic backgrounds, education (in its medicinal "good-for-you" sense), and social status. "In a lot of families," says Carl Shaver, a former vice president of Grand Union now in business for himself as a management consultant and fund raiser for orchestras, "the symphony has been like a religion—it's put in the wife's name. And it's suspect to a lot of husbands, like the household checking account." Most of the older orchestras play a regular weekday-afternoon subscription series for an almost exclusively feminine audience, which spends the morning shopping and the afternoon listening. Wher he was conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopol Stokowski objected strenuously to these "ladies with bun dles," and an effort was made to switch the orchestra' afternoon series in New York to a series of evening con certs. Arthur Judson, then manager of the Philadelphi Orchestra, kept framed on his wall for some years there after a letter the management received when this switc was originally announced: "Mrs. Tiffany regrets that sh cannot take her tickets for an evening series, becau e sh cannot go out alone in the evening and her hu ban hates music."

The economics of symphony orchestras are h vi affected by "women's committees"—volunteers wh se subscriptions, raise funds, and arrange educational e nt lunches, teas, parties, and an annual "orchestra ball" h is in many places a prime social occasion. A num subscriptions are sold entirely on the social importa the annual opening night, for which everybody dres u No orchestra that benefits by such events wants i losing them (in Boston and Philadelphia the chari raises more than $150,000 a year), but some tho f board members wonder whether the identification t orchestra with high society may not be counterpro Frank P. Thomas of Indianapolis, whose Burge h Systems has made substantial corporate contribut s that city's orchestra ("When you're in the hami continued p

Managing Orch
Is a Fine Art To joint business," he exp

American Symphony C something to improve y full-dress opening night ilies: "Wives see that c
'This place is not for me

Many orchestras mak people not already know mittees. Shaver says tha worked for an orchestra directors of all publicly h symphony subscription quarter of the compani approached." Income is ferior techniques for me

In some cities—India
New York, Phoenix, Sea
been drawn to symphon
"cultural centers." (See t
For reasons nobody fully have ordinarily been pron ership rather than by hig elegance seems to attrac previously reached by th
major growth situation, in the orchestra's last ye 123,900 in its first year at attendance cannot improv capacity than the old one ticket prices and income.

Many orchestras have organizations or even indi audience. John Edwards h phony's year-round contra long orchestra-in-residenc versities; the universities, for ticket sales. Detroit others, the University of
A few years ago a Negro
Detroit orchestra to launc in its congregation; the ductor regularly for school has also sold a concert to convention. The Rocheste lunch-time concerts a year
Cleveland Orchestra plays country clubs; Phoenix pla vation Army.

The case for running

To date, however, the season has been to expan
"home." In what is called a suburb or nearby city to in its own hall, and everybo own bed. Runout series hav
the Chicago Symphony, Ta its own city for Cleveland,
Los Angeles, Rochester an the West, where the buses f arranged to cities as much doubt about their profitabi

156

e great majority of regular-season on a subscription basis, e.g., to some-e every Thursday evening for four-on orchestra cannot play the same piece audience in the same season, four sepaare required every week. And a long season more than one subscription period and four separate audiences. Very few people love concerts enough to want to go every week—and subscription series may cost $200 or more for a tickets. Short series sell out these days much faster series; the resistance is apt to be especially for periods of more than twenty weeks.

New York Philharmonic has a thirty-two-week season (the nation's longest) at Lincoln Cencan play more or less the same program there four week and sell out every night. But the Philharplays for the nation's most sophisticated and affludience. No other city could sell as many tickets as York does for a fourteen-week series at $105 for a the orchestra. Also, New York has been unusually native in devising subscription combinations; at t there are twelve covering different time spans.

Tiffany's husband hates music expansion of the home season, then, begins with an to market the product in and around the home ter-

. Unfortunately, the demand for the product is un-and variously motivated; it is affected not only by musical interest, but by ethnic backgrounds, educa(in its medicinal "good-for-you" sense), and social
s. "In a lot of families," says Carl Shaver, a former president of Grand Union now in business for himself management consultant and fund raiser for orches-
"the symphony has been like a religion—it's put in wife's name. And it's suspect to a lot of husbands, like household checking account." Most of the older orchesplay a regular weekday-afternoon subscription series an almost exclusively feminine audience, which spends morning shopping and the afternoon listening. When was conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold kowski objected strenuously to these "ladies with bun s," and an effort was made to switch the orchestra' ernoon series in New York to a series of evening con
ts. Arthur Judson, then manager of the Philadelphi chestra, kept framed on his wall for some years there r a letter the management received when this switc s originally announced: "Mrs. Tiffany regrets that sh not take her tickets for an evening series, because sh not go out alone in the evening and her husban es music."

The economics of symphony orchestras are heavi ected by "women's committees"—volunteers who se scriptions, raise funds, and arrange educational event ches, teas, parties, and an annual "orchestra ball" th n many places a prime social occasion. A number scriptions are sold entirely on the social importance annual opening night, for which everybody dresses u orchestra that benefits by such events wants to i ing them (in Boston and Philadelphia the charity ises more than $150,000 a year), but some though aid members wonder whether the identification o chestra with high society may not be counterproduc ank P. Thomas of Indianapolis, whose Burger stems has made substantial corporate contribution at city's orchestra ("When you're in the hambur

continued pag

Managing Orchestras Is a Fine Art Too

continued from page 108

joint business," he explained amiably to a meeting of the American Symphony Orchestra League, "you have to do something to improve your image"), argues that the annual full-dress opening night depresses sales to middle-class families: "Wives see that opening night on TV and they say, 'This place is not for me—I'd be uncomfortable there.'"

Many orchestras make little effort to sell subscriptions to people not already known to members of the women's committees. Shaver says that in one of the cities where he has worked for an orchestra he made a list of the officers and directors of all publicly held corporations and found that the symphony subscription list included names from only one-quarter of the companies. "The others hadn't even been approached." Income is also lost, Shaver feels, through "inferior techniques for merchandising single tickets."

In some cities—Indianapolis, Los Angeles, Milwaukee, New York, Phoenix, Seattle, St. Louis—new audiences have been drawn to symphony concerts by new auditoriums and "cultural centers." (See the portfolio beginning on page 109.) For reasons nobody fully understands, the cultural centers have ordinarily been promoted by political and business leadership rather than by high society, and their socially neutral elegance seems to attract sections of the middle class not previously reached by the arts. In Los Angeles, to take one major growth situation, paid admissions went from 76,700 in the orchestra's last year at Philharmonic Auditorium to 123,900 in its first year at the new Music Center. Even where attendance cannot improve, because the new hall has no more capacity than the old one, a new hall permits a large rise in ticket prices and income.

Many orchestras have a tradition of selling concerts to organizations or even individuals, who then supply their own audience. John Edwards hopes to bail out the Chicago Symphony's year-round contract eventually by establishing week-long orchestra-in-residence arrangements at midwestern universities; the universities, not the symphony, are responsible for ticket sales. Detroit gives annual concerts for, among others, the University of Detroit and the Lutheran Church. A few years ago a Negro church bought the services of the Detroit orchestra to launch the career of a young conductor in its congregation; the orchestra now employs the conductor regularly for school concerts in the inner city. Detroit has also sold a concert to the Master Brewers Association convention. The Rochester Philharmonic sells Kodak eight lunch-time concerts a year, in the company's auditorium; the Cleveland Orchestra plays three concerts in tents at local country clubs; Phoenix plays an annual benefit for the Salvation Army.

The case for running out

To date, however, the easiest way to expand the home season has been to expand the geographical definition of "home." In what is called a "runout," the orchestra invades a suburb or nearby city to play the program it has just given in its own hall, and everybody then goes home to sleep in his own bed. Runout series have been arranged to Milwaukee for the Chicago Symphony, Tacoma for Seattle, the west end of its own city for Cleveland, Santa Barbara and San Diego for Los Angeles, Rochester and St. Joseph for Minneapolis. In the West, where the buses fly over flat roads, runouts may be arranged to cities as much as 200 miles away. There is no doubt about their profitability. The added costs of performing the same program one more time are obviously small, and the orchestra can often hope to build a constituency that will contribute money and political support.

Baltimore has dug itself out of what once looked like a hopeless deficit situation largely by concentration on runouts, which now account for forty-one of the orchestra's evening engagements (as against only thirty-six, including pops concerts, in the city's own Lyric Theatre). Twelve separately organized symphony societies have been established to sponsor the series of three to five concerts in towns around Baltimore. "Our judgment," says the orchestra's young general manager, Oleg Lobanov, "is that a fair price for outside concerts, in the halls where we play them, is $2.50 per adult per concert. We take the risks and the net after expenses." The price suggests a money-losing operation, but the resulting statewide support for the symphony makes possible an annual legislative grant of $125,000—and the new societies are already producing contributors to the annual maintenance drive. Pittsburgh's unprofitable runouts to small towns in the western half of the state are underwritten by Columbia Gas of Pennsylvania.

A boost from a brew

Perhaps the most envied of the middling-large orchestras is Seattle's, whose $1,200,000 budget is handsomely supported in several different ways. Nearly 5,900 subscriptions are sold for twelve pairs of concerts—"giving us," says manager Alan Watrous, "the nation's sixth-largest subscription audience, in the nineteenth-largest city"—and the orchestra plays in seventeen other cities in the state, fourteen of them under the sponsorship of each city's own, independent Seattle Symphony Society. In addition, Olympia Brewing supports a low-priced series in Seattle itself that offers younger and less wealthy audiences the chance to hear the same programs that the subscription audiences will hear, with young artists substituted for the big names who help sell the subscriptions for the more expensive series. Of the orchestra's 163 performances in 1967–68, about three-fifths were for school audiences; these too are well supported. "We get some money from Title III [of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act]," says Watrous airily, not talking about the work that must have gone into the litany, "some city, some county, some school system, some that the children pay for themselves, some from the union's Music Performance Trust Fund . . ."

Seattle has certain advantages other orchestras do not enjoy. It has only seventy-five men under annual contract, beefing up as needed for specific programs. Moreover, because the separately financed and managed local opera company employs the same musicians, the union permits the orchestra to pay its personnel a separate fee for each service rather than a weekly salary, thus relieving the pressure to find employment for the symphony in dry seasons. Seattle's conductor Milton Katims, as Watrous puts it, "relates beautifully to the community." In 1967 the Real Estate Board chose Katims as Seattle's Citizen of the Year.

Several other success stories argue that the soil for symphony can be found anywhere, given the right gardeners. Good management has helped give Cleveland what is probably the world's finest symphony orchestra (European musicians think it is, though Americans tend to be provincially fearful about praising their own); it has put Minneapolis in a position where it is likely to add a sixth name to the Big Five; it has given Salt Lake City, with a population of around 500,000, one of the dozen best orchestras in the country; it has enabled Detroit, for the first time in its long and mostly

continued page 153

→

Increased Wages and Benefits for Symphony Musicians

(The present article on the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra is the twelfth in a series of articles dealing with the development of major symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada and increased wage scales and benefits for their members that have been negotiated between A. F. of M. locals and orchestra managements.)

The present-day Pittsburgh Symphony, under the musical direction of William Steinberg, is considered to be in the first rank of major symphony orchestras in the United States. It is an organization with two distinct histories. The first functioned from 1896 to 1910; the second phase began in 1926 and involves many great musicians of this era and thousands of devoted citizens who keep the organization operating with their generous financial support.

In 1896 when Pittsburgh was just starting to emerge as an industrial giant, two dozen civic leaders, sparked by George Westinghouse, founder of the Westinghouse Electric Corporation, guaranteed the first full season of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Frederick Archer. Industrialist Andrew Carnegie provided a magnificent concert hall which still exists today.

In 1898 Victor Herbert became conductor of the orchestra, adding zest and color to the Pittsburgh scene. He composed many of his famous operettas during his six-year tenure.

When Herbert left Pittsburgh in 1904, Emil Paur took over the reins of the orchestra. Despite his international reputation and his greatest efforts, he had the misfortune of conducting an orchestra which continued to decline musically until 1910, when it dissolved.

For sixteen years, Pittsburgh was without an orchestra. In 1926 a group of professional musicians decided that a symphony orchestra was needed. This modest beginning was marked by rehearsals in obscure fraternal lodge halls, by begging and borrowing musical scores, and by tenaciously seeking the support of Pittsburghers who could afford to underwrite a symphony orchestra.

William Steinberg

Elias Breeskin, who served at the helm of the reorganized orchestra for four years, was succeeded in 1930 by Antonio Modarelli, who held the conductorial post for the next seven years. By that time, the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra was a veteran group of able musicians that had established itself solidly in the community, had been instrumental in breaking state "blue laws" that prohibited sale of concert tickets on Sundays and was ready for recognition in the music world.

Otto Klemperer, then with the Los Angeles Philharmonic, was called to Pittsburgh to institute the orchestra on a major plane. In the wake of Klemperer came Fritz Reiner to lend his dynamic personality and renowned reputation to the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. Reiner's tenure lasted until 1948. Then for the next four years the orchestra played under a veritable "Who's Who" listing of some of the world's greatest conductors.

In 1952 William Steinberg was appointed music director of the now 101 member discouraging musical history, to come up with a wholly first-rate orchestra. These wonders have been worked by leadership—mostly by the musical leadership and audience appeal of a conductor, but always with help from intelligent management and well-planned community support.

Managing Orchestras Is a Fine Art Too continued

"Everybody is the manager's boss"

The term "management," as it is applied by symphony orchestras, ordinarily refers to two quite different kinds of people: paid professional administrators, who usually have the title "manager"; and unpaid voluntary chairmen or presidents of boards of trustees, who are usually well-connected local businessmen or lawyers.

The manager's post carries great responsibility and relatively little authority. "Everybody in town is the manager's boss," says Helen Thompson, who has run the American Symphony Orchestra League for most of its twenty-six years. "Everybody who buys a ticket or gives five dollars. The minute a man comes on the board he's an expert in what you should do, and if he isn't, his wife is."

Managers are usually consulted by conductors about programs and soloists. They must handle negotiations with various unions and with the agents for the soloists. They must schedule rehearsals, concerts, and runouts with due regard for the teaching and other professional obligations that are often (especially in smaller orchestras) the musicians' main source of income. Any number of details must be dealt with exactly, from the floral decorations at the women's committee lunch to the arrival of rented scores in time for the musicians to learn unfamiliar works. There are the people who want to change their seats for next season's subscription series and there are the Birchites opposed to paying good American money for Communist soloists. At all the larger orchestras the administration of payrolls is a complex chore: although they operate under a union contract and at a union wage scale, the orchestras pay most of the men (93 out of 106 in New York) some amount individually negotiated over scale.

The volunteer presidents from business and the professions carry different kinds of burdens. Their first responsibility is, of course, to raise whatever money is needed to cover the deficit. In palmier days, when seasons ran twenty weeks and the men took jobs at hotels for the summers, individuals could sponsor an orchestra as a hobby. A Henry Lee Higginson in Boston, a William Andrews Clark Jr. in Los Angeles, an Elbert Lawrence Carpenter in Minneapolis would simply write a check for whatever was necessary at the end of the season. Some of this tradition survives, especially in the smaller cities, where the income-and-expense statement of the orchestra balances exactly because at its last meeting the board passes the hat. But at the larger orchestras the deficits today go beyond what individuals are likely to contribute every year. C. Wanton Balis, president of the Philadelphia Orchestra, estimates that by 1971 it will have an annual "income gap" of a million dollars. Los Angeles is there already; and Chicago is beyond.

It was in expectation of mounting deficits, and of a time lag before the orchestras could learn to cope with them, that the Ford Foundation in 1966 granted sixty-one of the nation's orchestras a total of $80,200,000. About three-quarters of the grant was marked for endowment purposes, and was contingent on the success of the orchestras in raising an equal amount (the largest orchestras had to raise twice as much as the $2 million Ford offered) through their own endowment drives. The rest was for development purposes—e.g., to help develop runout programs in places like Baltimore, Phoenix, and Seattle—and to guarantee that during the endowment drives the orchestras would not also have to increase their annual maintenance appeals. In most of the larger cities the Ford grant has stimulated drives to exceed the required matching funds: Minneapolis has already raised more than $6 million of a projected $8 million to put with Ford's $2 million, and Chicago, Philadelphia, and Boston have similarly ambitious intentions.

But unfortunately for the fiscal health of the orchestras, the magnitude of the new figures floating about has stimulated substantial extra demands from the musicians' union, which has in any event, like many other unions, lost control over its membership. The difference between an endowment fund and operating income is by no means too subtle a matter to be understood by a violinist—but he can pretend it is.

Corporate harmony

Increasingly, in recent years, the orchestras have looked to corporations for support. The model in this area, which nobody has been able to copy exactly, is John B. Ford's reorganization of the Detroit Symphony's finances following a horrendous collapse shortly after World War II. Ford went to thirty local companies and asked them each for $10,000 a year—nobody was allowed to contribute more. Today the maximum is not enforced (several companies contribute $30,000), and last year twenty-six Detroit corporations together put up about $400,000 for the orchestra, which was about 60 percent of the maintenance drive.

Orchestral fund raisers solicit corporations and local governments with arguments of self-interest. Boston and the San Francisco Bay area have demonstrated that an active cultural life helps companies recruit top-level people. In an ad offering a job for a physicist, Honeywell not long ago used a picture of Minneapolis conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski. Last spring's West Coast tour by the Utah Symphony was underwritten by the State Industrial Commission, because a previous appearance by the orchestra in New York had stimulated inquiries from business.

Ultimately, a good chunk of the support of symphony orchestras may have to come from tax revenues. It could come in the form of grants, or as payment for services in the form of school concerts and free outdoor concerts, or as a share of contributions to a richer "public television." But for the time being, the burden rests on individuals. Some meet it enthusiastically, in the spirits of Philadelphia's Balis: "The reason for doing all this work is when you sit in the hall and listen—these people are so damned good." Others work more in the pragmatic spirit of an argument that Chicago's Hercules, John Edwards, threw at a rather shocked audience of members of the American Symphony Orchestra League: "Do any of you really believe that a city really needs a symphony orchestra? I mean need—N-E-E-D—a symphony orchestra, in the way that a community needs other things, like social services, bread for the children, and all that sort of thing. The answer is no. If you ask whether a city would be better off or worse off without a symphony, the answer is different: it would be worse off."

Given careful management—and perhaps just a few glamorous new conductors—some such calculations should continue, at least for a while, to provide a strong enough foundation for the nation's orchestras. But in many cities it is going to be a very close call. END

Increased Wages and Benefits for Symphony Musicians

(The present article on the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra is the twelfth in a series of articles dealing with the development of major symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada and increased wage scales and benefits for their members that have been negotiated between A. F. of M. locals and orchestra managements.)

The present-day Pittsburgh Symphony, under the musical direction of William Steinberg, is considered to be in the first rank of major symphony orchestras in the United States. It is an organization with two distinct histories. The first functioned from 1896 to 1910; the second phase began in 1926 and involves many great musicians of this era and thousands of devoted citizens who keep the organization operating with their generous financial support.

In 1896 when Pittsburgh was just starting to emerge as an industrial giant, two dozen civic leaders, sparked by George Westinghouse, founder of the Westinghouse Electric Corporation, guaranteed the first full season of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Frederick Archer. Industrialist Andrew Carnegie provided a magnificent concert hall which still exists today.

In 1898 Victor Herbert became conductor of the orchestra, adding zest and color to the Pittsburgh scene. He composed many of his famous operettas during his six-year tenure.

When Herbert left Pittsburgh in 1904, Emil Paur took over the reins of the orchestra. Despite his international reputation and his greatest efforts, he had the misfortune of conducting an orchestra which continued to decline musically until 1910, when it dissolved.

For sixteen years, Pittsburgh was without an orchestra. In 1926 a group of professional musicians decided that a symphony orchestra was needed. This modest beginning was marked by rehearsals in obscure fraternal lodge halls, by begging and borrowing musical scores, and by tenaciously seeking the support of Pittsburghers who could afford to underwrite a symphony orchestra.

William Steinberg

Elias Breeskin, who served at the helm of the reorganized orchestra for four years, was succeeded in 1930 by Antonio Modarelli, who held the conductorial post for the next seven years. By that time, the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra was a veteran group of able musicians that had established itself solidly in the community, had been instrumental in breaking state "blue laws" that prohibited sale of concert tickets on Sundays and was ready for recognition in the music world.

Otto Klemperer, then with the Los Angeles Philharmonic, was called to Pittsburgh to institute the orchestra on a major plane. In the wake of Klemperer came Fritz Reiner to lend his dynamic personality and renowned reputation to the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. Reiner's tenure lasted until 1948. Then for the next four years the orchestra played under a veritable "Who's Who" listing of some of the world's greatest conductors.

In 1952 William Steinberg was appointed music director of the now 101 member

Managing Orchestras Is a Fine Art Too continued

discouraging musical history, to come up with a wholly first-rate orchestra. These wonders have been worked by leadership—mostly by the musical leadership and audience appeal of a conductor, but always with help from intelligent management and well-planned community support.

"Everybody is the manager's boss"

The term "management," as it is applied by symphony orchestras, ordinarily refers to two quite different kinds of people: paid professional administrators, who usually have the title "manager"; and unpaid voluntary chairmen or presidents of boards of trustees, who are usually well-connected local businessmen or lawyers.

The manager's post carries great responsibility and relatively little authority. "Everybody in town is the manager's boss," says Helen Thompson, who has run the American Symphony Orchestra League for most of its twenty-six years. "Everybody who buys a ticket or gives five dollars. The minute a man comes on the board he's an expert in what you should do, and if he isn't, his wife is."

Managers are usually consulted by conductors about programs and soloists. They must handle negotiations with various unions and with the agents for the soloists. They must schedule rehearsals, concerts, and runouts with due regard for the teaching and other professional obligations that are often (especially in smaller orchestras) the musicians' main source of income. Any number of details must be dealt with exactly, from the floral decorations at the women's committee lunch to the arrival of rented scores in time for the musicians to learn unfamiliar works. There are the people who want to change their seats for next season's subscription series and there are the Birchites opposed to paying good American money for Communist soloists. At all the larger orchestras the administration of payrolls is a complex chore: although they operate under a union contract and at a union wage scale, the orchestras pay most of the men (93 out of 106 in New York) some amount individually negotiated over scale.

The volunteer presidents from business and the professions carry different kinds of burdens. Their first responsibility is, of course, to raise whatever money is needed to cover the deficit. In palmier days, when seasons ran twenty weeks and the men took jobs at hotels for the summers, individuals could sponsor an orchestra as a hobby. A Henry Lee Higginson in Boston, a William Andrews Clark Jr. in Los Angeles, an Elbert Lawrence Carpenter in Minneapolis would simply write a check for whatever was necessary at the end of the season. Some of this tradition survives, especially in the smaller cities, where the income-and-expense statement of the orchestra balances exactly because at its last meeting the board passes the hat. But at the larger orchestras the deficits today go beyond what individuals are likely to contribute every year. C. Wanton Balis, president of the Philadelphia Orchestra, estimates that by 1971 it will have an annual "income gap" of a million dollars. Los Angeles is there already; and Chicago is beyond.

It was in expectation of mounting deficits, and of a time lag before the orchestras could learn to cope with them, that the Ford Foundation in 1966 granted sixty-one of the nation's orchestras a total of $80,200,000. About three-quarters of the grant was marked for endowment purposes, and was contingent on the success of the orchestras in raising an equal amount (the largest orchestras had to raise twice as much as the $2 million Ford offered) through their own endowment drives. The rest was for development purposes—e.g., to help develop runout programs in places like Baltimore, Phoenix, and Seattle—and to guarantee that during the endowment drives the orchestras would not also have to increase their annual maintenance appeals. In most of the larger cities the Ford grant has stimulated drives to exceed the required matching funds: Minneapolis has already raised more than $6 million of a projected $8 million to put with Ford's $2 million, and Chicago, Philadelphia, and Boston have similarly ambitious intentions.

But unfortunately for the fiscal health of the orchestras, the magnitude of the new figures floating about has stimulated substantial extra demands from the musicians' union, which has in any event, like many other unions, lost control over its membership. The difference between an endowment fund and operating income is by no means too subtle a matter to be understood by a violinist—but he can pretend it is.

Corporate harmony

Increasingly, in recent years, the orchestras have looked to corporations for support. The model in this area, which nobody has been able to copy exactly, is John B. Ford's reorganization of the Detroit Symphony's finances following a horrendous collapse shortly after World War II. Ford went to thirty local companies and asked them each for $10,000 a year—nobody was allowed to contribute more. Today the maximum is not enforced (several companies contribute $30,000), and last year twenty-six Detroit corporations together put up about $400,000 for the orchestra, which was about 60 percent of the maintenance drive.

Orchestral fund raisers solicit corporations and local governments with arguments of self-interest. Boston and the San Francisco Bay area have demonstrated that an active cultural life helps companies recruit top-level people. In an ad offering a job for a physicist, Honeywell not long ago used a picture of Minneapolis conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski. Last spring's West Coast tour by the Utah Symphony was underwritten by the State Industrial Commission, because a previous appearance by the orchestra in New York had stimulated inquiries from business.

Ultimately, a good chunk of the support of symphony orchestras may have to come from tax revenues. It could come in the form of grants, or as payment for services in the form of school concerts and free outdoor concerts, or as a share of contributions to a richer "public television." But for the time being, the burden rests on individuals. Some meet it enthusiastically, in the spirits of Philadelphia's Balis: "The reason for doing all this work is when you sit in the hall and listen—these people are so damned good." Others work more in the pragmatic spirit of an argument that Chicago's Hercules, John Edwards, threw at a rather shocked audience of members of the American Symphony Orchestra League: "Do any of you really believe that a city really needs a symphony orchestra? I mean need—N-E-E-D—a symphony orchestra, in the way that a community needs other things, like social services, bread for the children, and all that sort of thing. The answer is no. If you ask whether a city would be better off or worse off without a symphony, the answer is different: it would be worse off."

Given careful management—and perhaps just a few glamorous new conductors—some such calculations should continue, at least for a while, to provide a strong enough foundation for the nation's orchestras. But in many cities it is going to be a very close call. END

158

INCREASED WAGES AND BENEFITS FOR SYMPHONY MUSICIANS

Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra on a permanent basis. Since that time the orchestra has achieved international fame and stature. He has molded the ensemble into a musical instrument of precision and depth, and has persisted season after season in offering adventuresome and widely varied programs in music.

German born and trained, Steinberg helped found the Palestine Symphony Orchestra (now the Israel Philharmonic) in 1936. Two years later he came to the United States at the behest of Arturo Toscanini to help create and train the NBC Symphony Orchestra. In a short time he was engaged as a regular conductor of the San Francisco Opera and as guest of many of the major orchestras of this country. Before being summoned to Pittsburgh, Steinberg was conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic for seven years.

In the "Steel Capital" he found an orchestra with a skimpy budget of $400,000, a season of twenty-six weeks and little support for a community of its size. Having gone without a permanent conductor for four years, the morale of the orchestra members was low; performances inconsistent. However, within just a few seasons, experience, confidence and the pleasure of making music turned these players into excellent musicians. Steinberg takes great pains to let his men share in the sense of accomplishment that many conductors reserve for themselves.

Steinberg is also a vigorous fund raiser and public relations man. As a result the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra today enjoys a forty-four week season, a budget of nearly $2,000,000 and broad financial backing. The orchestra's season includes twenty-four weeks of subscription concerts in Pittsburgh and over forty concerts for young people.

In 1964, the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra was chosen by the Cultural Presentations Office of the State Department to re-establish the exchange of symphonic ensembles with Western European and Middle Eastern countries. In the course of three months and 25,000 miles, the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra played forty-two concerts in Greece, Lebanon, Iran, Switzerland, Scotland, Luxemburg, West Germany, Poland, Yugoslavia, Italy, France, Spain, Portugal and Iceland. All states east of the Mississippi River have been visited on frequent occasions and, in the spring of 1966, the orchestra made its first trip to the west coast, including appearances in San Francisco, Los Angeles, San Diego, Phoenix and Salt Lake City. The orchestra has also spent some time in Mexico and has made several jaunts to cities in the eastern part of Canada. Annual visits to New York's Carnegie Hall are now part of the orches- regular three-concert subscription series.

Naturally an orchestra will always lose some men who retire or accept other positions. But the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra has a reputation for low turnover, which is an important sign of a stable organization. That reputation derives from the harmonious, sensible and altogether amiable accord that guides the orchestra's destinies. Annual turnover of its personnel used to run between twenty-five and forty; this has been cut to a low and probably irreducible loss of seven to ten members each year.

Relations with Local 60-471 of the city have also been excellent. The signing of a three-year contract on June 10, 1966, is a remarkable example of mature and enlightened leadership and understanding of the situation on the part of union officials and symphony management. The agreement provided for an increase of $30.00 in the minimum wage scale spread over the covered period. At the same time, the concert season was gradually increased from thirty weeks during the 1965-66 season to forty-four weeks during its present season, with two weeks of paid vacation. Additional points of the contract include raises in rates for overtime and travel per diem. The pension plan for musicians is contributory and is also funded by benefits sponsored by the society using contracted services. Blue Cross, Blue Shield and the Major Medical program is paid in full by the society for each orchestra member.

Orchestras face the same overriding problem as business and industry—the problem of rising costs. The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra is no exception to this situation; its expenditures have more than doubled in the past ten years. Even so, there is little doubt as the contract comes up for renewal next year and as the pressure grows stronger for increased compensation to its personnel, that the musicians will fare well, for Pittsburgh realizes that the orchestra constitutes a vital cultural asset to the community.

When it was made known that Steinberg had been appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a three-year period beginning with the 1969-70 season, there was considerable conjecture in Pittsburgh and nationally as to Steinberg's future relations with the orchestra in the "Steel Capital." When questioned about a rumor that he might be leaving Pittsburgh for another directorial post, Steinberg himself gave the clue to his present situation. "We are too closely wed, the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra and I, to contemplate any divorce. I have spent sixteen years educating these men to share my own feeling of responsibility to the composers, to the audience and to the orchestra, and with the sense of ensemble we have developed together, the spirit and flexibility, I think it would be inconceivable for me to leave this orchestra." Later, in a move unprecedented in its history and perhaps unprecedented in the annuals of American symphony orchestras, it was announced that the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra had signed Steinberg to an unlimited contract as music director.

Musically one can expect good things to be plentiful in Pittsburgh this season. Steinberg will conduct sixteen of the twenty-four Friday-Sunday concerts of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra's forty-second subscription season. The remaining concerts will be conducted by Eugene Ormandy, Rafael Kubelik, Aaron Copland and associate conductor Henry Mazer. An array of leading soloists have also been engaged for the season.

—A. F. W.

THEY'RE THERE before the doors open on Friday afternoons. Russell Codman (left) walks from his downtown office to Symphony Hall as his father did before him.

HER GREAT-GREAT-GRANDFATHER was President of the United States, and so was his father, but Abigail Adams Homans still likes to ride to Symphony "up front" with her chauffeur.

Proper Bostonians maintain a tradition

Friday afternoon at the Symphony

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

Even that late and lambent individualist Mrs. Jack Gardner learned to live with it.

The lady with the palace who asked only men to her dinner parties because she thought Boston wives were "too dull," went to Symphony. Not, mind you, because it was "the thing to do," but because she was passionately interested in music and this was the most exciting orchestra of its kind.

So, like the rest of Boston Proper, she too gave up all engagements to be at "the Friday rehearsals." And the wives who clique-claqued against "that woman from New York" bid like mad for the seats right above her favorite first row, left balcony, so they could copy her rageous hats.

These towering confections so completely hid the stage that stern notes appeared in the concert programs requesting those "whose millinery exceeded 10 inches to please refrain from blocking the orchestra from view." Whereupon hats soared, and so did the auction sales for the second balcony.

The Friday afternooners still wear their hats to Symphony, though the seats aren't sold at auction any more.

Maybe President Banks and Treasurer Thorndike should consider reviving those auctions and let those bids soar again, with an eye to the deficit?

In a very changed world, much remains the same at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avs. And elbow to elbow, patrons who've spent a lifetime of Fall and Winter afternoons together still hoard their Symphony seats along with the family portraits and silver. They're often in The Will, and always in demand, and if you are called away or ill, your first duty is to see that the seats are used.

But that pearl above price, the family chauffeur, is fast vanishing, and the once-impotent ring around the hall has. There are only a proud few who fight their way, Cadillac by shiny Cadillac, across from their Horticultural Hall front corner refuge, to find their little old ladies.

The subway, though renamed Symphony, is only for the brave and sure of foot, but a happier answer is the chartered bus, and in front of the peerless purlieus, of the Chilton and the purple-paned windows of the twin Bulfinch houses that are the Women's City Club, the big chromy monsters pant and wait, while the late lunchers tiptoe out warily, feeling a little racy about it all.

The men, and there are quite a few, mostly walk from their downtown offices or their club, even as their fathers did before them. And trustees have the fun of leaving their coats in the side office, an immemorial custom.

There are hundreds of customers who merely murmur their seat location as they shuffle up the hallowed and hollowed marble steps, and if "the regulars" are at the door, a nod of greeting is sufficient.

It's exactly as Francis Lee Higginson visualized it and gave his life to it, in this, its prestigious 88th season, students, dear old girls, and all. And Mr. Higginson has trouble with deficits, too.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

FEB 16 1969

New England

159

In Boston, Money Makes the Music Go 'Round

How "lively" are the "lively arts" in Greater Boston? Are they flourishing—or famishing? Are they thriving—or just surviving? To get the answers, Globe critics have taken a hard look at their specialties, have talked to the city's cultural leaders, and have carefully weighed the area's artistic assets and liabilities. Kevin Kelly writes on the theater, Margo Miller on dance, Edgar J. Driscoll on art. Today, Michael Steinberg writes on music. This is the second of a five-part series on "The Boston Arts: Dead or Alive?"

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The Boston music scene, as the 1968-69 season gets under way, is all question marks:

- When is Boston going to get an opera house?
- What is to be the future of the Boston Symphony, which has a new president and is about to get a new music director?
- What is going on at the New England Conservatory?
- Can the revitalized Handel and Haydn Society and the new Philharmonia Orchestra make a musical contribution to this area?
- Is someone going to think of a way to get Greater Boston industry to pull its weight in supporting Boston musical institutions?

The money problem is what most answers hinge on.

The industrial and business support of the arts in Boston is at about half the national average. Polaroid Corp. of Cambridge, for example, has made its major contribution in the arts not to the Boston Symphony—but to the New York Philharmonic.

Music is expensive. It can't pay its own way. It is a money-spending operation, not a money-earning one.

Take the opera—Boston doesn't have a place where opera and ballet can be properly mounted. This may be the price the city pays for having two superb concert halls, Symphony and Jordan. If the Boston Symphony had no decent home, you can be sure that by now we'd have a cultural center of gleaming travertine, opera house and all.

ARTS Page 2

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
OCT 29 1968 New

BAY STATE BUSINESS WORLD
INCLUDING THE 128 WORLD
VOL. 5 NO. 2 NOVEMBER 13, 1968 Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

Herb's Planet

BSO Blends Talents Of Music & Business

By HERBERT N. SIEGEL

Since 1881, the magnificent music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been heard throughout the community, nation, and the world, unobtrusively supported by a complex management system.

As one of the "Big Five" — the others being the orchestras of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Cleveland — the BSO has earned and maintained its reputation as the best there is (or next to best if you happen to live in one of the other "Big Five" cities.)

There are many reasons why such an organization reaches the pinnacle in its field and superior ability of the members and their conductor are among them. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., is big business.

In an attempt to find out just what it does take to manage a symphony orchestra, we paid a visit to the organization's associate business manager and assistant treasurer, James Brosnahan, whose department is mainly concerned with the dollars and cents dealing of the BSO.

The discussion began in Mr. Brosnahan's second-floor office at Symphony Hall against a unique background of piped-in music — a live rehearsal of the Brahms "Requiem" taking place on the stage of the floor below.

Mr. Brosnahan began by saying that the management aspect had certainly become more complex since he first joined the orchestra in 1924 as an office boy in the ticket operation. Since that year, which also was Serge Koussevitsky's first as conductor, Brosnahan has

(Continued on Page Six)

BAY STATE BUSINESS WORLD
NORWOOD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,000
NOV 13 1968 New

(Continued from Page One)

operated through the tenures of Charles Munch (who recently died) and the present conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, who is in his final season before handing over the reins for the 1969-'70 season to William Steinberg, present conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Mr. Brosnahan recalled that bookkeeping under Koussevitsky and his 110-man orchestra was a relatively simple matter. All members were on individual contracts and the work consisted mainly of giving the names and salary amounts to the printer who would prepare a series of checks for the entire season and "that was that."

Today, states the busy manager, there are heavy bookkeeping and reporting demands made upon a non-profit educational organization which is exempt from federal and state taxes as well as Boston real estate taxes. "The printer of 40 years ago has been replaced by something called a National Cash No. 395," he noted.

New Contract

We were informed that the members of the orchestra and management had just signed a new three-year contract which featured the following highlights:

—A raise in the minimum pay scale to $14,000, which represents an increase of approximately 30 percent. Although Mr. Brosnahan would not elaborate on individual salaries, he did note that approximately 6 percent of the members were on the minimum scale.

—A 52-week schedule which allows for six weeks of vacation and a work week of six days including one totally "free" day with no rehearsal, performance or any other work obligations.

—A maximum of 8 "services" a week on regular pay schedule—a service being defined in the simplest terms as a concert performance or rehearsal session not to exceed two and one-half hours duration.

In addition to salaries, the members share in the recording royalties with the exception of transcription trust tapes, the sales proceeds of which are added to the BSO Pension Fund.

The conductor's job is also a 52-week proposition with heavy emphasis on the choosing of program, soloists, and guest conductors. Add to this the burden of conducting rehearsals and regular performances and it becomes apparent that this position is tasking enough without involving the conductor in any financial matters.

Fees paid to soloists can range anywhere from $200 to $6,000, Brosnahan noted, adding that the latter figure would be associated with the "greats" and the former with the talented unknowns whose appearance with so famous an orchestra can only serve as a boost to the top.

Varied Operations

Because there are so many different matters to handle, duties within management must be divided. Overseeing the entire operation is Thomas Perry who joined the organization in 1954. Harry Kraut, Jr., with the BSO for eight years, and also an associate business manager, handles among other duties, TV, radio, and recording finances in addition to the business management of the Berkshire Music Center School.

Compounding the workload is the fact that unlike most other major orchestras, the BSO does not concession any of its sub-operations such as ticket sales, parking, building maintenance or even the sale of soda "pop" at the "Pops".

The largest single source of revenue is from the sale of tickets to the winter and "Pops" concerts. Mr. Brosnahan noted that 93 percent of the 2,631-seat hall is sold on a subscription basis for the winter season at a range for various concert combinations from $73 to $203. Aware of the continuously-expanding operating deficit due mainly to increased costs, Brosnahan feels that ticket prices should be raised in line with other fields such as movie houses which have seen, in many instances, a four-fold rise in the last ten years as opposed to a stated 40 percent increase for the BSO over the same period.

Sales Not Enough

In the most recently issued financial statement, ticket revenue for the winter season and Pops exceeded $1.7 million while for the same period, salaries to members and conductors and fees to soloists approached $1.6 million. When other administrative costs were taken into account and when an additional revenue source of recording royalties of $175,000 was added to the ticket income, the operation still showed a deficit of $616,728.

With the conclusion of the winter season at the end of April, non-principals of the orchestra are required to play at Pops until the end of June, after which time some of the members go to Tanglewood for the "Bach-Mozart Series" and the remainder perform at the free summer Esplanade concerts at the Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River. The orchestra receives no income for these concerts. The Esplanade segment of the business, Mr. Brosnahan states, is the one notable exception to the orchestra's involvement in maintenance, with that work handled by the MDC in an "admirable manner." At the conclusion of these concerts, the Esplanade group heads for Tanglewood to join others for the Berkshire Festival.

Tanglewood Loss

The Festival follows the same familiar theme to Brosnahan and his counterparts in the so-called thirty "major" symphony orchestra in the country — those with annual budgets of more than $500,000. The financial report indicates that the concert receipts of $462,000 cannot match up against the compensation to players, conductors and soloists, plus all the other normal operating costs, and the net result is a Tanglewood deficit of nearly $253,000.

The third phase of the financial report deals with the school at the Berkshire Music Center which is now working towards accreditation in cooperation with the New England Conservatory of Music and Boston University. The Center realized tuition and dormitory income of nearly $155,000. However, after all expenses, this phase also showed a loss of $164,000 creating for the first time in the history of the BSO an operating deficit in excess of $1 million.

Help Always Needed

Brosnahan does not foresee the day when this orchestra or any similar type operation can be self-sustaining. He looks back in time to the year 1918 when a group of dedicated and successful businessmen led by Henry Lee Higginson both founded and funded the corporation. "Whatever deficit existed at the end of the season, benefactor Higginson made up out of his own pocket", noted Brosnahan, adding that this was a feat that could not be duplicated today. The BSO is obviously in need of additional funding and contributions, but a closer look shows that all is not too bleak.

First, matters pertaining to budget allocations and investments are handled by the three "pros" of the finance committee. They are John L. Thorndike, treasurer of the BSO Inc., and vice president of the Fiduciary Trust Co.; Robert Gardiner, president of Fiduciary; and E. Morton Jennings, Jr., executive vice president of the First National Bank of Boston. In its latest report, the corporation shows a stock and bond portfolio wih a market value of $6.6 million. Investment income is able to make a sizable inroad of nearly $500,000 into the operating deficit.

Ford Grant

Secondly, The Ford Foundation recently inaugurated a matching grant program for symphony orchestras throughout the U.S. in which they earmarked nearly $80 million on a 50 per cent matching basis. That is, in the case of the BSO, a Ford promise of $2 million if the BSO raises $4 million. Brosnahan states that his organization has already reached its goal, with half the amount collected and the remainder pledged over a five year period.

Lastly, Brosnahan notes that contributors to the orchestra, known as the Society of Friends under the guidance of trustee emeritus Edward Taft, of the BSO, now number more than 5,000.

Income Not Income

When queried about other "hidden" sources of income, (Interviewer's term—Ed. Note) Brosnahan went on to show in each case that although the income was indeed there, it was more than offset by expenses.

Cases in point were: the advertising revenues from the program books of the winter season, Pops and Tanglewood which approximated $150,000 annually, but "allowed for 300,000 books to be given away without having to charge a price for them"; rental of the hall to others was explained as not a policy of the BSO. Others are given permission to use the hall and to "reimburse" the BSO for a proportionate share of the maintenance and expenses; and road travel with performances in cities such as New York and Chicago, where income receipt could range from $10,000 to $18,000 per concert show the same ratio deficit due to the added expense of flying 100 men and their instruments. When the men are on the road, they are "on their own" and reimbursed $25 per diem.

$20 Million Needed

Brosnahan mentions a figure of $20 million to be needed in the corporate portfolio within the next 10-15 years and says that plans for a Capital drive are underway. There will be two distinct portions to this drive, one in the greater Boston area and the other for the Tanglewood festival with emphasis on contributions from New York and New Jersey people.

Brosnahan's real hope is that capital drives will not further increase the demands on the Friends of the orchestra, and perhaps what he is really saying is that the Friends need friends. When one takes into account the assets of the BSO in enhancing the cultural image and enriching the life of the community, no proper Bostonian or lover of music would argue that point.

160.

BOSTON ARTS 2
DEAD? OR ALIVE?

Sarah Caldwell--

SARAH CALDWELL
. . . human dynamo

She Makes Boston Opera

With a budget that might be used for pocket money at the Met, a human dynamo has managed to make Boston the envy of the operatic world.

In her 11 years as founder, artistic director and chief fund scrounger of the Opera Company of Boston, Sarah Caldwell has made it the most exciting venture of its kind in the country.

Daughter of a political science professor and a mother who taught piano, Miss Caldwell was born in Maryville, Mo., and reared in Arkansas. But she has said that she "grew up artistically in Boston." She came here in 1942 to study violin at the New England Conservatory, but, after meeting Boris Goldovsky, switched her allegiance to opera.

Encouraged by starved Boston opera lovers, Miss Caldwell launched her company in 1957 with a production of Offenbach's "Voyage to the Moon." In the years since, she has staged such rarities as "Moses and Aaron," "Hippolyte et Aricie," and "Intolleranza" — all in carefully staged, vital productions that have had hard-to-please critics reaching for superlatives.

BORROWED

Into the bargain she has managed to get good singers. Miss Caldwell's no-nonsense approach has a magnetic appeal for conscientious artists — even for established prima donnas.

"The divine Sarah" works under conditions that would appall less hardy souls. At the height of the season a 20-hour work-day is nothing unusual. Subsisting on a diet of soft drinks, coffee and hamburgers, she works till dawn, after which she has been known to catch a few hours sleep in the theater.

Her productions have been staged in wrestling arenas and former vaudeville palaces. Her musicians are borrowed from the Boston Symphony, and she has no resident chorus.

LOVE OF OPERA

And then there is the problem of money — the lack of it. A bugaboo for most opera directors, with Miss Caldwell it is recurrent and chronic. In 1967 she formed the American National Opera Company which, at the end of its first season, floundered in financial disaster.

But Miss Caldwell takes what is perhaps the only possible sane attitude for an opera director — a kind of sublime "cool." "Sarah acts as though she had a charge account with the world," notes one of her friends.

How does she succeed? Mainly out of talent — and a love of opera so deep that everything she touches is memorable. It is her life and for several years now she has given little thought to anything else — least of all to herself.

—HARRY NEVILLE

Sing

Hub's Biggest Need: an Opera House

★ ARTS

Continued from Page 1

The only component we need, though, is the opera house. Not having it is civic embarrassment. Worse, though, and more relevantly, it is crippling to the city's musical life. Sarah Caldwell's often brilliant Opera Company of Boston has no place in which to function properly. Neither does the Boston Ballet. Bostonians are deprived of the chance of seeing, for example, the operas of Hamburg and Rome—both were in New York recently—because there's no place to stage them.

CONTROVERSIAL SIZE

The War Memorial Auditorium, where the Metropolitan Opera plays on its Boston visits, is unavailable most of the time—certainly as far as the time requirements of a resident company go—and it is limited technically and too large for convincing artistic and theatrical results.

There is certain to be continuing controversy over this question of size. Sarah Caldwell would like a 1700-seat house. Walter Pierce of the Aaron Richmond management (New England's largest) says that 4000 is the practical minimum today from a point of view of financial reality.

Opera Company of Boston President, Laszlo J. Bonis, suggests 2500 as a reasonable compromise. The Boston Opera Assn., which brings the Met here, would be happier with even more than 4000.

MICHAEL STEINBERG

The cost of music like the cost of living, continues to rise. Musicians' earning power goes up; stage crews are enormously expensive, and so more money has to come in at the box office. This means more seats and bigger halls, since there's a limit to what the traffic will bear in raising ticket prices.

Many say $16 million is a fair price tag for a well-equipped, flexible opera house. If there were an existing theater Boston could convert, as St. Louis and Seattle have done to make homes for their symphonies, anything from half to three quarters that sum could be saved. The city doesn't have any though. The Music Hall, about which there has been talk, stands on land owned by Tufts University, and Tufts reportedly has other plans for it.

If an opera house could be built under the aegis of a school, Federal loans and grants might be available. The New England Conservatory, whose opera department has no place to work, is a logical candidate. The northeast Huntington-Gainsboro corner is a possible site, just a couple of blocks away from a street still called "Opera" where a fine opera house was torn down 10 years ago.

The New England Conservatory may provide the leadership for the construction of an opera house. Composer Gunther Schuller, who took over as president in 1967, has remarkable ability, drive, and ambition. He enjoys the support of an amazed and admiring board.

SYMPHONY HALL

In little more than a year, Schuller has made changes in curriculum, has added lavishly to the faculty, and has transformed a staid place into a really hopping one.

He wants, too, to make the Conservatory's influence felt outside its own walls. That is why the opera house project is a legitimate object of speculation. The Conservatory can be expected to extend itself in new directions of educational and social endeavor. The first steps toward a badly needed enrichment of Boston's dreary, though admittedly ample, concert life have been taken.

On the other side of Huntington Avenue, at Symphony Hall, Erich Leinsdorf, who resigns as Symphony's music director next August, was inclined by temperament to be an activist in such matters. That was one of several, ultimately destructive differences between himself and the more conservative trustees and players.

A plan on the Symphony's part to sponsor a training orchestra was killed by the musicians. So was a plan for a chamber ensemble of younger players, to specialize in performance of contemporary music.

Leinsdorf's successor, William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony since 1952 is a solid professional, and seems unlikely to have much that is new and exciting to say to the 1970's.

He is a Humphrey where many music lovers had wished for a McCarthy, and his appointment suggests "business as usual." Bringing Steinberg here may perhaps be meant as a breather for the Symphony, as the installation of a respected father figure at a moment when critical assessment of the orchestra's performance has not always been high, and when recording sales have been low.

Steinberg's contract is for three years. He obviously hopes to stay longer. He points out that three years is the normal length for an initial contract, that the word "interim" was nowhere mentioned in his negotiations. The Symphony's new president Talcott M. Banks, says Steinberg is quite right about that, but goes on to say that since the new music director is comparatively advanced in years, he would not be expected to stay as long as his predecessors (they, in reverse chronological order, were here 7, 13, and 25 seasons).

BOSTON CULTURE SYMBOLISM—A music score, film reel, ballet slippers, model of a stage, Shakespeare bust and the Museum of Fine Arts. (Ted Dully Photo)

Banks, who succeeded Henry B. Cabot as president of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of this season, is a lawyer, an intelligent and dedicated man, tough even unto ruthlessness, some would say, interested in and informed about music. He is a master at not letting slip anything he doesn't want to. His talk is conservative.

He speaks of the BSO as "a seamless web," suggesting that the succession of one president by another will effect little change. Yet there is a definite gleam in his eye when he speaks of the pleasure of taking his new post at this particular moment —"much more exciting than 30 years ago."

He sees the present time as one in which music itself and the artistic and social functions of orchestras are undergoing revolutionary changes.

Boston has a new chamber orchestra, the Philharmonic, a players' cooperative. It played three introductory concerts last Spring and launches its first full season in November. It could mean a departure from routine programming that would refresh Boston's concert life. The players are excellent. We'll have to wait and see if the imagination, sophistication, courage, and the administrative and business skills are there as well.

PUBLIC INDIFFERENCE

The Handel and Haydn Society has for decades been synonymous with bumbling stuffiness. Its president, an energetic pediatrician, Dr. George Geyer, is determined to make the Society into the sort of vital organization it was in the 19th Century when it gave Beethoven a commission and introduced the new music of Mendelssohn and Brahms and others to America.

With its music director, Thomas Dunn, now in his second season, he has worked out an entirely new program policy, one intended to be responsive to current tastes and interests, and aware of the limited audience popularity of choral music.

One of the biggest questions of all, though, concerns overcoming the indifference of a public which more and more is in the habit of spending its money at the record counters.

There is a lot of activity in Boston. Some of it is interesting; a lot represents routine competence. The money problems are bad, and no one sees an end to them.

The advanced schools here attract more and more valuable composers, performers, and scholars. They provide a home for the arts. Boston's wealth of schools looks, just now, like our best musical hope.

Next: Kevin Kelly looks at the theatre in Boston — the "fabulous invalid."

GUNTHER SCHULLER, American composer, president since 1967 of the New England Conservatory of Music.

WILLIAM STEINBERG, who becomes music director of the Boston Symphony in 1969.

THOMAS DUNN, conductor who has been brought in to give the venerable Handel and Haydn Society a now image.

The Enigma Of Music And Money

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

(One Of A Series)

When the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, summer home of the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York City Ballet, needed to cut its $50,000 deficit last summer, it scheduled special performances by "The Doors," "The Supremes," and Rowan and Martin.

Rowan and Martin were sold out weeks in advance, and I am quite certain that the combined fees of the three billings far exceeded the original deficit.

The economics of cost of cast versus income by ticket sales have been argued so often that it doesn't help to repeat them, except to mention that capactity houses cannot cover the basic costs of these major operations.

In the not-so-good, olden days we read in the biographies of many composers and artists, how royal patrons "engaged" their services and rewarded them at times with no more than a place to live and eat and work.

A financial reward, a precious bit of jewelry, even a costless title were some of the other rewards.

★ ★ ★

But all this has disappeared, and yet the idea behind this sort of patronage has not. It has increased in the form of waiting upon gifts by individuals, family trusts, local business establishments, foundations, government agencies, and generally solicited funds, in order to keep a major music organization, such as a symphony orchestra, in operation.

Basically, there is nothing wrong with this, except that patronage is still a very restricted and — comparatively speaking — a very limited affair.

Time and again we hear the formula:

If the American business community would earmark just one half of 1 per cent of the 5 per cent tax deduction allowable, for cultural activities, this would generate some $250 million annually and roughly translate to 10 times the annual amount currently allocated.

★ ★ ★

Of course, even this contribution would not completely solve the problem.

Let's look at some costs, using the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra as an example. After some 35 meetings, the orchestra has come up with a new three-year agreement for its musicians, which includes a 48-hour week season at $190 per week, basic pay, with 3 weeks paid vacation. It will go up to 52 weeks at $210 per week and 4 weeks paid vacation by 1970-71.

In addition, there is increased travel insurance, extended payments for sick leave, pensions, expansion of recording and broadcast privileges, and provisions for dividing the full orchestra into ensembles for other type concerts.

To put it into other terms, by 1970-71 the musicians will earn a minimum salary of $10,920 for the year, which while marking a dramatic increase from the $4,820 they received in 1965-66, doesn't come up to the one-time concert fee of between $15,000 and $20,000 for, let's say, Simon and Garfunkel.

★ ★ ★

In late August, the Boston Symphony announced its new three-year trade agreement, which pegs the basic minimum salary at $14,000 per year, and which includes an annual recording guarantee of $1,000. It is estimated that the cost of the increases will be in the neighborhood of $250,000 for the first year alone.

And we need to be reminded that first-chair players make considerably more than the basic minimum rate listed.

To look at the financial statement of the Cleveland Orchestra, now, in its 50th season, we learn that orchestra and staff salaries, direct concert expenses, administrative and office costs, payroll taxes, group insurance and annuities, summer concerts, and hall expenses for the year ending last May 31, amounted to $2,540,364.72.

The income from ticket sales, children's concerts, out-of-town concerts, and pops amounted to only $1,045,512.49, leaving a very large deficit of $1,494,852.23.

Other income contributions, however, from endowment funds, annual maintenance funds, the Ford Foundation, school boards, broadcasts, recordings, and other sources added another $1,185,880.78 to the overall income, but still left a deficit for the season of $308,000-plus.

★ ★ ★

There are instances where individual or family gifts are considerable, as, for example, Ralph Corbett's Foundation in Cincinnati, the Blossom family in Cleveland, or the recent $1 million gift to the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts for the building of the Juilliard School library by Mrs. DeWitt Wallace, who with her husband, is co-founder and co-chairman of Reader's Digest. But such benevolence is not the order of the day, to be sure.

Aware that symphony orchestras cannot afford being insular operations for either one segment of a community or one geographical area, but must serve an entire metropolitan community, many of them are entering a new phase in their history by expanding their offerings and entering capital fund drives.

The people who are on these planning boards are usually professional people from the world of the arts, business, industry, the professions, local schools, and, what is even more important, other musical and cultural arts organizations.

In some municipalities, this has already resulted in an annual fund drive for the performing arts in the style of a community chest campaign. The fears by those who have developed their own subscription list proved unfounded, because the overall interest and participation has invariably produced more revenue through a common effort than any individual effort.

It would appear that exploratory meetings and conversations held some years ago, and followed by intermittently by mail, but the Toledo Arts Commission are now translating into some tangible action. Other cities have done it, are doing it, and there is no valid reason whatever why Toledo — if Toledoans mean business — cannot do it.

★ ★ ★

We might as well face the fact that the cost of preserving professional performances in the arts will be higher and rise inexorably. The deficit in keeping music and the other performing arts "live" might double in the next 10 years.

It isn't inflation, incompetence of management, union pressures, or dishonesty which are responsible for this situation. It is a simple fact, explained in great detail in the Twentieth Century Fund report of two years ago, "Performing Arts: The Economic Dilemma," — that live performances involve man-hours.

In manufacturing, labor is one of the highest cost factors and automation can help, but in the arts, one cannot talk of "increased productivity" with less cost per unit.

Somewhere in all this, there is an obvious solution. The entire community must partake or the performing arts will have to return to the "royal" patronage level, confined to ducal dining halls, with musicians and composers using the servants' entrance through the kitchen.

After all, the productivity in other sectors of the American economy is providing society with the means to pay the bill, but only if it is determined to do so.

And this is where the real hang-up is.

More on this next week.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 172,008 SUN. 183,093

NOV 10 1968

161

N. E. Panel's Program Ambitious One

CHARLES J. STOKES

The New England Regional Commission has laid out for itself a fairly ambitious legislative program for 1969.

The commission is a federally supported agency to coordinate all those Washington directed programs which affect the economic health and progress of this region.

The governors of the six states serve as members with Maine's Kenneth M. Curtis as the cochairman for 1969. A federally appointed chairman John J. Linnehan serves fulltime from his office in Boston.

FIRST on the program's list is a proposal directed to Washington — and, in fact, to outgoing Massachusetts Governor Volpe, who will be the new Secretary of Transportation — calling for some form of guarantee for private investors in the Boston - New York high speed train service.

Next is a recommendation for a full-scale study of regional air transport service and the development of criteria for "regionally significant" airports. This would lead quite naturally to some increased aid to regional airports.

THEN CAME such proposals as those calling for improvement of interstate commuter service into Boston, a search for alternative East - West highway routes across Northern New England along with a system of regional interstate connector routes. But transportation problems, though first on the list of regional legislative proposals are hardly all that the governors have in mind for 1969.

Under "environmental control"—air and water pollution—they have the following suggestions for action: grants to states, cities and towns to establish desirable standards for clean air, water, open space and patterns of residential, commercial and industrial land use.

Included is a batch of proposals for handling solid wastes. They call for more cooperation among local communities, research into ocean disposal of waste, extension of sewer systems into suburban and rural areas and the like.

IN ADDITION; the commission calls for the establishment of a New England Trust to assist in preserving the region's open space and historical areas. In the same general field, the commission suggests that it begin general surveys of about 25 broad areas in which "new towns" might be developed across the six state region. Of these about a dozen would get very careful treatment and study, leading to direct suggestions to appropriate state and local authorities for actions to be taken soon.

FOR RURAL AREAS, especially in Northern New England, the commission proposes demonstration projects in comprehensive health services, management assistance to small farmers, aid in provision of potable water for rural householders as well as training for officials and employees of smaller towns.

FOR THE CITIES, the commission recommends the establishment of regional programs for "innovative" teacher training, a vast improvement in regional technical education so as to increase the supply of skilled manpower as well as job development assistance to model city programs.

Last on the governors' list was the call for the setting up of a Regional Arts Council.

This might extend the services of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regionwide, aid the development of local museums, develop regionwide television programs on the arts, provide technical assistance to a wide variety of local art groups and generally act as a clearing house for the region's cultural activities.

A big list with no price tags attached. But what is new is that for the first time, we have a spelling out of a regionwide set of goals for economic and social development. And if Governor Curtis can get some time free from his problems at Machiasport, he may just get this show on the road.

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 55,900

JAN 7 1969 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

NOV 17 1968 New

MUSIC

'Blue' Series A Possibility For PSO

By JOHN R. THORNTON

IT WOULD APPEAR logical that when management of a symphony orchestra achieves its goal of completely selling out a seven concert season, there would be cause for jubilant celebration. After all, the ticket sales are a major consideration in balancing a budget and to be assured of absolute success in this respect is quite gratifying.

In the case of the Portland Symphony Orchestra, their first full subscription for a season has brought to the fore another problem.

Many long time supporters of the orchestra, those who conc[illegible] through the lean years, were among those [illegible]mented by We[illegible]

Although there sho[illegible] there will be a substantial incr[illegible] same, and even a fully sold out second p[illegible] be lucky to cover its bills.

If it does become a reality it will be the best thing that has happened to the Portland Symphony since Paul Vermel was appointed regular conductor last year.

Not only will an increased schedule be good for the community in that it will widen interest, but the plus concerts will more than likely be better from the viewpoint of performance.

The great Boston Symphony, which performs Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings on the traditional series, is nearly always at its best in the second performance. Fridays are for the posh people, when the hall is surounded by double-parked limousines attended by sharply dressed chauffers. Saturdays are for the loyal who pay less, and they get the benefit of the second time around the block.

THE PSO BOARD of trustees is faced with a formidable task in balancing its budget for this season, for which $146,000 will be needed. Last season's budget was $131,000, including the cost of the federally subsidized Vaghy String Quartet, gone now to Canda.

Manager Andrew C. Holmes and conductor Vermel are having to bring in free lance professionals from New York and Boston to replace the Vaghy's, which has added considerably to the budget.

Last year's advance ticket sale was $30,000, and box office sales for the individual concerts brought in another $3,500.

This year the advance is $40,000, but the box office is likely to be next to zero. The only tickets available will be those returned to the symphony by people who can't attend individual concerts.

This $91,000 has to be raised to balance the budget. About $16,000 is hoped for from the Symphony Dinners evening in December, leaving the trustees to realize another $75,000, a sum equal to the entire budget just four years ago!

The challenge is large, but then the PSO is fortunate in having a trustee organization that consists in the main of some very smart business men.

If we are to have a really first class symphony orchestra, representing an invaluable asset to the community, it cannot be secured wiht Green Stamps.

N. E. Business Report

The New England Regional Commission has laid out for itself a fairly ambitious legislative program for 1969. So far, so good. But what is the Regional Commission? And in what legislatures is this program to be carried forward?

For most readers who probably have never heard of the New England Regional Commission, here are the facts. It is a Federally supported agency to coordinate all those Washington directed programs which affect the economic health and progress of this region.

The governors of the six states serve as members of the Commission with Maine's Kenneth M. Curtis as the Co-Chairman for 1969. A federally appointed chairman, John J. Linnehan, serves full-time from his office in Boston.

Now to the recommendations for 1969's legislatures, those meeting in Washington and in each of the New England state capitols. Frist on the list is a proposal directed to Washington — and, in fact, to outgoing Massachusetts Governor Volpe, who will be the Secretary of Transportation—calling for some form of guarantee for private investors in the Boston-New York high speed train service.

Next is a recommendation for a full-scale study of regional air transport service and the development of criteria for "regionally significant" airports. This would lead quite naturally to some increased aid to regional airports.

Then came such proposals as those calling for improvement of interstate commuter service into Boston, a search for alternative East-West highway routes across Northern New England along with a system of regional interstate connector routes. But transportation problems, though first on the list of regional legislative proposals are hardly all that the governors have in mind for 1969. Under "environmental control" — read air and water pollution — they have the following suggestions for action: grants to states, cities and towns to establish desirable standards for clean air, water, open space and patterns of residential, commercial and industrial land use.

Included is a batch of proposals for handling solid wastes. They call for more cooperation among local communities, research into ocean disposal of waste, extension of sewer systems into suburban and rural areas and the like.

In addition, the Commission calls for the establishment of a New England Trust to assist in preserving the region's open space and historical areas. In the same general field, the Commission suggests that it begin general surveys of about 25 broad areas in which "new towns" might be developed across the six state region. Of these about a dozen would get very careful treatment and study, leading to direct suggestions to appropriate state and local authorities for actions to be taken soon.

For rural areas, especially in Northern New England, the Commission proposes demonstration projects in comprehensive health services, management assistance to small farmers, aid in provision of potable water for rural householders as well as training for officials and employees of smaller towns.

For the cities, the Commission recommends the establishment of regional programs for "innovative" teacher training, a vast improvement in regional technical education so as to increase the supply of skilled manpower as well as job development assistance to model city programs.

Last on the Governors' list was the call for the setting up of a Regional Arts Council.

This might extend the services of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regionwide, and the development of local museums, develop regionwide television programs on the arts, provide technical assistance to a wide variety of local art groups and generally act as a clearing house for the region's cultural activities.

A big list with no price tags attached. But what is new is that for the first time, we have a spelling out of a regionwide set of goals for economic and social development. And if Governor Curtis can get some time free from his problems at Machiasport, he may just get this show on the road.

TIMES-ARGUS (e)
BARRE, VT.
CIRC. 11,900

JAN 4 1969 New England

162.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

DEC 21 1968 New England

As I Hear It

The Responsibility for Culture

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

IF ERICH LEINSDORF, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, should choose to step up the tempos of the four movements of the Beethoven Fifth and play it in, let's say, 34 minutes instead of 38, he would save the orchestra management no money at all.

And yet the orchestra's trustees, as with all those responsible for the buoyancy of innumerable cultural institutions of the whole country, are avidly searching for means either to lower expenses or to acquire additional funds to meet deficits. In music this state of affairs extends from the Metropolitan Opera to the Berkshire Community Orchestra and stops at all way stations.

Who hasn't had his mailbox jammed in this recent term with solicitations of funds and pleas for charity? Everyone responds in the ratio of his capacity and selects those which interest him. It is depressing at times to have to throw so many away, giving the impression to anyone who should inquire that one is indifferent to the fate of either an institution or an undoubtedly worthy charity. My colleague, Katharine Annin, only two weeks ago complained of the duplication of appeals from the same agency.

* * * *

HOWEVER, IT is in the nature of our society to desire cultural advantages for which admission fees, for opera and concerts, are not adequate to meet expenses. Hence the appeals. Only recently there were news items in this paper mentioning the formation of a committee to solicit funds in the Berkshires for Tanglewood, and, a few days later, an item spelled the amount of the deficit of the state-supported summer enterprise at Saratoga.

And William Schuman, president of Lincoln Center, announced that he is resigning. In an interview, he stated that he is becoming "less involved with the artistic and cultural phases and more and more with the activities dealing with the financial problems of the center."

The Albany Symphony Orchestra issued a release a month ago bluntly stating that "a symphony orchestra is truly nonprofit. It cannot support itself through ticket prices alone any more than a school or university can through tuition, a hospital through fees, or a museum or library through dues. Tickets reasonably can be expected to account for no more than 50 per cent of the budget.

* * * *

THE AVERAGE expense of a performance at the Metropolitan Opera is $57,000. Roughly broken down, the major segments include $24,000 for artists, orchestra, chorus and ballet; $11,000 for stage support, and $8,000 for staff-building operations. The remainder includes small items for publicity, royalties, costumes, scenery, etc. Management realizes plumb well that $15.50 for a prime seat is an awful lot of money. There are seats for $3.50 to $6.50, but they are admittedly hard to get. Even if they sell out the house, they still lose money. You can't increase the size of the auditorium for obvious reasons.

I don't know if there are comparable complaints against spending $12 for a seat to see "Hair," and it is pertinent to note in this frame that "Hair" is played repeatedly while the Met changes repertory, again for obvious reasons, seven times a week.

* * * *

ORCHESTRAS OFFER new programs a couple of times a week and every week. The Albany orchestra imposes five rehearsals per program; the first-rank professionals fewer. Not a few readers will undoubtedly ask themselves why Tanglewood, for instance, which publicizes its attendance figures as General Motors its production, and reveals with pride and satisfaction audiences from 6,000 to 12,000, should need additional money. I have no brief for any musical organization on that score, but at a study program at Williams College this summer, William J. Baumol presented a paper, "The Economist Analyzes Orchestra Finance." He pointed out that one cannot compare a live performance and a manufacturing process.

* * * *

LABOR-SAVING inventions can cut labor time in half, which is fine in the production of an automobile or a television set. But in production of live performance, human ingenuity is stymied and subject to severe limits in what it can do in reducing the labor time that must be devoted to the product.

The competition for that dollar which may not be essential for our own needs is tremendous, but the comparative financial euphoria under which the arts now flourish, or exist, is not a perennial. The planting, nourishing and flowering is a constant and annual process and we may expect, and should welcome, those eleemosynary letters which arrive every hour on the hour. The government, of course, encourages this process by giving tax advantages to donors.

In the present state of our affluent society, there seems always to be philanthropists interested in all the many phases of our many needs: Some give buildings to universities, some contribute to the welfare of the needy, some donate to orchestras and opera houses. Truly, the Christmas spirit of good will to man persists the year-round. I should say that the most patent evidence of the progress of mankind is its recognition of responsibility.

Boston Symphony Appeals for Funds

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has sounded a call for financial help.

The appeal for contributions was made Friday by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, who said the financial picture is "not only alarming, but becoming critical."

"If the Symphony is to continue even for two or three seasons more," Banks said, "we must reduce expenses and increase our income and contributions.

Banks said the increased expenses were due in part to the "creeping inflation," and said "the largest factor" in the higher costs was a contract signed with the musicians last summer for this season and the two following seasons.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

FEB 1 1969

Boston Symphony In Money Bind

BOSTON (AP) — The president of the board of directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra says the B.S.O. must spend less money and take in a substantial amount more if it is to continue "even for two or three seasons more."

Talcott M. Banks said Friday that the orchestra's financial plight is "not only alarming, but becoming critical."

"If the symphony is to continue even for two or three seasons more," Banks said, "we must reduce expenses and increase our income and contributions—very very substantially."

The B.S.O. "must be maintained, for it is not only the pride of our city but a cultural establishment of inestimable value to our nation and to the entire world of music," he said.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
CIRC. 11,350

FEB 1 1969 New Engl

EXPRESS (e)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 29,450

FEB 1 1969

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 60,000

FEB 12 1969

BSO banks on businessmen

by Ralph Locke

Two weeks ago, the president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Talcott M. Banks, met in Symphony Hall with the orchestra's players, trustees, Board of Overseers, managerial staff, and the members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the first such all-encompassing meeting in the orchestra's history, and it was arranged to make public the fact that the orchestra's financial situation is "not only alarming, but is becoming critical."

The B.S.O.'s financial problems are not new or surprising. In spite of inflationary pressures (especially labor costs), the administrative officers have tried not to raise ticket prices. On the contrary, they have instituted inexpensive ticket-series for Tuesday and Thursday night concerts and $1 rush seats for Friday afternoons.

Other recent ventures which, despite their admitted importance for the community, only compound the problem of rising costs are the Jordan Hall chamber concerts (which do not attract enough of an audience to make money), and the expanding Berkshire School program (which entails numerous scholarship awards—necessary for many students but a drain of capital for the orchestra.)

How does Mr. Banks propose to deal with the financial squeeze which we have just described? He made it very clear at the meeting that he had no intention of raising ticket prices in order to cover deficits. He said that this, "would be not only self-defeating, but against the basic principle that access to great music should not be restricted to the well-to-do."

In addition, it is impossible to enlarge Symphony Hall (for both acoustical and financial reasons), or to increase the concert schedule (already very heavy), in order to increase the ratio of ticket income to rehearsal time. Finally, it is to be hoped that the orchestra's staff would never consider offsetting their deficits by pinching pennies with the players or other personnel.

The orchestra will therefore have to go outside for assistance in re-balancing its budget. The decision announced by Mr. Banks is that the orchestra is now undertaking the second phase of its major fund-raising efforts. The successfully completed first phase was aimed at securing contributions from individuals in the Boston area. The second phase will, hopefully, reach the banks, insurance companies, and other large corporations which presumably benefit from the continuing activity of one of Boston's major cultural attractions.

In anticipation of a successful second-phase fund drive, the orchestra's trustees have announced that all aspects of the orchestra's activities will remain unchanged. We can only hope that the fund-raisers find Boston's flourishing businesses as cooperative in helping the orchestra deal with today's problems as so many individual citizens were in the past.

Symphony has image problem

By MARO MILLER

Like most American cultural institutions today, the Boston Symphony is hurting financially. The orchestra's fiscal plight was spelled out yesterday by Talcott M. Banks, BSO president, at a meeting of orchestra players, trustees, overseers, staff and friends.

The orchestra earns 67 percent of its income — a high figure among arts institutions. Operating expenses are $5 million a year but will increase to $5.4 million by 1971.

The largest expense is musicians' salaries. Beginning pay is $14,000 a year, with the average $20,000.

The orchestra is now giving as many income - producing concerts as the calendar allows — over 200 concerts here, at Tanglewood and on tour. Royalties from recordings are higher than ever while, nationally, record sales are in a slump.

Fund raising has been successful — to a point. The BSO raised $4 million to qualify for the $2 million challenge grant given by the Ford Foundation. But the principal of this money cannot be touched until 1976.

Banks also identified an image problem: "We have often heard it said that the Boston Symphony is rich, that is it has unnamed Boston supporters who will always pay its deficit. This is not true."

A new five-year fund drive — details to be announced — is being organized by Phillip K. Allen and George Kidder. The new campaign, Allen said, "will be selective, the bullet versus the shotgun. We will solicit more preparation and go back to those who either gave nothing the first time around or those who didn't give enough."

Banks thinks Boston a generous community but he said business interests are slower to respond than in Detroit, Minneapolis or Cleveland — cities which also support major arts institutions.

"An orchestra," Banks said, "has to recreate each performance," which costs money. "The Museum of Fine Arts doesn't have to repaint each picture every day."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

FEB 1 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

Editorials

FEB 10 1969 New Engl

The Piper Needs To Be Paid

It is doleful to report the emphatic demurrer that Talcott M. Banks entered before a Berkshire group last week. The new head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra disclaimed any secret sources of substantial income. He was thus shooting down a musical myth. It is that Symphony Hall, if embattled as it is increasingly becoming to be paradoxically in the middle of the "new" Boston, would find itself fortified by all the trust funds from Manchester-by-the-Sea, to Louisburg Square, to Cohasset Light. Not so, he said, fortissimo.

Gone are the days when some single Boston patron, or group of fatted well-wishers would pick up the inevitable deficit of such an enterprise. Moreover, as the performing scope of the orchestra has expanded into a year-around operation, the deficit, pushed further by the thrust of inflation, has risen until it is not merely alarming but critical.

Mr. Banks' appearance before a representative group of businessmen was more than a demonstration that the arts everywhere in the U.S. are in heavy seas. Roger L. Stevens, head of the piteously underfunded National Council on the Arts, has been saying this before businessmen all over the country. He came to point out that a substantial part of the BSO deficit was the result of the Tanglewood operation and the Berkshire Music Center school. Even as the Boston friends of the orchestra are being asked to increase their support as annual donors, so its Berkshire well-wishers, whether from artistic empathy, regional pride or economic self-interest, are being asked to assume an appropriate share of underwriting that part of the deficit caused by the Lenox operation and not covered by income from endowment and foundation grants.

Those to whom music is spiritual protein are already helping and presumably will help more. However, to those whose musical bent is limited to a whistling acquaintance with "Yankee Doodle," especially in the business community, the Boston Orchestra's eight-week presence in Berkshire is important and compelling. It needs no demonstration by charts and bars. Perhaps its most recent demonstration was the reasons given for the decision of a trade-magazine publishing house fleeing New York to locate here.

The response from Berkshire to our beleaguered neighbor should be loud and clear — and it will have to be a sustained one. Few non-metropolitan areas are as blessed physically and qualitatively as Berkshire. But the piper needs paying. He can't live on scenery or fantasies or sweet old ladies in clover strumming their checkbooks.

Boston Symphony In Financial Trouble

BOSTON (AP) — The president of the board of directors says the Boston Symphony Orchestra must spend less money and take in a substantial amount more if it is to continue "even for two or three seasons more."

Talcott M. Banks said that the orchestra's financial plight is "not only alarming, but becoming critical."

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

FEB 3 1969 N Eng

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

FEB 4 1969 N Eng

Inflation and the Arts

The arts, our community is learning, are not immune to the pinch of inflation.

Two institutions without which Boston would be greatly different are embarked on efforts to reduce expenses and raise more funds. Boston Symphony Orchestra entered the second phase of its current money-raising campaign last week with a warning from the trustees that the orchestra's financial condition is "not only alarming but becoming critical." And the Museum of Fine Arts today launches a drive for corporate gifts as part of its Centennial Fund with the announcement that its real operating income is less today than in the depression of the 1930's.

Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra trustees, said that if BSO is to continue even two or three more seasons, costs must be cut and income substantially increased. The Museum, meanwhile, is raising admission from 50 to 75 cents and closing about 10 per cent of its exhibition space to reduce the expense of security and maintenance. Five million dollars remain to be raised if the Centennial Fund goal is to be reached by the hundredth anniversary date, February 4, 1970.

Like other institutions, the orchestra and the museum have substantial assets, but significant amounts of their endowment funds are restricted so only income from them can be used. Meanwhile, inflation keeps costs climbing. Salaries for musicians, for example, have risen rapidly though not unjustifiably, considering how little these artists were paid a few years ago. At the museum, costs of recent building additions came to $1.5 million more than estimates three years earlier. A work by Monet, purchased for $45,000 in 1956, had to be insured for $1 million 12 years later.

The public has its own problems with inflation, of course, but the appeals of the BSO and museum merit the most generous response possible. Greater Boston and New England have become the singular regions they are in part because of institutions like these. If they are forced to reduce their activities markedly, or to price their services so high that only the most wealthy can enjoy them, dollars could never measure the resulting cost.

162.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

DEC 21 1968 New England

As I Hear It

The Responsibility for Culture

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

IF ERICH LEINSDORF, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, should choose to step up the tempos of the four movements of the Beethoven Fifth and play it in, let's say, 34 minutes instead of 38, he would save the orchestra management no money at all.

And yet the orchestra's trustees, as with all those responsible for the buoyancy of innumerable cultural institutions of the whole country, are avidly searching for means either to lower expenses or to acquire additional funds to meet deficits. In music this state of affairs extends from the Metropolitan Opera to the Berkshire Community Orchestra and stops at all way stations.

Who hasn't had his mailbox jammed in this recent term with solicitations of funds and pleas for charity? Everyone responds in the ratio of his capacity and selects those which interest him. It is depressing at times to have to throw so many away, giving the impression to anyone who should inquire that one is indifferent to the fate of either an institution or an undoubtedly worthy charity. My colleague, Katharine Annin, only two weeks ago complained of the duplication of appeals from the same agency.

* * * *

HOWEVER, IT is in the nature of our society to desire cultural advantages for which admission fees, for opera and concerts, are not adequate to meet expenses. Hence the appeals. Only recently there were news items in this paper mentioning the formation of a committee to solicit funds in the Berkshires for Tanglewood, and, a few days later, an item spelled the amount of the deficit of the state-supported summer enterprise at Saratoga.

And William Schuman, president of Lincoln Center, announced that he is resigning. In an interview, he stated that he is becoming "less involved with the artistic and cultural phases and more and more with the activities dealing with the financial problems of the center."

The Albany Symphony Orchestra issued a release a month ago bluntly stating that "a symphony orchestra is truly nonprofit. It cannot support itself through ticket prices alone any more than a school or university can through tuition, a hospital through fees, or a museum or library through dues. Tickets reasonably can be expected to account for no more than 50 per cent of the budget.

* * * *

THE AVERAGE expense of a performance at the Metropolitan Opera is $57,000. Roughly broken down, the major segments include $24,000 for artists, orchestra, chorus and ballet; $11,000 for stage support, and $8,000 for staff-building operations. The remainder includes small items for publicity, royalties, costumes, scenery, etc. Management realizes plumb well that $15.50 for a prime seat is an awful lot of money. There are seats for $3.50 to $6.50, but they are admittedly hard to get. Even if they sell out the house, they still lose money. You can't increase the size of the auditorium for obvious reasons.

I don't know if there are comparable complaints against spending $12 for a seat to see "Hair," and it is pertinent to note in this frame that "Hair" is played repeatedly while the Met changes repertory, again for obvious reasons, seven times a week.

* * * *

ORCHESTRAS OFFER new programs a couple of times a week and every week. The Albany orchestra imposes five rehearsals per program; the first-rank professionals fewer. Not a few readers will undoubtedly ask themselves why Tanglewood, for instance, which publicizes its attendance figures as General Motors its production, and reveals with pride and satisfaction audiences from 6,000 to 12,000, should need additional money. I have no brief for any musical organization on that score, but at a study program at Williams College this summer, William J. Baumol presented a paper, "The Economist Analyzes Orchestra Finance." He pointed out that one cannot compare a live performance and a manufacturing process.

* * * *

LABOR-SAVING inventions can cut labor time in half, which is fine in the production of an automobile or a television set. But in production of live performance, human ingenuity is stymied and subject to severe limits in what it can do in reducing the labor time that must be devoted to the product.

The competition for that dollar which may not be essential for our own needs is tremendous, but the comparative financial euphoria under which the arts now flourish, or exist, is not a perennial. The planting, nourishing and flowering is a constant and annual process and we may expect, and should welcome, those eleemosynary letters which arrive every hour on the hour. The government, of course, encourages this process by giving tax advantages to donors.

In the present state of our affluent society, there seems always to be philanthropists interested in all the many phases of our many needs: Some give buildings to universities, some contribute to the welfare of the needy, some donate to orchestras and opera houses. Truly, the Christmas spirit of good will to man persists the year-round. I should say that the most patent evidence of the progress of mankind is its recognition of responsibility.

Boston Symphony Appeals for Funds

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has sounded a call for financial help.

The appeal for contributions was made Friday by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, who said the financial picture is "not only alarming, but becoming critical."

"If the Symphony is to continue even for two or three seasons more," Banks said, "we must reduce expenses and increase our income and contributions.

Banks said the increased expenses were due in part to the "creeping inflation," and said "the largest factor" in the higher costs was a contract signed with the musicians last summer for this season and the two following seasons.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

FEB 1 1969

Boston Symphony In Money Bind

BOSTON (AP) — The president of the board of directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra says the B.S.O. must spend less money and take in a substantial amount more if it is to continue "even for two or three seasons more."

Talcott M. Banks said Friday that the orchestra's financial plight is "not only alarming, but becoming critical."

"If the symphony is to continue even for two or three seasons more," Banks said, "we must reduce expenses and increase our income and contributions—very very substantially."

The B.S.O. "must be maintained, for it is not only the pride of our city but a cultural establishment of inestimable value to our nation and to the entire world of music," he said.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
CIRC. 11,350

FEB 1 1969 New Engl

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 62,000

FEB 12 1969

BSO banks on businessmen

by Ralph Locke

Two weeks ago, the president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Talcott M. Banks, met in Symphony Hall with the orchestra's players, trustees, Board of Overseers, managerial staff, and the members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the first such all-encompassing meeting in the orchestra's history, and it was arranged to make public the fact that the orchestra's financial situation is "not only alarming, but is becoming critical."

The B.S.O.'s financial problems are not new or surprising. In spite of inflationary pressures (especially labor costs), the administrative officers have tried not to raise ticket prices. On the contrary, they have instituted inexpensive ticket-series for Tuesday and Thursday night concerts and $1 rush seats for Friday afternoons.

Other recent ventures which, despite their admitted importance for the community, only compound the problem of rising costs are the Jordan Hall chamber concerts (which do not attract enough of an audience to make money), and the expanding Berkshire School program (which entails numerous scholarship awards—necessary for many students but a drain of capital for the orchestra.)

How does Mr. Banks propose to deal with the financial squeeze which we have just described? He made it very clear at the meeting that he had no intention of raising ticket prices in order to cover deficits. He said that this, "would be not only self-defeating, but against the basic principle that access to great music should not be restricted to the well-to-do."

In addition, it is impossible to enlarge Symphony Hall (for both acoustical and financial reasons), or to increase the concert schedule (already very heavy), in order to increase the ratio of ticket income to rehearsal time. Finally, it is to be hoped that the orchestra's staff would never consider offsetting their deficits by pinching pennies with the players or other personnel.

The orchestra will therefore have to go outside for assistance in re-balancing its budget. The decision announced by Mr. Banks is that the orchestra is now undertaking the second phase of its major fund-raising efforts. The successfully completed first phase was aimed at securing contributions from individuals in the Boston area. The second phase will, hopefully, reach the banks, insurance companies, and other large corporations which presumably benefit from the continuing activity of one of Boston's major cultural attractions.

In anticipation of a successful second-phase fund drive, the orchestra's trustees have announced that all aspects of the orchestra's activities will remain unchanged. We can only hope that the fund-raisers find Boston's flourishing businesses as cooperative in helping the orchestra deal with today's problems as so many individual citizens were in the past.

EXPRESS (e)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 29,450

FEB 1 1969

Symphony has image problem

By MARO MILLER

Like most American cultural institutions today, the Boston Symphony is hurting financially. The orchestra's fiscal plight was spelled out yesterday by Talcott M. Banks, BSO president, at a meeting of orchestra players, trustees, overseers, staff and friends.

The orchestra earns 67 percent of its income — a high figure among arts institutions. Operating expenses are $5 million a year but will increase to $5.4 million by 1971.

The largest expense is musicians' salaries. Beginning pay is $14,000 a year, with the average $20,000.

The orchestra is now giving as many income - producing concerts as the calendar allows — over 200 concerts here, at Tanglewood and on tour. Royalties from recordings are higher than ever while, nationally, record sales are in a slump.

Fund raising has been successful — to a point. The BSO raised $4 million to qualify for the $2 million challenge grant given by the Ford Foundation. But the principal of this money cannot be touched until 1976.

Banks also identified an image problem: "We have often heard it said that the Boston Symphony is rich, that is it has unnamed Boston supporters who will always pay its deficit. This is not true."

A new five-year fund drive — details to be announced — is being organized by Phillip K. Allen and George Kidder. The new campaign, Allen said, "will be selective, the bullet versus the shotgun. We will solicit more preparation and go back to those who either gave nothing the first time around or those who didn't give enough."

Banks thinks Boston a generous community but he said business interests are slower to respond than in Detroit, Minneapolis or Cleveland — cities which also support major arts institutions.

"An orchestra," Banks said, "has to recreate each performance," which costs money. "The Museum of Fine Arts doesn't have to repaint each picture every day."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

FEB 1 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

Boston Symphony In Financial Trouble

BOSTON (AP) — The president of the board of directors says the Boston Symphony Orchestra must spend less money and take in a substantial amount more if it is to continue "even for two or three seasons more."

Talcott M. Banks said that the orchestra's financial plight is "not only alarming, but becoming critical."

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

FEB 3 1969 N Eng

Editorials

FEB 10 1969 Ne Engl

The Piper Needs To Be Paid

It is doleful to report the emphatic demurrer that Talcott M. Banks entered before a Berkshire group last week. The new head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra disclaimed any secret sources of substantial income. He was thus shooting down a musical myth. It is that Symphony Hall, if embattled as it is increasingly becoming to be paradoxically in the middle of the "new" Boston, would find itself fortified by all the trust funds from Manchester-by-the-Sea, to Louisburg Square, to Cohasset Light. Not so, he said, fortissimo.

Gone are the days when some single Boston patron, or group of fatted well-wishers would pick up the inevitable deficit of such an enterprise. Moreover, as the performing scope of the orchestra has expanded into a year-around operation, the deficit, pushed further by the thrust of inflation, has risen until it is not merely alarming but critical.

Mr. Banks' appearance before a representative group of businessmen was more than a demonstration that the arts everywhere in the U.S. are in heavy seas. Roger L. Stevens, head of the piteously underfunded National Council on the Arts, has been saying this before businessmen all over the country. He came to point out that a substantial part of the BSO deficit was the result of the Tanglewood operation and the Berkshire Music Center school. Even as the Boston friends of the orchestra are being asked to increase their support as annual donors, so its Berkshire well-wishers, whether from artistic empathy, regional pride or economic self-interest, are being asked to assume an appropriate share of underwriting that part of the deficit caused by the Lenox operation and not covered by income from endowment and foundation grants.

Those to whom music is spiritual protein are already helping and presumably will help more. However, to those whose musical bent is limited to a whistling acquaintance with "Yankee Doodle," especially in the business community, the Boston Orchestra's eight-week presence in Berkshire is important and compelling. It needs no demonstration by charts and bars. Perhaps its most recent demonstration was the reasons given for the decision of a trade-magazine publishing house fleeing New York to locate here.

The response from Berkshire to our beleaguered neighbor should be loud and clear — and it will have to be a sustained one. Few non-metropolitan areas are as blessed physically and qualitatively as Berkshire. But the piper needs paying. He can't live on scenery or fantasies or sweet old ladies in clover strumming their checkbooks.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

FEB 4 1969 N Eng

Inflation and the Arts

The arts, our community is learning, are not immune to the pinch of inflation.

Two institutions without which Boston would be greatly different are embarked on efforts to reduce expenses and raise more funds. Boston Symphony Orchestra entered the second phase of its current money-raising campaign last week with a warning from the trustees that the orchestra's financial condition is "not only alarming but becoming critical." And the Museum of Fine Arts today launches a drive for corporate gifts as part of its Centennial Fund with the announcement that its real operating income is less today than in the depression of the 1930's.

Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra trustees, said that if BSO is to continue even two or three more seasons, costs must be cut and income substantially increased. The Museum, meanwhile, is raising admission from 50 to 75 cents and closing about 10 per cent of its exhibition space to reduce the expense of security and maintenance. Five million dollars remain to be raised if the Centennial Fund goal is to be reached by the hundredth anniversary date, February 4, 1970.

Like other institutions, the orchestra and the museum have substantial assets, but significant amounts of their endowment funds are restricted so only income from them can be used. Meanwhile, inflation keeps costs climbing. Salaries for musicians, for example, have risen rapidly though not unjustifiably, considering how little these artists were paid a few years ago. At the museum, costs of recent building additions came to $1.5 million more than estimates three years earlier. A work by Monet, purchased for $45,000 in 1956, had to be insured for $1 million 12 years later.

The public has its own problems with inflation, of course, but the appeals of the BSO and museum merit the most generous response possible. Greater Boston and New England have become the singular regions they are in part because of institutions like these. If they are forced to reduce their activities markedly, or to price their services so high that only the most wealthy can enjoy them, dollars could never measure the resulting cost.

Boston Symphony On Financial Rocks?

BOSTON (AP) — The president of the board of directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra says the B.S.O. must spend less money and take in a substantial amount more if it is to continue "even for two or three seasons more."

Talcott M. Banks said Friday that the orchestra's financial plight is "not only alarming, but becoming critical."

"If the symphonyi s to continue even for two or three seasons more," Banks said, "we must reduce expenses and increase our income and contributions — very very substantially."

The B.S.O. "must be maintained, for it is not only the pride of our city but a cultural establishment of inestimable value to our nation and to the entire world of music," he said.

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 96,932

FEB 1 1969 New England

Financial position becoming critical

Boston Globe 2-8-69

Boston Symphony in need of help

By MARGO MILLER
Staff Writer

Henry Lee Higginson founded the Boston Symphony in 1881 and bankrolled it until 1918, when Ernest T. Dane became the orchestra's chief angel. That is, or should be ancient history, but unfortunately the notion clings that the Boston Symphony is rich, that it has unnamed Boston supporters who always will pay its deficits. This is not so, according to Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees.

Last week, before an unprecedented joint meeting of orchestra players, trustees, overseers and staff, Banks announced that the orchestra's financial position is "not only alarming but becoming critical."

With costs rising yearly, the orchestra is somewhat in the position of running hard to stay in the same place. It expects this season to earn 67 percent of its estimated $5 million budget. This percentage would appall a businessman. But among orchestras, the B.S.O.'s consistant 67 percent is a high earned-income rate. The national average of all orchestras, big and small, is currently 55 percent, down from 1965's 62 percent.

There are ways to increase earned income, but to the three most obvious solutions Banks says no, for artistic and humane reasons.

An increase in the size of Symphony Hall (2631 seats) would increase ticket revenue — but at the cost of the Hall's vaunted acoustics.

MILLER
Continued on Page B-85

New fund drive for B.S.O.

163

★MILLER
Continued from Page B-79

Raise ticket prices? (When single tickets are available, they range from $8.75 to $4.) That would restrict music to the well-to-do.

Add more concerts? The musicians already play some 200 programs here, at Tanglewood and on tour. Banks says, "You can't ask players to do more than they can take physically."

Ticket sales last season brought in $1.76 million in Boston and New York and $489,000 at Tanglewood. The B.S.O. leads the world's orchestras in sales of concert tapes for radio broadcast. But its record sales reflect the national downward trend. And of last year's $244,000 in record royalties, $100,000 was a one-shot Reader's Digest package of 10 LPs.

"I used to think the Boston Symphony was rich — until I became a trustee," Banks says. That was in 1954. Educated at Williams College and Harvard Law School, Banks, 63, is a partner in Palmer, Dodge, Gardner and Bradford. His trusteeships include Williams and the Clark Art Institute in Williamstown, and until he became B.S.O. president last Fall, succeeding Henry B. Cabot, he headed the Boston Opera Assn., sponsors of the Metropolitan Opera's annual Spring visit here. Perhaps because of his museum connection, he can make this analogy of the cost of production: "An orchestra has to recreate each performance. A museum doesn't have to repaint each picture each day."

The bulk of the $5 million B.S.O. budget goes, of course, for music costs. Salaries for musicians and conductor, the Pension Fund, and soloists' fees take nearly 60 percent. Slightly under 30 percent goes for concert costs and the orchestra's properties, and about 10 percent for staff and administration. Beginning salary in the orchestra is $14,000 (in 1946 it was $4000). The average salary is now about $20,000, which, Banks says, "compares favorably with the average salary of a full professor."

To bridge the gap between income and expenses, the Boston Symphony has some resources. It has the income ($520,000) from a $2.7 million endowment fund, (but cannot touch the principal) and from an unrestricted fund of $863,000. "We've had to dip into our unrestricted funds," Banks says. Then there was "manna from heaven," a $500,000 gift of the late Mrs. Stanley McCormick, the former Katherine Dexter, in memory of the orchestra's founder, Col Higginson. And there is income from the $2 million Ford Foundation Challenge Grant, though the principal is held in trust in New York until 1976.

The Ford grant ($81 million to 61 orchestras) has been both incentive and hazard in fund raising. Boston raised its matching money ($4 million pledged, $2 million received) without too much trouble; some orchestras found lesser challenges too great and had to give up. The notion that "Ford will always provide" is also not so. Its grants are seed money and of late its massive philanthropy is turning from the arts to public affairs.

Increasingly Boston will have to support its own cultural institutions. Banks thinks there is money around to give, though "my impression is that (the amount) has stabilized. The concept of necessity to maintain essential cultural activity is growing slightly." Boston business interests are slower to respond than, say, in Detroit, Cleveland and Minneapolis.

A new fund drive, details to be announced, is planned. It will be headed by B.S.O. trustee Philip K. Allen, who guided the recent successful drive, and Atty. George Kidder, partner in Hemenway and Barnes (like Banks, Williams and Harvard Law). Allen describes the new campaign as "selective — the bullet vs. the shotgun." Prospects include corporations and "those who gave nothing or who didn't give enough."

Allen also sees another source in "deferred giving" through wills and bequests, and waggishly he suggests such a gift is "another step up toward heaven."

There is also activity in the Berkshires, where community giving has slacked off but where the tourist traffic generated by Tanglewood is a mainstay of the county's economy.

Banks says he has enjoyed his first Hundred Days as Boston Symphony president. Music is his first love. He holds his orchestra second to none, and he thinks it more interesting and more of a challenge "to be involved with the Boston Symphony now than, say, 30 years ago, when everything was essentially stable and predictable."

His predecessor, Henry B. Cabot, once recalled his first days as president and how he got through a smaller financial crisis only because "ladies in Boston were accustomed to paying for their tickets in advance."

BOSTON SYMPHONY MONEY PLIGHT

BOSTON (AP) — The president of the board of directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra says the B.S.O. must spend less money and take in a substantial amount more if it is to continue "even for two or three seasons more."

Talcott M. Banks said yesterday that the orchestra's financial plight is "not only alarming, but becoming critical. If the symphony is to continue even for two or three seasons more," Banks said, "we must reduce expenses and increase our income and contributions — very, very substantially."

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

FEB 1 1969 E

Symphony Is Facing 'Critical' Cash Plight

An appeal for contributions to the Boston Symphony Orchestra was coupled yesterday with the warning that the orchestra's financial plight is "not only alarming, but becoming critical."

"If the Symphony is to continue even for two or three seasons more," Talcott M. Banks, told a gathering in Symphony Hall, "we must reduce expenses and increase our income and contributions—very very substantially."

Banks, who is president of the orchestra's board of trustees, said it was obvious that the orchestra "must be maintained, for it is not only the pride of our city but a cultural establishment of inestimable value to our nation and to the entire world of music."

Banks announced that George Kidder, a Boston attorney, would serve as co-chairman with Philip K. Allen, a symphony trustee, of the second phase of the orchestra's fund-raising campaign.

(Continued on Page Five)

Boston Symphony Faces Critical Financial Trouble

(Continued from First Page)

Among those who heard Banks outline the orchestra's financial crisis were the players, trustees, board of overseers, managerial staff and civic leaders.

Banks said it was "simply not so" that the orchestra "is rich, that it has unnamed supporters who will always pay its deficits.

"Our endowment funds are modest compared with most of the leading charitable and educational institutions in our city and most of our endowment funds are so restricted that only their incomes can be used."

He said this was true of the Ford Foundation's $2 million grant in 1966, which was matched two-for-one by $4 million in public contributions in the first phase of the orchestra's fund drive.

"None of the principal of that money can be touched until 1976," Banks said.

Banks gave a detailed accounting of the orchestra's expenses and the sources of income.

He rejected the idea of enlarging Symphony Hall beyond its 2,631 seats. The hall, he said, "is honored around the world for its acoustics and it would be absolute folly to try to enlarge it."

He also said that ticket prices should be kept "within reason," so that "access to great music should not be restricted to the well-to-do."

BANKS SAID the orchestra's increased expenses were due in part to the "creeping inflation that all of us are aware of every day."

He said the "largest factor" in the higher cost of the orchestra was the contract signed with the musicians last summer, covering the current season and the two following seasons.

The agreement was "gen- [illegible] justi- [illegible]

UNTIL RECENTLY, he said, the compensation of musicians of symphonic calibre had been "appallingly low." In 1938, he said, the orchestra's average salary was $4,000. Although the average had risen by 1946, the minimum was still $4,000.

The guaranteed minimum is now $14,000, with increases assured in the next two years, Banks said, and the average salary "is somewhere in the neighborhood of $20,000."

Banks said the increase had been "rapid and dramatic," with a player's income now comparing "favorably with the average salary of a full professor."

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1969

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 1 1969

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 6 1969

Boston Symphony has money blues

By Roderick Nordell
Arts-entertainment editor of The Christian Science Monitor

Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra faces a dire financial crisis. It is the latest example to surface in a crisis facing symphony orchestras across the United States.

So "alarming," so "critical" is the Boston Symphony's situation that it has brought about the first meeting in the orchestra's history to include players, trustees, overseers, managerial staff, and the Friends of the BSO.

It took place Jan. 31 in the context of a national financial problem for symphonies that has grown with "surprising speed" and that "came to a head in the past year," according to Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's board of trustees.

The Boston orchestra suffers from the same inflationary pressures as other major orchestras. But its crisis is compounded by a myth, said Mr. Banks. According to this myth, the BSO always has someone waiting in the wings to bail it out of money troubles.

This myth is just not true, said Mr. Banks. Having completed the first phase of the first capital fund drive in its history, the orchestra must now immediately begin a second phase of five years. It will use a "bullet" rather than a "shotgun" approach, approaching first a list of some 500 individuals and trying especially for corporate contributions.

Business 'slow'

In the latter respect, Boston is different from some other cities, such as Cleveland, whose symphony enjoys substantial business support. Boston "is slow" in the response of business to the BSO's needs, said Mr. Banks, even though the BSO is one of the major attractions luring executives and specialists to local industry.

Like other American symphonies, the BSO has little likelihood of receiving substantial government aid. Last year, Roger L. Stevens, the Johnson administration's head of the National Endowment for the Arts, said that congressional cuts in requested funds meant that the endowment could do virtually nothing for symphonies.

Yet symphony orchestras are particular victims of inflation. Unlike museums, for example, they do not own their works once they have purchased them. They must create each one anew, paying musicians to play, conductors to conduct, all in addition to the overhead of maintaining a hall whose seating capacity is fixed. The latter circumstance means that they cannot just automatically sell more tickets to meet rising costs.

Payments to musicians have gone up steadily over the years. Boston, after a slow start, now has a good pay scale, according to Mr. Banks, and would not sacrifice it to save money.

Loss 'only' one-third

An idea of the problem may be given by the fact that the BSO meets two-thirds of expenses from income. While a business would not last long at that rate, it is considered a mark of efficiency by BSO officials. "We take pride in losing only 33 percent," said one of them yesterday.

These officials recognize that, like other orchestras, they must do more to attract young people. Already special steps have been taken to let students and other young people know that tickets are available to them.

Also, there is a need for community involvement, a demonstration of the symphony's relevance to the urban scene, to the black community. Government and industry tend to divert funds from cultural "luxuries" to projects "bringing enrichment to people."

Already the orchestra has given concerts in Franklin Park, taken busloads of young people to Tanglewood, offered to cooperate with the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts to the extent the school chooses. Individual players offer free lessons to students at the school.

Windfalls rare

Not many orchestras can hope for such windfalls as the BSO's unexpected link-up with the Reader's Digest recordings program. Sometimes recordings in general have accounted for "as high as 10 percent" of the BSO income.

But so far nothing that has been done is enough to avert the impending crisis. The BSO's extraordinary meeting is intended as a resounding alarm to the community to recognize that great institutions do not exist through some kind of magic, some myth of unnamed benefactors to the rescue.

As far as symphony orchestras go, this needs to be one of those New England shots heard round the world.

164

Hub's Orch Can't Touch Principal, Or Enlarge Hall

Boston, Feb. 25.

Boston Symphony Orchestra is facing a critical cash plight. An appeal for contributions was coupled with the warning that the situation is "not only alarming, but becoming crucial."

"If the Symphony is to continue even for two or three seasons more," Talcott M. Banks, prexy of the orch's board of trustees, told a gathering in Symphony Hall, "we must reduce expenses and increase our income and contributions—very, very substantially."

Banks said it was obvious that the orch "must be maintained, for it is not only the pride of our city but a cultural establishment of inestimable value to our nation and to the entire world of music." Among those who heard Banks outline the orch's financial crisis were the players, trustees, board of overseers, managerial staff and civic leaders.

Banks said it was "simply not so" that the orchestra "is rich, that it has unnamed supporters who will always pay its deficits.

"Our endowment funds are modest compared with most of the leading charitable and educational institutions in our city and most of our endowment funds are so restricted that only their incomes can be used." He said this was true of the Ford Foundation's $2,000,000 grant in 1966, which was matched two-for-one by $4,000,000 in public contributions in the first phase of the orch's fund drive.

"None of the principal of that

(Continued on page 63)

Bost. Symph

Continued from page 61

money can be touched until 1976," Banks said. Banks gave a detailed accounting of the orch's expenses and the sources of income. He rejected the idea of enlarging Symphony Hall beyond its 2,631 seats. "The hall," he said "is honored around the world for its acoustics and it would be absolute folly to try to enlarge it." He also said that ticket prices should be "kept within reason," so that access to great music should not be restricted to the well-to-do."

Banks said the orch's increased expenses were due in part to the "creeping inflation that all of us are aware of every day." The largest factor in the higher cost of the orch was the contract signed with the musicians last summer covering the current season and the two following seasons, he said.

"The agreement was generous, but also fair and justifiable," he said. He pointed out that until recently the compensation of musicians of symphonic calibre had been "appallingly low." In 1938, he said, the orch's average salary was $4,000. Although the average had risen by 1946, the minimum was still $4,000.

The guaranteed minimum is now $14,000, with increases assured in the next two years, Banks said, and the average salary, "is somewhere in the neighborhood of $20,000. He said the increase had been "rapid and dramatic," with a player's income now comparing "favorably with the average salary of a full professor."

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 26 1969

MUSIC NOTES

Federal Funds Could Aid BSO

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

A week ago Friday Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony's Board of Trustees, made the sad news public: the orchestra is in extremely serious financial condition. The days are long gone when the Symphony could turn to its private patron for support, for though Henry L. Higginson single-handedly nurtured the orchestra for the first 67 years of its existence, his effort, combining love, money, and public spirit, was unique.

Now new means of support must be found, new ways to close the ever-growing 'income gap', that is, the difference between operating costs and financial intake. There are certain factors, as Banks pointed out, that resist change. These include the number of concerts the BSO plays (about 200 annually, which, considering the required rehearsal time, is very substantial), the capacity of Symphony Hall, which cannot be enlarged and, thus, cannot yield greater income) without the risk of serious acoustical damage, and the price of tickets, which is now moderate and, on ethical grounds should stay that way, encouraging as diversified a cross-section of the public as possible to partake of BSO activities.

MUSIC THIS WEEK

TODAY—Emil Gilels, pianist, playing von Weber, Beethoven, Ravel, Medtner, Prokofieff. Symphony Hall at 3 p.m.

MONDAY—Civic Symphony, Kalman Novak conducting Balakirev, Tchaikovsky, Mussorgsky. Jordan Hall at 8:30 p.m.

WEDNESDAY—Ali Akbar Khan, sarod player. Sanders Theater at 8:30 p.m.

FRIDAY—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jorge Mester conducting Mozart, Respighi, Stravinsky. Symphony Hall at 2 p.m. Cantata Singers, Richard Kapp conducting Bach, Martin. Sanders Theater at 8:30 p.m.

★

Operating costs for the orchestra this season are $5 million and for the coming season a projected $5.4 million. What rises most rapidly is the amount paid the players, and not administrative costs. Under the terms of their three-year contract, signed this past summer, the players receive a minimum of $14,000 with increases assured over the coming two years. Though its terms impose a burden, the contract is equitable, "generous but also fair and justifiable," according to Banks.

Thus, new sources of funding are needed. There is, it is true, the Ford grant of $2 million and the $4 million that was contributed to match the two-to-one terms the Foundation set, but the principal can't be touched until 1976.

To whom, then, should the Symphony turn? To the average concert-goer, first of all, who has always given willingly—and Banks well realizes that Boston is "a generous city" — to corporations, increasingly coming to the aid of the arts, to municipal and federal agencies.

★

There is a growing need for some sort of governmental support, and a growing awareness that it should be given, since the living arts substantially enrich the texture of our community, seeing to a wide-spread inner need in our lives, and firing the creative imagination of our youth.

I recommend strongly an over-view of the problem entitled "Performing Arts—The Economic Dilemma" by William Baumol and William Bowen (an MIT Paperback); the study deals with music, opera, theater, and dance, goes into considerable detail, and comes up with sobering conclusions.

Though only three years old, the book is already, in one respect, out of date, for costs have spiraled even faster than the authors feared; but nevertheless, you can find much valuable information here, presented with a nice sense of humor that doesn't belie the seriousness of the problem.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 434,330

FEB 9 1969

Money lack hurting music in Boston

Symphony, opera officials say contributions don't meet need

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

Boston's position as a major musical center is in jeopardy. The reason: the institutions that have made Boston a musically interesting city are short of money, some of them to the point where their survival cannot be taken for granted.

The Boston Symphony trustees do not have a reputation for liability to panic or reckless use of inflammatory rhetoric, yet they announced recently that the orchestra's financial condition is "not only alarming, but becoming critical."

The financial health of the New England Conservatory is a matter of extremely serious concern. One of the country's major educational institutions, it is, like the Symphony, not just a local adornment, but an important national cultural resource.

Two younger musical organizations, The Opera Company of Boston and the Boston Philharmonia, are in still more imminent sorts of peril. The Boston Ballet's general manager, Margaret Prausnitz, refers to the company's situation as "precarious."

COSTS RISING

Laszlo J. Bonis, president of the Opera Company of Boston, whose productions directed by Sarah Caldwell have attracted nationwide interest, describes the opera's position today as the "normal acute pre-performance panic." He elaborated: "We don't have a nickel, but that's not new. Panic financing is our normal condition."

The Opera Company's budget for the current season of five productions is $910,000. About $800,000 is for current expenses of producing opera, the rest for payment of debts and interest on bank loans.

Ruth McKay, the Company's executive director, points out that the move this year to the Shubert Theater, made necessary by the tearing down of the Back Bay Theater, is hard on the budget. "It costs at least $150,000 more per season to play to one half the audience." It is far from being merely a question of rental costs. The Shubert is smaller, which unbalances the income-expense ratio and it is a union house, which means that minimal costs for stage hands, box office personnel and and so forth, sky-rocket.

Is there danger that the next production, Verdi's "Macbeth," scheduled for Mar. 31 and Apr. 2 and 4, might not take place? Bonis and Mrs. McKay admit the possibility, but, says Bonis: "That has been true for every one of our production. I have to plan by the week; I can't look ahead longer than that. I may not know where some of next week's money is coming from, but two weeks ago I didn't know where this week's was coming from either."

SMALL BUDGET

A spokesman for the Philharmonia, a chamber orchestra founded last year and run as a musicians' cooperative, admits that the cancellation of the season's final concert, scheduled to take place under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas in Sanders Theater on Apr. 13, has been considered, adding, however, that he hopes this drastic means will not be resorted to. "It couldn't really solve our problems anyway."

The Philharmonia has a relatively small budget — $76,000 for the current season — and its spokesman refers to the business of keeping an orchestra financially afloat as "inverse merchandising." It is an operation, in other words, devoted to providing first-rate orchestral concerts, and that can only cost money, not make money.

The Philarmonia has outstanding debts. Conductors for the last three concerts have not paid, and the players have not been paid for the last two. Part of the problem seems to be that there is a big difference between cash pledges and cash in hand.

There is agreement among representatives of musical institutions that more help must come from the Greater Boston business community. Bonis points out that business contributions account for just 3 percent of the Opera Company's income. The situation is comparable, or even worse, for other institutions and a little better for the Philharmonia only because their budget is so modest.

BUSINESS BACKING

Bonis, a successful businessman himself, believes that the appeal to business cannot be made on a basis of "Look, this is a worthy organization that deserves your support, because the guy may not think so and may not be interested in the arts at all. Instead, you have to make it clear that these firms need the cultural institutions."

In fields, especially the scientific, where recruitment of personnel is highly competitive, a Boston-based firm has an edge on competitors elsewhere because it can offer the rich cultural life here as part of its inducements for moving here.

That appeal worked recently for a major, and immensely rich, firm. The upshot was a check for $500, which Bonis concedes is, under the circumstances, a fidiculous sum, "but it was $500 more than we ever got from them before."

He noticed as well that a major chemical concern listed the Opera Company in its recruitment brochure as one of the reasons for moving to Boston, but had never given the company a penny, and he told them: "You're using us, how about us using you?"

None of these organizations is lacking for evidence that it is needed and appreciated. That alone will not keep them alive, whether you are talking about a young and struggling one like the Philharmonia, or an older, richer, and nonetheless struggling one like the Boston Symphony.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAR 20 1969

Stepchild?

Year after year, the arts finish near last in the race for government funds.

Federal appropriations for the arts amounted to about $20 million last year. For the sciences, including research and development costs, about $20 billion was budgeted — a thousand times more.

Of course, most of the science budgeting is in support of defense and the Vietnam war. Even so, it fairly pictures the priorities in government which leaves the arts — theater, dance, music and the visual arts — near the bottom of the list.

It can be argued that when the Vietnam war ends, there will be a few more dollars in the till for arts support. But the realities include growing, not shrinking defense outlays, and those other massive fiscal omnivores — welfare and the restoration of the cities.

The Business Committee on the Arts met earlier this week and heard a Jeremiad on the paltriness of federal support from Roger L. Stevens, chairman of the National Council on the Arts. But the fact is that businessmen themselves have not dipped very deeply into their corporate pockets; even though businesses are allowed to deduct up to 5 percent of their income for contributions, they have given only 1½ percent to all causes, including education.

There has been much talk in the past few years about public support for the arts. But it hasn't materialized financially. Such lip service will not make up the 15 to 25 percent deficits which theaters face after ticket sales. For symphonies and opera companies that figure rises to 40 percent, leading to such survival crises as that facing the Boston Symphony.

It is easy to understand why European countries are more willing to subsidize the arts. The arts there were for centuries patronized by the aristocracy. When power was transferred to the state, the state also assumed the role of patron.

In America, there was no such tradition to be taken over. Here, if it were not for the munificence of a few foundations, most notably the Ford and Rockefeller foundations, the arts in this land would be in a sorrier state than they are.

The nation — business as well as government — must face up to supporting its beautiful daughter as well as its warrior son.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 3 1969

New England

Musical Notes

Boston Symphony Plight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the best in the nation, says its financial situation is "not only alarming, but becoming crucial." Players, trustees, the Board of Overseers, the managerial staff and civic leaders were told in a meeting that expenses must be reduced and income and contributions increased "very, very substantially." Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees, added that the rise in expenses was due to inflation, and at the same time defended the players' recent salary increase, cautioned against raising ticket prices and rejected the idea of enlarging the "acoustically perfect" Symphony Hall beyond its 2,631 seats . . . Gunther Schuller and Seiji Ozawa have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood, beginning in 1970. The Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony. William Steinberg will become music director of the symphony next fall, but he will also be retaining his position with the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Schuller

The U.S. and Soviet cultural exchange is back in full swing after a half-year freeze. Not only are Soviet groups such as the Borodin Quartet, which played in Dallas recently, touring the United States, but the University of Minnesota Band will be the first of the U.S. groups to tour Russia starting later this month. The band was originally scheduled to tour the Soviet Union last September, but the State Department postponed the trip because of the Czech crisis . . . Italian composer Luigi Dallapiccola will be the composer-in-residence at the Aspen Music Festival's Conference on Contemporary Music next summer. Dallapiccola will be in Aspen from July 16 to July 30 . . . French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez will make his debut with the New York Philharmonic Thursday. He will be the orchestra's guest conductor for four weeks . . . The Cologne Chamber Orchestra will give a concert at Texas Christian University's Ed Landreth Auditorium starting at 8 p.m. Monday. Tickets are $2.50 for the program of Bach, Telemann, Haydn, Schubert and Mozart . . . North Texas State University's A Cappella Choir will finish its annual concert tour with a performance at 8:15 p.m. Friday in the NTSU Main Auditorium. The public performance will be free. —O.C.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 269,449 SUN. 243,379

MAR 9 1969

164

Hub's Orch Can't Touch Principal, Or Enlarge Hall

Boston, Feb. 25.

Boston Symphony Orchestra is facing a critical cash plight. An appeal for contributions was coupled with the warning that the situation is "not only alarming, but becoming crucial."

"If the Symphony is to continue even for two or three seasons more," Talcott M. Banks, prexy of the orch's board of trustees, told a gathering in Symphony Hall, "we must reduce expenses and increase our income and contributions—very, very substantially."

Banks said it was obvious that the orch "must be maintained, for it is not only the pride of our city but a cultural establishment of inestimable value to our nation and to the entire world of music." Among those who heard Banks outline the orch's financial crisis were the players, trustees, board of overseers, managerial staff and civic leaders.

Banks said it was "simply not so" that the orchestra "is rich, that it has unnamed supporters who will always pay its deficits.

"Our endowment funds are modest compared with most of the leading charitable and educational institutions in our city and most of our endowment funds are so restricted that only their incomes can be used." He said this was true of the Ford Foundation's $2,000,000 grant in 1966, which was matched two-for-one by $4,000,000 in public contributions in the first phase of the orch's fund drive.

"None of the principal of that

(Continued on page 63)

Bost. Symph

Continued from page 61

money can be touched until 1976," Banks said. Banks gave a detailed accounting of the orch's expenses and the sources of income. He rejected the idea of enlarging Symphony Hall beyond its 2,631 seats. "The hall," he said "is honored around the world for its acoustics and it would be absolute folly to try to enlarge it." He also said that ticket prices should be "kept within reason," so that access to great music should not be restricted to the well-to-do."

Banks said the orch's increased expenses were due in part to the "creeping inflation that all of us are aware of every day." The largest factor in the higher cost of the orch was the contract signed with the musicians last summer covering the current season and the two following seasons, he said.

"The agreement was generous, but also fair and justifiable," he said. He pointed out that until recently the compensation of musicians of symphonic calibre had been "appallingly low." In 1938, he said, the orch's average salary was $4,000. Although the average had risen by 1946, the minimum was still $4,000.

The guaranteed minimum is now $14,000, with increases assured in the next two years. Banks said, and the average salary, "is somewhere in the neighborhood of $20,000. He said the increase had been "rapid and dramatic," with a player's income now comparing "favorably with the average salary of a full professor."

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 26 1969

Money lack hurting music in Boston

Symphony, opera officials say contributions don't meet need

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

Boston's position as a major musical center is in jeopardy. The reason: the institutions that have made Boston a musically interesting city are short of money, some of them to the point where their survival cannot be taken for granted.

The Boston Symphony trustees do not have a reputation for liability to panic or reckless use of inflammatory rhetoric, yet they announced recently that the orchestra's financial condition is "not only alarming, but becoming critical."

The financial health of the New England Conservatory is a matter of extremely serious concern. One of the country's major educational institutions, it is, like the Symphony, not just a local adornment, but an important national cultural resource.

Two younger musical organizations, The Opera Company of Boston and the Boston Philharmonia, are in still more imminent sorts of peril. The Boston Ballet's general manager, Margaret Prausnitz, refers to the company's situation as "precarious."

COSTS RISING

Laszlo J. Bonis, president of the Opera Company of Boston, whose productions directed by Sarah Caldwell have attracted nationwide interest, describes the opera's position today as the "normal acute pre-performance panic." He elaborated: "We don't have a nickel, but that's not new. Panic financing is our normal condition."

The Opera Company's budget for the current season of five productions is $910,000. About $800,000' is for current expenses of producing opera, the rest for payment of debts and interest on bank loans.

Ruth McKay, the Company's executive director, points out that the move this year to the Shubert Theater, made necessary by the tearing down of the Back Bay Theater, is hard on the budget. "It costs at least $150,000 more per season to play to one half the audience." It is far from being merely a question of rental costs. The Shubert is smaller, which unbalances the income-expense ratio and it is a union house, which means that minimal costs for stage hands, box office personnel and and so forth, sky-rocket.

Is there danger that the next production, Verdi's "Macbeth," scheduled for Mar. 31 and Apr. 2 and 4, might not take place? Bonis and Mrs. McKay admit the possibility, but, says Bonis: "That has been true for every one of our production. I have to plan by the week; I can't look ahead longer than that. I may not know where some of next week's money is coming from, but two weeks ago I didn't know where this week's was coming from either."

SMALL BUDGET

A spokesman for the Philharmonia, a chamber orchestra founded last year and run as a musicians' cooperative, admits that the cancellation of the season's final concert, scheduled to take place under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas in Sanders Theater on Apr. 13, has been considered, adding, however, that he hopes this drastic means will not be resorted to. "It couldn't really solve our problems anyway."

The Philharmonia has a relatively small budget — $76,000 for the current season — and its spokesman refers to the business of keeping an orchestra financially afloat as "inverse merchandising." It is an operation, in other words, devoted to providing first-rate orchestral concerts, and that can only cost money, not make money.

The Philarmonia has outstanding debts. Conductors for the last three concerts have not paid, and the players nave not been paid for the last two. Part of the problem seems to be that there is a big difference between cash pledges and cash in hand.

There is agreement among representatives of musical institutions that more help must come from the Greater Boston business community. Bonis points out that business contributions account for just 3 percent of the Opera Company's income. The situation is comparable, or even worse, for other institutions and a little better for the Philharmonia only because their budget is so modest.

BUSINESS BACKING

Bonis, a successful businessman himself, believes that the appeal to business cannot be made on a basis of "Look, this is a worthy organization that deserves your support, because the guy may not think so and may not be interested in the arts at all. Instead, you have to make it clear that these firms need the cultural institutions."

In fields, especially the scientific, where recruitment of personnel is highly competitive, a Boston-based firm has an edge on competitors elsewhere because it can offer the rich cultural life here as part of its inducements for moving here.

That appeal worked recently for a major, and immensely rich, firm. The upshot was a check for $500, which Bonis concedes is, under the circumstances, a fidiculous sum, "but it was $500 more than we ever got from them before."

He noticed as well that a major chemical concern listed the Opera Company in its recruitment brochure as one of the reasons for moving to Boston, but had never given the company a penny, and he told them: "You're using us, how about us using you?"

None of these organizations is lacking for evidence that it is needed and appreciated. That alone will not keep them alive, whether you are talking about a young and struggling one like the Philharmonia, or an older, richer, and nonetheless struggling one like the Boston Symphony.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAR 20 1969

Stepchild?

Year after year, the arts finish near last in the race for government funds.

Federal appropriations for the arts amounted to about $20 million last year. For the sciences, including research and development costs, about $20 billion was budgeted — a thousand times more.

Of course, most of the science budgeting is in support of defense and the Vietnam war. Even so, it fairly pictures the priorities in government which leaves the arts — theater, dance, music and the visual arts — near the bottom of the list.

It can be argued that when the Vietnam war ends, there will be a few more dollars in the till for arts support. But the realities include growing, not shrinking defense outlays, and those other massive fiscal omnivores — welfare and the restoration of the cities.

The Business Committee on the Arts met earlier this week and heard a Jeremiad on the paltriness of federal support from Roger L. Stevens, chairman of the National Council on the Arts. But the fact is that businessmen themselves have not dipped very deeply into their corporate pockets; even though businesses are allowed to deduct up to 5 percent of their income for contributions, they have given only 1½ percent to all causes, including education.

There has been much talk in the past few years about public support for the arts. But it hasn't materialized financially. Such lip service will not make up the 15 to 25 percent deficits which theaters face after ticket sales. For symphonies and opera companies that figure rises to 40 percent, leading to such survival crises as that facing the Boston Symphony.

It is easy to understand why European countries are more willing to subsidize the arts. The arts there were for centuries patronized by the aristocracy. When power was transferred to the state, the state also assumed the role of patron.

In America, there was no such tradition to be taken over. Here, if it were not for the munificence of a few foundations, most notably the Ford and Rockefeller foundations, the arts in this land would be in a sorrier state than they are.

The nation — business as well as government — must face up to supporting its beautiful daughter as well as its warrior son.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 3 1969 New England

MUSIC NOTES

Federal Funds Could Aid BSO

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

A week ago Friday Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony's Board of Trustees, made the sad news public: the orchestra is in extremely serious financial condition. The days are long gone when the Symphony could turn to its private patron for support, for though Henry L. Higginson single-handedly nurtured the orchestra for the first 67 years of its existence, his effort, combining love, money, and public spirit, was unique.

Now new means of support must be found, new ways to close the ever-growing 'income gap', that is, the difference between operating costs and financial intake. There are certain factors, as Banks pointed out, that resist change. These include the number of concerts the BSO plays (about 200 annually, which, considering the required rehearsal time, is very substantial), the capacity of Symphony Hall, which cannot be enlarged and, thus, cannot yield greater income) without the risk of serious acoustical damage, and the price of tickets, which is now moderate and, on ethical grounds should stay that way, encouraging as diversified a cross-section of the public as possible to partake of BSO activities.

★

Operating costs for the orchestra this season are $5 million and for the coming season a projected $5.4 million. What rises most rapidly is the amount paid the players, and not administrative costs. Under the terms of their three-year contract, signed this past summer, the players receive a minimum of $14,000 with increases assured over the coming two years. Though its terms impose a burden, the contract is equitable, "generous but also fair and justifiable," according to Banks.

Thus, new sources of funding are needed. There is, it is true, the Ford grant of $2 million and the $4 million that was contributed to match the two-to-one terms the Foundation set, but the principal can't be touched until 1976.

To whom, then, should the Symphony turn? To the average concert-goer, first of all, who has always given willingly—and Banks well realizes that Boston is "a generous city" — to corporations, increasingly coming to the aid of the arts, to municipal and federal agencies.

★

There is a growing need for some sort of governmental support, and a growing awareness that it should be given, since the living arts substantially enrich the texture of our community, seeing to a wide-spread inner need in our lives, and firing the creative imagination of our youth.

I recommend strongly an over-view of the problem entitled "Performing Arts—The Economic Dilemma" by William Baumol and William Bowen (an MIT Paperback); the study deals with music, opera, theater, and dance, goes into considerable detail, and comes up with sobering conclusions.

Though only three years old, the book is already, in one respect, out of date, for costs have spiraled even faster than the authors feared; but nevertheless, you can find much valuable information here, presented with a nice sense of humor that doesn't belie the seriousness of the problem.

MUSIC THIS WEEK

TODAY—Emil Giles, pianist, playing von Weber, Beethoven, Ravel, Medtner, Prokofieff. Symphony Hall at 3 p.m.

MONDAY—Civic Symphony, Kalman Novak conducting Balakirev, Tchaikovsky, Mussorgsky. Jordan Hall at 8:30 p.m.

WEDNESDAY—Ali Akbar Khan, sarod player. Sanders Theater at 8:30 p.m.

FRIDAY—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jorge Mester conducting Mozart, Respighi, Stravinsky. Symphony Hall at 2 p.m. Cantata Singers, Richard Kapp conducting Bach, Martin. Sanders Theater at 8:30 p.m.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 434,230

FEB 9 1969

Musical Notes

Boston Symphony Plight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the best in the nation, says its financial situation is "not only alarming, but becoming crucial." Players, trustees, the Board of Overseers, the managerial staff and civic leaders were told in a meeting that expenses must be reduced and income and contributions increased "very, very substantially." Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees, added that the rise in expenses was due to inflation, and at the same time defended the players' recent salary increase, cautioned against raising ticket prices and rejected the idea of enlarging the "acoustically perfect" Symphony Hall beyond its 2,631 seats . . . Gunther Schuller and Seiji Ozawa have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood, beginning in 1970. The Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony. William Steinberg will become music director of the symphony next fall, but he will also be retaining his position with the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Schuller

The U.S. and Soviet cultural exchange is back in full swing after a half-year freeze. Not only are Soviet groups such as the Borodin Quartet, which played in Dallas recently, touring the United States, but the University of Minnesota Band will be the first of the U.S. groups to tour Russia starting later this month. The band was originally scheduled to tour the Soviet Union last September, but the State Department postponed the trip because of the Czech crisis . . . Italian composer Luigi Dallapiccola will be the composer-in-residence at the Aspen Music Festival's Conference on Contemporary Music next summer. Dallapiccola will be in Aspen from July 16 to July 30 . . . French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez will make his debut with the New York Philharmonic Thursday. He will be the orchestra's guest conductor for four weeks . . . The Cologne Chamber Orchestra will give a concert at Texas Christian University's Ed Landreth Auditorium starting at 8 p.m. Monday. Tickets are $2.50 for the program of Bach, Telemann, Haydn, Schubert and Mozart . . . North Texas State University's A Cappella Choir will finish its annual concert tour with a performance at 8:15 p.m. Friday in the NTSU Main Auditorium. The public performance will be free. —O.C.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 209,449 SUN. 213,379

MAR 9 1969

165

Business and Arts Make a Good Match

Culture's crystal ball envisions a new partnership: That of business and the arts. Necessity is the mutual attraction. The combination of televised exposure to the arts and a better-educated population produces a citizenry which seeks more cultural outlets. Little theater groups, dance companies and symphony orchestras and choruses have sprung up in hundreds of communities. As hunger for art grows the organization dispensing it expands and improves, adding to its cost, to meet audience demand for more and better programs while funds to maintain even the status quo dwindle.

Meanwhile business firms have discovered that supporting the arts has left the category of "charity" and now is a matter of sound business practices if they would attract the new breed of executives whose cultural awareness matches their professional acumen. Thus, the conditions for a fruitful marriage exists. But one of the partners, the one with the money, needs a little urging.

About a year ago, the nation-wide Business Committee for the Arts, Inc., (BCA) was formed by 95 leading business executives dedicated to the proposition that "a healthy artistic life is an important element . . . that fully merits the support of the business sector." Over the weekend its president, G. A. McClellan visited Connecticut for the first time speaking in New London to the combined Southeastern Connecticut and Norwich Area Chambers of Commerce and friends of the Eastern Connecticut Symphony. He cited the growing trend of firms seeking new locations to give top priority to an area's condition for intellectual stimulation, knowing young executives may be retained or lost depending on that very fact. One of his illustrations cited an Orlando, Florida corporation which credits the city's symphony orchestra, two little theater groups, an arts center and Rollins College as factors keeping its engineers' turnover rate among the country's lowest.

Yet, across the nation, each of those cultural avenues runs in the red every year. The Eastern Connecticut Symphony must raise a budget of $31,000 or halt its expanded series, 100-voice chorus, Youth Orchestra and school mini-concerts which numbered 65 last year. Hartford Symphony fortunately met its $100,000 goal in 1968 but unlike Cleveland's orchestra lacks substantial support of business. Even the Boston Symphony operates at a 33 per cent annual loss, its condition now described as "alarming" and "critical." Business and the arts would be a good match if the bridegroom would loosen his purse strings. The bride's dowry is worth it.

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 150,750

MAR 25 1969 New England

Symphony Orchestras Face 'Economic Crisis' In Five Major Cities

* * *

Study Shows Costs in Chicago, Boston, New York, Cleveland, Philadelphia Outpace Revenue

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

CLEVELAND—Five major U.S. symphony orchestras face a "severe economic crisis" as costs outrace revenue, a management study shows.

The report, commissioned by the orchestras in Cleveland, Boston, Chicago, New York and Philadelphia, says the annual operating deficit of the five groups widened to $5.7 million in 1967-68 from $2.9 million in 1963-64. At that rate, the five orchestras will have annual operating deficits approaching $8 million by the 1971-72 season, the report added.

The study was made by the Cleveland office of McKinsey & Co., a management consulting company.

Since 1963-64, costs have risen 59%, while operating revenue has increased only 44%, the report says. Costs are affected by an expanded orchestra season and higher salaries for musicians. The average minimum annual salary for musicians in the five orchestras rose to $11,800 in 1967-68 from $7,700 in 1963-64, while in the same period the average annual salary increased to $14,400 from $9,100.

Orchestras in Chicago, Cleveland and Boston had sizable deficits in 1967-68 despite nonoperating income from endowments, grants and annual maintenance campaigns.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra deficit in 1967-68 was $710,000; the Cleveland Orchestra, $591,000, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, $292,000. The Philadelphia orchestra had a deficit of $76,000, while the New York Philharmonic had a surplus of $31,000. The report notes that the New York, Philadelphia and Boston symphonies have larger concert halls and give more performances in their home series.

"Outlook for Increased Pressure"

"While New York and Philadelphia were in a stronger position last year," the report says, "the outlook for increased pressure on orchestra budgets will probably endanger them in the future."

The report doesn't conclude that any of the orchestras may cease operation, but urges management of the groups to "work together to meet future economic pressures and challenges," through coordinated fund-raising efforts with the Federal Government, national foundations and potential corporate donors.

The orchestras face increased cost pressures because most concerts already are sold out and managements are reluctant to raise ticket prices. In addition, income from royalty and broadcast sources has remained constant, the study says.

The study shows that all five of the orchestras will face sizable overall losses in 1971-72, even after nonoperating funds are considered, unless additional funds are raised. "To break even, they will need to double their nonoperating income in the next four years," the report says.

The report urged orchestra managements to develop "better methods of communicating with orchestra members and their bargaining representatives" particularly when "certain management actions may not be popular with some musicians who haven't been fully apprised of the severe problems facing the orchestras."

Meeting in Cleveland

General managers of the five orchestras will meet in Cleveland July 11 to discuss the problems.

Commenting on the report, Frank E. Joseph, chairman of the Musical Arts Association, parent organization of the Cleveland Orchestra, said, "Our annual operating deficit now has reached such a proportion as to threaten the continuation of the Cleveland Orchestra as perhaps the greatest musical ensemble in the world today."

Alfred M. Rankin, president of the association, said the Cleveland group expects a $1.1 million deficit on May 31, and that current fund-raising efforts appear likely to "fall short of our financial requirements by $500,000 to $600,000."

The deficiency will be made up from unrestricted endowment funds, "which are severely limited," he added. "It now appears that our available endowment will be completely exhausted if it is necessary to invade our resources to the same extent next year."

WALL STREET JOURNAL (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. EASTERN ED. 375,100

MAY 19 1969 New England

TRAVEL
FLORAL PARK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 279,000

MAY 1969

Around The Country

By Edward M. Mintz

There's a crisis in the great culture boom that built the glass and marble palaces over the past decade. In New York, Lincoln Center is having trouble balancing its budget—for $3,000,000 you can have the Juilliard Theatre one of the components of Lincoln Center named for you, or for $1,000,000 a drama workshop—and the N.Y. State Council on the Arts is facing a budget cut, while the Museum of Modern Art has named CBS' William S. Paley to head a drive for $50,000,000. Atlanta's new $13,000,000 Memorial Art Center closed its repertory theater, ballet, opera company and children's theater, for lack of funds. Some $50,000,000 in contracts has been let for the construction of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C. but an additional $15,000,000 will be needed, according to its sponsors. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is appealing for contributions for a situation that is "not only alarming, but becoming crucial." Philadelphia's financial crisis threatens to kill the summer season of free concerts at Robin Hood Dell, and in Newark the Museum and Public Library are fighting for their lives because of a severe fiscal crisis. Even in far off Sydney, Australia, the opera house is in trouble. So support your local performing arts center now, or there may not be one.

Boston's, nation's orchestras in financial troubles

By HARRY NEVILLE
Staff Writer

U. S. symphony orchestras are in serious financial trouble — so much so that one New York City fund-raising expert thinks that at least one-third of the nation's major orchestras will be defunct within five years.

Symphony officials in Detroit recently stated that their orchestra is on the verge of bankruptcy, and the Cleveland Orchestra — one of the country's most prestigious — has had to utilize endowment fund capital in order to meet growing deficits. One of its officials has also mentioned the possibility of bankruptcy.

Board members of at least four important orchestras have discussed proposals for consolidation of playing forces.

And one of the country's foremost orchestras, the Minneapolis Symphony, recently changed its name to the Minnesota Orchestra and shifted from a city to a regional operating basis, partly as a means of obtaining an additional market.

The nature and extent of the crisis are reflected in the figures of a recent study made by the Cleveland office of McKinsey & Co., a management consulting firm.

Commissioned by the principal orchestras of Cleveland, Boston, Chicago, New York and Philadelphia, the report showed the combined annual operating deficit for the five groups had grown to $5.7 million in 1967-68, as compared to $2.9 million in 1963-64. The deficit at the end of the 1971-72 season was projected at nearly $8 million.

Costs have risen 59 percent since 1963-64, the report says, while operating revenue has increased only 44 percent. The increase was caused, in part, by an expanded season and higher salaries for players. Musicians' minimum average annual salaries in the five groups rose from $7,700 in 1963-64 to $11,800 in 1967-68, while in the same period average annual salaries increased from $9,100 to $14,400.

Despite non-operating income from endowments, grants and annual maintenance campaigns, Cleveland, Chicago, and Boston orchestras had sizable deficits in 1967-68.

Hardest hit was Chicago, with $710,000. Cleveland was next with $591,000, and Boston third with $292,00.-

Philadelphia's deficit was a relatively mild $76,000, and the N.Y. Philharmonic managed a surplus of $31,000. The report says, however, that increased budgetary pressures will probably endanger New York and Philadelphia in the future.

Early this year Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony's board of trustees, described that orchestra's finacial position as "not only alarming but becoming critical." He indicated that increasing an orchestra's earned income is a difficult thing.

There are three obvious ways of doing this, none of which are acceptable solutions. The size of Symphony Hall cannot be increased because this would be at the expense of the Hall's celebrated accoustics.

An increase in prices would place tickets beyond the means of all but a privileged few. More concerts would be a physical impossibility for the musicians, who already play some 200 programs here, at Tanglewood and on tour.

Boston has mounted a new five-year fund drive, but this too is fraught with a certain amount of difficulty. Banks considers Boston a generous community, but he indicated business interests are slower to respond here than in several comparable communities.

The Ford Foundation has been extremely generous to orchestras. In 1966 it gave a total of $80.2 million to 61 different groups, with the proviso that certain matching funds would be raised by the orchestras themselves. Many were unable to qualify.

As for government help, Katharine Graham of the Washington Post probably spoke conclusively when she said before the recent convention of the American Symphony Orchestra League: "I fear that much effort in the world of arts has been wasted on the illusion that the government — at all levels — will bring rescue and solvency. This, I believe, is fantasy."

At this point few observers close to the musical scene see the situation as anything less than grim. Not only does the country seem to have more orchestras than it can or cares to support, but several commentators are predicting with utter seriousness the end of the symphony orchestra as a viable musical institution in America.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 23 1969 New England

Seeding and Watering the Arts

The arts, too, play an educational role. They instruct, provoke, offer insights, broaden horizons. Yet in Massachusetts, government support for the arts has been minuscule even beside the sometimes limited support for other forms of education (see above).

Not until 1966 did the Commonwealth create a Council on the Arts and Humanities, and not until the current fiscal year, about to end, did it provide the council with more than a token budget. At that, the $100,000 appropriated to "stimulate and encourage" the arts and humanities is a modest investment compared to what several other states spend.

For the next fiscal year $150,000 was requested for the Council. A third of that was gone when the budget came out of the House, and the Senate did not restore it.

In a state budget of $1.5 billion, $50,000 is almost infinitesimal. To the Council on the Arts and Humanities, however, it represents a number of worthwhile programs. Ventures encouraged by the Council cover a wide range—art classes for children, special concerts and theater performances, workshops for teachers and artists, restoration of works of art, preservation of historical documents, to name only a few. The Council stresses support, not subsidy. It makes no handouts but contracts with organizations and individuals for services rendered. What financial assistance it gives is considered seed money.

In the world of the arts, as elsewhere, promising programs need to be not only seeded but watered before they flourish. A bigger budget would enable the Council, while seeding new undertakings, to give another year of support to valuable but struggling projects.

It is probably naive to think that the conference committee will rectify the failures of the House and Senate and restore the full budget request for the Council. Legislators, even if they know art, also know what they like, and that is to keep taxpayers as happy as possible. Perhaps the greatest naivete exists among those who appreciate the role of the arts and who have benefitted from the work of the Council, but who did not realize that it was necessary to tell the lawmakers that as taxpayers and citizens they were unhappy about the Council's budget cut.

6/24/69
Boston Herald Traveller

165

Business and Arts Make a Good Match

Culture's crystal ball envisions a new partnership: That of business and the arts. Necessity is the mutual attraction. The combination of televised exposure to the arts and a better-educated population produces a citizenry which seeks more cultural outlets. Little theater groups, dance companies and symphony orchestras and choruses have sprung up in hundreds of communities. As hunger for art grows the organization dispensing it expands and improves, adding to its cost, to meet audience demand for more and better programs while funds to maintain even the status quo dwindle.

Meanwhile business firms have discovered that supporting the arts has left the category of "charity" and now is a matter of sound business practices if they would attract the new breed of executives whose cultural awareness matches their professional acumen. Thus, the conditions for a fruitful marriage exists. But one of the partners, the one with the money, needs a little urging.

About a year ago, the nation-wide Business Committee for the Arts, Inc., (BCA) was formed by 95 leading business executives dedicated to the proposition that "a healthy artistic life is an important element . . . that fully merits the support of the business sector." Over the weekend its president, G. A. McClellan visited Connecticut for the first time speaking in New London to the combined Southeastern Connecticut and Norwich Area Chambers of Commerce and friends of the Eastern Connecticut Symphony. He cited the growing trend of firms seeking new locations to give top priority to an area's condition for intellectual stimulation, knowing young executives may be retained or lost depending on that very fact. One of his illustrations cited an Orlando, Florida corporation which credits the city's symphony orchestra, two little theater groups, an arts center and Rollins College as factors keeping its engineers' turnover rate among the country's lowest.

Yet, across the nation, each of those cultural avenues runs in the red every year. The Eastern Connecticut Symphony must raise a budget of $31,000 or halt its expanded series, 100-voice chorus, Youth Orchestra and school mini-concerts which numbered 65 last year. Hartford Symphony fortunately met its $100,000 goal in 1968 but unlike Cleveland's orchestra lacks substantial support of business. Even the Boston Symphony operates at a 33 per cent annual loss, its condition now described as "alarming" and "critical." Business and the arts would be a good match if the bridegroom would loosen his purse strings. The bride's dowry is worth it.

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 150,750

MAR 25 1969 New England

Symphony Orchestras Face 'Economic Crisis' In Five Major Cities

* * *

Study Shows Costs in Chicago, Boston, New York, Cleveland, Philadelphia Outpace Revenue

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

CLEVELAND—Five major U.S. symphony orchestras face a "severe economic crisis" as costs outrace revenue, a management study shows.

The report, commissioned by the orchestras in Cleveland, Boston, Chicago, New York and Philadelphia, says the annual operating deficit of the five groups widened to $5.7 million in 1967-68 from $2.9 million in 1963-64. At that rate, the five orchestras will have annual operating deficits approaching $8 million by the 1971-72 season, the report added.

The study was made by the Cleveland office of McKinsey & Co., a management consulting company.

Since 1963-64, costs have risen 59%, while operating revenue has increased only 44%, the report says. Costs are affected by an expanded orchestra season and higher salaries for musicians. The average minimum annual salary for musicians in the five orchestras rose to $11,800 in 1967-68 from $7,700 in 1963-64, while in the same period the average annual salary increased to $14,400 from $9,100.

Orchestras in Chicago, Cleveland and Boston had sizable deficits in 1967-68 despite nonoperating income from endowments, grants and annual maintenance campaigns.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra deficit in 1967-68 was $710,000; the Cleveland Orchestra, $591,000, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, $292,000. The Philadelphia orchestra had a deficit of $76,000, while the New York Philharmonic had a surplus of $31,000. The report notes that the New York, Philadelphia and Boston symphonies have larger concert halls and give more performances in their home series.

"Outlook for Increased Pressure"

"While New York and Philadelphia were in a stronger position last year," the report says, "the outlook for increased pressure on orchestra budgets will probably endanger them in the future."

The report doesn't conclude that any of the orchestras may cease operation, but urges management of the groups to "work together to meet future economic pressures and challenges," through coordinated fund-raising efforts with the Federal Government, national foundations and potential corporate donors.

The orchestras face increased cost pressures because most concerts already are sold out and managements are reluctant to raise ticket prices. In addition, income from royalty and broadcast sources has remained constant, the study says.

The study shows that all five of the orchestras will face sizable overall losses in 1971-72, even after nonoperating funds are considered, unless additional funds are raised. "To break even, they will need to double their nonoperating income in the next four years," the report says.

The report urged orchestra managements to develop "better methods of communicating with orchestra members and their bargaining representatives" particularly when "certain management actions may not be popular with some musicians who haven't been fully apprised of the severe problems facing the orchestras."

Meeting in Cleveland

General managers of the five orchestras will meet in Cleveland July 11 to discuss the problems.

Commenting on the report, Frank E. Joseph, chairman of the Musical Arts Association, parent organization of the Cleveland Orchestra, said, "Our annual operating deficit now has reached such a proportion as to threaten the continuation of the Cleveland Orchestra as perhaps the greatest musical ensemble in the world today."

Alfred M. Rankin, president of the association, said the Cleveland group expects a $1.1 million deficit on May 31, and that current fund-raising efforts appear likely to "fall short of our financial requirements by $500,000 to $600,000."

The deficiency will be made up from unrestricted endowment funds, "which are severely limited," he added. "It now appears that our available endowment will be completely exhausted if it is necessary to invade our resources to the same extent next year."

TRAVEL
FLORAL PARK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 279,000

MAY 1969

Around The Country

By Edward N. White

There's a crisis in the great culture boom that built the glass and marble palaces over the past decade. In New York, Lincoln Center is having trouble balancing its budget—for $3,000,000 you can have the Juilliard Theatre one of the components of Lincoln Center named for you, or for $1,000,000 a drama workshop—and the N.Y. State Council on the Arts is facing a budget cut, while the Museum of Modern Art has named CBS' William S. Paley to head a drive for $50,000,000. Atlanta's new $13,000,000 Memorial Art Center closed its repertory theater, ballet, opera company and children's theater, for lack of funds. Some $50,000,000 in contracts has been let for the construction of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C. but an additional $15,000,000 will be needed, according to its sponsors. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is appealing for contributions for a situation that is "not only alarming, but becoming crucial." Philadelphia's financial crisis threatens to kill the summer season of free concerts at Robin Hood Dell, and in Newark the Museum and Public Library are fighting for their lives because of a severe fiscal crisis. Even in far off Sydney, Australia, the opera house is in trouble. So support your local performing arts center now, or there may not be one.

WALL STREET JOURNAL (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. EASTERN ED. 375,100

MAY 19 1969 New England

Boston's, nation's orchestras in financial troubles

By HARRY NEVILLE
Staff Writer

U. S. symphony orchestras are in serious financial trouble — so much so that one New York City fund-raising expert thinks that at least one-third of the nation's major orchestras will be defunct within five years.

Symphony officials in Detroit recently stated that their orchestra is on the verge of bankruptcy, and the Cleveland Orchestra — one of the country's most prestigious — has had to utilize endowment fund capital in order to meet growing deficits. One of its officials has also mentioned the possibility of bankruptcy.

Board members of at least four important orchestras have discussed proposals for consolidation of playing forces.

And one of the country's foremost orchestras, the Minneapolis Symphony, recently changed its name to the Minnesota Orchestra and shifted from a city to a regional operating basis, partly as a means of obtaining an additional market.

The nature and extent of the crisis are reflected in the figures of a recent study made by the Cleveland office of McKinsey & Co., a management consulting firm.

Commissioned by the principal orchestras of Cleveland, Boston, Chicago, New York and Philadelphia, the report showed the combined annual operating deficit for the five groups had grown to $5.7 million in 1967-68, as compared to $2.9 million in 1963-64. The deficit at the end of the 1971-72 season was projected at nearly $8 million.

Costs have risen 59 percent since 1963-64, the report says, while operating revenue has increased only 44 percent. The increase was caused, in part, by an expanded season and higher salaries for players. Musicians' minimum average annual salaries in the five groups rose from $7,700 in 1963-64 to $11,800 in 1967-68, while in the same period average annual salaries increased from $9,100 to $14,400.

Despite non-operating income from endowments, grants and annual maintenance campaigns, Cleveland, Chicago, and Boston orchestras had sizable deficits in 1967-68.

Hardest hit was Chicago, with $710,000. Cleveland was next with $591,000, and Boston third with $292,00.-

Philadelphia's deficit was a relatively mild $76,000, and the N.Y. Philharmonic managed a surplus of $31,000. The report says, however, that increased budgetary pressures will probably endanger New York and Philadelphia in the future.

Early this year Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony's board of trustees, described that orchestra's finacial position as "not only alarming but becoming critical." He indicated that increasing an orchestra's earned income is a difficult thing.

There are three obvious ways of doing this, none of which are acceptable solutions. The size of Symphony Hall cannot be increased because this would be at the expense of the Hall's celebrated accoustics.

An increase in prices would place tickets beyond the means of all but a privileged few. More concerts would be a physical impossibility for the musicians, who already play some 200 programs here, at Tanglewood and on tour.

Boston has mounted a new five-year fund drive, but this too is fraught with a certain amount of difficulty. Banks considers Boston a generous community, but he indicated business interests are slower to respond here than in several comparable communities.

The Ford Foundation has been extremely generous to orchestras. In 1966 it gave a total of $80.2 million to 61 different groups, with the proviso that certain matching funds would be raised by the orchestras themselves. Many were unable to qualify.

As for government help, Katharine Graham of the Washington Post probably spoke conclusively when she said before the recent convention of the American Symphony Orchestra League: "I fear that much effort in the world of arts has been wasted on the illusion that the government — at all levels — will bring rescue and solvency. This, I believe, is fantasy."

At this point few observers close to the musical scene see the situation as anything less than grim. Not only does the country seem to have more orchestras than it can or cares to support, but several commentators are predicting with utter seriousness the end of the symphony orchestra as a viable musical institution in America.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 23 1969 New England

Seeding and Watering the Arts

The arts, too, play an educational role. They instruct, provoke, offer insights, broaden horizons. Yet in Massachusetts, government support for the arts has been minuscule even beside the sometimes limited support for other forms of education (see above).

Not until 1966 did the Commonwealth create a Council on the Arts and Humanities, and not until the current fiscal year, about to end, did it provide the council with more than a token budget. At that, the $100,000 appropriated to "stimulate and encourage" the arts and humanities is a modest investment compared to what several other states spend.

For the next fiscal year $150,000 was requested for the Council. A third of that was gone when the budget came out of the House, and the Senate did not restore it.

In a state budget of $1.5 billion, $50,000 is almost infinitesimal. To the Council on the Arts and Humanities, however, it represents a number of worthwhile programs. Ventures encouraged by the Council cover a wide range—art classes for children, special concerts and theater performances, workshops for teachers and artists, restoration of works of art, preservation of historical documents, to name only a few. The Council stresses support, not subsidy. It makes no handouts but contracts with organizations and individuals for services rendered. What financial assistance it gives is considered seed money.

In the world of the arts, as elsewhere, promising programs need to be not only seeded but watered before they flourish. A bigger budget would enable the Council, while seeding new undertakings, to give another year of support to valuable but struggling projects.

It is probably naive to think that the conference committee will rectify the failures of the House and Senate and restore the full budget request for the Council. Legislators, even if they know art, also know what they like, and that is to keep taxpayers as happy as possible. Perhaps the greatest naivete exists among those who appreciate the role of the arts and who have benefitted from the work of the Council, but who did not realize that it was necessary to tell the lawmakers that as taxpayers and citizens they were unhappy about the Council's budget cut.

6/24/69
Boston Herald Traveller

166

MUSIC

American Orchestras: The Sound of Trouble

As a group, the symphony orchestras of the U.S. are unsurpassed in quality by those of any other nation in the world. Yet today they are in trouble —loud, unavoidable, cymbal-crashing financial trouble. In Buffalo and Rochester, the two Philharmonics are so pressed for funds that they are talking merger; so are the Cincinnati and Indianapolis orchestras. The Detroit Symphony, which has just emerged from a 34-day musicians' strike, is in such economic straits that it may have to disband. "Between 1971 and 1973," predicts Manhattan Fund Raiser Carl Shaver, an expert in orchestral finances, "we stand a very good chance of losing at least one-third, if not half of our major symphony orchestras."

The facts are summed up in a new study prepared for the nation's top five orchestras—New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland and Chicago—by the management-consultant firm of McKinsey & Co. Because rocketing costs —most notably, sharply increased salary scales—have not been met by a similar gain in income, the orchestras' combined annual operating deficit rose from $2.9 million in 1964 to $5.7 million in 1968. The loss will soar to $8,000,000 by the 1971-72 season unless drastic steps are taken.

Into Bankruptcy. So large are the deficits that orchestras have been forced to dip into endowments to survive. In the past five years, the Chicago Symphony has had to dip into its endowment so regularly that it has shrunk from $6,200,000 to $1,000,000. In Cleveland, the orchestra is about to tap its endowment fund for $600,000 to help meet a 1968-69 deficit of $1,100,000. If the same thing happens next year, says Orchestra President Alfred M. Rankin, the endowment fund will be wiped out, and the orchestra built by George Szell over the past 23 years into one of the world's finest may have to disband or go into bankruptcy.

The New York Philharmonic, Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra are not that badly off, but they are sufficiently worried to have joined a newly created committee of managers and orchestra presidents. A major concern is the symphonies' lucrative recording agreements, which may be endangered by the contract signed in April with the American Federation of Musicians. The new rules, affecting length of sessions and overtime pay, will make recording in the U.S. at least 20% more expensive, and thus may force record companies to sign up more orchestras abroad, where labor costs are lower.

There are a few encouraging exceptions to the battle against poverty—notably in Pittsburgh, Minneapolis, Salt Lake City and Atlanta—but the crisis situation is nationwide. Six years ago, the Detroit Symphony had an earned annual income of $550,000, which left it only $400,000 to raise to meet a $950,000 budget. This past season, the orchestra's earned income rose to $900,000 —but its budget soared to $2,200,000. The Los Angeles Philharmonic's deficit of $500,000 in 1966 has increased to $1,100,000 for 1969.

One reason for the crisis is that money for the arts is tighter than it has been in years. Because of more pressing social needs, the Federal Government, as well as many state governments, has cut back its spending on culture. Much of the money that formerly came from the big corporations is now going into the ghettos. As for private donors, explains the Los Angeles Philharmonic's Zubin Mehta, the same reliable philanthropists also give to museums, hospitals and universities, and they have just about reached the limit of giving. Foundation money, like the $80.2 million that Ford gave to 61 orchestras in 1966, must be matched by orchestra-raised funds; many of the symphonies have not yet found the donations to qualify for such grants. "Every year our expenses go up," says Mehta, "but the donations remain the same."

Some critics of American orchestral life contend that the real trouble is that the symphony has been for too long a plaything of the wealthy. Even though symphony-going is not dominated by the rich to the extent that it was 40 years ago, it is still a formal experience that most turned-on youth regard as static, outmoded and irrelevant. As the conservative, 19th century-oriented programming of most orchestras proves, the institutions are trapped into patterns of pleasing the wealthy patrons who support them—and by and large, the patrons like Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky. This does not mean that the orchestras would automatically attract larger audiences with avant-garde programs. The real problem is attracting the young today so that there will be an audience tomorrow.

Boston Symphony Music Director Erich Leinsdorf insists that "the real crisis is musical, and it can only be solved musically. For over two decades there has been an increasing interest in baroque music. The orchestras have done nothing about it. There is a growing interest in avant-garde music. Nothing is being done." No one objects to preserving the masterpieces of the past, as a museum keeps Rembrandts. But some musical experts feel that there may be more orchestral museums than are needed. English Conductor Colin Davis, 41, a strong possibility to head either the New York Philharmonic or the Boston Symphony some day, is one of them. "You devalue your masterpieces if you play them every week," he says. "If it is something you have too much of, like sex and breakfast, then it doesn't mean anything any more."

Civic pride is strong, and few orchestras really want to quit. Because of union-backed demands, the big five already are operating 52 weeks out of the year. At first glance, it might seem that a longer season would automatically mean more income. But since every concert by every orchestra is a deficit affair, more concerts mean a larger deficit. Los Angeles has expanded its annual schedule from 37 weeks to 46 in the past three years, and the musicians are pushing hard for 52. "Sure, the schedule is murderous," says A.F.M. President Herman Kenin. "But the goal is not 52 weeks but 52 checks. The musician has to pay the mortgage on his house, educate his children and feed his wife all year, not just 40 weeks."

Orchestra managers do not begrudge

MINNEAPOLIS TRIBUNE

MINNESOTA ORCHESTRA REHEARSING AT HIGH SCHOOL
What is missing is the jingle of coins.

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000
JUN 13 1969

Many Symphonies Broke

By PAUL HUME
L.A. Times-Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON — Three days before the American Symphony Orchestra League (ASOL) opened its convention in Atlanta, officials of the Detroit Symphony were saying flatly that their orchestra was on the verge of bankruptcy.

The officers of the Cleveland Orchestra, noting they had to dip into their discretionary endowment fund's capital in order to cover running deficits, said if the drain continued at the same rate in the coming year, they would be facing the same bankrupt fate.

A high officer of the National Symphony Orchestra said that, in his opinion, the Washington orchestra would not and should not open its coming fall season. The present fund drive, while the most successful in its history, is still almost a quarter of a million dollars short of its goal.

This is the situation with almost every symphony orchestra in the country. The major subjects at the recent Atlanta meetings centered exclusively around the problems of financial support. Explorations into greater business and industrial support for the arts were mixed with hard talk on proposed legislation that would seriously affect the present level of foundation assistance. And the specter of mergers, which in some circles seems more friendly than in others, is motivated entirely, at least among the larger orchestras, by the crushing pressures of unmet and perhaps unmeetable budgets.

All of this has been clearly visible and specifically predicted in past years. Nearly a decade ago, in a memorable article in McCall's magazine, conductors Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia and the late Fritz Reiner of the Chicago orchestras prophesied, without reservation, that, unless new sources of financial assistance came to light, some of the country's major orchestras would have to go out of business within 10 years.

If a New York City expert in fund-raising drives for symphony orchestras correctly reads the future, "out of business" signs will be going up shortly. His name is Carl Shaver, and he says that by 1971 to 1973 one-third if not one half of our major symphonies will no longer be operating.

Which ones? St. Louis? Detroit? Baltimore? The National in Washington?

What is the answer? Speaking before the Symphony League in Atlanta, Katharine Graham, publisher of the Washington Post, said, "I fear that much effort in the world of arts has been wasted on the illusion that the government — at all levels — will bring rescue and solvency. This, I believe, is fantasy."

In 1966, the Ford Foundation gave a fantastic $80.2 million to 61 orchestras on matching bases that varied from city to city. Many of those orchestras have been unable to raise the funds needed to qualify for the matching monies.

One hard-headed man who literally has spent years in volunteer fund-raising for various orchestras, said:

"At this point, with 15 major orchestras now involved in new contract negotiations with union locals, I would go to the union and put it to them straight. I would tell them, 'We can merge with orchestra X; we can go out of business; or we can write a contract for 36 weeks at the high figures we have lately reached. You tell us which to do. Your demands have brought us to this place, now you tell us which way to go.'"

The achievement of a 52-week contract by the five big orchestras of Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, New York and Philadelphia, and the approaching of that goal by many other orchestras has had its enormous place in producing much of the current crunch. Now some musicians who have the kind of contract they once wanted, find they would rather have more time off. They might be interested in a shorter contract, though the idea of a reduced income is hardly likely to attract them.

Mergers between smaller community orchestras favored by regional geographic situations such as those that helped the Tampa-St. Petersburg combine are a good prospect.

"Regionalization" of an orchestra such as that recently carried out by the Minneapolis Orchestra, when it changed its name to the Minnesota Orchestra and became a genuinely statewide organization, is another excellent avenue for exploration.

Many larger orchestras, such as Atlanta, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh and St. Louis are the only professional ensembles in a fairly large territory. If they can manage, in friendly ways, to make themselves attractive to the hundreds of smaller communities within a practicable radious of their home bases, they may find some of the new income they need.

Press Clipping Division
Kansas Press Service
Affiliate of Kansas Press Ass'n.
701 Jackson, Topeka, Ks.
KANSAS
Topeka Daily Capital
JUN 30 1969

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JUL 22 1969
New England Newsclip

The beggar arts

The general low regard in which the arts are held in America was shown in Congress again a week ago. The House quibbled over funding another $7.5 million to match private-sector donations needed to finish the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts.

In a way, we can understand the conflict that tore at congressmen like Rep. Henry C. Schadeberg (R) of Wisconsin during the debate: "It is a beautiful center, and it will be, but it is necessary to convince the people of my district, who are waiting for . . . a sewer system or for taking care of pollution in the lakes. . . ."

Frankly, it's not really a question of sewers or symphonies. That's always the argument of the reluctant giver. The few millions our national government puts out for the arts could be trebled, then trebled and trebled again and still be a very modest sum.

The truth is the arts in America have a narrow base of public support. The plight of the nation's symphonies shows this. The Boston Symphony had a half million dollar deficit last season.

At present, much of the talk about music, theater, and dance companies' budget problems centers on labor costs, or musicians' salaries (base salary contracts of $14,000 to $16,000 were negotiated by some symphonies for this fall). Yet this isn't the heart of the matter either. Musicians belong in the premium professional category and deserve at least what they get. And as for the stage labor costs, these are no higher than comparable labor in the industrial world.

In Europe, as is doggedly pointed out, the arts situation is different. West Germany, for example, has more than 150 opera companies. These are supported by public funds so that, in effect, the government pays an average of $2.50 toward every ticket. But in Europe, history prepared for the present. When power passed from royalty to the republics in the past couple of centuries, the responsibilities of patronage were handed over to the government, too. America had no such heritage to pass on.

A democratic base for the arts is building in America. With more and more young people going to college, we are creating a culturally educated constituency. For the moment, however, artistic companies must scrounge up patronage as best they can. It's as if they were perpetually caught up in preparing for a charity ball.

Part of the arts' troubles in America is their stubborn aristocratic trappings. But these too will pass. The American temperament is vigorous and forthright, not mincing or fancy. This is why American singers are so successful abroad, and why America is now the dominant graphic arts power. But the end of America's cultural beggary seems slow in coming.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUL 26 1969

CONTRACT GIVES PHILA. ORCHESTRA TOP MINIMA

PHILADELPHIA—Philadelphia Orchestra musicians will receive minimums of $16,040 next season, the highest minimum pay of any symphony orchestra musicians in the U. S. under terms of a three-year contract agreed upon on Monday (14).

The new pact will increase the minima to $16,560 in 1970-71 and $17,080 in 1971-72. The minimum for the 1968-69 season was $14,350, with $2,000 in recording fees and $12,350 in salary. The recording fee figure will remain the same.

The second highest paid orchestra in the country will be the Boston Symphony, with members getting $16,000, of which $1,000 will be in recording fees. Both the Philadelphia and Boston record for RCA. The New York Philharmonic is third in salaries with $15,040 minimum pay, including $1,000 in recording fees. The Philharmonic records for Columbia. The Philharmonic and the Boston will be in the final years of their contracts next season.

166

MUSIC

American Orchestras: The Sound of Trouble

As a group, the symphony orchestras of the U.S. are unsurpassed in quality by those of any other nation in the world. Yet today they are in trouble —loud, unavoidable, cymbal-crashing financial trouble. In Buffalo and Rochester, the two Philharmonics are so pressed for funds that they are talking merger; so are the Cincinnati and Indianapolis orchestras. The Detroit Symphony, which has just emerged from a 34-day musicians' strike, is in such economic straits that it may have to disband. "Between 1971 and 1973," predicts Manhattan Fund Raiser Carl Shaver, an expert in orchestral finances, "we stand a very good chance of losing at least one-third, if not half of our major symphony orchestras."

The facts are summed up in a new study prepared for the nation's top five orchestras—New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland and Chicago—by the management-consultant firm of McKinsey & Co. Because rocketing costs —most notably, sharply increased salary scales—have not been met by a similar gain in income, the orchestras' combined annual operating deficit rose from $2.9 million in 1964 to $5.7 million in 1968. The loss will soar to $8,000,000 by the 1971-72 season unless drastic steps are taken.

Into Bankruptcy. So large are the deficits that orchestras have been forced to dip into endowments to survive. In the past five years, the Chicago Symphony has had to dip into its endowment so regularly that it has shrunk from $6,200,000 to $1,000,000. In Cleveland, the orchestra is about to tap its endowment fund for $600,000 to help meet a 1968-69 deficit of $1,100,000. If the same thing happens next year, says Orchestra President Alfred M. Rankin, the endowment fund will be wiped out, and the orchestra built by George Szell over the past 23 years into one of the world's finest may have to disband or go into bankruptcy.

The New York Philharmonic, Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra are not that badly off, but they are sufficiently worried to have joined a newly created committee of managers and orchestra presidents. A major concern is the symphonies' lucrative recording agreements, which may be endangered by the contract signed in April with the American Federation of Musicians. The new rules, affecting length of sessions and overtime pay, will make recording in the U.S. at least 20% more expensive, and thus may force record companies to sign up more orchestras abroad, where labor costs are lower.

There are a few encouraging exceptions to the battle against poverty—notably in Pittsburgh, Minneapolis, Salt Lake City and Atlanta—but the crisis situation is nationwide. Six years ago, the Detroit Symphony had an earned annual income of $550,000, which left it only $400,000 to raise to meet a $950,000 budget. This past season, the orchestra's earned income rose to $900,000 —but its budget soared to $2,200,000. The Los Angeles Philharmonic's deficit of $500,000 in 1966 has increased to $1,100,000 for 1969.

One reason for the crisis is that money for the arts is tighter than it has been in years. Because of more pressing social needs, the Federal Government, as well as many state governments, has cut back its spending on culture. Much of the money that formerly came from the big corporations is now going into the ghettos. As for private donors, explains the Los Angeles Philharmonic's Zubin Mehta, the same reliable philanthropists also give to museums, hospitals and universities, and they have just about reached the limit of giving. Foundation money, like the $80.2 million that Ford gave to 61 orchestras in 1966, must be matched by orchestra-raised funds; many of the symphonies have not yet found the donations to qualify for such grants. "Every year our expenses go up," says Mehta, "but the donations remain the same."

Some critics of American orchestral life contend that the real trouble is that the symphony has been for too long a plaything of the wealthy. Even though symphony-going is not dominated by the rich to the extent that it was 40 years ago, it is still a formal experience that most turned-on youth regard as static, outmoded and irrelevant. As the conservative, 19th century-oriented programming of most orchestras proves, the institutions are trapped into patterns of pleasing the wealthy patrons who support them—and by and large, the patrons like Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky. This does not mean that the orchestras would automatically attract larger audiences with avant-garde programs. The real problem is attracting the young today so that there will be an audience tomorrow.

Boston Symphony Music Director Erich Leinsdorf insists that "the real crisis is musical, and it can only be solved musically. For over two decades there has been an increasing interest in baroque music. The orchestras have done nothing about it. There is a growing interest in avant-garde music. Nothing is being done." No one objects to preserving the masterpieces of the past, as a museum keeps Rembrandts. But some musical experts feel that there may be more orchestral museums than are needed. English Conductor Colin Davis, 41, a strong possibility to head either the New York Philharmonic or the Boston Symphony some day, is one of them. "You devalue your masterpieces if you play them every week," he says. "If it is something you have too much of, like sex and breakfast, then it doesn't mean anything any more."

Civic pride is strong, and few orchestras really want to quit. Because of union-backed demands, the big five already are operating 52 weeks out of the year. At first glance, it might seem that a longer season would automatically mean more income. But since every concert by every orchestra is a deficit affair, more concerts mean a larger deficit. Los Angeles has expanded its annual schedule from 37 weeks to 46 in the past three years, and the musicians are pushing hard for 52. "Sure, the schedule is murderous," says A.F.M. President Herman Kenin. "But the goal is not 52 weeks but 52 checks. The musician has to pay the mortgage on his house, educate his children and feed his wife all year, not just 40 weeks."

Orchestra managers do not begrudge

MINNEAPOLIS TRIBUNE

MINNESOTA ORCHESTRA REHEARSING AT HIGH SCHOOL
What is missing is the jingle of coins.

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000
JUN 13 1969

Many Symphonies Broke

By PAUL HUME
L.A. Times-Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON — Three days before the American Symphony Orchestra League (ASOL) opened its convention in Atlanta, officials of the Detroit Symphony were saying flatly that their orchestra was on the verge of bankruptcy.

The officers of the Cleveland Orchestra, noting they had to dip into their discretionary endowment fund's capital in order to cover running deficits, said if the drain continued at the same rate in the coming year, they would be facing the same bankrupt fate.

A high officer of the National Symphony Orchestra said that, in his opinion, the Washington orchestra would not and should not open its coming fall season. The present fund drive, while the most successful in its history, is still almost a quarter of a million dollars short of its goal.

This is the situation with almost every symphony orchestra in the country. The major subjects at the recent Atlanta meetings centered exclusively around the problems of financial support. Explorations into greater business and industrial support for the arts were mixed with hard talk on proposed legislation that would seriously affect the present level of foundation assistance. And the specter of mergers, which in some circles seems more friendly than in others, is motivated entirely, at least among the larger orchestras, by the crushing pressures of unmet and perhaps unmeetable budgets.

All of this has been clearly visible and specifically predicted in past years. Nearly a decade ago, in a memorable article in McCall's magazine, conductors Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia and the late Fritz Reiner of the Chicago orchestras prophesied, without reservation, that, unless new sources of financial assistance came to light, some of the country's major orchestras would have to go out of business within 10 years.

If a New York City expert in fund-raising drives for symphony orchestras correctly reads the future, "out of business" signs will be going up shortly. His name is Carl Shaver, and he says that by 1971 to 1973 one-third if not one half of our major symphonies will no longer be operating.

Which ones? St. Louis? Detroit? Baltimore? The National in Washington?

What is the answer? Speaking before the Symphony League in Atlanta, Katharine Graham, publisher of the Washington Post, said, "I fear that much effort in the world of arts has been wasted on the illusion that the government — at all levels — will bring rescue and solvency. This, I believe, is fantasy."

In 1966, the Ford Foundation gave a fantastic $80.2 million to 61 orchestras on matching bases that varied from city to city. Many of those orchestras have been unable to raise the funds needed to qualify for the matching monies.

One hard-headed man who literally has spent years in volunteer fund-raising for various orchestras, said:

"At this point, with 15 major orchestras now involved in new contract negotiations with union locals, I would go to the union and put it to them straight. I would tell them, 'We can merge with orchestra X; we can go out of business; or we can write a contract for 36 weeks at the high figures we have lately reached. You tell us which to do. Your demands have brought us to this place, now you tell us which way to go.'"

The achievement of a 52-week contract by the five big orchestras of Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, New York and Philadelphia, and the approaching of that goal by many other orchestras has had its enormous place in producing much of the current crunch. Now some musicians who have the kind of contract they once wanted, find they would rather have more time off. They might be interested in a shorter contract, though the idea of a reduced income is hardly likely to attract them.

Mergers between smaller community orchestras favored by regional geographic situations such as those that helped the Tampa-St. Petersburg combine are a good prospect.

"Regionalization" of an orchestra such as that recently carried out by the Minneapolis Orchestra, when it changed its name to the Minnesota Orchestra and became a genuinely statewide organization, is another excellent avenue for exploration.

Many larger orchestras, such as Atlanta, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh and St. Louis are the only professional ensembles in a fairly large territory. If they can manage, in friendly ways, to make themselves attractive to the hundreds of smaller communities within a practicable radious of their home bases, they may find some of the new income they need.

Press Clipping Division
Kansas Press Service
Affiliate of Kansas Press Ass'n.
701 Jackson, Topeka, Ks.
KANSAS
Topeka Daily Capital
JUN 30 1969

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JUL 22 1969
New England Newsclip

The beggar arts

The general low regard in which the arts are held in America was shown in Congress again a week ago. The House quibbled over funding another $7.5 million to match private-sector donations needed to finish the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts.

In a way, we can understand the conflict that tore at congressmen like Rep. Henry C. Schadeberg (R) of Wisconsin during the debate: "It is a beautiful center, and it will be, but it is necessary to convince the people of my district, who are waiting for . . . a sewer system or for taking care of pollution in the lakes. . . ."

Frankly, it's not really a question of sewers or symphonies. That's always the argument of the reluctant giver. The few millions our national government puts out for the arts could be trebled, then trebled and trebled again and still be a very modest sum.

The truth is the arts in America have a narrow base of public support. The plight of the nation's symphonies shows this. The Boston Symphony had a half million dollar deficit last season.

At present, much of the talk about music, theater, and dance companies' budget problems centers on labor costs, or musicians' salaries (base salary contracts of $14,000 to $16,000 were negotiated by some symphonies for this fall). Yet this isn't the heart of the matter either. Musicians belong in the premium professional category and deserve at least what they get. And as for the stage labor costs, these are no higher than comparable labor in the industrial world.

In Europe, as is doggedly pointed out, the arts situation is different. West Germany, for example, has more than 150 opera companies. These are supported by public funds so that, in effect, the government pays an average of $2.50 toward every ticket. But in Europe, history prepared for the present. When power passed from royalty to the republics in the past couple of centuries, the responsibilities of patronage were handed over to the government, too. America had no such heritage to pass on.

A democratic base for the arts is building in America. With more and more young people going to college, we are creating a culturally educated constituency. For the moment, however, artistic companies must scrounge up patronage as best they can. It's as if they were perpetually caught up in preparing for a charity ball.

Part of the arts' troubles in America is their stubborn aristocratic trappings. But these too will pass. The American temperament is vigorous and forthright, not mincing or fancy. This is why American singers are so successful abroad, and why America is now the dominant graphic arts power. But the end of America's cultural beggary seems slow in coming.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUL 26 1969

CONTRACT GIVES PHILA. ORCHESTRA TOP MINIMA

PHILADELPHIA—Philadelphia Orchestra musicians will receive minimums of $16,040 next season, the highest minimum pay of any symphony orchestra musicians in the U. S. under terms of a three-year contract agreed upon on Monday (14).

The new pact will increase the minima to $16,560 in 1970-71 and $17,080 in 1971-72. The minimum for the 1968-69 season was $14,350, with $2,000 in recording fees and $12,350 in salary. The recording fee figure will remain the same.

The second highest paid orchestra in the country will be the Boston Symphony, with members getting $16,000, of which $1,000 will be in recording fees. Both the Philadelphia and Boston record for RCA. The New York Philharmonic is third in salaries with $15,040 minimum pay, including $1,000 in recording fees. The Philharmonic records for Columbia. The Philharmonic and the Boston will be in the final years of their contracts next season.

166

the musicians their salaries. Says President Talcott Banks of the Boston Symphony, which now has a guaranteed minimum wage of $14,000 for 52 weeks of work a year: "The raise in salary levels we are now paying was long overdue." Instead, the concern of orchestra officials is about how to use their players throughout the 52-week working year. Fund Raiser Shaver likens the plight of the orchestra to that of "a manufacturer who had a market for 1,000,000 bolts, and as a result of the union contract was forced to turn out 2,000,000 bolts."

No Semantic Gimmick. Conductors Mehta and Leinsdorf believe that the disadvantages of high labor costs and long seasons can in the long run be turned into assets. Mehta thinks that the eventual answer will be an orchestra in every major American city that will serve several musical purposes. "The only way seasons can be enlarged indefinitely is by giving symphony and opera," says Mehta, "then breaking up the orchestra—making chamber-music groups, moving around the countryside, going out to the people." Leinsdorf goes Mehta one better. "The solution is not to make the orchestra smaller but to make it larger, 120 in all, instead of 100 or 106. It would have three divisions within it: a baroque ensemble of 26 players or so, a modern ensemble of eight to 20, and the regular 19th century orchestra, which usually has about 75 musicians."

For many U.S. orchestras, one potential pattern for the future is the success formula of the former Minneapolis Symphony. In 1966, at the time of its $2,000,000 Ford grant, a study was made of anticipated income and costs for the next five years. The directors decided that by 1971 the symphony needed to raise a minimum of $10 million, if it was to have a chance of coming out on top. But how? First, the organization's name was changed to the Minnesota Orchestra. More than just a semantic gimmick, that symbolized the orchestra's intention to become regional rather than a municipal enterprise. As a result, it could now zero in on large, untapped financial sources in Saint Paul and other Minnesota communities. Under Polish Conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, who had been programming an imaginative spectrum of Western music, the orchestra began presenting school concerts all over the state, lowering student-ticket prices at Northrop Auditorium in Minneapolis to $1. When it became apparent that new audiences were being reached, donations from previously untapped sources began to pour in. As of last week, the Minnesota Orchestra had nearly reached its $10 million goal.

The lesson to be learned from the Minneapolis experience is that each orchestra must devise ways to serve its community better. As Shaver warns: "You cannot raise endowments by trying to finance the status quo."

ons who support them—and by and ge, the patrons like Beethoven, hms and Tchaikovsky. This does not an that the orchestras would auto-tically attract larger audiences with nt-garde programs. The real problem attracting the young today so that re will be an audience tomorrow.

Boston Symphony Music Director Er-Leinsdorf insists that "the real cri-is musical, and it can only be solved sically. For over two decades there been an increasing interest in ba-ue music. The orchestras have done hing about it. There is a growing in-st in avant-garde music. Nothing is g done." No one objects to pre-ving the masterpieces of the past, as useum keeps Rembrandts. But some sical experts feel that there may be e jingle of coins.

ARSING AT HIGH SCHOOL

more orchestral museums than are need-d. English Conductor Colin Davis, 41, strong possibility to head either the New York Philharmonic or the Boston Symphony some day, is one of them. "You devalue your masterpieces if you play them every week," he says. "If it is something you have too much of, like sex and breakfast, then it doesn't mean anything any more."

Civic pride is strong, and few orchestras really want to quit. Because of union-backed demands, the big five already are operating 52 weeks out of the year. At first glance, it might seem that a longer season would automatically mean more income. But since every concert by every orchestra is a deficit affair, more concerts mean a larger deficit. Los Angeles has expanded its annual schedule from 37 weeks to 46 in the past three years, and the musicians are pushing hard for 52. "Sure, the schedule is murderous," says A.F.M. President Herman Kenin. "But the goal is not 52 weeks but 52 checks. The musician has to pay the mortgage on his house, educate his children and feed his wife all year, not just 40 weeks."

Orchestra managers do not begrudge

TIME, JUNE 13, 1969
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000

JUN 13 1969

Many Symphonies Broke

By PAUL HUME
L.A. Times-Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON — Three days before the American Symphony Orchestra League (ASOL) opened its convention in Atlanta, officials of the Detroit Symphony were saying flatly that their orchestra was on the verge of bankruptcy.

The officers of the Cleveland Orchestra, noting they had to dip into their discretionary endowment fund's capital in order to cover running deficits, said if the drain continued at the same rate in the coming year, they would be facing the same bankrupt fate.

A high officer of the National Symphony Orchestra said that, in his opinion, the Washington orchestra would not and should not open its coming fall season. The present fund drive, while the most successful in its history, is still almost a quarter of a million dollars short of its goal.

This is the situation with almost every symphony orchestra in the country. The major subjects at the recent Atlanta meetings centered exclusively around the problems of financial support. Explorations into greater business and industrial support for the arts were mixed with hard talk on proposed legislation that would seriously affect the present level of foundation assistance. And the specter of mergers, which in some circles seems more friendly than in others, is motivated entirely, at least among the larger orchestras, by the crushing pressures of unmet and perhaps unmeetable budgets.

All of this has been clearly visible and specifically predicted in past years. Nearly a decade ago, in a memorable article in McCall's magazine, conductors Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia and the late Fritz Reiner of the Chicago orchestras prophesied, without reservation, that, unless new sources of financial assistance came to light, some of the country's major orchestras would have to go out of business within 10 years.

If a New York City expert in fund-raising drives for symphony orchestras correctly reads the future, "out of business" signs will be going up shortly. His name is Carl Shaver, and he says that by 1971 to 1973 one-third if not one half of our major symphonies will no longer be operating.

Which ones? St. Louis? Detroit? Baltimore? The National in Washington?

What is the answer? Speaking before the Symphony League in Atlanta, Katharine Graham, publisher of the Washington Post, said, "I fear that much effort in the world of arts has been wasted on the illusion that the government — at all levels — will bring rescue and solvency. This, I believe, is fantasy."

In 1966, the Ford Foundation gave a fantastic $80.2 million to 61 orchestras on matching bases that varied from city to city. Many of those orchestras have been unable to raise the funds needed to qualify for the matching monies.

One hard-headed man who literally has spent years in volunteer fund-raising for various orchestras, said:

"At this point, with 15 major orchestras now involved in new contract negotiations with union locals, I would go to the union and put it to them straight. I would tell them, 'We can merge with orchestra X; we can go out of business; or we can write a contract for 36 weeks at the high figures we have lately reached. You tell us which to do. Your demands have brought us to this place, now you tell us which way to go.'"

The achievement of a 52-week contract by the five big orchestras of Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, New York and Philadelphia, and the approaching of that goal by many other orchestras has had its enormous place in producing much of the current crunch. Now some musicians who have the kind of contract they once wanted, find they would rather have more time off. They might be interested in a shorter contract, though the idea of a reduced income is hardly likely to attract them.

Mergers between smaller community orchestras favored by regional geographic situations such as those that helped the Tampa-St. Petersburg combine are a good prospect.

"Regionalization" of an orchestra such as that recently carried out by the Minneapolis Orchestra, when it changed its name to the Minnesota Orchestra and became a genuinely statewide organization, is another excellent avenue for exploration.

Many larger orchestras, such as Atlanta, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh and St. Louis are the only professional ensembles in a fairly large territory. If they can manage, in friendly ways, to make themselves attractive to the hundreds of smaller communities within a practicable radious of their home bases, they may find some of the new income they need.

Press Clipping Division
Kansas Press Service
Affiliate of Kansas Press Ass'n.
701 Jackson, Topeka, Ks.

KANSAS
Topeka Daily Capital

JUN 30 1969

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 22 1969 New England Newsclip

The beggar arts

The general low regard in which the arts are held in America was shown in Congress again a week ago. The House quibbled over funding another $7.5 million to match private-sector donations needed to finish the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts.

In a way, we can understand the conflict that tore at congressmen like Rep. Henry C. Schadeberg (R) of Wisconsin during the debate: "It is a beautiful center, and it will be, but it is necessary to convince the people of my district, who are waiting for . . . a sewer system or for taking care of pollution in the lakes. . . ."

Frankly, it's not really a question of sewers or symphonies. That's always the argument of the reluctant giver. The few millions our national government puts out for the arts could be trebled, then trebled and trebled again and still be a very modest sum.

The truth is the arts in America have a narrow base of public support. The plight of the nation's symphonies shows this. The Boston Symphony had a half million dollar deficit last season.

At present, much of the talk about music, theater, and dance companies' budget problems centers on labor costs, or musicians' salaries (base salary contracts of $14,000 to $16,000 were negotiated by some symphonies for this fall). Yet this isn't the heart of the matter either. Musicians belong in the premium professional category and deserve at least what they get. And as for the stage labor costs, these are no higher than comparable labor in the industrial world.

In Europe, as is doggedly pointed out, the arts situation is different. West Germany, for example, has more than 150 opera companies. These are supported by public funds so that, in effect, the government pays an average of $2.50 toward every ticket. But in Europe, history prepared for the present. When power passed from royalty to the republics in the past couple of centuries, the responsibilities of patronage were handed over to the government, too. America had no such heritage to pass on.

A democratic base for the arts is building in America. With more and more young people going to college, we are creating a culturally educated constituency. For the moment, however, artistic companies must scrounge up patronage as best they can. It's as if they were perpetually caught up in preparing for a charity ball.

Part of the arts' troubles in America is their stubborn aristocratic trappings. But these too will pass. The American temperament is vigorous and forthright, not mincing or fancy. This is why American singers are so successful abroad, and why America is now the dominant graphic arts power. But the end of America's cultural beggary seems slow in coming.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUL 26 1969

CONTRACT GIVES PHILA. ORCHESTRA TOP MINIMA

PHILADELPHIA—Philadelphia Orchestra musicians will receive minimums of $16,040 next season, the highest minimum pay of any symphony orchestra musicians in the U. S. under terms of a three-year contract agreed upon on Monday (14).

The new pact will increase the minima to $16,560 in 1970-71 and $17,080 in 1971-72. The minimum for the 1968-69 season was $14,350, with $2,000 in recording fees and $12,350 in salary. The recording fee figure will remain the same.

The second highest paid orchestra in the country will be the Boston Symphony, with members getting $16,000, of which $1,000 will be in recording fees. Both the Philadelphia and Boston record for RCA. The New York Philharmonic is third in salaries with $15,040 minimum pay, including $1,000 in recording fees. The Philharmonic records for Columbia. The Philharmonic and the Boston will be in the final years of their contracts next season.

Orchestras In Crises

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
109,181
JUL 20 1969
New England Newsclip

By JOHN THORNTON

AMERICAN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS, already facing financial crises all over the country, must now fight against proposed tax reform measures that would discourage future invested and donated funds.

Wilbur D. Mills, (D.-Ark.,) chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has announced tentative decisions on some reform recommendations that have alarmed officers of the American Symphony League.

The League's tax consultants feel these proposals would threaten favorable tax exempt treatment of some orchestras.

Under the new proposals, if orchestras cannot qualify for the 30 per cent deduction as publicly supported organizations, they could be classified as "private foundations," subject to restrictive measures, including a five percent tax on net investment incomes.

The determination of an orchestra's tax exempt status under the proposed tax measures may rest upon the orchestra's basic structure. The principal question would be: Does the orchestra corporation have a wide membership open to the general public, or, is it a corporation controlled solely by a small, self perpetuating group of trustees?

The question invites all sorts of problems, the biggest involving the impracticality of running an orchestra with several thousand voting members whose contributions consist of small, token sums.

DURING THE LEAGUE'S national convention in Atlanta last June the subject of tax reform as applied to charitable gifts was a major topic of discussion. The League, after assembling all of its data and collating its information, drew up recommendations for the House Ways and Means Committee to consider.

1. Through clarification of definitions in the legislation, remove the threat that symphony orchestras, their supporting endowment funds and auxiliary organizations might be deemed "private foundations", and give them the same favored treatment proposed for churches and colleges.

2. Maintain the tax deduction for appreciated property donated to symphony orchestras. In addition, fund raising women's auxiliaries often receive gifts of tangible property of various kinds, most of which is disposed of in a way that will provide dollar support for orchestra maintenance.

3. Eliminate the proposed tax on private foundation income since such a tax would lead to a reduced foundation support.

For 28 major orchestras in the country, foundation support totalled $7.5 million in the 1967-68 season representing nearly 15 per cent of the total financing of the orchestras. Of this amount, nearly $7 million came from the Ford Foundation.

4. Protect the right of private foundations to make direct gifts for study, training and research to creative and performing artists (conductors, composers, singers, instrumentalists, etc) and to musical scholars and administrative trainees.

BEFORE THE Ways and Means Committee convenes in the fall to finalize its recommendations, individual orchestras, through their trustees and management teams will have bombarded Washington representatives with pleas not to enact tax legislation that would handicap efforts in obtaining donated and investment revenues.

Their alarm is certainly justified. Not only small orchestras, but some of our most well established are feeling the pinch.

The Detroit Symphony, just recovering from a 34 day musicians' strike is in such economic trouble that it may have to disband.

In the last five years the Chicago Symphony has been forced to borrow from its endowment so regularly this has shrunk from $6,200,000 to $1,000,000.

The Cleveland Symphony may have to take $600,000 from the endowment to help meet a $1,100,000 deficit. If this happens again next year, Orchestra President A. M. Rankin gloomily forecasts the orchestra may be forced into bankruptcy.

There are several basic reasons for the crisis: musicians salaries are being sharply increased, but orchestra revenues are not rising proportionately. Federal and state governments, facing serious problems of social reform, are cutting way back on culture dollars.

The big corporate donations are being seriously trimmed, as their sizeable gifts are now going into the ghettos.

Private donors are also being asked to give to museums, hospitals, universities and other performing groups so that their maximum potential is being exhausted. Annual donor contributions remain static, but orchestra budgets steadily increase.

THE CIRCLE has vicious side effects. The big orchestras (Boston, Philadelphia, New York, Chicago) are now operating just about 52 weeks a year. But a long session does not mean more income, just larger deficits. The individual profits but the company suffers, a situation that would horrify any businessman.

Both Zubin Mehta at Los Angeles and Erich Leindsdorf at Boston have bold solutions to the problem.

They believe their orchestras should be split into various sized ensembles. These smaller groups, when not playing with the large orchestras, would program concerts that would fit a busy travel schedule and would also take part in operatic productions. In other words, the orchestras would have a multiple purpose and would serve the community in a variety of ways.

I talked at great length on this problem with Paul Vermel, the Portland Symphony's musical director and conductor, who attended the League Convention at Atlanta.

His reflections and thoughts on the subject will be the substance of next week's column.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,219,382
JUL 18 1969

MARTIN BERNHEIMER

Top Orchestra Pay in Philadelphia

One of my unfavorite requests comes from readers who want me to rate American orchestras in order of quality. The task is not only silly and fruitless, but also impossible.

It is still easy, on the other hand, to rate the orchestras in terms of which pay most generously. Philadelphia wins.

Raymond Kendall

Next season, the minimum full-year salary will rise from $14,350 to $16,040. In 1970-1 the figure rises again, to $16,560, and in 1971-2 the new contract specifies a minimum of $17,080. Philadelphia players are assured $2,000 annually in recording fees, and this is included in the totals.

The new Philadelphia Orchestra agreement, just negotiated, also specifies an increase in paid vacations from five to six weeks, improved pension and medical benefits, and a $25 per-diem rate for tours.

The next-best-paid instrumentalist in the U.S. next season will belong to the Boston Symphony, where the present minimum salary is $16,000, including $1,000 in recording fees. New York comes in third, the Philharmonic paying a $15,040 minimum, including $1,000 for recordings. Both Boston and New York will have to arrange for new contracts and, presumably, higher terms, at the end of 1969-70.

How does Los Angeles compare to The Big Three? The present contract, about to expire, provides for a $225 minimum weekly wage for a 46-week season. Total: $10,350 annually. Recording fees provide additional income, but none are assured in the players' contracts.

★

NEW POST FOR KENDALL: Raymond Kendall, former president of the Performing Arts Academy at The Music Center and Fine Arts dean at USC, has been appointed executive director of the Young Musicians Foundation effective Sept. 15. The choice of Kendall to fill this newly created, full-time position marks the beginning of what, hopefully, will be a new phase in YMF history. The organization intends to broaden the base and scope of its operations, align itself more closely to the functions of other resident groups at The Music Center, and expand the national involvement of its annual competitions.

★

ENCORE: The biggest mystery surrounding the Hollywood Bowl opening last week involved the identity of Joan Sutherland's second encore, a pretty ditty which sounded like "Il bacio," but wasn't. To the rescue of enlightenment comes Stephen Knafel, a helpful reader from Los Angeles, who claims the piece was "Io non sono piu l'Annetta" from a masterpiece by Ricci called "Crispino e la Comare." Of course!

Hiring and Salary Policy Of Philharmonic Listed

By DONAL HENAHAN

The managing director of The New York Philharmonic, which has been charged with racial discrimination in hiring musicians, told a City Commission on Human Rights hearing yesterday that he did not believe in the use of screens during auditions for orchestra members.

"I personally think it is a disadvantage not to let the people who are judging see how the auditioning player plays," said Carlos Moseley, the orchestra's top administrator.

Mr. Moseley testified for the second day on how the Philharmonic selects its new members in attempting to refute charges of bias leveled against the orchestra by two Negro musicians, Earl Madison, 24-year-old cellist, and J. Arthur Davis, 34-year-old double-bass player. Both were rejected several times in auditions, and maintained that the only reason was that they were black.

The screen technique, Mr. Moseley testified, had been tried briefly by the Philharmonic before he became managing director in 1961. This had been done, he went on, "perhaps eight or 10 years ago, for one set of auditions, I believe, and then dropped." Mr. Moseley said judges often gained information about a player's weaknesses, such as a stiff bowing arm, by being able to see as well as hear him in action.

Practice in Boston

Recently, Mr. Moseley added, the Boston Symphony began using audition screens "for some preliminary auditions," but he could think of no other orchestra that had tried the method.

Although, as Mr. Moseley pointed out, the musical director presides over each final audition and his choice is invariably final, the vast majority of applicants are ruled out in preliminary sessions that the musical director does not attend. Usually at those sessions, the managing director said, a group of as few as three or as many as 10 leading members of the orchestra, drawn from its front desks, and often including assistant conductors and the personnel manager, judges the preliminary audition.

The musicians' union allows auditions to be held only when an orchestral vacancy exists, Mr. Moseley said. Applications are then sought by informing other leading orchestras, heads of major music schools and a few well-known instrumental teachers and by advertising in several union publications. The musicians themselves also pass the word. When the aplicants make themselves known, the Philharmonic sends them form letters asking for biographical data.

Since 1961, Mr. Moseley said, only two Philharmonic players, both in solo positions, had been engaged without going through the audition procedures.

As questioning went on, it appeared that the commission's lawyers and those of the complainants, four in all, were attempting to lay the groundwork for an extensive examination of the Philharmonic's practices in many areas, including salary scales and the hiring of both musical and nonmusical employes, as well as auditioning procedures.

Mr. Moseley was asked to provide details of pay for all the string sections, from first desks to the back row, and did so with the exception of salaries of first-desk men, which he called confidential."

Although virtually all data provided in yesterday's testimony could be found in the union contract, the commission's deputy counsel, Robert Weitz, said those and other, more complete, figures would be put on the record because in the event of a ruling in favor of the black musicians there might be a suit filed for "compensatory damages."

Mr. Moseley testified that the Philharmonic will pay its musicians a minimum of $270 a week next season in the final year of a three-year contract, and add a $1,000 yearly guarantee against recording fees.

Under the contract, first violinists all receive at least $10 to $40 above this scale, he said, and the other string section performers range up to $25 over scale a man. The number of musicians over scale varies from section to section. More first violinists receive above-scale pay than seconds.

Viola, cello and bass sections have increasingly fewer musicians earning the premium, Mr. Moseley said.

Office Employes

Turning to the personnel in Mr. Moseley's offices, attorneys for the black musicians said there were no Negroes on the Philharmonic's 30-person administrative staff. Mr. Moseley said the Philharmonic had tried to find qualified black people for the staff.

The Philharmonic's musical director emeritus, Leonard Bernstein, was excused from the day's session by consent of all parties. His name, originally entered on Mr. Madison's complaint as a respondent, was dropped without public announcement before the hearings began, on May 8. Mr. Bernstein remains under subpoena as a witness, however, according to a commission spokesman.

The only witness heard besides Mr. Moseley was Ortiz Walton, of Berkeley, Calif., who testified that he had been a double-bass player with the Boston Symphony for seven years and had been often harassed because of his color. The hearing was adjourned to Sept. 24 at 10 A.M.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
AUG 2 1969

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
AUG 5 1969
New England Newsclip

167

Detroit Symphony Has Growing Pains

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

Recent months have provided graphic examples of the problems facing three orchestras: Detroit, Boston and Philadelphia, whose successes or failures have special meaning for Worcester.

Detroit Symphony Orchestra, which has played for Worcester Music Festival since 1958, now lists more than 100 players and is highly esteemed, though not rated in the "top five" (New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland and Chicago.)

It recently (just in time to salvage the big summer season) signed a new contract, making modest increases in minimum weekly pay, bettering fringe benefits, and guaranteeing paid vacations as well as certain minimum weeks of work per year.

The players were not happy, since they had struck for much larger weekly rate increases, and for more weeks of guaranteed work per year.

The biggest bone of contention was Meadow Brook Music Festival at Oakland University, Rochester, Mich. The players wanted these eight weeks of summer work to be guaranteed. Detroit leaders, who enter the Meadow Brook picture only as that Festival's sponsors invite them to enter, could guarantee nothing, especially as this year Meadow Brook has chosen to climax its summer with one week of the N.Y. Philharmonic under guest conductors.

The Compromise

However, the Detroit management agreed to find work somewhere, and its compromise runs as follows:

Old contract, 40 weeks at a minimum of $205. New contract, '69-'70 season, 44 weeks and $215., plus two weeks of paid vacation; '70-'71, 46 weeks and $235., plus three weeks vacation.

This works out that the lowest possible pay for a Detroit player will be $9,890, $11,025, and $11,515. In the next three seasons, and many players will receive more.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, a year ago, signed new contracts based on $14,000 minimum pay, for virtually a 52-week year, including paid vacations. Its old minmum rate was said to have been $10,500.

Philadelphia Orchestra very recently announced new minimum annual pay of $16,040, $16,560 and $17,080 for the next three seasons.

Philadelphia (which played for the Worcester Festival 1944-1957) is probably worrying the least of these three orchestras, as it taps a bonanza at Saratoga (blessed with free-spending crowds) and rides high on such times as recording royalties. Boston (as I pointed out in a recent article) has for several years been doing necessary things quietly, to increase income, diversify activities, secure added endowment and maintenance funds, in many cases aided by matching grants.

Growing Pains

Detroit's growing pains are so recent that it is still dazed, and somewhat disillusioned to find that metropolitan Detroit is too static a field for it, financially and artistically.

Detroit may well have to undertake additional statewide activities and become the Michigan Orchestra, following Minneapolis' example in Minnesota.

Detroit's deficit was already a staggering one before the new contract.

Worcester, in the second year of a three-year contract with Detroit, is not yet hit hard by these problems.

We may well ponder what our fate would have been, had we continued to hire Philadelphia after 1957, paying the substantial increases then asked, or had managed to sign up Boston as our Festival orchestra. Boston by the way (on several occasions) is reported to have said informally that it cannot fit a Worcester week into its season. We on the other hand cannot split our Festival into single days, scattered through the season.

From the above figures I have made a very daring guess, that the Philadelphia Orchestra today would cost us 50 per cent more than Detroit, and this difference could well demand desperate measures in order to avoid bankruptcy for Worcester Festival.

NY Times, 7/15/69

Philadelphia Musicians Win Top Pay

Special to The New York Times

PHILADELPHIA, July 14—Members of the Philadelphia Orchestra will receive the highest minimum income of any symphony musicians in the United States next season under the terms of a three-year contract agreed upon with management today.

This season, the final one in the current contract, the Philadelphians receive a minimum of $14,350, of which $2,000 is in recording fees and $12,350 in salary. Under the new contract, the recording fee remains the same but the salary rises. The men will get a total of $16,040 next season, $16,560 in 1970-1971 and $17,080 in 1971-72.

The second highest minimum pay for symphonies next season will be earned by Boston Symphony musicians. They will get $16,000, which $1,000 is recording fees. Third highest will be the New York Philharmonic musicians—$15,040, of which $1,000 is recording fees. Both the New York and the Boston ensembles will be in the final year of their current contracts next season.

The new Philadelphia contract also calls for an increase in paid vacations, from five to six weeks, and increased pension and medical benefits. Per diem rates for tours will rise from $19.50 to $25.

Yesterday's agreement was reached two months before the expiration of the current contract, Sept. 15. In 1966, the orchestra's season was delayed eight weeks by a strike before contract terms could be agreed upon.

Under the new contract, management has the right to divide the orchestra into two performing groups for special concerts. This will make an increase in the number of in-school educational concerts possible.

Orchestras In Crises

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
109,181
JUL 20 1969
New England Newsclip

By JOHN THORNTON

AMERICAN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS, already facing financial crises all over the country, must now fight against proposed tax reform measures that would discourage future invested and donated funds.

Wilbur D. Mills, (D.-Ark.,) chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has announced tentative decisions on some reform recommendations that have alarmed officers of the American Symphony League.

The League's tax consultants feel these proposals would threaten favorable tax exempt treatment of some orchestras.

Under the new proposals, if orchestras cannot qualify for the 30 per cent deduction as publicly supported organizations, they could be classified as "private foundations," subject to restrictive measures, including a five percent tax on net investment incomes.

The determination of an orchestra's tax exempt status under the proposed tax measures may rest upon the orchestra's basic structure. The principal question would be: Does the orchestra corporation have a wide membership open to the general public, or, is it a corporation controlled solely by a small, self perpetuating group of trustees?

The question invites all sorts of problems, the biggest involving the impracticality of running an orchestra with several thousand voting members whose contributions consist of small, token sums.

DURING THE LEAGUE'S national convention in Atlanta last June the subject of tax reform as applied to charitable gifts was a major topic of discussion. The League, after assembling all of its data and collating its information, drew up recommendations for the House Ways and Means Committee to consider.

1. Through clarification of definitions in the legislation, remove the threat that symphony orchestras, their supporting endowment funds and auxiliary organizations might be deemed "private foundations", and give them the same favored treatment proposed for churches and colleges.

2. Maintain the tax deduction for appreciated property donated to symphony orchestras. In addition, fund raising women's auxiliaries often receive gifts of tangible property of various kinds, most of which is disposed of in a way that will provide dollar support for orchestra maintenance.

3. Eliminate the proposed tax on private foundation income since such a tax would lead to a reduced foundation support.

For 28 major orchestras in the country, foundation support totalled $7.5 million in the 1967-68 season representing nearly 15 per cent of the total financing of the orchestras. Of this amount, nearly $7 million came from the Ford Foundation.

4. Protect the right of private foundations to make direct gifts for study, training and research to creative and performing artists (conductors, composers, singers, instrumentalists, etc) and to musical scholars and administrative trainees.

BEFORE THE Ways and Means Committee convenes in the fall to finalize its recommendations, individual orchestras, through their trustees and management teams will have bombarded Washington representatives with pleas not to enact tax legislation that would handicap efforts in obtaining donated and investment revenues.

Their alarm is certainly justified. Not only small orchestras, but some of our most well established are feeling the pinch.

The Detroit Symphony, just recovering from a 34 day musicians' strike is in such economic trouble that it may have to disband.

In the last five years the Chicago Symphony has been forced to borrow from its endowment so regularly this has shrunk from $6,200,000 to $1,000,000.

The Cleveland Symphony may have to take $600,000 from the endowment to help meet a $1,100,000 deficit. If this happens again next year, Orchestra President A. M. Rankin gloomily forecasts the orchestra may be forced into bankruptcy.

There are several basic reasons for the crisis: musicians salaries are being sharply increased, but orchestra revenues are not rising proportionately. Federal and state governments, facing serious problems of social reform, are cutting way back on culture dollars.

The big corporate donations are being seriously trimmed, as their sizeable gifts are now going into the ghettos.

Private donors are also being asked to give to museums, hospitals, universities and other performing groups so that their maximum potential is being exhausted. Annual donor contributions remain static, but orchestra budgets steadily increase.

THE CIRCLE has vicious side effects. The big orchestras (Boston, Philadelphia, New York, Chicago) are now operating just about 52 weeks a year. But a long session does not mean more income, just larger deficits. The individual profits but the company suffers, a situation that would horrify any businessman.

Both Zubin Mehta at Los Angeles and Erich Leindsdorf at Boston have bold solutions to the problem.

They believe their orchestras should be split into various sized ensembles. These smaller groups, when not playing with the large orchestras, would program concerts that would fit a busy travel schedule and would also take part in operatic productions. In other words, the orchestras would have a multiple purpose and would serve the community in a variety of ways.

I talked at great length on this problem with Paul Vermel, the Portland Symphony's musical director and conductor, who attended the League Convention at Atlanta.

His reflections and thoughts on the subject will be the substance of next week's column.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,219,382
JUL 18 1969

MARTIN BERNHEIMER

Top Orchestra Pay in Philadelphia

One of my unfavorite requests comes from readers who want me to rate American orchestras in order of quality. The task is not only silly and fruitless, but also impossible.

It is still easy, on the other hand, to rate the orchestras in terms of which pay most generously. Philadelphia wins.

Raymond Kendall

Next season, the minimum full-year salary will rise from $14,350 to $16,040. In 1970-1 the figure rises again, to $16,560, and in 1971-2 the new contract specifies a minimum of $17,080. Philadelphia players are assured $2,000 annually in recording fees, and this is included in the totals.

The new Philadelphia Orchestra agreement, just negotiated, also specifies an increase in paid vacations from five to six weeks, improved pension and medical benefits, and a $25 per-diem rate for tours.

The next-best-paid instrumentalist in the U.S. next season will belong to the Boston Symphony, where the present minimum salary is $16,000, including $1,000 in recording fees. New York comes in third, the Philharmonic paying a $15,040 minimum, including $1,000 for recordings. Both Boston and New York will have to arrange for new contracts and, presumably, higher terms, at the end of 1969-70.

How does Los Angeles compare to The Big Three? The present contract, about to expire, provides for a $225 minimum weekly wage for a 46-week season. Total: $10,350 annually. Recording fees provide additional income, but none are assured in the players' contracts.

★

NEW POST FOR KENDALL: Raymond Kendall, former president of the Performing Arts Academy at The Music Center and Fine Arts dean at USC, has been appointed executive director of the Young Musicians Foundation effective Sept. 15. The choice of Kendall to fill this newly created, full-time position marks the beginning of what, hopefully, will be a new phase in YMF history. The organization intends to broaden the base and scope of its operations, align itself more closely to the functions of other resident groups at The Music Center, and expand the national involvement of its annual competitions.

★

ENCORE: The biggest mystery surrounding the Hollywood Bowl opening last week involved the identity of Joan Sutherland's second encore, a pretty ditty which sounded like "Il bacio," but wasn't. To the rescue of enlightenment comes Stephen Knafel, a helpful reader from Los Angeles, who claims the piece was "Io non sono piu l'Annetta" from a masterpiece by Ricci called "Crispino e la Comare." Of course!

Hiring and Salary Policy Of Philharmonic Listed

By DONAL HENAHAN

The managing director of The New York Philharmonic, which has been charged with racial discrimination in hiring musicians, told a City Commission on Human Rights hearing yesterday that he did not believe in the use of screens during auditions for orchestra members.

"I personally think it is a disadvantage not to let the people who are judging see how the auditioning player plays," said Carlos Moseley, the orchestra's top administrator.

Mr. Moseley testified for the second day on how the Philharmonic selects its new members in attempting to refute charges of bias leveled against the orchestra by two Negro musicians, Earl Madison, 24-year-old cellist, and J. Arthur Davis, 34-year-old double-bass player. Both were rejected several times in auditions, and maintained that the only reason was that they were black.

The screen technique, Mr. Moseley testified, had been tried briefly by the Philharmonic before he became managing director in 1961. This had been done, he went on, "perhaps eight or 10 years ago, for one set of auditions, I believe, and then dropped." Mr. Moseley said judges often gained information about a player's weaknesses, such as a stiff bowing arm, by being able to see as well as hear him in action.

Practice in Boston

Recently, Mr. Moseley added, the Boston Symphony began using audition screens "for some preliminary auditions," but he could think of no other orchestra that had tried the method.

Although, as Mr. Moseley pointed out, the musical director presides over each final audition and his choice is invariably final, the vast majority of applicants are ruled out in preliminary sessions that the musical director does not attend. Usually at those sessions, the managing director said, a group of as few as three or as many as 10 leading members of the orchestra, drawn from its front desks, and often including assistant conductors and the personnel manager, judges the preliminary audition.

The musicians' union allows auditions to be held only when an orchestral vacancy exists, Mr. Moseley said. Applications are then sought by informing other leading orchestras, heads of major music schools and a few well-known instrumental teachers and by advertising in several union publications. The musicians themselves also pass the word. When the aplicants make themselves known, the Philharmonic sends them form letters asking for biographical data.

Since 1961, Mr. Moseley said, only two Philharmonic players, both in solo positions, had been engaged without going through the audition procedures.

As questioning went on, it appeared that the commission's lawyers and those of the complainants, four in all, were attempting to lay the groundwork for an extensive examination of the Philharmonic's practices in many areas, including salary scales and the hiring of both musical and nonmusical employes, as well as auditioning procedures.

Mr. Moseley was asked to provide details of pay for all the string sections, from first desks to the back row, and did so with the exception of salaries of first-desk men, which he called confidential."

Although virtually all data provided in yesterday's testimony could be found in the union contract, the commission's deputy counsel, Robert Weitz, said those and other, more complete, figures would be put on the record because in the event of a ruling in favor of the black musicians there might be a suit filed for "compensatory damages."

Mr. Moseley testified that the Philharmonic will pay its musicians a minimum of $270 a week next season in the final year of a three-year contract, and add a $1,000 yearly guarantee against recording fees.

Under the contract, first violinists all receive at least $10 to $40 above this scale, he said, and the other string section performers range up to $25 over scale a man. The number of musicians over scale varies from section to section. More first violinists receive above-scale pay than seconds.

Viola, cello and bass sections have increasingly fewer musicians earning the premium, Mr. Moseley said.

Office Employes

Turning to the personnel in Mr. Moseley's offices, attorneys for the black musicians said there were no Negroes on the Philharmonic's 30-person administrative staff. Mr. Moseley said the Philharmonic had tried to find qualified black people for the staff.

The Philharmonic's musical director emeritus, Leonard Bernstein, was excused from the day's session by consent of all parties. His name, originally entered on Mr. Madison's complaint as a respondent, was dropped without public announcement before the hearings began, on May 8. Mr. Bernstein remains under subpoena as a witness, however, according to a commission spokesman.

The only witness heard besides Mr. Moseley was Ortiz Walton, of Berkeley, Calif., who testified that he had been a double-bass player with the Boston Symphony for seven years and had been often harassed because of his color. The hearing was adjourned to Sept. 24 at 10 A.M.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
AUG 2 1969

Philadelphia Musicians Win Top Pay

NY Times, 7/15/69

Special to The New York Times

PHILADELPHIA, July 14 —Members of the Philadelphia Orchestra will receive the highest minimum income of any symphony musicians in the United States next season under the terms of a three-year contract agreed upon with management today.

This season, the final one in the current contract, the Philadelphians receive a minimum of $14,350, of which $2,000 is in recording fees and $12,350 in salary. Under the new contract, the recording fee remains the same but the salary rises. The men will get a total of $16,040 next season, $16,560 in 1970-1971 and $17,080 in 1971-72.

The second highest minimum pay for symphonies next season will be earned by Boston Symphony musicians. They will get $16,000, which $1,000 is recording fees. Third highest will be the New York Philharmonic musicians—$15,040, of which $1,000 is recording fees. Both the New York and the Boston ensembles will be in the final year of their current contracts next season.

The new Philadelphia contract also calls for an increase in paid vacations, from five to six weeks, and increased pension and medical benefits. Per diem rates for tours will rise from $19.50 to $25.

Yesterday's agreement was reached two months before the expiration of the current contract, Sept. 15. In 1966, the orchestra's season was delayed eight weeks by a strike before contract terms could be agreed upon.

Under the new contract, management has the right to divide the orchestra into two performing groups for special concerts. This will make an increase in the number of in-school educational concerts possible.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
AUG 5 1969
New England Newsclip

167

Detroit Symphony Has Growing Pains

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

Recent months have provided graphic examples of the problems facing three orchestras: Detroit, Boston and Philadelphia, whose successes or failures have special meaning for Worcester.

Detroit Symphony Orchestra, which has played for Worcester Music Festival since 1958, now lists more than 100 players and is highly esteemed, though not rated in the "top five" (New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland and Chicago.)

It recently (just in time to salvage the big summer season) signed a new contract, making modest increases in minimum weekly pay, bettering fringe benefits, and guaranteeing paid vacations as well as certain minimum weeks of work per year.

The players were not happy, since they had struck for much larger weekly rate increases, and for more weeks of guaranteed work per year.

The biggest bone of contention was Meadow Brook Music Festival at Oakland University, Rochester, Mich. The players wanted these eight weeks of summer work to be guaranteed. Detroit leaders, who enter the Meadow Brook picture only as that Festival's sponsors invite them to enter, could guarantee nothing, especially as this year Meadow Brook has chosen to climax its summer with one week of the N.Y. Philharmonic under guest conductors.

The Compromise

However, the Detroit management agreed to find work somewhere, and its compromise runs as follows:

Old contract, 40 weeks at a minimum of $205. New contract, '69-'70 season, 44 weeks and $215., plus two weeks of paid vacation; '70-'71, 46 weeks and $235., plus three weeks vacation.

This works out that the lowest possible pay for a Detroit player will be $9,890, $11,025, and $11,515. In the next three seasons, and many players will receive more.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, a year ago, signed new contracts based on $14,000 minimum pay, for virtually a 52-week year, including paid vacations. Its old minmum rate was said to have been $10,500.

Philadelphia Orchestra very recently announced new minimum annual pay of $16,040, $16,560 and $17,080 for the next three seasons.

Philadelphia (which played for the Worcester Festival 1944-1957) is probably worrying the least of these three orchestras, as it taps a bonanza at Saratoga (blessed with free-spending crowds) and rides high on such times as recording royalties. Boston (as I pointed out in a recent article) has for several years been doing necessary things quietly, to increase income, diversify activities, secure added endowment and maintenance funds, in many cases aided by matching grants.

Growing Pains

Detroit's growing pains are so recent that it is still dazed, and somewhat disillusioned to find that metropolitan Detroit is too static a field for it, financially and artistically.

Detroit may well have to undertake additional statewide activities and become the Michigan Orchestra, following Minneapolis' example in Minnesota.

Detroit's deficit was already a staggering one before the new contract.

Worcester, in the second year of a three-year contract with Detroit, is not yet hit hard by these problems.

We may well ponder what our fate would have been, had we continued to hire Philadelphia after 1957, paying the substantial increases then asked, or had managed to sign up Boston as our Festival orchestra. Boston by the way (on several occasions) is reported to have said informally that it cannot fit a Worcester week into its season. We on the other hand cannot split our Festival into single days, scattered through the season.

From the above figures I have made a very daring guess, that the Philadelphia Orchestra today would cost us 50 per cent more than Detroit, and this difference could well demand desperate measures in order to avoid bankruptcy for Worcester Festival.

168

Hard Times Face Musicians

By S. GORDON GAPPER
Journal Music Critic

HANOVER N. H. — The way you hear it these days—from composers, conductors and performers — the changes which have taken place in music are nothing compared with what we are about to receive.

Conversations during the annual conference at Tanglewood in Massachusetts and here at Dartmouth College's seventh annual Congregation of the Arts make it as clear as a New England mountain stream that these changes are going to surge from the concert audience to the parlor piano.

And both of those, incidentally, are in danger of being swept out to sea.

There is an intensity, indeed a desperation, in the musical scene today as concerned persons try to find the answer to holding audiences against the threats — if that is what they are — of economics and technology. To take an example of the latter first:

The critics en masse were able to hear the Baldwin electronics piano, which was first played in public by Lorin Hollander last February to a limited audience in New York City.

It was demonstrated in the shed at Tanglewood the other day. It is a concert grand without sounding board. Instead, the string vibrations are picked up electronically and reproduced through loudspeakers under the instrument.

The sounds available to the pianist are much softer and louder than those he can make with a conventional piano. Moreover, through the use of two pedals he can vary the intensity of sound as much as he likes to give a tremolo effect and can confine his effects to either end of the keyboard. Eventually, the controls will be placed close to the keyboard and he will be able to vary timber as well as volume, thus adding vastly to the capabilities of the piano. The sound, too, can be channeled to other speakers.

All this is not to plug the Baldwin Piano and Organ Co. (the other major American piano distributor apparently is not interested) but simply to show how far the use of electronically modified instruments has gone beyond the "traditional" audience's likes and dislikes. The company expects it to take some time to get into real production — perhaps a year — and is making no prediction about price.

The critics also were given a demonstration of "domestic" four channel stereophonic sound, which will be available in the Boston area this fall (if you have four stereo radio sets) and undoubtedly will be found everywhere before too long.

Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be broadcast in this area from two FM stations. The effect of having speakers for different channels at the four corners of the room is, as they say, total concert hall realism. The broadcasts will be sponsored, one feels obliged to say, by the firm which helped develop the technique, Acoustic Research, Inc., Cambridge, Mass.

What all this — live or recorded — is going to do to the concert hall audience is anybody's guess. Or would be if it weren't for an uncomfortable fact already noted by John Hamilton, director of Dartmouth College's electronic music studio.

That is that for the first time last season, audiences for symphony orchestras in the United States dropped.

This does not mean that the cultural boom in the United States has gone bust; it means that the stream of music is beginning to flow into entirely new channels and that the custodians and purveyors of music —those who pay and those who play —are going to pull farther away from their already alienated audiences unless something drastic is done.

Ralph Burgard, an official of the Associated councils for the Arts, a national body serving state and local arts councils, told the critics at Tanglewood:

"New forms of regional cooperation are going to be important — for economy and for reaching new audiences."

He gave as an example the cooperation of several musical organizations (symphony orchestras and others) in Ontario, which have a centralized, computerized mailing, a unified box office and a common employe insurance play.

He believes actual mergers of orchestras (such as those proposed for Buffalo and Rochester in New York, or Cincinnati and Indianapolis) "are not going to be much of a factor."

He added that a national scientific survey had indicated that music and sex (not necessarily in that order) have given individuals their most important experiences.

Which seems to give force to his argument that "the money crisis has to be solved" and that the arts deserve "higher priority" than they have had "in the nation's business."

Richard Wangerin, president of the American Symphony Orchestra League, outlined the so-called Missouri Plan in which the Missouri State Council for the Arts is involved. The object is to have the St. Louis Symphony and the Kansas City Philharmonic take part in small-town orchestra series.

First-chair players in the two large orchestras would be available to give clinics in high schools and also as soloists in concertos with the poorer orchestras. And the local orchestras would be invited to send stands of players to take part in rehearsals and performances of the larger orchestras.

The scheme, Wangerin said, would raise the artistic standards of the smaller orchestras and at the same time broaden the earning power and audience of the larger orchestras.

Music lovers are now aware that the Minneapolis Symphony's title has been broadened to Minnesota and that rumors are rife as to the Detroit Symphony's intentions to get on concert series in outstate Michigan, including that of the Flint Symphony.

Whether or not you believe such moves are advantageous to both parties, Wangerin said, they "need understanding on both sides" to make them work.

Symphonic costs are up, Wangerin pointed out, because payrolls keep climbing.

Although orchestral players' salaries average under $10,000, he said, the scale for players in the top ten orchestras began last year at $10,000.

Basic payment for the Philadelphia Orchestra, he said, is $16,080 per man and "that's for a 20-hour week and includes seven weeks' vacation."

Of that, he said, $14,000 represents what the sponsoring society has to raise and the rest what each player gets from the orchestra's recording contract. (Some orchestras, including the Boston Symphony, are now signing contracts with European record companies because reproduction costs are much cheaper across the water).

Erich Leinsdorf, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony, observed for the critics that it is rehearsals and not performances that cost money, since there are more of them, and that "there has been a steady erosion" of rehearsal time resulting from decisions in musician - management salary negotiations.

The result of fewer rehearsals is, he said, that some orchestras are giving fewer programs than before, even if the number of concerts has increased. They are, in other words, sticking pretty much to familiar, well-rehearsed material.

It is readily demonstrable that this is not keeping young audiences, and Conductors, and Marion Di Bonaventura, the music director of Dartmouth's summer arts program, believes that if economics has to be a determining factor in the survival of music, some drastic changes have to be made in how the music business is run.

"Music is at a crossroads," he told me," or rather at a dead end, because its economic life is threatened. Music will have to have a day of reckoning."

One part of the solution as he sees it appears paradoxical.

He suggests that in view of the increased length of most orchestras' seasons, the membership of orchestras could be increased from about 100 to about 140 to make them more flexible in length of employment and styles of program (the effective size of two large orchestras which merge, it has been suggested, would be reduced to about that figure.

He also suggests that it is "absolutely imperative that audiences be brought past Ravel and Debussy"—that is, into the vast contemporary literature which many orchestras ignore, despite young people's interests.

He believes that many persons stay away from concerts because they hear enough traditional music piped into offices, stores, elevators and airline terminals.

To Hamilton, the electronic composer surrounded by $50,000 worth of equipment (making the Dartmouth studio one of the top five in the United States,), the corner has been turned.

He looks forward to a computer hookup (which some other schools have) which will make the electronic composer's work a lot easier. Even now, he told me, the technical knowledge required to compose music electronically is "much less crucial" than it was when composers began playing with sine tones.

There are still only about 200 commercial records of electronic music, said Hamilton, running his hands along Dartmouth's huge stock of unpublished tapes by most of the world's masters of electronic music. But the supply is increasing and Hamilton gave this example of the demand.

Dartmouth has issued a disc of works by finalists in its 1968 International Electronic Music Competition. Before the recent LP, "Switched-on Bach," made from a Moog synthesizer, hit the stands, the Dartmouth disc had sold 4,000 copies. Since "Bach" appeared, the Dartmouth disc sold 25,000 copies in a similar time period.

Having heard something familiar played electronically, people are more willing to listen to original electronic composition, he believes.

The same kind of equipment that is sending astronauts to the moon and back turns up in the composition of electronic music and Di Bonaventura had something to say about this: "I find it quite grotesque that these heroic men played "Take Me Back to Houston." I would have found it equally grotesque if they had played "Aida." They still would have proved themselves victims of our cultural environment."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
DEC 17 1968

Composer John Huggler Wins $1500 Horblit Award

Composer John Huggler has been awarded the 1968 Horblit Award by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Presentation of the $1500 award was made at Symphony Hall on Friday by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees.

The Horblit Award was established in 1947 by Mark M. Horblit "to foster and promote the writing of symphonic compositins by composers resident in the United States." The award committee consisted of Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Symphony; A. Tillman Merritt, chairman of the music department at Harvard University; and Mr. Banks. The first recipient in 1947 was Aaron Copland; the most recent recipient in 1966 was Gunther Schuller.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
DEC 17 1968

Huggler wins BSO award

Composer John Huggler is the recipient of the 1968 Horblit Award by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Presentation of the $1500 award was made recently at Symphony Hall by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees.

Established in 1947 by Mark M. Horblitt, the award has as its purpose the encouragement of symphonic compositions by composers resident in the U.S., and the enlargement of "the fund of good music suitable for rendition by symphonic orchestras."

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
DEC 17 1968

Composer Gets Award

Composer John Huggler of Lexington received the Horblit award for meritorious work in the field of symphonic composing from Boston Symphony Orchestra. First winner of the $1500 award in 1947 was Aaron Copland. Last year's award went to Gunther Schuller, new president of New England Conservatory.

A native of Rochester, Huggler was the symphony's composer in-residence under a Rockefeller Foundation grant in the 1964-65 season.

He has a bachelor of music degree from Eastman School of Music. The composer was a clarinetist with the Oklahoma City Symphony, and was a Guggenheim Fellow in Rome in 1962-63.

Boston Symphony has performed several of Huggler's compositions, during the regular season and on tour. His most recent works are flute and trumpet concertos.

Huggler is professor of music at University of Massachusetts at Boston.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
DEC 18 1968

Horblit Award to Huggler

Composer John Huggler of Lexington has received the $1,500 Horblit Award for 1968 presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first award went to Aaron Copland in 1947; the most recent, to Gunther Schuller in 1966.

The Flint Journal
FLINT, MICH.
D. 115,014 SUN. 115,373
AUG 18 1969

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892
JAN 12 1969

A YOUNG and comparatively unknown composer has received the 1968 Horblit Award by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Amount of the award is $1,500.

Its purpose is "to foster and promote the writing of symphonic compositions by composers resident in the United States."

Under a program financed by a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, Huggler was the Boston Symphony's composer - in - residence during the 1964-65 season.

We look forward to hearing some music from the pen of Huggler.

ROCHESTER TIMES UNION
Monday, August 11, 1969

Arts of the Times

Philharmonic Needs Funds From Radio and Records

By DR. HOWARD HANSON

Director Emeritus, Eastman School of Music

I was much impressed by a recently published interview with Joseph De Vitt, the able president of the Rochester local of the American Federation of Musicians, on the subject of symphony orchestras in the United States, and, particularly, the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. I would, however, like to add some further observations.

Dr. Hanson

A great deal of public opinion seems to favor the raising of a large endowment fund for the "permanent" support of the orchestra. With this I cannot agree. If every artistic and educational enterprise which could not support itself from endowment income had to fold its tents I am afraid that there would not be many left. As one sage put it, "The arts and education must live on the interest on their indebtedness"!

It is ungracious to sock a gift-horse in the jaw but I am not sure that the generosity of the Ford Foundation has proved an unmixed blessing. It has made us all too susceptible to the endowment syndrome.

Furthermore continuing to exists on a year to year basis will give us some time to reassess the entire orchestral problem. There can be no question that — for better or worse — we are living in a brand new age. We hear infinitely more music than ever before, but we hear most of it electronically, by record, radio, or television. And, with the exception of recordings which we buy, we listen to most of it free.

THERE ARE, it is true, millions of dollars of income accruing to symphony orchestras from the sale of records. In the cases of some of the great orchestras this income forms a not inconsiderable part of the orchestra's revenues. However, this sizable income is divided among a very few orchestras.

The reason for this inequity is simple. The fees for recording are set on a national, rather than a local, basis. In other words the standard recording fees are the same for the Columbus, Rochester, Buffalo and San Antonio symphonies as for the Philadelphia, Boston, Cleveland and New York Philharmonic orchestras. This presents an absolutely impossible economic situation.

The Rochester orchestra, good as it is, cannot compete on the same price scale with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Excellent as we are we are not that good! And yet, according to union regulations, we must compete on the same terms. Even golf provides for handicaps!

THERE IS ANOTHER matter which should be examined as music moves further into the electronic age. The millions of hours of serious and popular music played on radio bring no revenue to the performers who made the record. The composer, if he is living, receives royalties through the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, (ASCAP). This, I think, is entirely proper. The performers, however, receive no royalties.

And yet a very small performance fee from every radio station in the country would go far to solve the nation's orchestral problems.

We are in a new age and the sooner we grapple with its new problems the better off we shall be in our cultural development.

WAYLAND ENTERPRISE
NATICK, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,200
DEC 31 1968

NATICK BULLETIN
NATICK, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,650
DEC 31 1968

Horblit Award

Composer John Huggler has been awarded the 1968 Horblit Award by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Presentation of the award in the amount of $1500 was made at Symphony Hall by Talcott M. Banks, President of the Orchestra's Trustees. The Horblit Award was established in 1947 by Mark M. Horblit. Its purpose is "to foster and promote the writing of symphonic compositions by composers resident in the United States by providing for awards to be conferred in recognition of meritorious work in that field, and thus to enlarge the fund of good music suitable for rendition by symphony orchestras."

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
DEC 28 1968

John Huggler Gains Award

BOSTON — Composer John Huggler has received the $1,500 Horblit Award of the Boston Symphony. Huggler was the orchestra's composer-in-residence during the 1964-1965 season under a program financed by the Rockefeller Foundation.

The award established in 1947 by Mark W. Horblit is given "to foster and promote the writing of symphonic compositions by composers resident in the United States by providing for awards to be conferred in recognition of meritorious work in that field, and thus to enlarge the fund of good music suitable for rendition by symphony orchestras."

The award committee consisted of Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony music director; A. Tillman Merritt, chairman of the Harvard University Department of Music; and Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees. Aaron Copland was the first recipient of the award in 1947. The 1966 winner was Gunther Schuller.

Composer John Huggler was awarded the 1968 Horblit Award of $1,500 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Horblit Award was established in 1947 "to foster and promote the writing of symphonic compositions by composers resident in the United States by providing for awards to be conferred in recognition of meritorious work in that field, and thus to enlarge the fund of good music suitable for rendition by symphony orchestras."

Under a program financed by a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, Mr. Huggler was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's composer-in-residence during the 1964-65 season. He has performed as a clarinetist with the Oklahoma City Symphony and was a Guggenheim Fellow in Rome in 1962-63.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100
FEB 1969

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 16,000
FEB 1969

168

Hard Times Face Musicians

By S. GORDON GAPPER
Journal Music Critic

HANOVER N. H. — The way you hear it these days—from composers, conductors and performers — the changes which have taken place in music are nothing compared with what we are about to receive.

Conversations during the annual conference at Tanglewood in Massachusetts and here at Dartmouth College's seventh annual Congregation of the Arts make it as clear as a New England mountain stream that these changes are going to surge from the concert audience to the parlor piano.

And both of those, incidentally, are in danger of being swept out to sea.

There is an intensity, indeed a desperation, in the musical scene today as concerned persons try to find the answer to holding audiences against the threats — if that is what they are — of economics and technology. To take an example of the latter first:

The critics en masse were able to hear the Baldwin electronics piano, which was first played in public by Lorin Hollander last February to a limited audience in New York City.

It was demonstrated in the shed at Tanglewood the other day. It is a concert grand without sounding board. Instead, the string vibrations are picked up electronically and reproduced through loudspeakers under the instrument.

The sounds available to the pianist are much softer and louder than those he can make with a conventional piano. Moreover, through the use of two pedals he can vary the intensity of sound as much as he likes to give a tremolo effect and can confine his effects to either end of the keyboard. Eventually, the controls will be placed close to the keyboard and he will be able to vary timber as well as volume, thus adding vastly to the capabilities of the piano. The sound, too, can be channeled to other speakers.

All this is not to plug the Baldwin Piano and Organ Co. (the other major American piano distributor apparently is not interested) but simply to show how far the use of electronically modified instruments has gone beyond the "traditional" audience's likes and dislikes. The company expects it to take some time to get into real production — perhaps a year — and is making no prediction about price.

The critics also were given a demonstration of "domestic" four channel stereophonic sound, which will be available in the Boston area this fall (if you have four stereo radio sets) and undoubtedly will be found everywhere before too long.

Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be broadcast in this area from two FM stations. The effect of having speakers for different channels at the four corners of the room is, as they say, total concert hall realism. The broadcasts will be sponsored, one feels obliged to say, by the firm which helped develop the technique, Acoustic Research, Inc., Cambridge, Mass.

What all this — live or recorded — is going to do to the concert hall audience is anybody's guess. Or would be if it weren't for an uncomfortable fact already noted by John Hamilton, director of Dartmouth College's electronic music studio.

That is that for the first time last season, audiences for symphony orchestras in the United States dropped.

This does not mean that the cultural boom in the United States has gone bust; it means that the stream of music is beginning to flow into entirely new channels and that the custodians and purveyors of music —those who pay and those who play —are going to pull farther away from their already alienated audiences unless something drastic is done.

Ralph Burgard, an official of the Associated councils for the Arts, a national body serving state and local arts councils, told the critics at Tanglewood:

"New forms of regional cooperation are going to be important — for economy and for reaching new audiences."

He gave as an example the cooperation of several musical organizations (symphony orchestras and others) in Ontario, which have a centralized, computerized mailing, a unified box office and a common employe insurance play.

He believes actual mergers of orchestras (such as those proposed for Buffalo and Rochester in New York, or Cincinnati and Indianapolis) "are not going to be much of a factor."

He added that a national scientific survey had indicated that music and sex (not necessarily in that order) have given individuals their most important experiences.

Which seems to give force to his argument that "the money crisis has to be solved" and that the arts deserve "higher priority" than they have had "in the nation's business."

Richard Wangerin, president of the American Symphony Orchestra League, outlined the so-called Missouri Plan in which the Missouri State Council for the Arts is involved. The object is to have the St. Louis Symphony and the Kansas City Philharmonic take part in small-town orchestra series.

First-chair players in the two large orchestras would be available to give clinics in high schools and also as soloists in concertos with the poorer orchestras. And the local orchestras would be invited to send stands of players to take part in rehearsals and performances of the larger orchestras.

The scheme, Wangerin said, would raise the artistic standards of the smaller orchestras and at the same time broaden the earning power and audience of the larger orchestras.

Music lovers are now aware that the Minneapolis Symphony's title has been broadened to Minnesota and that rumors are rife as to the Detroit Symphony's intentions to get on concert series in outstate Michigan, including that of the Flint Symphony.

Whether or not you believe such moves are advantageous to both parties, Wangerin said, they "need understanding on both sides" to make them work.

Symphonic costs are up, Wangerin pointed out, because payrolls keep climbing.

Although orchestral players' salaries average under $10,000, he said, the scale for players in the top ten orchestras began last year at $10,000.

Basic payment for the Philadelphia Orchestra, he said, is $16,080 per man and "that's for a 20-hour week and includes seven weeks' vacation."

Of that, he said, $14,000 represents what the sponsoring society has to raise and the rest what each player gets from the orchestra's recording contract. (Some orchestras, including the Boston Symphony, are now signing contracts with European record companies because reproduction costs are much cheaper across the water).

Erich Leinsdorf, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony, observed for the critics that it is rehearsals and not performances that cost money, since there are more of them, and that "there has been a steady erosion" of rehearsal time resulting from decisions in musician - management salary negotiations.

The result of fewer rehearsals is, he said, that some orchestras are giving fewer programs than before, even if the number of concerts has increased. They are, in other words, sticking pretty much to familiar, well-rehearsed material.

It is readily demonstrable that this is not keeping young audiences, and Conductors, and Marion Di Bonaventura, the music director of Dartmouth's summer arts program, believes that if economics has to be a determining factor in the survival of music, some drastic changes have to be made in how the music business is run.

"Music is at a crossroads," he told me," or rather at a dead end, because its economic life is threatened. Music will have to have a day of reckoning."

One part of the solution as he sees it appears paradoxical.

He suggests that in view of the increased length of most orchestras' seasons, the membership of orchestras could be increased from about 100 to about 140 to make them more flexible in length of employment and styles of program (the effective size of two large orchestras which merge, it has been suggested, would be reduced to about that figure.

He also suggests that it is "absolutely imperative that audiences be brought past Ravel and Debussy"—that is, into the vast contemporary literature which many orchestras ignore, despite young people's interests.

He believes that many persons stay away from concerts because they hear enough traditional music piped into offices, stores, elevators and airline terminals.

To Hamilton, the electronic composer surrounded by $50,000 worth of equipment (making the Dartmouth studio one of the top five in the United States.), the corner has been turned.

He looks forward to a computer hookup (which some other schools have) which will make the electronic composer's work a lot easier. Even now, he told me, the technical knowledge required to compose music electronically is "much less crucial" than it was when composers began playing with sine tones.

There are still only about 200 commercial records of electronic music, said Hamilton, running his hands along Dartmouth's huge stock of unpublished tapes by most of the world's masters of electronic music. But the supply is increasing and Hamilton gave this example of the demand.

Dartmouth has issued a disc of works by finalists in its 1968 International Electronic Music Competition. Before the recent LP, "Switched-on Bach," made from a Moog synthesizer, hit the stands, the Dartmouth disc had sold 4,000 copies. Since "Bach" appeared, the Dartmouth disc sold 25,000 copies in a similar time period.

Having heard something familiar played electronically, people are more willing to listen to original electronic composition, he believes.

The same kind of equipment that is sending astronauts to the moon and back turns up in the composition of electronic music and Di Bonaventura had something to say about this: "I find it quite grotesque that these heroic men played "Take Me Back to Houston." I would have found it equally grotesque if they had played "Aida." They still would have proved themselves victims of our cultural environment."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

DEC 17 1968

Composer John Huggler Wins $1500 Horblit Award

Composer John Huggler has been awarded the 1968 Horblit Award by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Prsentation of the $1500 award was made at Symphony Hall on Friday by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees.

The Horblit Award was established in 1947 by Mark M. Horblit "to foster and promote the writing of symphonic compositins by composers resident in the United States." The award committee consisted of Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Symphony; A. Tillman Merritt, chairman of the music department at Harvard University; and Mr. Banks. The first recipient in 1947 was Aaron Copland; the most recent recipient in 1966 was Gunther Schuller.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

DEC 17 1968

Huggler wins BSO award

Composer John Huggler is the recipient of the 1968 Horblit Award by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Presentation of the $1500 award was made recently at Symphony Hall by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees.

Established in 1947 by Mark M. Horblitt, the award has as its purpose the encouragement of symphonic compositions by composers resident in the U.S., and the enlargement of "the fund of good music suitable for rendition by symphonic orchestras."

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

DEC 17 1968

Composer Gets Award

Composer John Huggler of Lexington received the Horblit award for meritorious work in the field of symphonic composing from Boston Symphony Orchestra. First winner of the $1500 award in 1947 was Aaron Copland. Last year's award went to Gunther Schuller, new president of New England Conservatory.

A native of Rochester, Huggler was the symphony's composer in-residence under a Rockefeller Foundation grant in the 1964-65 season.

He has a bachelor of music degree from Eastman School of Music. The composer was a clarinetist with the Oklahoma City Symphony, and was a Guggenheim Fellow in Rome in 1962-63.

Boston Symphony has performed several of Huggler's compositions, during the regular season and on tour. His most recent works are flute and trumpet concertos.

Huggler is professor of music at University of Massachusetts at Boston.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

DEC 18 1968

Horblit Award to Huggler

Composer John Huggler of Lexington has received the $1,500 Horblit Award for 1968 presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first award went to Aaron Copland in 1947; the most recent, to Gunther Schuller in 1966.

The Flint Journal
FLINT, MICH.
D. 115,014 SUN. 115,373

AUG 18 1969

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

JAN 12 1969

A YOUNG and comparatively unknown composer has received the 1968 Horblit Award by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Amount of the award is $1,500.

Its purpose is "to foster and promote the writing of symphonic compositions by composers resident in the United States."

Under a program financed by a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, Huggler was the Boston Symphony's composer - in - residence during the 1964-65 season.

We look forward to hearing some music from the pen of Huggler.

ROCHESTER TIMES UNION
Monday, August 11, 1969

Arts of the Times

Philharmonic Needs Funds From Radio and Records

By DR. HOWARD HANSON

Director Emeritus, Eastman School of Music

I was much impressed by a recently published interview with Joseph De Vitt, the able president of the Rochester local of the American Federation of Musicians, on the subject of symphony orchestras in the United States, and, particularly, the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. I would, however, like to add some further observations.

Dr. Hanson

A great deal of public opinion seems to favor the raising of a large endowment fund for the "permanent" support of the orchestra. With this I cannot agree. If every artistic and educational enterprise which could not support itself from endowment income had to fold its tents I am afraid that there would not be many left. As one sage put it, "The arts and education must live on the interest on their indebtedness"!

It is ungracious to sock a gift-horse in the jaw but I am not sure that the generosity of the Ford Foundation has proved an unmixed blessing. It has made us all too susceptible to the endowment syndrome.

Furthermore continuing to exists on a year to year basis will give us some time to reassess the entire orchestral problem. There can be no question that — for better or worse — we are living in a brand new age. We hear infinitely more music than ever before, but we hear most of it electronically, by record, radio, or television. And, with the exception of recordings which we buy, we listen to most of it free.

THERE ARE, it is true, millions of dollars of income accruing to symphony orchestras from the sale of records. In the cases of some of the great orchestras this income forms a not inconsiderable part of the orchestra's revenues. However, this sizable income is divided among a very few orchestras.

The reason for this inequity is simple. The fees for recording are set on a national, rather than a local, basis. In other words the standard recording fees are the same for the Columbus, Rochester, Buffalo and San Antonio symphonies as for the Philadelphia, Boston, Cleveland and New York Philharmonic orchestras. This presents an absolutely impossible economic situation.

The Rochester orchestra, good as it is, cannot compete on the same price scale with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Excellent as we are we are not that good! And yet, according to union regulations, we must compete on the same terms. Even golf provides for handicaps!

THERE IS ANOTHER matter which should be examined as music moves further into the electronic age. The millions of hours of serious and popular music played on radio bring no revenue to the performers who made the record. The composer, if he is living, receives royalties through the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, (ASCAP). This, I think, is entirely proper. The performers, however, receive no royalties.

And yet a very small performance fee from every radio station in the country would go far to solve the nation's orchestral problems.

We are in a new age and the sooner we grapple with its new problems the better off we shall be in our cultural development.

WAYLAND ENTERPRISE
NATICK, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,200

DEC 31 1968

NATICK BULLETIN
NATICK, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,650

DEC 31 1968

Horblit Award

Composer John Huggler has been awarded the 1968 Horblit Award by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Presentation of the award in the amount of $1500 was made at Symphony Hall by Talcott M. Banks, President of the Orchestra's Trustees. The Horblit Award was established in 1947 by Mark M. Horblit. Its purpose is "to foster and promote the writing of symphonic compositions by composers resident in the United States by providing for awards to be conferred in recognition of meritorious work in that field, and thus to enlarge the fund of good music suitable for rendition by symphony orchestras."

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

DEC 28 1968

John Huggler Gains Award

BOSTON — Composer John Huggler has received the $1,500 Horblit Award of the Boston Symphony. Huggler was the orchestra's composer-in-residence during the 1964-1965 season under a program financed by the Rockefeller Foundation.

The award established in 1947 by Mark W. Horblit is given "to foster and promote the writing of symphonic compositions by composers resident in the United States by providing for awards to be conferred in recognition of meritorious work in that field, and thus to enlarge the fund of good music suitable for rendition by symphony orchestras."

The award committee consisted of Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony music director; A. Tillman Merritt, chairman of the Harvard University Department of Music; and Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees. Aaron Copland was the first recipient of the award in 1947. The 1966 winner was Gunther Schuller.

Composer John Huggler was awarded the 1968 Horblit Award of $1,500 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Horblit Award was established in 1947 "to foster and promote the writing of symphonic compositions by composers resident in the United States by providing for awards to be conferred in recognition of meritorious work in that field, and thus to enlarge the fund of good music suitable for rendition by symphony orchestras."

Under a program financed by a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, Mr. Huggler was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's composer-in-residence during the 1964-65 season. He has performed as a clarinetist with the Oklahoma City Symphony and was a Guggenheim Fellow in Rome in 1962-63.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

FEB 1969

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,000

FEB 1969

Boston Symphony OKs Three-Year Contract

Players and management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra agreed yesterday to a three-year contract providing some $500,000 in pay increases, including a minimum salary of $14,000.

The minimum salary includes an annual recording guarantee of $1,000.

Also provided were several new features for a symphony orchestra, including 15 five-day weeks each year. In the first year, eight weeks will have two consecutive days off and the number increases to 10 weeks during the last two years of the contract.

In addition, an advisory committee will be formed of five members chosen jointly by orchestra members and management to act as consultant to management on musical matters and other aspects of the orchestra's function.

The former basic minimum for players was $10,500.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

EAGLE TRIBUNE (M) & (E)
LAWRENCE, MASS.

AUG 28 1968 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
CIRC. 82,450

SEP 1 1968 New England Newsclip

NEWS (e)
BANGOR, ME.
CIRC. 79,750

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 56,000

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

The Boston Symphony's

BSO raises fund goal to $5.5 million more curent fund drive has raised $4.2 million in contributions and pledges, more than enough to qualify for the Ford Foundation challenge grant of $2 million. But the orchestra is going out for an additional $5.5 million, according to a newsletter to Friends of the Boston Symphony signed by B.S.O. president Henry B. Cabot.

The $5.5 million is to be added to capital. Cabot writes: "Over the next five years, in addition to bringing the annual giving by the Friends from its current $325,000 to about double that amount, the orchestra will need to increase its capital by an additional $5.5 million.

This will mean that income from this capital, plus the Friends annual giving and income from all other sources — tickets, royalties, radio and television — will help the orchestra balance its books.

The current fund drive has been under the direction of trustee Philip K. Allen and several committees. Included in the initial $5.5 million goal was $1.5 million for refurbishment and alteration of Symphony Hall.

At the time that this goal was set, the Boston Redevelopment Authority had intended to make changes in the areas around Symphony Hall, necessitating switching the hall's entrance from Massachusetts av. to the blank west wall. This alteration has now been postponed until the BRA clarifies its own plans.

Orchestra players and management are presently negotiating the players' contract for the next three years. Symphony concerts resume here in late September.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

AUG 23 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 24 1968 New England Newsclip

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 327,594 SUN. 356,929

AUG 31 1968

Boston Symphony Signs Pact; $14,000 Basic Pay

A new 3-year agreement between players and management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been announced, five days before the current agreement expires.

Among the features of the new agreement, reached after nearly 18 months of negotiations, is a basic minimum salary of $14,000, which included an annual recording guarantee of $1000. The former basic minimum salary for Boston Symphony Orchestra players was $10,500. The new wage levels are subjects to review at the end of two years, but it is estimated that the cost of the increases will be in the neighborhood of $250,000 for the first year, an additional $150,000 for the following year, and $100,000 for the third year.

The agreement contains several features new to symphony orchestras, including fifteen 5-day weeks in each of the contract's three years. In the first year of the agreement, eight of these weeks will have two consecutive days off. That number increases to ten in the second and third years.

Another new feature is an advisory committee to be formed of five members chosen jointly by the Orchestra members and the management. It will act in a consultative role, advising the management on musical matters and musical aspects of the Orchestra's functions. The advisory committee is created for an initial two-year period.

Speaking for the members of the Orchestra, George Zazofsky, chairman of the Orchestra committee, commented, "Naturally we're happy to have an agreement that in salary matters is at least equal to the best in the country, but we're even more pleased with some of the other features."

Both sides acknowledged the helpfulness of Local 9 of the American Federation of Musicians, and Robert Segal, attorney for the players of the Orchestra.

(The St. Louis Symphony Society three-year contract with the American Federation of Musicians, Local Two, expires this fall. Negotiations are now under way for a new agreement.)

SUNDAY STANDARD
TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 60,150

SEP 8 1968 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

AUG 28 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

DEMOCRAT
HOLYOKE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,000

AUG 31 1968 New England Newsclip

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

AUG 31 1968 New England Newsclip

NEWS (E)
MILFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 10,000

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

Regional Roundup

$14G Minimum Yearly For BSO in New Pact

A new three-year agreement between players and management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was announced in a joint player-management statement Wednesday, five days before the current agreement expires.

$14,000 Minimum

Among the features of the new agreement, reached after nearly 18 months of negotiations, is a basic minimum salary of $14,000, which included an annual recording guarantee of $1000. The former basic minimum salary for the players was $10,500. The new wage levels are subject to review at the end of two years, but it is estimated that the cost of the increases will be in the neighborhood of $250,000 for the first year, an additional $150,000 for the following year and $100,000 for the third year.

The agreement contains several features new to symphony orchestras, including 15 five-day weeks in each of the contract's three years. In the first year of the agreement, eight of these weeks will have two consecutive days off. That number increases to 10 in the second and third years.

Another new feature is an advisory committee to be formed of five members chosen jointly by orchestra members and management. It will act in a consultative role, advising the management on musical matters and musical aspects of the orchestra's functions. The advisory committee is created for an initial two-year period.

Auditions Procedures

New auditions procedures have also been agreed upon within the string section, to insure the most impartial possible method of advancement. Seating at the front desks will be determined by the music director. If an opening occurs in the desks behind the front desks, voluntary auditions will be arranged at which a sizable committee of string players votes on the filling of the vacancy. The music director will continue to be responsible for the selection of new orchestra members.

In announcing the agreement, which was negotiated in Boston and during the orchestra's recently concluded Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, both sides gratefully acknowledged the helpfulness of Local 9 of the American Federation of Musicians and Robert Segal, attorney for the players.

Commenting on the new agreement, Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, said, "I'm delighted we've reached this agreement ahead of the deadline. We began early, knowing that there was much to be talked about, and we bargained long and hard. What we have, I think, is an agreement in which both sides can take pride. In terms of salary, we met terms we had to meet. More importantly, we broke new ground in management-player relations, finding new ways to take advantage of the enormous fund of experience and talent we have in our orchestra. We have enjoyed a particularly close and respectful relationship with our orchestra players in Boston, and the new agreement is certainly an expression of that tradition."

Leinsdorf "Delighted"

Erich Leinsdorf, music director, said, "I am delighted we now take our vacations with the knowledge that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a contract which seems to please all concerned. I am greatly in favor of increased participation and responsibility for players, expecially since with year-round work no one person can really be on top of every problem. The whole trend to greater participation everywhere, be they musicians, industrial workers or students is very sound, and I am confident that it will prove of benefit to music."

Speaking for the members of the orchestra, George Zazofsky, chairman of the orchestra committee, commented, "Naturally we're happy to have an agreement that in salary matters is at least equal to the best in the country, but we're even more pleased with some of the other features. The management's recognition of the orchestra's concern for its artistic well-being and of the artistic contribution and advice the players can offer is genuinely enlightened and progressive.

"That's also true of the unique auditioning procedures within the string section, and the writing into the contract of a substantial number of five-day weeks, amounting in the third year to half the winter season being scheduled that way. For many reasons, these negotiations took a long time. There was a great deal of give and take. We've come through with a contract which is a tribute to both sides and which we think makes a Boston Symphony Orchestra position easily the most desirable of any orchestra."

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

170

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D. 34,382

SEP 25 1968

Deficit No Surprise

-M iow in can tem in a e lit-their rt of sident ointed tee in ng re-ons on n Series about ist plus ntenance lowest ets—$12—

e for 18

ociety's fi-part of a one illus-
pt. 16 press
ficago Symwhich will open the 1968-69 Choral Union Series in Hill Auditorium on Oct. 5.

The press release lists the Chicago Symphony's recent and currently budgeted deficits: $776,000 in fiscal-1967, $710,000 in fiscal-1968, and $600,000 in the fiscal-year that started July 1.

That reduced deficit budgeted this year by the Chicago Symphony reflects an assumption by the Chicago Orchestral Association's trustees that they can meet these aims:

Raising more in annual giving by Chicago-area residents than the $425,000 received in unrestricted gifts last year, plus $4 million in private endowments required as a condition for keeping a $2 million Ford Foundation endowment that is already producing revenue for the orchestra, plus another $6 million to be added to the orchestra's income-producing endowment during the next 10 years.

As a major example of an established campaign for gifts that successfully wipes out operating deficits, Rector points to a recent press release from the philadelphia Orchestra, an organization traditionally linked with the May Festival in Ann Arbor.

The press release reports that the Philadelphia Orchestra is currently somewhat beyond $2 million in its effort to raise $4 million in endowments, as a condition for a $2 million Ford Foundation endowment. This effort, like the Chicago Symphony's, is part of a $10 million "challenge drive."

A third recent press release, from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is pointed to by Rector as one illustration of why musical organizations are launching major campaigns for gifts.

It reports the signing of a new three-year contract between the Boston Symphony's management and Local 9, American Federation of Musicians, providing pay increases for players expected to cost $250,000 the first year, an additional $150,000 the second year, and $100,000 the third year. Minimum pay for players is raised in the contract from $10,500 to $14,000.

That means the University Musical Society can expect to spend roughly twice as much the next time it brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Ann Arbor as it did a decade ago, Rector explains.

He expresses doubt that the society's hope of raising private gifts, to offset operating deficits, was helped by a U-M regent who said last week the society "looks like a real sick baby."

Rector sees it this way: "The society is a 90-year-old, healthy, precious child that needs the attention of the parent institution—the mother of state universities—and of the city fathers."

The Detroit News
D. 700,321 SUN. 947,155

SEP 26 1968

Music Notes

Musicians eye Boston pay scale

By JAY CARR
Detroit News Drama and Music Critic

With their current contract expiring next year, Detroit Symphony musicians are eyeing recent developments that might figure in upcoming contract negotiations.

Musicians' union negotiators are sure to take note of the new Boston Symphony contract. It calls for a basic minimum salary of $14,000 (including an annual recording guarantee of $1,000) and institutes some novel string auditioning procedures.

Seating at Boston's front desks will be determined by the conductor. If an opening occurs in the desks behind the front desks, voluntary auditions will be arranged at which a committee of string players votes on the filling of the vacancy.

FEDERAL SUBSIDIES to orchestras, pensions, working conditions, legislation on performance copyrights and the question of evaluation of conductors have been discussed in recent union-management talks in other cities.

A ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION grant will enable the University of Michigan's School of Music to present four "Contemporary Directions" concerts. The first will take place Saturdays at the Rackham Lecture Hall in Ann Arbor at 8 p.m. Featured work: Roger Reynold's mixed-media "Ping."

Other concerts in the series: Nov. 1, Jan. 25 and March 15. Same time, same place. Fr admission to all concerts.

The Metropolitan Or produce its first tape early Nippon Hoso
the Jap
Corpor
and

The Dallas Morning Ne
B. Dealey Awards a nationwide, offerin first prize in strings divisi prize of ances
bro

CLINTON, MO.
DEMOCRAT
D. 3,000

SEP 5 1968

DAYTON DAILY NEWS
DAYTON, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 151,741

SEP-8--68

047

Lively Arts

By BETTY DIETZ KREBS

NX

Man With the Stick? He's Orchestra Member

WHILE THE new Boston Symphony contract doesn't give the musicians quite the power that the men of the Israel Philharmonic, the Vienna Symphony and one or two of the London orchestras have, it does give them an important voice in orchestra affairs.

Even the conductor must meet the approval of players in the other orchestras mentioned.

The musical charlatans come and go but they don't stay long, obviously, when the players, men with many years of playing for the finest, have a voice in what goes on.

It makes me think of the time a man long on theatrics and short on talent took over Toscanini's podium for a guest performance. Shrilly, he demanded the musicians follow his commands.

In retaliation, they threatened to play it his way. That way, the men knew, would end in disaster.

The Boston contract, of course, doesn't make that much change.

But it does provide for an advisory committee to be made up of five members, chosen jointly by the orchestra members and the management. The new committee, which will be created for an initial two-year period, will serve on a consulting basis, advising the management on musical matters and musical aspects of the orchestra's functions.

THAT ISN'T ALL. Every orchestra has problems when it comes to advancement within the ranks. So a new set of auditions procedures has been agreed to.

The music director still decides who gets the front desks and hires the new players. But if there's an opening behind the front desks, particularly in the string sections, a committee of players will vote at voluntary auditions.

The new three-year agreement, result of 18 months of bargaining, also carries a hefty boost in pay.

Basic minimum salary will be $14,000 which includes an annual recording guarantee of $1,000. Contrast this with the previous basic minimum of $10,500.

Something new has also been added to symphony orchestra contracts. That is 15 five-day weeks in each of the contract's three years. The first year of the agreement will provide for eight of these weeks to have two consecutive days off. The number increases to 10 in the second and third years.

The wage levels will be subject to review at the end of two years but the changes are expected to cost some $250,000 the first year, an additional $150,000 the second and $100,000 for the last year of the contract.

WINNING A SPOT in the Boston Symphony has always been a real plum for musicians.

Thus, it's probably the understatement of the year when an orchestra committee spokesman notes: "We've come through with a contract . . . we think makes a Boston Symphony orchestra position easily the most desirable of any orchestra."

Erich Leinsdorf, who's music director, views the situation with considerable good cheer.

"I am greatly in favor of increased participation and responsibility for players, especially since with year-round work no one person can really be on top of every problem."

He ought to know.

THE LAKE ERIE Opera theater, which is part of the Orchestra's program, this week gets moving Severance hall. Smetana's The Friday and Satur-is

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

SEP 15 1968

MUSIC

New Contract Sounds Sweet To BSO Members

By JOHN THORNTON

FIVE DAYS BEFORE the current Boston Symphony player-management agreement expired, a new three year pact was announced, establishing record salaries for the musicians.

The minimum is now $14,000 a year, including a recording guarantee of $1,000, which is a considerable jump from the basic minimum of $10,500 agreed upon three years ago. It is estimated that the total cost of the increases will be $250,000 the first year, another $150,000 the second year and around $100,000 for the third year.

Another victory for the players is evident in the forming of an advisory committee to be chosen jointly by orchestra and management. The committee will act in "a consultative role," advising management on musical matters and musical aspects of the orchestra's function. It is to be given a two year trial period.

New audition procedures have also been announced, mostly concerned with the string sections, to assure a fair and impartial method of advancement.

Seating of the front desks remains the choice of the music director, but if an opening occurs in desks behind the first chairs, voluntary auditions will be arranged at which a sizable committee of string players will vote on the filling of the vacancy.

The regular conductor-music director (who will be William Steinberg at the end of this season) will continue to select any new orchestra member.

The new contract includes 15 five-day weeks in each of the three years of the agreement. In the first year, eight of these weeks will have two consecutive days off, with that number increasing to 10 in the second and third years.

There are several features about the announcement that deserve commendation: 1. There was never a hint that the Boston Symphony would strike if no new agreement was signed, saving the kind of disaster that followed in the wake of the strike by the Philadelphia Orchestra last fall; 2. The salary levels will reflect the playing standard, for the BSO will attract the very best of the new musicians from all over the country, thus keeping it among the best ensembles in the world.

Participation Welcomed

SPEAKING ON THE new role of importance granted orchestra members in artistic problems, Erich Leinsdorf says: "I am greatly in favor of increased participation and responsibility for players, especially since with year-round work no one person can really be on top of every problem. The whole trend to greater participation everywhere, be they musicians, industrial workers or students is very sound, and I am confident that it will prove of benefit to music."

On this same subject, George Zazofsky, chairman of the orchestra committee comments: ". . management's recognition of the orchestra's concern for its artistic wellbeing and of the artistic contribution and advice the players can offer is genuinely enlightened and progressive."

Zazofsky is also highly pleased with new string audition methods and the days-off weeks, which will relieve musicians of the burden of long all-work-no-play periods.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the BSO trustees, admits "we broke new ground in management-player relationships finding new ways to take advantage of the enormous fund of experience and talent we have in our orchestra."

The BSO is quite easily the busiest orchestra in the United States since it not only has a full regular winter season, but in addition it boasts a heavy spring Pops season and summers at Tanglewood, plus tours and recordings. Only the first desk players have any relief from this crushing schedule. They take time off during "Pops" before heading out for Lenox.

One source of revenue that is highly important to the orchestra appears at this point to be in doubt. When Leinsdorf succeeded Munch, RCA-Victor, which favored the appointment, made a great many recordings with the new director.

In the last few seasons rumors have persisted that Leinsdorf-BSO albums have not been selling well. There was even talk that the dispute between Leinsdorf and the trustees which broke into the open last year was partly instigated by poor record sales.

Steinberg on the other hand has been under various recording agreements, the longest with Capitol, which made many records with him and the Pittsburgh Symphony. It remains to be seen what RCA-Victor will do about new BSO releases when Leinsdorf's contract ends next year.

I can recall that when Munch was boss at Boston, RCA-Victor made the Chicago Symphony-Fritz Reiner team its favorite, almost totally ignoring the Hub orchestra. This decision made for bitter feelings, and other companies bid for the BSO services that year.

Recent Stereo Tapes

ON THE SUBJECT of recordings, there are many splendid new stereo tapes I've neglected to mention. New du-techniques and improved signal to noise ratios have problems which had annoyed industry

ment:

170

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D. 34,932

SEP 25 1968

Deficit No Surprise

open the 1968-69 Choral Union Series in Hill Auditorium on Oct. 5.

The press release lists the Chicago Symphony's recent and currently budgeted deficits: $776,000 in fiscal-1967, $710,000 in fiscal-1968, and $600,000 in the fiscal-year that started July 1.

That reduced deficit budgeted this year by the Chicago Symphony reflects an assumption by the Chicago Orchestral Association's trustees that they can meet these aims:

Raising more in annual giving by Chicago-area residents than the $425,000 received in unrestricted gifts last year, plus $4 million in private endowments required as a condition for keeping a $2 million Ford Foundation endowment that is already producing revenue for the orchestra, plus another $6 million to be added to the orchestra's income-producing endowment during the next 10 years.

As a major example of an established campaign for gifts that successfully wipes out operating deficits, Rector points to a recent press release from the philadelphia Orchestra, an organization traditionally linked with the May Festival in Ann Arbor.

The press release reports that the Philadelphia Orchestra is currently somewhat beyond $2 million in its effort to raise $4 million in endowments, as a condition for a $2 million Ford Foundation endowment. This effort, like the Chicago Symphony's, is part of a $10 million "challenge drive."

A third recent press release, from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is pointed to by Rector as one illustration of why musical organizations are launching major campaigns for gifts.

It reports the signing of a new three-year contract between the Boston Symphony's management and Local 9, American Federation of Musicians, providing pay increases for players expected to cost $250,000 the first year, an additional $150,000 the second year, and $100,000 the third year. Minimum pay for players is raised in the contract from $10,500 to $14,000.

That means the University Musical Society can expect to spend roughly twice as much the next time it brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Ann Arbor as it did a decade ago, Rector explains.

He expresses doubt that the society's hope of raising private gifts, to offset operating deficits, was helped by a U-M regent who said last week the society "looks like a real sick baby."

Rector sees it this way: "The society is a 90-year-old, healthy, precious child that needs the attention of the parent institution—the mother of state universities—and of the city fathers."

The Detroit News
D. 700,321 SUN. 947,155

SEP 26 1968

Music Notes

Musicians eye Boston pay scale

By JAY CARR
Detroit News Drama and Music Critic

With their current contract expiring next year, Detroit Symphony musicians are eyeing recent developments that might figure in upcoming contract negotiations.

Musicians' union negotiators are sure to take note of the new Boston Symphony contract. It calls for a basic minimum salary of $14,000 (including an annual recording guarantee of $1,000) and institutes some novel string auditioning procedures.

Seating at Boston's front desks will be determined by the conductor. If an opening occurs in the desks behind the front desks, voluntary auditions will be arranged at which a committee of string players votes on the filling of the vacancy.

FEDERAL SUBSIDIES to orchestras, pensions, working conditions, legislation on performance copyrights and the question of evaluation of conductors have been discussed in recent union-management talks in other cities.

A ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION grant will enable the University of Michigan's School of Music to present four "Contemporary Directions" concerts. The first will take place Saturdays at the Rackham Lecture Hall in Ann Arbor at 8 p.m. Featured work: Roger Reynold's mixed-media "Ping."

Other concerts in the series: Nov. 1, Jan. 25 and March 15. Same time, same place. Fr[illegible] admission to all concerts.

The Metropolitan Or[illegible] produce its first [illegible] tape early [illegible] Nippon Hos[illegible] the Jap[illegible] Corpor[illegible] and [illegible]

The Dallas Morning Ne[illegible] B. Dealey Awards a[illegible] nationwide, offerin[illegible] first prize in [illegible] strings divisi[illegible] prize of [illegible] ances [illegible] bro[illegible]

CLINTON, MO.
DEMOCRAT
D. 3,000

SEP 5 1968

DAYTON DAILY NEWS
DAYTON, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 151,741

SEP-8--68

Lively Arts

By BETTY DIETZ KREBS

Man With the Stick? He's Orchestra Member

WHILE THE new Boston Symphony contract doesn't give the musicians quite the power that the men of the Israel Philharmonic, the Vienna Symphony and one or two of the London orchestras have, it does give them an important voice in orchestra affairs.

Even the conductor must meet the approval of players in the other orchestras mentioned.

The musical charlatans come and go but they don't stay long, obviously, when the players, men with many years of playing for the finest, have a voice in what goes on.

It makes me think of the time a man long on theatrics and short on talent took over Toscanini's podium for a guest performance. Shrilly, he demanded the musicians follow his commands.

In retaliation, they threatened to play it his way. That way, the men knew, would end in disaster.

The Boston contract, of course, doesn't make that much change.

But it does provide for an advisory committee to be made up of five members, chosen jointly by the orchestra members and the management. The new committee, which will be created for an initial two-year period, will serve on a consulting basis, advising the management on musical matters and musical aspects of the orchestra's functions.

THAT ISN'T ALL. Every orchestra has problems when it comes to advancement within the ranks. So a new set of auditions procedures has been agreed to.

The music director still decides who gets the front desks and hires the new players. But if there's an opening behind the front desks, particularly in the string sections, a committee of players will vote at voluntary auditions.

The new three-year agreement, result of 18 months of bargaining, also carries a hefty boost in pay.

Basic minimum salary will be $14,000 which includes an annual recording guarantee of $1,000. Contrast this with the previous basic minimum of $10,500.

Something new has also been added to symphony orchestra contracts. That is 15 five-day weeks in each of the contract's three years. The first year of the agreement will provide for eight of these weeks to have two consecutive days off. The number increases to 10 in the second and third years.

The wage levels will be subject to review at the end of two years but the changes are expected to cost some $250,000 the first year, an additional $150,000 the second and $100,000 for the last year of the contract.

WINNING A SPOT in the Boston Symphony has always been a real plum for musicians.

Thus, it's probably the understatement of the year when an orchestra committee spokesman notes: "We've come through with a contract . . . we think makes a Boston Symphony orchestra position easily the most desirable of any orchestra."

Erich Leinsdorf, who's music director, views the situation with considerable good cheer.

"I am greatly in favor of increased participation and responsibility for players, especially since with year-round work no one person can really be on top of every problem."

He ought to know.

THE LAKE ERIE Opera theater, which is part of the [illegible] Orchestra's program, this week gets moving [illegible] Severance hall. Smetana's The [illegible] Friday and Satur- [illegible] is

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

SEP 15 1968

MUSIC

New Contract Sounds Sweet To BSO Members

By JOHN THORNTON

FIVE DAYS BEFORE the current Boston Symphony player-management agreement expired, a new three year pact was announced, establishing record salaries for the musicians.

The minimum is now $14,000 a year, including a recording guarantee of $1,000, which is a considerable jump from the basic minimum of $10,500 agreed upon three years ago. It is estimated that the total cost of the increases will be $250,000 the first year, another $150,000 the second year and around $100,000 for the third year.

Another victory for the players is evident in the forming of an advisory committee to be chosen jointly by orchestra and management. The committee will act in "a consultative role," advising management on musical matters and musical aspects of the orchestra's function. It is to be given a two year trial period.

New audition procedures have also been announced, mostly concerned with the string sections, to assure a fair and impartial method of advancement.

Seating of the front desks remains the choice of the music director, but if an opening occurs in desks behind the first chairs, voluntary auditions will be arranged at which a sizable committee of string players will vote on the filling of the vacancy.

The regular conductor-music director (who will be William Steinberg at the end of this season) will continue to select any new orchestra member.

The new contract includes 15 five-day weeks in each of the three years of the agreement. In the first year, eight of these weeks will have two consecutive days off, with that number increasing to 10 in the second and third years.

There are several features about the announcement that deserve commendation: 1. There was never a hint that the Boston Symphony would strike if no new agreement was signed, saving the kind of disaster that followed in the wake of the strike by the Philadelphia Orchestra last fall; 2. The salary levels will reflect the playing standard, for the BSO will attract the very best of the new musicians from all over the country, thus keeping it among the best ensembles in the world.

Participation Welcomed

SPEAKING ON THE new role of importance granted orchestra members in artistic problems, Erich Leinsdorf says: "I am greatly in favor of increased participation and responsibility for players, especially since with year-round work no one person can really be on top of every problem. The whole trend to greater participation everywhere, be they musicians, industrial workers or students is very sound, and I am confident that it will prove of benefit to music."

On this same subject, George Zazofsky, chairman of the orchestra committee comments: ". . management's recognition of the orchestra's concern for its artistic wellbeing and of the artistic contribution and advice the players can offer is genuinely enlightened and progressive."

Zazofsky is also highly pleased with new string audition methods and the days-off weeks, which will relieve musicians of the burden of long all-work-no-play periods.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the BSO trustees, admits "we broke new ground in management-player relationships finding new ways to take advantage of the enormous fund of experience and talent we have in our orchestra."

The BSO is quite easily the busiest orchestra in the United States since it not only has a full regular winter season, but in addition it boasts a heavy spring Pops season and summers at Tanglewood, plus tours and recordings. Only the first desk players have any relief from this crushing schedule. They take time off during "Pops" before heading out for Lenox.

One source of revenue that is highly important to the orchestra appears at this point to be in doubt. When Leinsdorf succeeded Munch, RCA-Victor, which favored the appointment, made a great many recordings with the new director.

In the last few seasons rumors have persisted that Leinsdorf-BSO albums have not been selling well. There was even talk that the dispute between Leinsdorf and the trustees which broke into the open last year was partly instigated by poor record sales.

Steinberg on the other hand has been under various recording agreements, the longest with Capitol, which made many records with him and the Pittsburgh Symphony. It remains to be seen what RCA-Victor will do about new BSO releases when Leinsdorf's contract ends next year.

I can recall that when Munch was boss at Boston, RCA-Victor made the Chicago Symphony-Fritz Reiner team its favorite, almost totally ignoring the Hub orchestra. This decision made for bitter feelings, and other companies bid for the BSO services that year.

Recent Stereo Tapes

ON THE SUBJECT of recordings, there are many splendid new stereo tapes I've neglected to mention. New du- [illegible] techniques and improved signal to noise ratios have [illegible] problems which had annoyed industry [illegible]

[illegible] ment:

171.

Munch to Conduct Orchestre de Paris in Hub

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

French conductor Charles Munch is recovered from the siege of pneumonia that caused him to cancel his American tour last summer, and he will conduct at Symphony Hall, Boston, Wednesday evening, Oct. 23.

It will mark the Boston debut of the new Orchestre de Paris that makes its first tour of the United States this fall.

Orchestre de Paris is the first of four visiting orchestras in the season's Boston University Celebrity Series presented by Mrs. Aaron Richmond and Walter Pierce.

The others are the Toronto Symphony, Dec. 1; Cleveland Orchestra, Feb. 16; Minneapolis Symphony, Mar. 15.

Finest Players

Munch was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1949, when he succeeded the late Serge Koussevitzky, until Erich Leinsdorf took over in 1962.

The 100-member Orchestre de Paris was recruited in lengthy auditions from the finest players of former French orchestras. Its framework was the now disbanded Orchestre de la Societe de Concerts du Conservatoire.

Munch was nominated as music director by the French General Assembly, which is responsible for the creation of the Orchestre de Paris.

The Boston program is Debussy's "La MER," Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," and Brahms' First Symphony.

Among Munch's cancellations of the summer were the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga Performing Arts Center, and Cleveland Orchestra at Blossom Music Center.

ONE OF THE MOST valuable organizations in musical service will meet Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 15 and 16, in Minneapolis.

It will be the 19th annual conference of the National Association of Music Therapy. Panel-discussing their work at an international level, various authorities will explore such topics as "the Orff philosophy and technique of music deducation," and the use of music in the treatment of breathing disorders.

Special guest will be Mrs. Hubert H. Humphrey, wife of the Democratic candidate for the presidency.

UNIVERSITY of Massachusetts Concert Association began its big-time series last Wednesday with a recital by the English guitarist lutenist Julian Bream.

Remaining attractions are the Robert Wagner Chorale; Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Ruggiero Ricci, violinist; Rampal and Veyron-LaCroix Duo; Gina Bachauer, pianist; Weisberg Contemporary Chamber Ensemble, and New York Brass Quintet.

A GREAT DEAL of attention was paid to William Steinberg's appointment to succeed Erich Leinsdorf as conductor of the Boston Symphony, beginning in September, 1969.

Several other changes have been made in the conductorship of major symphony orchestras.

Baltimore Symphony has Brian Priestman as conductor for this season, to be succeeded by Sergiu Comissiona in 1969-70. Cleveland Philharmonic Orchestra is being conducted by Jose Serebrier.

Thomas Briccetti has assumed duties as associate conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony. Leonard Slatkin is new assistant conductor of the St. Louis Symphony.

Karel Ancerl, who had a sensational success at Tanglewood last summer, immediately succeeded Seiji Ozawa as conductor of the Toronto Symphony.

A sensational 22-year-old pianist, Andre Watts, would appear to be launched in earnest on a brilliant career.

Today, he opens Lincoln's Center's "Great Performers at Philharmonic Hall" series in New York City. Oct. 27 he begins a tour of seven recitals in Europe.

Watts will return to this country in December to resume the longest concert-tour of his six-year career, including 50 appearances in 18 states.

Among the major American orchestras with which he will be appearing this season are the Boston (in both Boston and New York), Cleveland, San Francisco, St. Louis, Detroit, Indianapolis, and Rochester.

It reminds one of the real start of the late William Kapell's career.

MUSIC

Raymond Merin

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
OCT 13 1968

The memorial service at Trinity Church — Milton

"LE BEAU CHARLES"

FUNERAL AND MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR CHARLES MUNCH

The state funeral for Charles Munch, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony, Grand officer of the Legion of Honor, and a French citizen of great prominence, took place on the morning of Tuesday November 12 at the Protestant Temple de l'Oratoire on the Rue Saint Honoré in Paris. The mourners included André Malraux, Minister of State for Cultural Affairs, Marcel Landowski, Director of Music at the Ministry, Maurice Doublet, Prefect Governor of Paris, Georges Auric, composer and former Director of the Paris Opera, and many other distinguished men and women. Erich Leinsdorf, Munch's successor as Music Director of the Boston Symphony, and Thomas D. Perry Jr, Manager, represented the Orchestra. The guard of honor and the band were members of the French Navy. The Reverend Georges Marchal conducted the service, and M. Landowski spoke a short eulogy.

Luben Yardanov, concertmaster of L'Orchestre de Paris, which Munch had organized in 1967, and with which he was touring at the time of his death, presided over the music during the funeral. The musical tributes were an organ prelude and fugue by J. S. Bach, the Adagio and Fugue for strings K. 546 by Mozart, the 'Holy song of thanksgiving to God' from the String quartet op. 132 by Beethoven, and the final chorus 'Ruht wohl' from the St John Passion of Bach.

Burial followed the service at the Louveciennes Cemetery near 'La Futaie', Charles Munch's eighteenth century home, where he had lived since he retired from the Boston Symphony in 1962.

On Thursday November 14 a memorial service was held at Trinity Church, Boston, conducted by the Rector, the Reverend Theodore P. Ferris, a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among those attending were Trustees of the Orchestra, headed by Talcott M. Banks, President; Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops; players of the Orchestra past and present; members of the Management and staff; the Consul General of France, M. Jacques Massenet; and many friends and admirers of Dr Munch.

Members of the Orchestra, conducted by Charles Wilson, played Barber's 'Adagio for strings'. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society joined the Orchestra in 'The shepherds' farewell' from L'Enfance du Christ by Berlioz, and the New England Conservatory Chorus sang the chorus 'Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen' from Ein deutsches Requiem by Brahms.

Choruses, congregation and orchestra joined to perform the final chorale from Bach's St John Passion, 'O Lord, thy little angel send'. Berj Zamkochian played Bach's Chorale prelude for organ 'Wenn wir in höchsten Nöten sein'.

CHARLES MUNCH

1891-1968

BY all odds, Charles Munch should have developed into a conductor in the German tradition. Alsatian-born, he had spent many years in Germany, and has been concertmaster of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra when Wilhelm Furtwängler was the conductor. Furtwängler was a conductor in the line that led back to Wagner, and his conducting was full of rhythmic changes and emotional underlinings.

But Munch went his own way, and his conducting was in the French style. That means elegance, proportion and clarity. He was most at home in French music, where his interpretations had the special grace and plasticity that the best French conductors alone seem to bring to that repertory.

He was an inspirational conductor who was capable of great flights of imagination. It was no secret in musical circles that he was not much of a disciplinarian. His rehearsals were easygoing and he never was interested in the fierce type of integrated ensemble represented by a Toscanini or a Szell. He was much more interested in color and in the over-all effect, rather than in details. One result was that the Boston Symphony under his directorship did not have the sheer virtuosity in ensemble favored by other orchestras. But, as a compensation, there were the moments when Munch kindled his players to a kind of personalized interpretation that is becoming rarer and rarer in these days of technical perfection and emotional inhibition.

—H. C. S.

Ports-of-Call

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE FIRST concert I ever heard in Europe was a program played by the Ysaye orchestra in Brussels with Lucien Capet as violin soloist in the Bach E Major concerto and both Beethoven romances. I heard Capet many times later but then only as the first violinist in his own string quartet.

Capet became a highly regarded teacher as well. One of his most distinguished pupils was Charles Munch. The latest notice which the recent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was accorded was of his appearance in New York a week ago as leader of the recently organized French orchestra, L'Orchestre de Paris.

Anyone who has followed Munch's career in America over the last 22 years might have known that he would play Berlioz' "Fantastique" Symphony and the second suite of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." He has always played these works at every important concert he has conducted and always earns, and deserves, superlative reports for his performances.

* * *

MUNCH WAS born in Strasbourg in 1891. Evidently if you want to live to a grand and vigorous old age, the vocation to take up is orchestra conducting. But his career discloses a pattern which was more or less the formula for any serious violin student of his day. From Paris and Capet, Munch went to Berlin and Carl Flesch. There were a half-dozen or more ports-of-call on the violin circuit in that era.

A violin student rarely stuck with one teacher, no matter how eminent he may have been. Along with Capet in Paris and Flesch in Berlin, there were several other capitals where magnets of equal attraction lived and worked. There was Enesco, also in Paris, Jeno Hubay in Budapest, Auer in St. Petersburg, Sevcik in Prague and Ysaye in Brussels. Each man was supposed to have some special method, even secret, which would push his pupils to the top—if not more swiftly at least more surely.

Charles Munch and Friend

* * *

CAPET, for instance, was considered the most suave bowmaster on the stage. His right arm had the grace of a ballet dancer. Incidentally, Capet also had a long, full black beard which he nonchalantly raised as he started to play to allow him to tuck his fiddle under his chin. He was supposed to have brought the technique of the bow to as great a degree of perfection as Sevcik did the technique of the left hand.

When Elman and Heifetz came out of Auer's class, he became the bright star of the violin firmament. The most brilliant students left their teachers to get the final lick and polish from Auer, figuring that if he could do it for one he could do it for another. They seemed not to stop to consider that maybe Mischa and Jascha themselves brought something to Auer.

The classes of these teachers were miniature leagues of nations. Every aspirant was from afar, it seemed—Australia, South America, Asia, to say nothing of the students from every country in Europe and from the United States and Canada where, especially, there was unaccountably a certain mild disdain for the local professors. Any music student, instrumental or vocal, of a generation ago just had to have the cachet or diploma of a European master.

* * *

MUNCH's peregrinations were typical. After finishing his studies he returned to his native Alsace, then German territory, to become professor of violin at the Strasbourg conservatory and concertmaster of the Strasbourg City Orchestra. He soon went on to be concertmaster and apprentice conductor at the Gewandhaus orchestra in Leipzig. His French debut took place at the head of the Straram orchestra. His progress through the Lamoureux and conservatory orchestras in Paris, his American debut in 1946 as guest of the Boston Symphony, and his appointment as musical director in Boston in 1949, are facts we all know pretty well. One of his greatest prides and glories was the tour in 1952 on which he took the BSO to his own country and Paris and many other European capitals.

Munch's name is inscribed on the permanent memorials of the Paris Conservatory walls along with his famous predecessors. Another of the less important and lasting bulletins on the Paris Conservatory walls, and indeed of every other important conservatory, are the little cards seeking applicants for orchestral positions in every city and country of the globe. "Wanted: oboe player in Sydney; cello in Cairo; principal second violin, Stockholm;" etc.

NOT ONLY are the students of any one professor an international group but normally the personnel of a city's orchestra is equally assembled from far and near. One of the distinctive qualities of the musical vocation at the orchestral level is its cosmopolitan solvency. Any musician visiting another city and going backstage at concert time is almost sure to find former colleagues and classmates and the reunions have a remarkable warmth and nostalgia. No musician who has pursued his studies to the higher grades ever is without acquaintances no matter to what metropolis he may go. The musical fraternity is world encircling and at that plane quite free of ill will. The practicing musician is practically assured of a friendly port-of-call no matter where he may wander.

DEAD AT 77 — Charles Munch, who became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949 and remained here for 13 years, has died in Richmond, Va., at the age of 77. (See story on Page 48.)

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
NOV 2 1968

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250
NOV 17 1968

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923
NOV 6 1968

New Engla

171

Munch to Conduct Orchestre de Paris in Hub

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

French conductor Charles Munch is recovered from the siege of pneumonia that caused him to cancel his American tour last summer, and he will conduct at Symphony Hall, Boston, Wednesday evening, Oct. 23.

It will mark the Boston debut of the new Orchestre de Paris that makes its first tour of the United States this fall.

Orchestre de Paris is the first of four visiting orchestras in the season's Boston University Celebrity Series presented by Mrs. Aaron Richmond and Walter Pierce.

The others are the Toronto Symphony, Dec. 1; Cleveland Orchestra, Feb. 16; Minneapolis Symphony, Mar. 15.

Finest Players

Munch was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1949, when he succeeded the late Serge Koussevitzky, until Erich Leinsdorf took over in 1962.

The 100-member Orchestre de Paris was recruited in lengthy auditions from the finest players of former French orchestras. Its framework was the now disbanded Orchestre de la Societe de Concerts du Conservatoire.

Munch was nominated as music director by the French General Assembly, which is responsible for the creation of the Orchestre de Paris.

The Boston program is Debussy's "La MER," Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," and Brahms' First Symphony.

Among Munch's cancellations of the summer were the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga Performing Arts Center, and Cleveland Orchestra at Blossom Music Center.

ONE OF THE MOST valuable organizations in musical service will meet Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 15 and 16, in Minneapolis.

It will be the 19th annual conference of the National Association of Music Therapy. Panel-discussing their work at an international level, various authorities will explore such topics as "the Orff philosophy and technique of music deducation," and the use of music in the treatment of breathing disorders.

Special guest will be Mrs. Hubert H. Humphrey, wife of the Democratic candidate for the presidency.

UNIVERSITY of Massachusetts Concert Association began its big-time series last Wednesday with a recital by the English guitarist lutenist Julian Bream.

Remaining attractions are the Robert Wagner Chorale; Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Ruggiero Ricci, violinist; Rampal and Veyron-LaCroix Duo; Gina Bachauer, pianist; Weisberg Contemporary Chamber Ensemble, and New York Brass Quintet.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

A GREAT DEAL of attention was paid to William Steinberg's appointment to succeed Erich Leinsdorf as conductor of the Boston Symphony, beginning in September, 1969.

Several other changes have been made in the conductorship of major symphony orchestras.

Baltimore Symphony has Brian Priestman as conductor for this season, to be succeeded by Sergiu Comissiona in 1969-70. Cleveland Philharmonic Orchestra is being conducted by Jose Serebrier.

Thomas Briccetti has assumed duties as associate conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony. Leonard Slatkin is new assistant conductor of the St. Louis Symphony.

Karel Ancerl, who had a sensational success at Tanglewood last summer, immediately succeeded Seiji Ozawa as conductor of the Toronto Symphony.

A sensational 22-year-old pianist, Andre Watts, would appear to be launched in earnest on a brilliant career.

Today, he opens Lincoln's Center's "Great Performers at Philharmonic Hall" series in New York City. Oct. 27 he begins a tour of seven recitals in Europe.

Watts will return to this country in December to resume the longest concert-tour of his six-year career, including 50 appearances in 18 states.

Among the major American orchestras with which he will be appearing this season are the Boston (in both Boston and New York), Cleveland, San Francisco, St. Louis, Detroit, Indianapolis, and Rochester.

It reminds one of the real start of the late William Kapell's career.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

OCT 13 1968

The memorial service at Trinity Church — Milton

"LE BEAU CHARLES"

FUNERAL AND MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR CHARLES MUNCH

The state funeral for Charles Munch, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony, Grand officer of the Legion of Honor, and a French citizen of great prominence, took place on the morning of Tuesday November 12 at the Protestant Temple de l'Oratoire on the Rue Saint Honoré in Paris. The mourners included André Malraux, Minister of State for Cultural Affairs, Marcel Landowski, Director of Music at the Ministry, Maurice Doublet, Prefect Governor of Paris, Georges Auric, composer and former Director of the Paris Opera, and many other distinguished men and women. Erich Leinsdorf, Munch's successor as Music Director of the Boston Symphony, and Thomas D. Perry Jr, Manager, represented the Orchestra. The guard of honor and the band were members of the French Navy. The Reverend Georges Marchal conducted the service, and M. Landowski spoke a short eulogy.

Luben Yardanov, concertmaster of L'Orchestre de Paris, which Munch had organized in 1967, and with which he was touring at the time of his death, presided over the music during the funeral. The musical tributes were an organ prelude and fugue by J. S. Bach, the Adagio and Fugue for strings K. 546 by Mozart, the 'Holy song of thanksgiving to God' from the String quartet op. 132 by Beethoven, and the final chorus 'Ruht wohl' from the St John Passion of Bach.

Burial followed the service at the Louveciennes Cemetery near 'La Futaie', Charles Munch's eighteenth century home, where he had lived since he retired from the Boston Symphony in 1962.

On Thursday November 14 a memorial service was held at Trinity Church, Boston, conducted by the Rector, the Reverend Theodore P. Ferris, a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among those attending were Trustees of the Orchestra, headed by Talcott M. Banks, President; Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops; players of the Orchestra past and present; members of the Management and staff; the Consul General of France, M. Jacques Massenet; and many friends and admirers of Dr Munch.

Members of the Orchestra, conducted by Charles Wilson, played Barber's 'Adagio for strings'. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society joined the Orchestra in 'The shepherds' farewell' from L'Enfance du Christ by Berlioz, and the New England Conservatory Chorus sang the chorus 'Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen' from Ein deutsches Requiem by Brahms.

Choruses, congregation and orchestra joined to perform the final chorale from Bach's St John Passion, 'O Lord, thy little angel send'. Berj Zamkochian played Bach's Chorale prelude for organ 'Wenn wir in höchsten Nöten sein'.

CHARLES MUNCH

1891-1968

BY all odds, Charles Munch should have developed into a conductor in the German tradition. Alsatian-born, he had spent many years in Germany, and has been concertmaster of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra when Wilhelm Furtwängler was the conductor. Furtwängler was a conductor in the line that led back to Wagner, and his conducting was full of rhythmic changes and emotional underlinings.

But Munch went his own way, and his conducting was in the French style. That means elegance, proportion and clarity. He was most at home in French music, where his interpretations had the special grace and plasticity that the best French conductors alone seem to bring to that repertory.

He was an inspirational conductor who was capable of great flights of imagination. It was no secret in musical circles that he was not much of a disciplinarian. His rehearsals were easygoing and he never was interested in the fierce type of integrated ensemble represented by a Toscanini or a Szell. He was much more interested in color and in the over-all effect, rather than in details. One result was that the Boston Symphony under his directorship did not have the sheer virtuosity in ensemble favored by other orchestras. But, as a compensation, there were the moments when Munch kindled his players to a kind of personalized interpretation that is becoming rarer and rarer in these days of technical perfection and emotional inhibition.

—H. C. S.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250

NOV 17 1968

Ports-of-Call

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE FIRST concert I ever heard in Europe was a program played by the Ysaye orchestra in Brussels with Lucien Capet as violin soloist in the Bach E Major concerto and both Beethoven romances. I heard Capet many times later but then only as the first violinist in his own string quartet.

Capet became a highly regarded teacher as well. One of his most distinguished pupils was Charles Munch. The latest notice which the recent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was accorded was of his appearance in New York a week ago as leader of the recently organized French orchestra, L'Orchestre de Paris.

Anyone who has followed Munch's career in America over the last 22 years might have known that he would play Berlioz' "Fantastique" Symphony and the second suite of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." He has always played these works at every important concert he has conducted and always earns, and deserves, superlative reports for his performances.

* * *

MUNCH WAS born in Strasbourg in 1891. Evidently if you want to live to a grand and vigorous old age, the vocation to take up is orchestra conducting. But his career discloses a pattern which was more or less the formula for any serious violin student of his day. From Paris and Capet, Munch went to Berlin and Carl Flesch. There were a half-dozen or more ports-of-call on the violin circuit in that era.

A violin student rarely stuck with one teacher, no matter how eminent he may have been. Along with Capet in Paris and Flesch in Berlin, there were several other capitals where magnets of equal attraction lived and worked. There was Enesco, also in Paris, Jeno Hubay in Budapest, Auer in St. Petersburg, Sevcik in Prague and Ysaye in Brussels. Each man was supposed to have some special method, even secret, which would push his pupils to the top—if not more swiftly at least more surely.

Charles Munch and Friend

* * *

CAPET, for instance, was considered the most suave bowmaster on the stage. His right arm had the grace of a ballet dancer. Incidentally, Capet also had a long, full black beard which he nonchalantly raised as he started to play to allow him to tuck his fiddle under his chin. He was supposed to have brought the technique of the bow to as great a degree of perfection as Sevcik did the technique of the left hand.

When Elman and Heifetz came out of Auer's class, he became the bright star of the violin firmament. The most brilliant students left their teachers to get the final lick and polish from Auer, figuring that if he could do it for one he could do it for another. They seemed not to stop to consider that maybe Mischa and Jascha themselves brought something to Auer.

The classes of these teachers were miniature leagues of nations. Every aspirant was from afar, it seemed—Australia, South America, Asia, to say nothing of the students from every country in Europe and from the United States and Canada where, especially, there was unaccountably a certain mild disdain for the local professors. Any music student, instrumental or vocal, of a generation ago just had to have the cachet or diploma of a European master.

* * *

MUNCH's peregrinations were typical. After finishing his studies he returned to his native Alsace, then German territory, to become professor of violin at the Strasbourg conservatory and concertmaster of the Strasbourg City Orchestra. He soon went on to be concertmaster and apprentice conductor at the Gewandhaus orchestra in Leipzig. His French debut took place at the head of the Straram orchestra. His progress through the Lamoureux and conservatory orchestras in Paris, his American debut in 1946 as guest of the Boston Symphony, and his appointment as musical director in Boston in 1949, are facts we all know pretty well. One of his greatest prides and glories was the tour in 1952 on which he took the BSO to his own country and Paris and many other European capitals.

Munch's name is inscribed on the permanent memorials of the Paris Conservatory walls along with his famous predecessors. Another of the less important and lasting bulletins on the Paris Conservatory walls, and indeed of every other important conservatory, are the little cards seeking applicants for orchestral positions in every city and country of the globe. "Wanted: oboe player in Sydney; cello in Cairo; principal second violin, Stockholm;" etc.

NOT ONLY are the students of any one professor an international group but normally the personnel of a city's orchestra is equally assembled from far and near. One of the distinctive qualities of the musical vocation at the orchestral level is its cosmopolitan solvency. Any musician visiting another city and going backstage at concert time is almost sure to find former colleagues and classmates and the reunions have a remarkable warmth and nostalgia. No musician who has pursued his studies to the higher grades ever is without acquaintances no matter to what metropolis he may go. The musical fraternity is world encircling and at that plane quite free of ill will. The practicing musician is practically assured of a friendly port-of-call no matter where he may wander.

DEAD AT 77 — Charles Munch, who became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949 and remained here for 13 years, has died in Richmond, Va., at the age of 77. (See story on Page 48.)

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

NOV 2 1968

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 128,923

NOV 6 1968

New Engla

172

HERALD NEWS (e).
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 41,700
NOV 7 1968

EXPRESS (e)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 28,750
NOV 7 1968

BULLETIN (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 147,150
NOV 7 1968

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543
NOV 7 1968

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 9,017
NOV 7 1968

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450
NOV 7 1968

Munch Dead; Memorial Program Planned In Hub

BOSTON (UPI)—The haunting, wistful strains of Gabriel Faure's "The Death of Melisande" will float through acoustically superb Symphony Hall tonight with deeper sentiment than usual.

Erich Leinsdrof selected the music as a program opening memorial for Charles Munch, his predecessor as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died Tuesday night in a Virginia hotel.

Faure's incidental music to the play "pelleas and Melisande" long had been a favorite of Munch, Leinsdorf recalled, and he planned to play the excerpt tonight and at the orchestra's weekend concerts.

Munch, a native of Alsace, Germany, was director of the Boston Symphony for 13 seasons, the longest service of any conductor here except Serge Koussevitzky, whom he succeeded in October 1949.

Munch, 77, was founder and musical director of the newly formed Orchestre de Paris. He was in Richmond to conduct the orchestra Wednesday night.

Found Dead In Hotel

A valet found Munch dead in his hotel room Wednesday morning. A medical examiner attributed his death to a heart attack. The white-haired conductor had a medical history of heart trouble.

Munch took the Boston Symphony on three international tours, two of them to Europe, including 1956. when the Boston group became the first western concert orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union. Four years later the Bostonians played in Japan, Taiwan, the Phillippines, Australia and New Zealand.

Recordings made with the Boston Symphony earned Munch many awards, including nine Grand Prix du Disques in France.

For the orchestra's 75th season, Munch commissioned works by some dozen composers, including Americans Leonard Bernstein, Aaron Copeland and Samuel Barber.

He was author of the book, "I Am a Conductor," which was published first in France and later in the United States, Great Britain, Switzerland and the U.S.S.R.

Fled Hitler

Munch left his German homeland when Hitler came to power in the 30s.

Munch was thoroughly French in temperment though when he was born in Strasbourg on Sept. 26, 1891, that Alsace city was under German rule.

Fled Hitler

Munch left his German homeland when Hitler came to power in the 30s.

Munch was thoroughly French in temperment though when he was born in Strasbourg on Sept. 26, 1891, that Alsace city was under German rule.

In his boyhood, Munch wanted to be a locomotive engineer and while studying violin he threatened to quit music to take up medicine.

World War I broke out as Munch was studying in Paris. He returned to Strasbourg where he was mobilized into Kaiser Wilhelm's army.

Wounded at Verdun, his fingers stiff from lack of practice, Munch left music and, at 26, upon discharge from the army, entered business.

Munch returned to music in 1920 and his progress was rapid, staring as a violinist with the Strasbourg Conservatory.

He won a competition to join the famed Gewandhaus Orchestra of Leipsig and also served on the faculty of the conservatory there.

Upon Hitler's ascent to power, Munch was ordered to become a German citizen as a price for continuing his work in Leipsig.

Aided By Heiress

He chose, instead, to leave for Paris, where Genevieve Aubry, heiress to a chocolate fortune, an old friend and later his wife, financed Munch's debut as conductor in France.

He founded the Paris Philharmonic and in 1938 became conductor of the famous Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

During World War II, Munch turned over his salary to the underground and used his position to protect French musicians.

The New York Philharmonic invited Munch to the United States but because of booking confusion he made his American debut in Boston.

His first program, climaxed by a reading of the rarely performed Saint-Saens Organ Symphony, won a boisterous ovation and endeared him to the Boston audience.

Immediate Hit

Known as "Le Beau Charles" in European musical circles, Munch made an immediate hit with the Boston music-going public.

Munch won acclaim as an interpreter of French music, particularly that of Hector Berlioz, but he also was convicing while conducting the German and Russian masters and some contemporary composers.

Critics frequently faulted Munch for allowing the Boston Symphony to become sloppy in its performances, but few could deny his canny ability to choose a program and excite audiences.

Favorite Munch Piece To Honor Him in Death

BOSTON (UPI) — The haunting strains of Gabriel Faure's "The Death of Melisande" will float through Symphony Hall tonight with deeper sentiment than usual.

Erich Leinsdorf selected the music as a program-opening memorial for Charles Munch, his predecessor as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died Tuesday night in a Virginia hotel.

Faure's incidental music to the play "Pelleas and Melisande" long had been a favorite of Munch, Leinsdorf recalled, and he planned to play the excerpt tonight and at the orchestra's weekend concerts.

Munch, 77, was director of the Boston Symphony for 13 seasons, the longest service of any conductor here except Serge Koussevitzky, whom he succeeded in October 1949.

* * *

Munch died while in Richmond, Va., to conduct the newly formed Orchestre de Paris, which he founded.

A valet found Munch dead in his hotel room Wednesday morning. A medical examiner attributed his death to a heart attack. The white-haired conductor had had a medical history of heart trouble.

Munch took the Boston Symphony on three international tours, two of them to Europe, including one in 1956, when the Boston group became the first Western concert orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union. Four years later the Bostonians played in Japan, Taiwan, the Philippines, Australia and New Zealand.

Recordings made with the Boston Symphony earned Munch many awards, including nine Grand Prix du Disques in France.

For the orchestra's 75th season, Munch commissioned works by some dozen composers, including Americans Leonard Bernstein, Aaron Copland and Samuel Barber.

He was author of the book "I Am a Conductor," which was published first in France and later in the United States, Great Britain, Switzerland and the U.S.S.R.

* * *

The New York Philharmonic invited Munch to the United States but, because of his booking confusion, he made his American debut in Boston.

His first program, climaxed by a reading of the rarely performed Saint-Saens Organ Symphony, won a boisterous ovation and endeared him to the Boston audience.

Known as "Le Beau Charles" in European musical circles, Munch made an immediate hit with the Boston music-going public.

Munch won acclaim as an interpreter of French music, particularly that of Hector Berlioz, but he also was convincing while conducting the German and Russian masters and some contemporary composers.

Charles Munch leads the BSO at a Tanglewood concert.

Noted Conductor Charles Munch Succumbs at 77

RICHMOND, Va. (UPI) — Charles Munch, 77-year-old musical director and conductor of the Orchestra de Paris, was found dead in his hotel room Wednesday morning, apparently the victim of a heart attack.

Discovered by Valet

His body was discovered by his valet.

A native of Germany, Munch left his homeland when Hitler came to power in the 30s. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1948 to 1962 and left that post to be head of Orchestra de Paris.

Orchestra de Paris is on tour in this country and Munch was to have conducted it Wednesday night here. His assistant conductor, Serge Baudo, was scheduled to replace him.

A state medical examiner listed the cause of death of Munch as "acute coronary deficiency." He had a history of heart attacks, authorities said.

Plays in Boston

The Orchestra de Paris played recently in Boston and won praise from the critics.

Munch was to have been a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony during its current 1968-1969 season. Last summer, because of illness, Munch canceled a guest appearance with the orchestra during the Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass.

CHARLES MUNCH

Illness also kept Munch away much of one season during his tenure in Boston and Swiss conductor Ernest Ansermet was called in as a substitute on that occasion.

Continued From Page 1

Munch was thoroughly French in temperament though when he was born in Strasbourg on Sept. 26, 1891, that Alsace city was under German rule.

In his boyhood, Munch wanted to be a locomotive engineer and while studying violin he threatened to quit music to take up medicine.

World War I broke out as Munch was studying in Paris. He returned to Strasbourg where he was mobilized into Kaiser Wilhelm's army.

Wounded at Verdun

Wounded at Verdun, his fingers stiff from lack of practice, Munch left the music and at 26, upon discharge from the army, entered business.

Munch returned to music in 1920 and his progress was rapid, starting as a violinist with the Strasbourg Conservatory.

He won a competition to join the famed Gewandhaus Orchestra of Leipsig and also served on the faculty of the conservatory there.

Upon Hitler's ascent to power, Munch was ordered to become a German citizen as a price for continuing his work in Leipsig.

Aided by Heiress

He chose, instead, to leave for Paris, where Genevieve Aubry, heiress to a chocolate fortune, an old friend and later his wife, financed Munch's debut as conductor in France.

He founded the Paris Philharmonic and in 1938 became conductor of the famous Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

During World War II, Munch turned over his salary to the underground and used his position to protect French musicians.

Invited to U. S.

The New York Philharmonic invited Munch to the United States but because of booking confusion he made his American debut in Boston.

His first program, climaxed by a reading of the rarely performed Saint-Saens Organ Symphony, won a boisterous ovation and endeared him to the Boston audience.

Known as "Le Beau Charles" in European musical circles, Munch made an immediate hit with the Boston music-going public.

Acclaimed as Interpreter

Munch won acclaim as an interpreter of French music, particularly that of Hector Berlioz, but he also was convincing while conducting the German and Russian masters and some contemporary composers.

Critics frequently faulted Munch for allowing the Boston Symphony to become sloppy in its performances, but few could deny his canny ability to choose a program and excite audiences.

"In the relation of conductor and orchestra, there are two sides, the artistic and the human, and to reconcile the two is impossible," Munch once explained.

Munch was a gentleman and like all Frenchmen, emotional, compassionate and shy. He is remembered by music lovers of Western Massachusetts as one who added world stature to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he served as music director for 13 years.

Hailed by 15,300

On Aug. 26, 1962, an audience of 15,300 hailed Munch at Tanglewood with cheers rivaling those of a football throng as he stepped down from the podium into retirement. For fully five minutes the ovation reverberated through the giant Music Shed at the Berkshire Music Center.

Munch returned infrequently to Tanglewood as guest conductor at the request of Erich Leinsdorf, his successor. In Lenox and the environs of Southern Berkshire, Munch is recalled by those who frequented the BSO rehearsals as a colorful, easily recognizable figure.

In rehearsal, Munch would coax his men in French, English and German. He might even go on bended knee to woo more tone from the cellos.

Seldom as Rehearsed

A performance conducted by Munch in the Berkshires was never exactly as rehearsed. Before an audience, Munch leaned heavily on the inspiration of the moment.

The late Willard Clark, who followed Munch's career as music critic for The Springfield Union, gave a rave review to the conductor's farewell concert at Tanglewood.

"His career with the orchestra ended on a peak of triumph, as, once again, he fused the members of the orchestra into a single instrument for a performance of the Ninth Symphony by Beethoven," Clark wrote.

"Persons in the crowd beneath him, pressed close to the stage, were packed into a tight mass. They stepped on each other's toes and elbowed each other as they cheered and clapped," Clark said for readers of The Union.

Munch followed the vibrant and dramatic Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, second oldest in the nation. It was not an easy task, for Koussevitzky, who founded the Berkshire Music Center, had charmed music lovers for 25 years, both by his musicianship and his social gregariousness.

During his tenure, the BSO made four extended tours — a transcontinental tour of the United States in 1953 and three abroad through Europe, Soviet Russia and the Far East in 1952, 1956 and 1960.

Under his leadership, the orchestra won five New York Music Critics Circle awards, two American-International Music Fund awards and others for outstanding recordings.

Interested in Modern Music

Like Koussevitzky, Munch was interested in modern music. During his Boston tenure, he programmed 168 contemporary works, 36 of which were by American composers.

At Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston orchestra, Munch is recalled as a shy man who avoided the post-concert social gatherings which Koussevitsky enjoyed. At a concert's conclusion, he would hurry from the stage, nodding to waiting well-wishers and drive to his quarters.

Charles Munch, 77, Dead; Leader Of Boston And Other Symphonies

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — A concert by the Orchestra de Paris was performed Wednesday with no applause, a silent tribute to Charles Munch, the orchestra's musical director and conductor who died earlier in the day.

The body of the 77-year-old world reknown musician was found in bed in his hotel room by his valet. Medical examiners said Munch, who had a history of heart attacks, died at approximately 6 a.m. from acute coronary deficiency.

The concert Munch was to have conducted at Richmond's Mosque Auditorium was performed instead under the baton of Sergei Baudo, the orchestra's permanent conductor.

In Paris, the French Ministry of Cultural Affairs said today the orchestra will continue its tour in the Unites States and Mexico.

The orchestra will be directed by Baudo and guest conductors Jean Martinon and Jean-Pierre Jacquillat. No consideration has been given to naming a successor to Munch.

A native of Alsace, Munch went to Paris in the 1030s when Hitler came to power and founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra. After conducting five years, he gained one of the most prestigious musical posts in France, director of the "Societe des Concerts" and professor of conducting at the Paris Conservatory.

During the German occupation of France in World War II, Munch continued to conduct but donated his salary to the French underground and used the prestige of his position to protect French musicians from harassment by the Germans.

Charles Munch

For this, the French government at the close of the war made him an officer of the Legion of Hnor.

Munch was appointed music director of the Boston Symphony in 1949, following the death of Serge Koussevitsky. He previously had made his North American debut with the orchestra in the United States and Europe. He was appointed music director of the Orchestra de Paris in 1967 and was leading the new symphony group on its first North American tour when he died.

His body was being sent to France for burial.

Munch Succumbs at 77

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
NOV 7 1968 New England

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 99,032

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800
NOV 7 1968

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 27,048
NOV 7 1968

THE SUN
SPRINGFIELD, O.
A.M. - CIRC. 19,665

NEWS (E)
MILFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 10,000
NOV 7 1968

NOV-7-68 047

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 6,100
NOV 7 1968

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
NOV 7 1968

PARIS SYMPHONY DIRECTOR DIES

RICHMOND, Va. — (AP) — Charles Munch, 77-year-old musical director and conductor of the Paris Symphony Orchestra was found dead in his hotel room Wednesday.

Munch's body was found in bed by his valet when he tried to awaken Munch, who was to conduct the orchestra in a concert Wednesday night.

Medical examiners said the cause of death was acute coronary deficiency. Munch had a history of heart attacks, doctors said.

The native of Alsace had been conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1948 until 1963 when he was selected to head the Orchestra de Paris.

When Hitler came to power in the 1930s Munch left Germany for Paris where he founded the Paris Philharmoni Orchestra, became its regular conductor and in 1938 became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

He continued to conduct during the German occupation of France in World War II but turned his salary over to the underground and used his position to protect French musicians. After the war the liberated French government made him an officer of the Legion of Honor.

His body will be sent to France for burial.

UNION LEADER (M) & (E)
MANCHESTER, N. H.
NOV 7 1968 New England

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 56,000
NOV 7 1968 New England

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NOV 7 1968 New England

DAILY OKLAHOMAN
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA
175,904 Circ.
Date 11-7-68

Charles Munch Dies at 77, Boston Symphony Conductor

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Charles Munch, eminent French conductor, died in his sleep Tuesday night in Richmond, Va., while on tour with his new Orchestre de Paris. He was 77.

He was to conduct a concert last night.

His body was discovered by his valet.

All of Munch's American engagements as guest conductor were cancelled last summer because of pneumonia. He was scheduled for major concerts at Tanglewood, Saratoga Performing Arts Center, and Blossom Hill (Cleveland) festivals, among others.

Charles Munch

Boston Symphony

Munch succeeded the late Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1949. He held that post for 13 years, making his final appearance with the Boston Symphony, as regular conductor, in August of 1962.

Following his performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Munch received one of the greatest ovations in Tanglewood history.

Munch appeared in Worcester but once with the Boston Symphony. It was on March 10, 1958, on the Civic Music series.

The program was Handel's "Water Music" Suite, the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

After his retirement from the Boston Symphony in 1962, Erich Leinsdorf was appointed to succeed him. Leinsdorf will yield the baton to William Steinberg in September 1969.

Munch continued his career as guest conductor of many orchestras throughout the world.

Scheduled in Hub

He was scheduled to guest-conduct the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Feb. 14, 15, 18 and 20, 1969. The programs were to be announced.

Munch was highly respected and admired by members of the Boston Symphony.

When things went wrong at rehearsal, he was capable of enough humility to say to the men, "Help me." He frequently went backstage to compliment other conductors on their performances.

Unlike some other conductors, Munch did not fire players capriciously over alleged inefficiencies or the crossing of personal paths.

The thought of firing men was horrifying to him. He thought, as do many Europeans, that a symphony job should be a job for life.

In an interview with Harry Shapiro, horn player for 30 years with the Boston Symphony, Shapiro said.

Pro Orchestra

"Munch considered us as a 'pro' orchestra and would not treat us like students. He wanted music to speak for itself. tempos changed from rehearsal to performance, and he tended to play too fast."

"But," Shapiro added, "he put us on our toes so that we could follow any beat and tempo at any time."

Munch came to the Boston Symphony in the prime of his musical life, with an illustrious European career to commend him.

He was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father. His first teacher was his father, Ernest Munch, director of the Saint-Guillaume Chorus is Strasbourg.

At the age of 28 he was made professor at the Strasbourg conservatory and conductor of its orchestra.

Munch first came to this country in December 1946, when he made his American debut conducting the Boston Symphony, as guest.

His last appearance in Boston was two weeks ago, Oct. 23, marking the Boston debut of his new Orchestre de Paris.

The 100-member orchestra was recruited in lengthy auditions from the finest players of former French orchestras. Its framework was the now disbanded Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

Munch was recently nominated music director of the new orchestra by the French General Assembly, which is responsible for the creation of the Orchestre de Paris.

French Music

His specialty was French music of the romantic and impressionistic eras. He was also a zealous champion of new American music.

For his Boston and touring program with the Orchestre de Paris, Munch selected Debussy's "La Mer," Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," and Brahms' First Symphony.

The American public knew Munch as a completely dedicated conductor, a musician oblivious to outward show. He was not only absorbed by the music he conducted but possessed by it.

Many felt that he could penetrate and communicate music as perhaps no other conductor.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350
NOV 7 1968 New England

Paris Leader Of Symphony Found Dead

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — Charles Munch, 77-year-old musical director and conductor of the Paris symphony orchestra was found dead in his hotel room Wednesday.

Munch's body was found in bed by his valet when he tried to awaken Munch, who was to conduct the orchestra in a concert Wednesday night.

Medical examiners said the cause of death was acute coronary deficiency. Munch had a history of heart attacks, doctors said.

The native of Alsace had been conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1948 until 1963 when he was selected to head the Orchestra de Paris.

When Hitler came to power in the 1930's Munch left Germany for Paris where he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, became its regular conductor and in 1938 became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

He continued to conduct during the German occupation of France in World War II but turned his salary over to the underground and used his position to protect French musicians.

After the war the liberated French government made him an officer of the Legion of Honor.

His body will be sent to France for burial.

STAR (E)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 306,200
NOV 7 1968

Charles Munch Dies; Symphony Conductor

Charles Munch, who came to the United States unheralded in 1946 and became the conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony, died in his sleep early yesterday in Richmond. His valet found him dead in his bed in the John Marshall Hotel.

The 77-year-old conductor had been scheduled to lead a concert of the 120-member Orchestre de Paris in Richmond last night. Mr. Munch helped form the group for the French government and the city of Paris, and was named its director last year. He led the orchestra in Constitution Hall here a week ago, on the group's first tour of the United States, in a typical Munch program — works by Berlioz, Duelleux, and Ravel.

CHARLES MUNCH

Son of Organist

Mr. Munch was born in Strasbourg in Alsace-Lorraine, which was then a German province. His mother was the daughter of a clergyman, and his father was Ernest Munch, an organist who founded the choir of St. Guillaume. His brother, Fritz, also became a noted musician.

After studying violin at the Strasbourg Conservatory and in Berlin and Paris, he returned to Strasbourg to become a professor at the conservatory and the city orchestra's concert master.

In Leipzig, Germany, he studied conducting under Wilhelm Furtwaengler, and was a violinist, concertmaster and apprentice conductor at the Gewandhaus there. He became leader of the orchestra in 1926.

Took Permanent Post

Making his French debut in 1932, he performed for the first time in Paris the next year, conducting the Staram Orchestra.

He also conducted the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris.

From 1935 to 1938 he was named permanent conductor of the Orchestre de la Societe Philharmonique, another Paris orchestra he helped found.

He also was the leading conductor at the International Society for Contemporary Music, a series of programs performed at the Paris Exposition of 1937.

Mr. Munch was named director of the Orchestre du Conservatoire, the city's oldest orchestra, in 1938.

Led BBC Orchestra

In World War II, during the German occupation of Paris he continued to conduct the orchestra, but he gave his fees to the French resistance and was able, he said, to prevent the Nazis from removing orchestra members because of race or religion.

The first French conductor invited to conduct in England after the war, he led the British Broadcasting Co. orchestra and also orchestras in Switzerland, the Netherlands, and Belgium. He also appeared at the International Festival of Music in Zurich in 1946 and also at festivals in Prague and Strasbourg.

Making his American debut with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in 1947 after appearances as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony, he was hailed by the critics.

In October 1949 he succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony. He continued as conductor of the orchestra until 1962, also serving as music director for the last two years.

Acclaimed for his recordings, he was awarded the Grand Prix du Disque eight times between 1949 to 1961, and received awards from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences in 1960 and 1962.

Mr. Munch was decorated a chevalier in the Legion of Honor. He also was a member of the French Order of Arts and Letters and the Order of the Cedar of Lebanon.

He leaves a brother and a sister.

Burial will be in France.

Munch Earned Music Lovers' Esteem In Symphony Hall, Tanglewood Concerts

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Many people who frequent Symphony Hall in Boston or Tanglewood in Lenox probably can recite the names of the conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as they can recall the names of our presidents or of the English kings. Within the memory of a multitude of such a category of music lovers, the name of Charles Munch, who died in Richmond, Va., will be remembered with affection.

Munch followed Serge Koussevitzky on the Boston Orchestra's podium and stayed 13 years, from 1949 to 1962. The task of replacing a man like Koussevitzky, as in the analogous case when Arturo Toscanini left the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, was a formidable one but Munch, different in nearly every aspect of his skills, soon established himself as a personage worthy of the eminence the job imposes.

Koussevitzky had been a fastidious leader, a man of taste and penetrating musical insight. Not that Munch was lacking in any such quality, but he was more the open-field runner, looking for an opening to carry the ball for an emotional gain. He was a spontaneous performer—a pattern which carried him and the orchestra, and the audience, to sweeps of giddy exhilaration, and flights of imaginative poetry but also, on occasion, to mild if unobserved pitfalls.

Retiring as Person

He was a large and heavy man without any suggestion of embonpoint; dignified and courteous to his audiences and individuals, but shy and retiring. Before his orchestra he could be completely unaware of exhibitionism and without inhibitions, but in the privacy of a living room he was the least desirous to take the floor and dominate the company.

Munch was born in Germany in 1891, but, like Koussevitzky, who came from Russia, he was drawn to Paris by the musical magnetism there before and after World War I and became totally Gallicized. Indeed, when the Cultural Ministry, the City of Paris and the regional counties last year decided to inaugurate an orchestra which would compete on the level of the Berlin, Vienna, London, Boston and Philadelphia orchestras and rise above the orchestral mediocrity which has persisted in Paris for so many years, it was to the 76-year-old Charles Munch that Marcel Landowski, director of music attached to the Ministry, turned for a leader.

All France looks to the new Orchestre de Paris to help recoup their country's lost cultural grandeur. The permanent chief of the orchestra is Serge Baudo, a very capable and respected young conductor, but for export it was on the prestige of a man like Munch that the Ministry decided to rely, and it was while on tour here that the venerable artist was stricken.

Born to Musical Family

